PREFACE

Types of World Literature offers to the student and the general reader selections from the accepted masterpieces of the world. It is intended primarily to meet the increasing demand for courses in comparative literature. More and more has it become apparent that the literature of one nation can be best appreciated when studied in relation to the literature of other countries. In the study of any given type, it is more profitable for a student to become familiar with the masters—to compare the work of Aeschylus, Shakespeare, and Ibsen in the art of tragedy, and of Homer, Dante, and Milton in the epic—than to devote his attention to many minor writers of a single period or country. Only by studying the great artists of many countries can he form standards of comparison and begin to acquire a discriminating taste for literary excellence.

The present anthology includes specimens from literature outside the strict forms of epic, lyric, drama, and their cognates. The student who is becoming acquainted for the first time with European belles lettres, should be led to realize that there is a literature of biography, politics, history, and philosophy—as well as scientific contributions to these fields—which cannot be neglected in a liberal education. These less aesthetic, but more tangible types of literary endeavor have an immediate appeal for many students unresponsive as yet to more difficult and abstract literary types like lyric poetry. We have found by experience in the classroom that some students acquire their first zest for reading from the spirited history of a Macaulay, or the picturesque autobiography of a Benvenuto Cellini. Others see a new world opening after reading the apology and death of Socrates from the dialogues of Plato; they find themselves for the first time sharers in the philosophic and moral thought of the world. After they have become absorbed in any one of these fields of literary endeavor, the teacher by tactful management can readily lead them on to the enjoyment of others. To succeed in creating a love, even in a single student a year, for the best that has been known and thought in the world of literature should be encouragement enough for the teacher who loves his classics, although he may realize that a cultivated taste is the final result only of years of diligent study, and that comparatively few ever achieve it. To increase the number of lovers of the literature of the world is, then, the intention of this volume.

The editors are indebted to the kindness of their friend Professor Robert Shafer of the University of Cincinnati for permission to reprint the textual notes to certain poems from his well-known volumes, From Beowulf to Thomas Hardy.

THE EPIC, one of the oldest forms of literature, is thought to have developed from the gradual amalgamation, through many centuries, of popular heroic tales. The authors of these original folk tales are unknown, but the essential unity of finished epics like the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Nibelungenlied, composed though they be of many stories originally of independent origin, has led many critics to believe that conscious literary artists were responsible for their present form. Homer (c. 850 B. C.) is the name of the poet to whom are attributed the two great Greek epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey.

The folk epic, as distinguished from other types of literature, is a long, poetic narrative of the adventures of national heroes in love and war. In epics of popular origin, attention is centered upon bravery and skill in battle, aided or thwarted by gods with supernatural powers. But in the art epic a more human element appears. Vergil's Æneid, for example, though written in close imitation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, contains three books wholly given over to the love episodes of Dido and Æneas.

The transition from folk epics to the romances of the Middle Ages occurs, in fact, through this extensive development of the love interest, which, begun by Vergil (70-19 B. C.), finally grew to dominate the story. The hero no longer is, like Achilles, distinguished chiefly for his deeds of valor, but, like Launcelot in the great prose romance Mort D'Arthur of Thomas Malory (c. 1400-1471 A. D.), has become the ideal lover, who braves all hardships for the sake of his lady, and woos her according to the codes of medieval chivalry. Magic enchantment and the mysteries of the Christian religion take the place of the supernatural gods. Deeds of prowess are still related, as in the stories of the Knights of the Round Table questing for the Holy Grail. But the intricacies of romantic love call for elaborate and complicated plots with numerous sub-plots, and many characters of importance, until the essential unity of the classical epic dealing with a central figure or theme, like the wrath of Achilles, or the wanderings of Ulysses or Æneas, is lost.

Both the Epic and the Romance embody in varying degrees the culture of a race or a civilization. The Iliad, in celebrating the wrath of Achilles, depicts the victory of the Greeks over the Trojan barbarians. Through it we approach the heart of ancient Greece and perceive what manner of men her heroes were. The Odyssey sums up all that the Greeks endured in their wanderings upon the sea. The Æneid, combining themes from both the Iliad and the Odyssey, retells the fall of Troy, but keeps, as its central thought, the founding of Rome and the Latin race. The Eddas collected in the eleventh century A. D., and the Nibelungenlied written in the twelfth century, present, respectively, the mythology and the legends of the Scandinavian and the Germanic peoples. This poetry arises out of the great migrations of tribes that wrecked the Roman Empire and laid the foundations of European civilization. "The Nibelungenlied," says Genung, "marks the culmination of the great process which made Rome a German Empire and transformed the invading hordes into a highly civilized people."

Throughout the ages following the Germanic invasions the medieval church stood as the defender and preserver of civilization. It exercised upon the barbarians that authority with which the Roman Empire had formerly commanded the obedience of its people. The Divine Comedy of Dante (1265-1331) is an epic which reveals the life and thoughts of this civilization which had become absorbed in Christian theology promulgated by the Church of Rome. Dante's poem is an epitome of medieval Christianity. Replete though it be with local allusions to politics and party strife, it is in essence a subjective epic upon the pilgrimage of the human soul. The Divine Comedy shows how man may achieve salvation by comprehending the moral design of God in creation and man's relation to it. The personal journey of Dante through Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise is an allegory of the conduct and consequences of every human life. The term Comedy is used by Dante in its medieval sense, to denote a story with a happy ending.

About 1100 A. D. there came to fruition in the Song of Roland an epic recalling and preserving the unity and the emphasis upon personal valor found in other primitive epics. This epic, celebrating the exploits of Charlemagne's nephew, Roland, against the Saracens in the pass at Roncesvalles, epitomizes those early struggles of the Franks that checked the onrush of the Moors, and finally saved Europe from Mohammedan domination. Only after Roland's death do we hear in a few lines that his loved one, Aude the Fair, died of grief. But when the story passes to Italy it is reworked by Ariosto (1474-1533) into an elaborate romance. Roland, as portrayed in Orlando Furioso, is the hero of numerous adventures, going mad for love of the false Angelica.

Tasso (1544-1595) in his epic Jerusalem Delivered portrays the great historic period of the Crusaders in the Holy Land. Following the example of Dante rather than Ariosto, he employed the romantic epic not only for pleasure, but for moral instruction and for the inculcation of the Christian virtues. Spenser (1552-1599) in The Faerie Queene essayed a moral purpose more ambitious than Tasso's, "to fashion a gentleman or noble person in virtuous and gentle discipline." Into his elaborate romance of knights and ladies he weaves obscure moral, religious, and political allegories.

The greatest epic from the pen of an Englishman, Paradise Lost by John Milton (1608-1674), returns to the epic of classical form, especially Vergil's Æneid. Of all epics it has the loftiest purpose, "to assert eternal Providence and to justify the ways of God to man." Milton's epic, therefore, concerns all Christendom and the fate of the human race. The splendor of Milton's characterization of Satan in the early books has led as keen a critic as Dryden to declare that Satan is the hero of the poem, but in the later books Milton carefully shows him as neither heroic nor victorious, and deliberately degrades him. For sustained and lofty purpose and for what Matthew Arnold terms "the grand style" in poetry, the epic of Milton is unsurpassed.

THE ILIAD¹

BOOK III

MEANTIME to white-arm'd Helen Iris sped,
The heav'nly messenger: in form she seem'd
Her husband's sister, whom Antenor's son,
The valiant Helicaon had to wife,
Laodice, of Priam's daughters all Loveliest of face: she in her chamber found Her whom she sought: a mighty web she wove,
Of double woof and brilliant hues; whereon
Was interwoven many a toilsome strife
Of Trojan warriors and of brass-clad Greeks,
For her encounter'd at the hand of Mars. 11
Beside her Iris stood, and thus she spoke:
"Come, sister dear, and see the glorious deeds

¹Lines 121-244. Translation by Edward, Earl of Derby.

Of Trojan warriors and brass-clad Greeks.
They who erewhile, impatient for the fight,
Roll'd o'er the plain the woful tide of war, 16
Now silent sit, the storm of battle hush'd,
Reclining on their shields, their lances bright
Beside them reared; while Paris in the midst
And warlike Meneläus, stand prepar'd 20
With the long spear for thee to fight; thyself
The prize of conquest and the victor's wife."
Thus as she spoke, in Helen's breast arose
Fond recollection of her former Lord,
Her home, and parents; o'er her head she threw 25
A snowy veil; and shedding tender tears
She issu'd forth, not unaccompanied;
For with her went fair Aethra, Pittheus'
child,
And stag-ey'd Glymene, her maidens twain.
They quickly at the Scaean gate arriv'd. 30
Attending there on aged Priam, sat
The Elders of the city; Panthöus,

And Lampus, and Thymætes; Clytius,
 Bold Icetæon, and Ucalegon,
 With sage Antenor, wise in council both: 35
 All these were gather'd at the Scaean gate;
 By age exempt from war, but in discourse
 Abundant, as the cricket, that on high From topmost boughs of forest tree sends forth

His delicate music; so on Ilium's tow'rs 40
 Sat the sage chiefs and councillors of Troy.
 Helen they saw, as to the tow'r she came;
 And "'tis no marvel," one to other said,
 "The valiant Trojans and the well-greav'd
 Greeks

For beauty such as this should long endure 45
 The toils of war; for goddess-like she seems;
 And yet, despite her beauty, let her go,
 Nor bring on us and on our sons a curse."
 Thus they; but aged Priam Helen call'd:

"Come here, my child, and sitting by my side, 50
 From whence thou canst discern thy former
 Lord,

His kindred, and thy friends (not thee I
 blame,
 But to the Gods I owe this woful war),
 Tell me the name of yonder mighty chief Among the Greeks a warrior brave and strong: 55

Others in height surpass him; but my eyes
 A form so noble never yet beheld,
 Nor so august; he moves, a King indeed!"

To whom in answer, Helen, heav'nly fair:
 "With rev'rence, dearest father, and with shame 60

I look on thee: oh would that I had died
 That day when hither with thy son I came,
 And left my husband, friends, and darling
 child,

And all the lov'd companions of my youth:
 That I died not, with grief I pine away. 65
 But to thy question; I will tell thee true;
 Yon chief is Agamemnon, Atreus' son,

Wide-reigning, mighty monarch, ruler good,
 And valiant warrior; in my husband's name,
 Lost as I am, I call'd him brother once." 70

She spoke: th' old man admiring gaz'd,
 and cried,

"Oh bless'd Atreides, child of happy fate,
 Favour'd of Heav'n! how many noble Greeks
 Obey thy rule! In vine-clad Phrygia once
 I saw the hosts of Phrygian warriors wheel 75
 Their rapid steeds; and with them, all the bands

Of Atreus, and of Mygdon, godlike King,
 Who lay encamp'd beside Sangarius' stream:
 I too with them was number'd, in the day
 When met them in the field the Amazons, 80
 The woman-warriors; but their forces all
 Reach'd not the number of the keen-ey'd
 Greeks."

Ulysses next the old man saw, and ask'd,
 "Tell me again, dear child, who this may be,
 In stature less than Atreus' royal son, 85
 But broader-shoulder'd, and of ampler chest.
 His arms are laid upon the fertile plain,
 But he himself is moving through the ranks,
 Inspecting, like a full-fleec'd ram, that moves Majestic through a flock of snow-white ewes." 90

To whom Jove's offspring, Helen, thus replied:

"The wise Ulysses that, Laertes' son:
 Though bred in rugged Ithaca, yet vers'd
 In ev'ry stratagem, and deep device."

"O woman," then the sage Antenor said, 95
 "Of these thy words I can the truth avouch;
 For hither when on thine account to treat,
 Brave Menelæus and Ulysses came,
 I lodg'd them in my house, and lov'd them
 both, 99

And studied well the form and mind of each.
 As they with Trojans mix'd in social guise,
 When both were standing, o'er his comrade
 high

With broad-set shoulders Menelæus stood;
 Seated, Ulysses was the nobler form:
 Then, in the great Assembly, when to all 105
 Their public speech and argument they fram'd,

In fluent language Menelæus spoke,
 In words though few, yet clear; though young in years,

No wordy babbler, wasteful of his speech:
 But when the skill'd Ulysses rose to speak,
 With down-cast visage would he stand, his
 eyes 111

Bent on the ground; the staff he bore, nor back

He wav'd, nor forward, but like one untaught,

He held it motionless; who only saw Would say that he was mad, or void of sense; 115

But when his chest its deep-ton'd voice sent
 forth,

With words that fell like flakes of wintry
 snow,

No mortal with Ulysses could compare: 118
Then little reck'd we of his outward show."

At sight of Ajax next th' old man enquir'd;
"Who is yon other warrior, brave and strong, Tow'ring o'er all with head and shoulders broad?"

To whom, in answer, Helen, heav'nly fair:
"Gigantic Ajax that, the prop of Greece;
And by his side Idomeneus of Crete 125 Stands godlike, circled round by Cretan chiefs.

The warlike Meneläus welcom'd him Oft in our palace, when from Crete he came.

Now all the other keen-ey'd Greeks I see, Whom once I knew, and now could call by name; 130

But two I miss, two captains of the host,
My own two brethren, and my mother's
sons,

Castor and Pollux; Castor, charioteer Unrivalled, Pollux, matchless pugilist.
In Lacedaemon have they stay'd behind? 135
Or can it be, in ocean-going ships
That they have come indeed, but shun to join

The fight of warriors, fearful of the shame,
And deep disgrace that on my name attend?"
Thus she; but they beneath the teeming
earth 140

In Lacedaemon lay, their native land.*

BOOK XXIV

THE games were ended, and the multitude
Amid the ships their sev'ral ways dispers'd:
Some to their supper, some to gentle sleep
Yielding, delighted; but Achilles still Mourn'd o'er his lov'd companion; not on
him 5

Lighted all-conqu'ring sleep, but to and fro
Restless he toss'd, and on Patroclus thought,
His vigour and his courage; all the deeds
They two together had achiev'd; the toils,
The perils they had undergone, amid 10
The strife of warriors, and the angry waves.
Stirr'd by such mem'ries, bitter tears he shed;
Now turning on his side, and now again
Upon his back; then prone upon his face;
Then starting to his feet, along the shore 15
All objectless, despairing, would he roam;
Nor did the morn, above the sea appearing,
Unmark'd of him arise; his flying steeds

He then would harness, and, behind the car
The corpse of Hector trailing in the dust, 20
Thrice make the circuit of Patroclus' tomb;
Then would he turn within his tent to rest,
Leaving the prostrate corpse with dust de-
fil'd;

But from unseemly marks the valiant dead
Apollo guarded, who with pity view'd 25
The hero, though in death; and round him
threw

His golden ægis; nor, though dragg'd along,
Allow'd his body to receive a wound.

Thus foully did Achilles in his rage
Misuse the mighty dead; the blessed Gods 30
With pitying grief beheld the sight, and urg'd

That Hermes should by stealth the corpse remove.

The counsel pleas'd the rest; but Juno still,
And Neptune, and the blue-ey'd Maid, re-tain'd

The hatred, unappeas'd, with which of old 35
Troy and her King and people they pursued;
Since Paris to the rival Goddesses,
Who to his sheepfold came, gave deep offence,
Preferring her who brought him in return
The fatal boon of too successful love. 40

But when the twelfth revolving day was
come,

Apollo thus th' assembled Gods address'd:
"Shame on ye, Gods, ungrateful! have ye
not,

At Hector's hand, of bulls and choicest goats
Receiv'd your off'rings meet? and fear ye
now 45

E'en his dead corpse to save, and grant his wife,

His mother, and his child, his aged sire
And people, to behold him, and to raise
His fun'ral pile, and with due rites entomb?
But fell Achilles all your aid commands; 50
Of mind unrighteous, and inflexible
His stubborn heart; his thoughts are all of
blood;

E'en as a lion, whom his mighty strength
And dauntless courage lead to leap the fold,
And 'mid the trembling flocks to seize his prey; 55

E'en so Achilles hath discarded ruth,
And conscience, arbiter of good and ill.
A man may lose his best-lov'd friend, a son,
Or his own mother's son, a brother dear:

He mourns and weeps, but time his grief allays, 60

*Book VI (lines 279-611) and Book XXII (complete) of the Iliad will be found starting on page 1185-a.

For fate to man a patient mind hath giv'n:
But godlike Hector's body, after death,
Achilles, unrelenting, foully drags, Lash'd to his car, around his comrades
tomb. 64

This is not to his praise; though brave he be,
Yet thus our anger he may justly rouse,
Who in his rage insults the senseless clay."

To whom, indignant, white-arm'd Juno
thus:
"Some show of reason were there in thy speech,

God of the silver bow, could Hector boast 70
Of equal dignity with Peleus' son.
A mortal one, and nurs'd at woman's breast;
The other, of a Goddess born, whom I Nurtur'd and rear'd, and to a mortal gave
In marriage; gave to Peleus, best belov'd 75
By all th' Immortals, of the race of man.
Ye, Gods, attended all the marriage rites;
Thou too, companion base, false friend, wast
there,

And, playing on thy lyre, didst share the feast."

To whom the Cloud-compeller answer'd
thus: 80
"Juno, restrain thy wrath; they shall not both

Attain like honour; yet was Hector once,
Of all the mortals that in Ilium dwell,
Dearest to all the Gods, and chief to me;
For never did he fail his gifts to bring, 85
And with burnt-off'rings and libations due
My altars crown; such worship I receiv'd.
Yet shall bold Hector's body, not without
The knowledge of Achilles, be remov'd;
For day and night his Goddess-mother
keeps 90

Her constant watch beside him. Then, some God

Bid Thetis hither to my presence haste;
And I with prudent words will counsel her,
That so Achilles may at Priam's hand Large ransom take, and set brave Hector
free." 95

He said; and promptly on his errand sprang
The storm-swift Iris; in the dark-blue sea
She plung'd, midway 'twixt Imbros' rugged shore

And Samos' isle; the parting waters plash'd.
As down to ocean's lowest depths she dropp'd, 100

Like to a plummet, which the fisherman
Lets fall, encas'd in wild bull's horn, to bear

Destruction to the sea's voracious tribes.
There found she Thetis in a hollow cave,
Around her rang'd the Ocean Goddesses: 105
She, in the midst, was weeping o'er the fate
Her matchless son awaiting, doom'd to die
Far from his home, on fertile plains of Troy.
Swift-footed Iris at her side appear'd,
And thus address'd her: "Hasten, Thetis;

Jove, 110
Lord of immortal counsel, summons thee."
To whom the silver-footed Goddess thus:
"What would with me the mighty King of Heav'n?

Press'd as I am with grief, I am asham'd
To mingle with the Gods; yet will I go: 115 Nor shall he speak in vain, whate'er his
words."

Thus as she spoke, her veil the Goddess
took,
All black, than which none deeper could be found;

She rose to go; the storm-swift Iris led
The way before her; ocean's parted waves
Around their path receded; to the beach 121 Ascending, upwards straight to Heav'n they sprang.

Th' all-seeing son of Saturn there they found,
And rang'd around him all th' immortal
Gods.

Pallas made way; and by the throne of Jove
Sat Thetis, Juno proff'ring to her hand 126
A goblet fair of gold, and adding words
Of welcome; she the cup receiv'd, and drank.
Then thus began the sire of Gods and men:
"Thou, Thetis, sorrowing to Olympus com'st, 130

Borne down by ceaseless grief; I know it
well;

Yet hear the cause for which I summon'd
thee.

About Achilles, thy victorious son,
And valiant Hector's body, for nine days Hath contest been in Heav'n; and some have
urg'd 135

That Hermes should by stealth the corpse
remove.

This to Achilles' praise I mean to turn,
And thus thy rev'rence and thy love retain.
Then haste thee to the camp, and to thy son
My message bear; tell him that all the Gods
Are fill'd with wrath; and I above the rest
Am angry, that beside the beak'd ships, 142
He, mad with rage, the corpse of Hector
keeps:

So may he fear me, and restore the dead.

Iris meantime to Priam I will send, 145
And bid him seek the Grecian ships, and there
Obtain his son's release: and with him bring
Such presents as may melt Achilles' heart."

He said; the silver-footed Queen obey'd; Down from Olympus' heights in haste she sped, 150

And sought her son; him found she in his tent,

Groaning with anguish, while his comrades
round,

Plying their tasks, prepar'd the morning meal.

For them a goodly sheep, full-fleec'd, was slain. 154

Close by his side his Goddess-mother stood,
And gently touch'd him with her hand, and
said,

"How long, my son, wilt thou thy soul consume

With grief and mourning, mindful nor of food
Nor sleep? nor dost thou wisely, to abstain From woman's love; for short thy time on
earth: 160

Death and imperious fate are close at hand.
Hear then my words; a messenger from Jove
To thee I come, to tell thee that the Gods
Are fill'd with wrath, and he above the rest
Is angry, that beside the beak'd ships 165
Thou, mad with rage, the corpse of Hector keep'st.

Then ransom take, and liberate the dead."

To whom Achilles, swift of foot, replied:
"So be it; ransom let him bring, and bear
His dead away, if such the will of Jove." 170

Thus, in the concourse of the ships, they two,

Mother and son, their lengthen'd converse
held.

Then Saturn's son to Iris gave command:
"Haste thee, swift Iris, from Olympus'
height,

To Troy, to royal Priam bear my words; 175
And bid him seek the Grecian ships, and there Obtain his son's release; and with him take
Such presents as may melt Achilles' heart.

Alone, no Trojan with him, must he go;
Yet may a herald on his steps attend, 180

Some aged man, his smoothly-rolling car
And mules to drive; and to the city back
To bring his dead, whom great Achilles slew.
Nor let the fear of death disturb his mind:
Hermes shall with him, as his escort, go, 185

And to Achilles' presence safely bring.
Arriv'd within the tent, nor he himself
Will slay him, but from others will protect.
Not ignorant is he, nor void of sense,
Nor disobedient to the Gods' behest; 190
But will with pitying eyes his suppliant
view."

He said; and on his errand sped in haste
The storm-swift Iris; when to Priam's house
She came, the sounds of wailing met her
ear. 194

Within the court, around their father, sat
His sons, their raiment all bedew'd with tears;

And in the midst, close cover'd with his robe,
Their sire, his head and neck with dirt de-
fil'd,

Which, wallowing on the earth, himself had heap'd, 199

With his own hands, upon his hoary head.
Throughout the house his daughters loudly wail'd

In mem'ry of the many and the brave
Who lay in death, by Grecian warriors slain.
Beside him stood the messenger of Jove,
And whisper'd, while his limbs with terror
shook: 205

"Fear nothing, Priam, son of Dardanus,
Nor let thy mind be troubled; not for ill,
But here on kindly errand am I sent:

To thee I come, a messenger from Jove,
Who from on high looks down on thee with
eyes 210

Of pitying love; he bids thee ransom home
The godlike Hector's corpse; and with thee take

Such presents as may melt Achilles' heart.
Alone, no Trojan with thee, must thou go;
Yet may a herald on thy steps attend, 215

Some aged man, thy smoothly-rolling car
And mules to drive, and to the city back
To bring thy dead, whom great Achilles slew.
Nor let the fear of death disturb thy mind:

Hermes shall with thee, as thine escort, go,
And to Achilles' presence safely bring. 221

Arriv'd within the tent, nor he himself
Will slay thee, but from others will protect;
Not ignorant is he, nor void of sense,
Nor disobedient to the Gods' behest, 225
But will with pitying eyes his suppliant
view."

Swift-footed Iris said, and vanish'd
straight:

He to his sons commandment gave, the mules

To yoke beneath the smoothly-rolling car,
And on the axle fix the wicker seat. 230
Himself the lofty cedar chamber sought,
Fragrant, high-roof'd, with countless treasures stor'd;

And call'd to Hecuba his wife, and said,
"Good wife, a messenger from Jove hath come,
Who bids me seek the Grecian ships, and there 235

Obtain my son's release; and with me take
Such presents as may melt Achilles' heart.
Say then, what think'st thou? for my mind inclines

To seek the ships within the Grecian camp."
So he; but Hecuba lamenting cried, 240
"Alas, alas! where are thy senses gone?
And where the wisdom, once of high repute
'Mid strangers, and 'mid those o'er whom thou reign'st?

How canst thou think alone to seek the ships,
Ent'ring his presence, who thy sons hath slain, 245

Many and brave? an iron heart is thine!
Of that bloodthirsty and perfidious man,
If thou within the sight and reach shalt come,
No pity will he feel, no rev'rence show:
Rather remain we here apart and mourn; 250
For him, when at his birth his thread of life
Was spun by fate, 'twas destin'd that afar
From home and parents, he should glut the maw

Of rav'ning dogs, by that stern warrior's tent,

Whose inmost heart I would I could devour: 255

Such for my son were adequate revenge,
Whom not in ignominious flight he slew;
But standing, thoughtless of escape or flight,
For Trojan men and Troy's deep-bosom'd dames."

To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire:
"Seek not to hinder me; nor be thyself 261
A bird of evil omen in my house;
For thou shalt not persuade me. If indeed
This message had been brought by mortal man,

Prophet, or seer, or sacrificing priest, 265
I should have deem'd it false, and laugh'd to scorn

The idle tale; but now (for I myself Both saw and heard the Goddess) I must go;
Nor unfulfill'd shall be the words I speak:
And if indeed it be my fate to die 270

Beside the vessels of the brass-clad Greeks,
I am content! by fierce Achilles' hand
Let me be slain, so once more in my arms
I hold my boy, and give my sorrow vent."
Then raising up the coffer's polish'd lid, 275
He chose twelve gorgeous shawls, twelve single cloaks,

As many rugs, as many splendid robes,
As many tunics; then of gold he took
Ten talents full; two tripods, burnish'd bright,

Four caldrons; then a cup of beauty rare, 280
A rich possession, which the men of Thrace
Had giv'n, when there he went ambassador;
E'en this he spar'd not, such his keen desire
His son to ransom. From the corridor
With angry words he drove the Trojans all:

"Out with ye, worthless rascals, vagabonds! 286

Have ye no griefs at home, that here ye come

To pester me? or is it not enough
That Jove with deep affliction visits me,
Slaying my bravest son? ye to your cost 290
Shall know his loss: since now that he is gone,
The Greeks shall find you easier far to slay.
But may my eyes be clos'd in death, ere see
The city sack'd, and utterly destroy'd."

He said, and with his staff drove out the crowd; 295

Before the old man's anger fled they all;
Then to his sons in threat'ning tone he cried;
To Paris, Helenus, and Agathon, Pammon, Antiphanus, Polites brave,
Deiphobus, and bold Hippothöus, 300
And godlike Dius; all these nine with threats
And angry taunts the aged sire assail'd:
"Haste, worthless sons, my scandal and my shame!

Would that ye all beside the Grecian ships
In Hector's stead had died! Oh woe is me, 305

Who have begotten sons, in all the land
The best and bravest; now remains not one;
Mestor, and Troilus, dauntless charioteer,
And Hector, who a God 'mid men appear'd,
Nor like a mortal's offspring, but a God's:
All these hath Mars cut off; and left me none,
None but the vile and refuse; liars all, 312
Vain skipping coxcombs, in the dance alone,
And in nought else renown'd; base plunderers,

From their own countrymen, of lambs and kids. 315

When, laggards, will ye harness me the car Equipp'd with all things needed for the
way?"

He said; they quail'd beneath their father's wrath,

And brought the smoothly-running mulewain out,

Well-fram'd, new-built; and fix'd the wicker seat; 320

Then from the peg the mule-yoke down they
took,

Of boxwood wrought, with boss and rings complete;

And with the yoke, the yoke-band brought they forth, 323

Nine cubits long; and to the polish'd pole
At the far end attach'd; the breast-rings then Fix'd to the pole-piece: and on either side Thrice round the knob the leathern thong they wound.

And bound it fast, and inward turn'd the tongue.

Then the rich ransom, from the chambers
brought, 329

Of Hector's head, upon the wain they pil'd;
And yok'd the strong-hoof'd mules, to harness train'd,

The Mysians' splendid present to the King:
To Priam's car they harness'd then the
steeds,

Which he himself at polish'd manger fed. 334

Deep thoughts revolving, in the lofty halls
Were met the herald and the aged King,
When Hecuba with troubled mind drew
near;

In her right hand a golden cup she bore
Of luscious wine, that ere they took their
way, 339

They to the Gods might due libations pour;
Before the car she stood, and thus she spoke:
"Take, and to father Jove thine off'ring pour,
And pray that he may bring thee safely home
From all thy foes; since sore against my will Thou needs wilt venture to the ships of Greece. 345

Then to Idæan Jove, the cloud-girt son
Of Saturn, who th' expanse of Troy surveys,
Prefer thy pray'r, beseeching him to send,
On thy right hand, a wingèd messenger,
The bird he loves the best, of strongest flight;
That thou thyself mayst see and know the sign, 351

And, firm in faith, approach the ships of Greece.

But should all-seeing Jove the sign withhold.
Then not with my consent shouldst thou attempt,

Whate'er thy wish, to reach the Grecian ships." 355

To whom, in answer, godlike Priam thus:
"O woman, I refuse not to obey

Thy counsel; good it is to raise the hands
In pray'r to Heav'n, and Jove's protection seek."

The old man said; and bade th' attendant
pour 360

Pure water on his hands; with ewer she,
And basin, stood beside him: from his wife.
The due ablutions made, he took the cup;
Then in the centre of the court he stood,
And as he pour'd the wine, look'd up to Heav'n, 365

And thus with voice uplifted pray'd aloud:
"O father Jove, who rul'st on Ida's height,
Most great, most glorious! grant that I may find

Some pity in Achilles' heart; and send,
On my right hand, a wingèd messenger, 370
The bird thou lov'st the best, of strongest flight,

That I myself may see and know the sign,
And, firm in faith, approach the ships of Greece."

Thus as he pray'd, the Lord of counsel
heard; 374

And sent forthwith an eagle, feather'd king, Dark bird of chase, and Dusky thence surnam'd:

Wide as the portals, well secur'd with bolts,
That guard some wealthy monarch's lofty
hall,

On either side his ample pinions spread.
On the right hand appear'd he, far above 380
The city soaring; they the fav'ring sign
With joy beheld, and ev'ry heart was cheer'd.
Mounting his car in haste, the aged King Drove thro' the court, and thro' the echoing porch;

The mules in front, by sage Idæus driv'n, 385
That drew the four-wheel'd wain; behind them came

The horses, down the city's steep descent Urg'd by th' old man to speed; the crowd of friends

That follow'd mourn'd for him, as doom'd to death.

Descended from the city to the plain, 390
His sons and sons-in-law to Ilium took

Their homeward way; advancing o'er the plain

They two escap'd not Jove's all-seeing eye;
Pitying he saw the aged sire; and thus
At once to Hermes spoke, his much-lov'd son:

"Hermes, for thou in social converse lov'st
To mix with men, and hear'st whome'er thou wilt;

Haste thee, and Priam to the Grecian ships
So lead, that none of all the Greeks may see Ere at Achilles' presence he attain."

He said; nor disobey'd the heav'nly Guide;
His golden sandals on his feet he bound,
Ambrosial work; which bore him o'er the waves,

Swift as the wind, and o'er the wide-spread earth;

Then took his rod, wherewith he seals at will
The eyes of men, and wakes again from sleep.
This in his hand he bore, and sprang for flight.

Soon the wide Hellespont he reach'd, and Troy,

And pass'd in likeness of a princely youth,
In op'ning manhood, fairest term of life.

The twain had pass'd by Ilus' lofty tomb,
And halted there the horses and the mules
Beside the margin of the stream to drink;
For darkness now was creeping o'er the earth:

When through the gloom the herald Hermes saw

Approaching near, to Priam thus he cried:

"O son of Dardanus, bethink thee well;
Of prudent counsel great is now our need.

A man I see, and fear he means us ill.
Say, with the horses shall we fly at once,

Or clasp his knees, and for his mercy sue?"
The old man heard, his mind confus'd with dread;

So grievously he fear'd, that ev'ry hair
Upon his bended limbs did stand on end;

He stood astounded; but the Guardian-God
Approach'd, and took him by the hand, and said:

"Where, father, goest thou thus with horse and mule

In the still night, when men are sunk in sleep?

And fear'st thou not the slaughter-breathing Greeks,

Thine unrelenting foes, and they so near?

If any one of them should see thee now,

So richly laden in the gloom of night,
How wouldst thou feel? thou art not young thyself,

And this old man, thy comrade, would avail
But little to protect thee from assault. 435
I will not harm thee, nay will shield from harm,

For like my father's is, methinks, thy face."
To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire:
"Tis as thou say'st, fair son; yet hath some God

Extended o'er me his protecting hand, 440
Who sends me such a guide, so opportune.
Bless'd are thy parents in a son so grac'd
In face and presence, and of mind so wise."

To whom in answer thus the Guardian-God:

"O father, well and wisely dost thou speak;
But tell me this, and truly: dost thou bear
These wealthy treasures to some foreign land,
That they for thee in safety may be stor'd?
Or have ye all resolv'd to fly from Troy
In fear, your bravest slain, thy gallant son,
Who never from the Greeks' encounter
flinch'd?" 451

To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire:
"Who art thou, noble Sir, and what thy race,
That speak'st thus fairly of my hapless son?"

To whom in answer thus the Guardian-God:

"Try me, old man; of godlike Hector ask;
For often in the glory-giving fight

These eyes have seen him; chief, when to the ships

The Greeks he drove, and with the sword destroy'd.

We gaz'd in wonder; from the fight restrain'd

By Peleus' son, with Agamemnon wroth.

His follower I; one ship convey'd us both;
One of the Myrmidons I am; my sire

Polycctor, rich, but aged, e'en as thou.
Six sons he hath, besides myself, the sev'nth;

And I by lot was drafted for the war. 466

I from the ships am to the plain come forth;
For with the dawn of day the keen-ey'd

Greeks

Will round the city marshal their array.

They chafe in idleness; the chiefs in vain 470
Strive to restrain their ardour for the fight."

To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire:
"If of Achilles, Peleus' son, thou art

Indeed a follower, tell me all the truth;

Lies yet my son beside the Grecian ships, 475

Or hath Achilles torn him limb from limb,
And to his dogs the mangled carcase giv'n?"

To whom in answer thus the Guardian-God:

"On him, old man, nor dogs nor birds have fed,

But by the ship of Peleus' son he lies 480

Within the tent; twelve days he there hath lain,

Nor hath corruption touch'd his flesh, nor worms,

That wont to prey on men in battle slain.

The corpse, indeed, with each returning 484

Around his comrade's tomb Achilles drags,

Yet leaves it still uninjur'd; thou thyself

Mightst see how fresh, as dew-besprent, he lies,

From blood-stains cleans'd, and clos'd his many wounds, 488

For many a lance was buried in his corpse.

So, e'en in death, the blessed Gods above,

Who lov'd him well, protect thy noble son."

He said; th' old man rejoicing heard his words,

And answer'd, "See, my son, how good it is To give th' immortal Gods their tribute due;

For never did my son, while yet he liv'd, 495

Neglect the Gods who on Olympus dwell;

And thence have they remember'd him in death.

Accept, I pray, this goblet rich-emboss'd;

Be thou my guard, and, under Heav'n, my guide,

Until I reach the tent of Peleus' son." 500

To whom in answer thus the Guardian-God:

"Old father, me thy younger wouldst thou tempt,

In vain; who bidd'st me at thy hands accept

Thy proffer'd presents, to Achilles' wrong. 504

I dread his anger; and should hold it shame

To plunder him, through fear of future ill.

But, as thy guide, I could conduct thee safe,

As far as Argos, journeying by thy side,

On ship-board or on foot; nor by the fault

Of thy conductor shouldst thou meet with harm." 510

Thus spoke the Guardian-God, and on the car

Mounting in haste, he took the whip and reins,

And with fresh vigour mules and horses fill'd.

When to the ship-tow'rs and the trench they came,

The guard had late been busied with their meal; 515

And with deep sleep the heav'nly Guide o'er-spread

The eyes of all; then open'd wide the gates,

And push'd aside the bolts, and led within

Both Priam, and the treasure-laden wain.

But when they reach'd Achilles' lofty tent,

(Which for their King the Myrmidons had built 521

Of fir-trees fell'd, and overlaid the roof

With rushes mown from off the neighb'ring mead;

And all around a spacious court enclos'd

With cross-set palisades; a single bar 525

Of fir the gateway guarded, which to shut

Three men, of all the others, scarce suffic'd,

And three to open; but Achilles' hand

Unaided shut with ease the massive bar)

Then for the old man Hermes op'd the gate,

And brought within the court the gifts design'd 531

For Peleus' godlike son; then from the car

Sprang to the ground, and thus to Priam spoke:

"Old man, a God hath hither been thy guide;

Hermes I am, and sent to thee from Jove, 535

Father of all, to bring thee safely here.

I now return, nor to Achilles' eyes

Will I appear; beseems it not a God

To greet a mortal in the sight of all. 539

But go thou in, and clasp Achilles' knees,

And supplicate him for his father's sake,

His fair-hair'd mother's, and his child's, that so

Thy words may stir an answer in his heart."

Thus saying, Hermes to Olympus' heights

Return'd; and Priam from his chariot sprang,

And left Idæus there, in charge to keep 546

The horses and the mules, while he himself

Enter'd the dwelling straight, where wont to sit

Achilles, lov'd of Heav'n. The chief he found

Within, his followers seated all apart; 550

Two only in his presence minister'd,

The brave Automedon, and Alcimius,

A warrior bold; scarce ended the repast

Of food and wine; the table still was set.

Great Priam enter'd, unperceiv'd of all; 555

And standing by Achilles, with his arms

Embrac'd his knees, and kiss'd those fearful hands,

Blood-stain'd, which many of his sons had slain.

As when a man, by cruel fate pursued, 559
In his own land hath shed another's blood,
And flying, seeks beneath some wealthy house

A foreign refuge; wond'ring, all behold:
On godlike Priam so with wonder gaz'd
Achilles; wonder seiz'd th' attendants all, 564
And one to other looked; then Priam thus
To Peleus' son his suppliant speech address'd:
"Think, great Achilles, rival of the Gods,
Upon thy father, e'en as I myself
Upon the threshold of unjoyous age: 569
And haply he, from them that dwell around
May suffer wrong, with no protector near
To give him aid; yet he, rejoicing, knows
That thou still liv'st; and day by day may hope

To see his son returning safe from Troy; 574
While I, all hapless, that have many sons,
The best and bravest through the breadth of Troy,
Begotten, deem that none are left me now.
Fifty there were, when came the sons of Greece;

Nineteen the offspring of a single womb; 579
The rest, the women of my household bore.
Of these have many by relentless Mars
Been laid in dust; but he, my only one,
The city's and his brethren's sole defence,
He, bravely fighting in his country's cause,
Hector, but lately by thy hand hath fall'n:
On his behalf I venture to approach 586
The Grecian ships; for his release to thee
To make my pray'r, and priceless ransom pay.

Then thou, Achilles, reverence the Gods;
And, for thy father's sake, look pitying down
On me, more needing pity; since I bear 591
Such grief as never man on earth hath borne,
Who stoop to kiss the hand that slew my son."

Thus as he spoke, within Achilles' breast
Fond mem'ry of his father rose; he touch'd
The old man's hand, and gently put him by;
Then wept they both, by various mem'ries
stirr'd: 597

One, prostrate at Achilles' feet, bewail'd
His warrior son; Achilles for his sire,
And for Patroclus wept, his comrade dear;
And through the house their weeping loud was heard. 601

But when Achilles had indulg'd his grief,

And eas'd the yearning of his heart and limbs,
Uprising, with his hand the aged sire,
Pitying his hoary head and hoary beard, 605
He rais'd, and thus with gentle words address'd:

"Alas, what sorrows, poor old man, are thine!

How couldst thou venture to the Grecian ships

Alone, and to the presence of the man 609
Whose hand hath slain so many of thy sons,
Many and brave? an iron heart is thine!
But sit thou on this seat; and in our hearts,
Though filled with grief, let us that grief suppress;

For woful lamentation nought avails. 614
Such is the thread the Gods for mortals spin,
To live in woe, while they from cares are free.
Two coffers lie beside the door of Jove,
With gifts for man: one good, the other ill;
To whom from each the Lord of lightning gives, 619

Him sometimes evil, sometimes good befalls;
To whom the ill alone, him foul disgrace
And grinding mis'ry o'er the earth pursue:
By God and man alike despis'd he roams.
Thus from his birth the Gods to Peleus gave Excellent gifts; with wealth and substance
bless'd 625

Above his fellows; o'er the Myrmidons
He rul'd with sov'reign sway; and Heav'n bestow'd

On him, a mortal, an immortal bride.
Yet this of ill was mingled in his lot,
That in his house no rising race he saw 630
Of future Kings; one only son he had,
One doom'd to early death; nor is it mine
To tend my father's age; but far from home
Thee and thy sons in Troy I vex with war.
Much have we heard too of thy former wealth; 635

Above what Lesbos northward, Macar's
seat,

Contains, and Upper Phrygia, and the shores
Of boundless Hellespont, 'tis said that thou
In wealth and number of thy sons wast
bless'd.

But since on thee this curse the Gods have
brought, 640

Still round thy city war and murder rage.
Bear up, nor thus with grief incessant mourn;
Vain is thy sorrow for thy gallant son;
Thou canst not raise him, and mayst suffer
more." 644

To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire;
 "Tell me not yet, illustrious chief, to sit,
 While Hector lies, uncar'd for, in the tent;
 But let me quickly go, that with mine eyes
 I may behold my son; and thou accept 649
 The ample treasures which we tender thee:
 Mayst thou enjoy them, and in safety reach Thy native land, since thou hast spar'd my life,
 And bidd'st me still behold the light of Heav'n."

To whom Achilles thus with stern regard:
 "Old man, incense me not; I mean myself 655
 To give thee back thy son; for here of late Despatch'd by Jove, my Goddess-mother
 came,
 The daughter of the aged Ocean-God:
 And thee too, Priam, well I know, some God
 (I cannot err) hath guided to our ships. 660
 No mortal, though in vent'rous youth, would dare

Our camp to enter; nor could hope to pass
 Unnotic'd by the watch, nor easily Remove the pond'rous bar that guards our doors.

But stir not up my anger in my grief; 665
 Lest, suppliant though thou be, within my tent

I brook thee not, and Jove's command transgress."

He said; the old man trembled, and obey'd;
 Then to the door-way, with a lion's spring,
 Achilles rush'd; not unaccompanied; 670
 With him Automedon and Alcimus,
 His two attendants, of his followers all,
 Next to the lost Patroclus, best-esteem'd;
 They from the yoke the mules and horses
 loos'd;

Then led the herald of the old man in, 675
 And bade him sit; and from the polish'd wain
 The costly ransom took of Hector's head.
 Two robes they left, and one well-woven vest,

To clothe the corpse, and send with honour
 home. 679

Then to the female slaves he gave command
 To wash the body, and anoint with oil,
 Apart, that Priam might not see his son;
 Lest his griev'd heart its passion unrestrain'd
 Should utter, and Achilles, rous'd to wrath,
 His suppliant slay, and Jove's command transgress. 685

When they had wash'd the body, and with oil

Anointed, and around it wrapp'd the robe
 And vest, Achilles lifted up the dead
 With his own hands, and laid him on the couch;

Which to the polish'd wain his followers
 rais'd. 690

Then groaning, on his friend by name he
 call'd:

"Forgive, Patroclus! be not wroth with me,
 If in the realm of darkness thou shouldst
 hear

That godlike Hector to his father's arms,
 For no mean ransom, I restore; whereof 695
 A fitting share for thee I set aside."

This said, Achilles to the tent return'd;
 On the carv'd couch, from whence he rose, he sat

Beside the wall; and thus to Priam spoke:
 "Old man, thy son, according to thy pray'r, 700

Is giv'n thee back; upon the couch he lies;
 Thyself shalt see him at the dawn of day.
 Meanwhile the ev'ning meal demands our care.

Not fair-hair'd Niobe abstain'd from food
 When in the house her children lay in death,
 Six beauteous daughters and six stalwart
 sons. 706

The youths, Apollo with his silver bow,
 The maids, the Archer-Queen, Diana, slew,
 With anger fill'd that Niobe presum'd
 Herself with fair Latona to compare, 710
 Her many children with her rival's two;
 So by the two were all the many slain.
 Nine days in death they lay; and none was
 there

To pay their fun'ral rites; for Saturn's son
 Had given to all the people hearts of stone.
 At length th' immortal Gods entomb'd the
 dead. 716

Nor yet did Niobe, when now her grief
 Had worn itself in tears, from food refrain.
 And now in Sipylus, amid the rocks,
 And lonely mountains, where the Goddess
 nymphs 720

That love to dance by Achelöus' stream,
 'Tis said, were cradled, she, though turn'd to stone,

Broods o'er the wrongs inflicted by the Gods.
 So we too, godlike sire, the meal may share;
 And later, thou thy noble son mayst mourn,
 To Troy restor'd—well worthy he thy tears."

This said, he slaughter'd straight a white-fleec'd sheep; 727

His comrades then the carcase flay'd and
dress'd:

The meat prepar'd, and fasten'd to the spits;
Roasted with care, and from the fire withdrew. 730

The bread Automedon from baskets fair
Apportion'd out; the meat Achilles shar'd.
They on the viands set before them fell.
The rage of thirst and hunger satisfied,
In wonder Priam on Achilles gaz'd, 735
His form and stature; as a God he seem'd;
And he too look'd on Priam, and admir'd
His venerable face, and gracious speech. 738
With mutual pleasure each on other gaz'd,
Till godlike Priam first address'd his host:

"Dismiss me now, illustrious chief, to rest;
And lie we down, in gentle slumbers wrapp'd;
For never have mine eyes been clos'd in
sleep, 743

Since by thy hand my gallant son was slain:
But groaning still, I brood upon my woes,
And in my court with dust my head defile.
Now have I tasted bread, now ruddy wine
Hath o'er my palate pass'd; but not till now."

Thus he; his comrades and th' attendant maids

Achilles order'd in the corridor 750
Two mattresses to place, with blankets fair
Of purple wool o'erlaid; and on the top
Rugs and soft sheets for upper cov'ring spread.

They from the chamber, torch in hand, withdrew, 754

And with obedient haste two beds prepar'd.
Then thus Achilles spoke in jesting tone:
"Thou needs must sleep without, my good old friend;

Lest any leader of the Greeks should come,
As is their custom, to confer with me;
Of them whoe'er should find thee here by
night 760

Forthwith to Agamemnon would report,
And Hector might not be so soon restor'd.
But tell me truly this; how many days
For godlike Hector's fun'ral rites ye need;
That for so long a time I may myself 765
Refrain from combat, and the people stay."

To whom in answer Priam, godlike sire:
"If by thy leave we may indeed perform
His fun'ral rites, to thee, Achilles, great
Will be our gratitude, if this thou grant.
Thou know'st how close the town is hemm'd around; 771

And from the mountain, distant as it is,

The Trojans well may fear to draw the wood.
Nine days to public mourning would we give;
The tenth, to fun'ral rites and fun'ral feast;
Then on th' eleventh would we raise his mound; 776

The twelfth, renew the war, if needs we must."

To whom Achilles swift of foot replied:
"So shall it be, old Priam; I engage
To stay the battle for the time requir'd."

Thus speaking, with his hand the old man's wrist 781

He grasp'd, in token that he need not fear.
Then in the corrid'or lay down to rest
Old Priam and the herald, Elders sage;
While in his tent's recess Achilles slept, 785
The fair Briseïs resting by his side.

In night-long slumbers lay the other Gods,
And helmèd chiefs, by gentle sleep subdued;
But on the eyes of Hermes, Guardian-God,
No slumber fell, deep pond'ring in his mind
How from the ships in safety to conduct 791
The royal Priam, and the guard elude.

Above the sleeper's head he stood, and cried:
"Old man, small heed thou tak'st of coming
ill,

Who, when Achilles gives thee leave to go,
Sleep'st undisturb'd, surrounded by thy foes.
Thy son hath been restor'd, and thou hast paid 797

A gen'rous price; but to redeem thy life,
If Agamemnon and the other Greeks Should know that thou art here, full thrice so much 800

Thy sons, who yet are left, would have to pay."

He said; the old man trembled, and arous'd
The herald; while the horses and the mules
Were yok'd by Hermes, who with silent speed Drove through th' encampment, unobserv'd
of all. 805

But when they came to eddying Xanthus'
ford,

Fair-flowing stream, born of immortal Jove,
To high Olympus Hermes took his flight
As morn, in saffron robe, o'er all the earth
Was light diffusing; they with fun'ral wail
Drove cityward the horses; following came
The mules that drew the litter of the dead.
The plain they travers'd o'er, observ'd of
none, 813

Or man or woman, till Cassandra, fair
As golden Venus, from the topmost height
Of Pergamus, her father in his car

Upstanding saw, the herald at his side.
 Him too she saw, who on the litter lay;
 Then lifted up her voice, and cried aloud
 To all the city, "Hither, Trojans, come, 820
 Both men and women, Hector see restor'd;
 If, while he liv'd, returning from the fight,
 Ye met him e'er rejoicing, who indeed
 Was all the city's chiefest joy and pride."

She said; nor man nor woman then was left 825

Within the city; o'er the minds of all
 Grief pass'd, resistless; to the gates in throngs They press'd, to crowd round him who brought the dead.

The first to clasp the body were his wife
 And honour'd mother; eagerly they sprang
 On the smooth-rolling wain, to touch the head 831

Of Hector; round them, weeping, stood the crowd

Weeping, till sunset, all the live-long day
 Had they before the gates for Hector mourn'd;

Had not old Priam from the car address'd 835
 The crowd: "Make way, that so the mules may pass;

When to my house I shall have brought my
 dead,

Ye there may vent your sorrow as ye will."

Thus as he spoke, obedient to his word
 They stood aside, and for the car made way:
 But when to Priam's lordly house they came,
 They laid him on a rich-wrought couch, and
 call'd 842

The minstrels in, who by the hero's bed
 Should lead the melancholy chorus; they Pour'd forth the music of the mournful dirge,
 While women's voices join'd in loud lament.
 White-arm'd Andromache the wail began,
 The head of Hector clasping in her hands:
 "My husband, thou art gone in pride of youth,

And in thine house hast left me desolate; 850
 Thy child an infant still, thy child and mine,
 Unhappy parents both! nor dare I hope
 That he may reach the ripeness of his youth;
 For ere that day shall Troy in ruin fall, Since thou art gone, her guardian! thou whose arm 855

Defended her, her wives, and helpless babes!
 They now shall shortly o'er the sea be borne,
 And with them I shall go; thou too, my child,
 Must follow me, to servile labour doom'd,
 The suff'ring victim of a tyrant Lord; 860

Unless perchance some angry Greek may seize

And dash thee from the tow'r—a woful
 death!

Whose brother, or whose father, or whose
 son 863

By Hector hath been slain; for many a Greek
 By Hector's hand hath bit the bloody dust;
 Not light in battle was thy father's hand!

Therefore for him the gen'ral city mourns;
 Thou to thy parents bitter grief hast caus'd,
 Hector! but bitt'rest grief of all hast left

To me! for not to me was giv'n to clasp 870
 The hand extended from thy dying bed, Nor words of wisdom catch, which night and
 day,

With tears, I might have treasur'd in my
 heart."

Weeping she spoke—the women join'd the wail.

Then Hecuba took up the loud lament: 875
 "Hector, of all my children dearest thou!
 Dear to th' Immortals too in life wast thou,
 And they in death have borne thee still in
 mind;

For other of my sons, his captives made,
 Across the wat'ry waste, to Samos' isle 880
 Or Imbros, or th' inhospitable shore
 Of Lemnos, hath Achilles, swift of foot,
 To slav'ry sold; thee, when his sharp-edg'd
 spear

Had robb'd thee of thy life, he dragg'd indeed 884

Around Patroclus' tomb, his comrade dear, Whom thou hadst slain; yet so he rais'd not up

His dead to life again; now liest thou here,
 All fresh and fair, as dew-besprent; like one Whom bright Apollo, with his arrows keen,
 God of the silver bow, hath newly slain." 890

Weeping, she spoke; and rous'd the gen'ral grief.

Then Helen, third, the mournful strain renew'd:

"Hector, of all my brethren dearest thou!
 True, godlike Paris claims me as his wife,
 Who bore me hither—would I then had died!
 But twenty years have pass'd since here I
 came, 896

And left my native land; yet ne'er from thee
 I heard one scornful, one degrading word;
 And when from others I have borne reproach,
 Thy brothers, sisters, or thy brothers' wives,
 Or mother, (for thy sire was ever kind 901

E'en as a father) thou hast check'd them still

With tender feeling, and with gentle words.
For thee I weep, and for myself no less:

For, through the breadth of Troy, none love me now, 905

None kindly look on me, but all abhor."

Weeping she spoke, and with her wept the crowd.

At length the aged Priam gave command:
"Haste now, ye Trojans, to the city bring—
Good store of fuel; fear no treach'rous wile;
For when he sent me from the dark-ribb'd
ships, 911

Achilles promis'd that from hostile arms
Till the twelfth morn we should no harm sus-tain."

He said; and they the oxen and the mules
Yok'd to the wains, and from the city
throng'd: 915

Nine days they labour'd, and brought back to Troy

Good store of wood; but when the tenth day's light

Upon the earth appear'd, weeping, they bore

Brave Hector out; and on the fun'ral pile
Laying the glorious dead, applied the torch.

While yet the rosy-finger'd morn was young 921

Round noble Hector's pyre the people
press'd:

When all were gather'd round, and closely
throng'd,

First on the burning mass, as far as spread
The range of fire, they pour'd the ruddy wine,
And quench'd the flames: his brethren then and friends 926

Weeping, the hot tears flowing down their cheeks,

Collected from the pile the whiten'd bones;
These in a golden casket they enclos'd, 929
And o'er it spread soft shawls of purple dye;
Then in a grave they laid it, and in haste
With stone in pond'rous masses cover'd o'er;
And rais'd a mound, and watch'd on ev'ry
side,

From sudden inroad of the Greeks to guard.
The mound erected, back they turn'd; and
all 935

Assembled duly, shar'd the solemn feast
In Priam's palace, Heav'n-descended King.

Such were the rites to glorious Hector paid. 938

THE ODYSSEY¹

BOOK XXI

PALLAS, the goddess of the azure eyes,

Woke in the mind of sage Penelope,
The daughter of Icarius, this design,—
To put into the suitors' hands the bow
And gray steel rings, and to propose a game 5
That in the palace was to usher in
The slaughter. So she climbed the lofty stair,
Up from the hall, and took in her plump hand
The fair carved key; its wards were wrought
of brass,

And ivory was the handle. Soon she reached 10

The furthest room with her attendant maids.
There lay the treasures of Ulysses,—brass
And gold, and steel divinely wrought.

There lay
His bow unstrung; there lay his quiver charged

With arrows; many were the deadly shafts 15
It held, a stranger's gift, who met him once
In Lacedaemon, Iphitus by name,
The son of Eurytus, and like the gods

In presence. In Messenè met the twain,
And in the mansion of Orsilochus, 20

The warlike. Thither had Ulysses come
To claim a debt from all the region round;
For rovers from Messenè to their ships
Had driven and carried off from Ithaca
Three hundred sheep and those who tended
them. 25

For this Ulysses, though a stripling yet,
Came that long voyage, on an embassy,
Sent by his father and the other chiefs.
And Iphitus had come in search of steeds
Which he had lost,—twelve mares, and under
them 30

Twelve hardy mules, their foals. That errand brought

The doom of death upon him. For he came,
In journeying, to the abode of Hercules,
The mighty hero-son of Jupiter, 34
Famed for his labors, who, in his own house,
Slew Iphitus, the stranger. Cruel wretch!
Who revered not the vengeance of the
gods,

Nor what was due to his own board, at which
He placed his guest, and slew him afterward,

And in his stables kept the goodly mares. 40
 'T was when this guest was seeking for his
 steeds

He met Ulysses, and bestowed on him
 The bow, which mighty Eurytus once bore,
 And dying in his lofty palace left
 The weapon to his son. Ulysses gave 45
 In turn a trenchant sword and massive lance,
 A pledge of kindly hospitality,
 Begun, but not continued till they sat
 Each at the other's table; for the son
 Of Jove first took the life of him who gave 50
 The bow, the godlike son of Eurytus.
 That bow Ulysses, when he went to war
 In his black galleys, never took with him,
 But left it in his palace, to be kept
 In memory of a beloved friend, 55
 And only bore it in his own domain.

Now when the glorious lady reached the room,
 And stood upon the threshold, wrought of oak
 And polished by the workman's cunning
 hand,
 Who stretched the line upon it, and set up 60
 Its posts, and hung its shining doors, she loosed

With a quick touch the thong that held the ring,

Put in the key, and with a careful aim Struck back the sounding bolts. As when a bull

Roars in the field, such sound the beautiful
 doors, 65

Struck with the key, gave forth, and instantly

They opened to her. Up the lofty floor
 She stepped, where stood the coffer that contained

The perfumed garments. Reaching forth her
 hand,

The queen took down the bow, that hung within 70

Its shining case, and sat her down, and laid
 The case upon her knees, and, drawing forth
 The monarch's bow, she wept aloud. As soon

As that new gush of tears had ceased to fall, Back to the hall she went, and that proud throng 75

Of suitors, bearing in her hand the bow
 Unstrung, and quiver, where the arrows lay
 Many and deadly. Her attendant maids Brought also down a coffer, where were laid

Much brass and steel, provided by the king
 For games like these. The glorious lady
 then, 81

In presence of the suitors, stood beside
 The columns that upheld the stately roof.
 She held a lustrous veil before her cheeks,
 And, while on either side of her a maid 85
 Stood modestly, bespake the suitors thus:—

“Hear, noble suitors! ye who throng these halls,

And eat and drink from day to day, while long

My husband has been gone; your sole excuse
 For all this lawlessness the claim ye make 90 That I become a bride. Come then, for
 now

A contest is proposed. I bring to you
 The mighty bow that great Ulysses bore.
 Whoe'er among you he may be whose hand Shall bend this bow, and send through these twelve rings 95

An arrow, him I follow hence, and leave
 This beautiful abode of my young years,
 With all its plenty,—though its memory,
 I think, will haunt me even in my dreams.”

She spake, and bade the master of the swine, 100

The good Eumaeus, place the bow and rings
 Of hoary steel before the suitor-train.

In tears he bore the bow and laid it down.
 The herdsman also wept to see again 104

His master's bow. Antinoüs called to both
 With a loud voice, and chid them angrily:—

“Ye silly rustics, who can never see Beyond the hour, why trouble with your
 tears

The lady who had grief enough besides For her lost husband? Sit and share the feast 110

In silence, or go forth and leave the bow;
 A difficult contest it will be for us,

Nor, as I think, will this fair bow be bent
 With ease, since surely there is no man here
 Such as Ulysses was. I saw him once, 115
 While but a child, and still remember him.”

He spake, yet in his secret heart believed That he should bend the bow, and send a shaft

Through all the rings. And yet he was the first 119

To taste the steel,—an arrow from the hand
 Of the great chief Ulysses,—whom he wronged

In his own palace, and to equal wrong

Encouraged others. Then Telemachus
Rose in his sacred might, and thus began:—

“Alas! it must be that Saturnian Jove 125
Has made me lose my wits. Wise as she is,
My mother promises to leave her home
And follow some one else, and yet I laugh,
And am delighted in my foolish heart. 129
Come then, since such a contest is proposed,
Ye suitors! and for such a woman too.
The like is not in all the lands of Greece,
Argos, Mycenae, or the hallowed shore
Of Pylos, or in Ithaca itself,
Or the dark mainland coast. Ye know it
well; 135

Why should I praise my mother? Come then, all;

Let there be no excuses for delay,
Nor longer leave the bow untried, that we May see the event. I too am moved to try;
And if I bend the bow, and send a shaft 140
Through all the rings, my gracious mother
then

Will not, to my great grief, renounce her
home,

And, following another, leave me here,
Although my prowess even now might win
The glorious prizes that my father won.” 145

He spake and, rising, from his shoulders
took

The purple cloak, and laid the trenchant
sword

Aside; and first he placed the rings of steel
In order, opening for them in the ground 149
A long trench by a line, and stamping close The earth around them. All admired the skill

With which he ranged them never having seen

The game before. And then he took his place

Upon the threshold, and essayed the bow;
And thrice he made the attempt, and thrice gave o'er, 155

Yet hoping still to draw the cord, and send An arrow through the rings. He would have drawn

The bow at the fourth trial, but a nod
Given by his father caused him to forbear, Though eager for the attempt. And then again 160

The princely youth bespake the suitors
thus:—

“Well, this is strange! I may hereafter prove

A craven and a weakling, or perchance
Am yet too young, and cannot trust my arm
To do me right against the man who first 165 Assaults me. Come then, ye whose strength excels

My own, and try the bow, and end the strife.”

He spake, and setting down the bow to lean

Against the firm smooth panels of the wall,
And the swift shaft against the bow's fair curve, 170

He took again his seat upon the throne
From which he rose. And then Eupheithes'
son,

Antinoös, to the crowd of suitors said:—

“Rise one by one, my friends, from right to left. 174

Begin where he begins who pours the wine.”

So spake Antinoös, and the rest approved.
Then rose Leiodes, son of Ctenops, first.

He was their seer, and always had his seat Beside the ample bowl. From deeds of wrong

He shrank with hatred, and was sore incensed 180

Against the suitors all. He took the bow
And shaft, and, going to the threshold, stood
And tried the bow, yet bent it not; it galled
His hands, for they were soft, and all unused
To such a task; and thus at length he
spake:— 185

“O friends, I bend it not; another hand
Must try. This bow, upon this very spot, Will take from many a prince the breath of
life.

And better were it thus to die, by far,
Than, living, fail of that intent for which 190
We haunt this place, and still from day to day

Assemble. There is many a one whose wish
And hope are strong to wed Penelope,
The consort of Ulysses; but so soon
As he shall see and try the hero's bow 195
Let him with marriage presents seek to gain
Some other bride among the long-robed dames,

Achaia's daughters. Let him leave the queen

To wed the suitor who shall bring to her
The richest gifts, and him whom fate appoints.” 200

He spake, and setting down the bow to lean

Against the firm smooth panels of the wall,
And the swift shaft against the bow's fair
curve,

He took again his seat upon the throne
From which he rose. Antinoüs then took up 205

The word and answered, and reproached him
thus:—

“What words are these, Leiodes, that have passed

Thy lips? harsh words and fearful,—that this bow

Shall take from many princes here the breath 209

Of life, and all because thou hast no power
To bend it? Thy good mother bore thee not
To draw the bow and send the arrow forth,
But others of the noble suitor-train

Are here, 'by whom this bow shall yet be bent.” 214

Then to Melanthius, keeper of the goats,
Antinoüs gave this bidding. “Light a fire
With speed, Melanthius, in the palace here,
And place a seat before it. Lay a fleece Upon the seat, and bring us from within
An ample roll of fat, that we young men 220
By warming and anointing may make soft
The bow, and draw the cord, and end the strife.”

He spake; Melanthius kindled instantly
A glowing fire, and near it placed a seat,
And on the seat a fleece, and from within 225
Brought forth an ample roll of fat, with which The young men, having warmed it, smeared
the bow

And tried, but bent it not, too weak by far
For such a feat. Antinoüs kept aloof,
He and the godlike youth Eurymachus, 230
Two princes who in might excelled the rest.

The herdsman of Ulysses meantime left
The palace, and with him the swineherd went,

And after them Ulysses. When they all Were now without the gate and palace court, 235

Ulysses spake to them, and blandly said:— “Herdsman and swineherd, shall I say to
you

Somewhat, or shall I keep it back? My
heart

Moves me to say it. Should Ulysses come,
Led by some god, and suddenly, what aid 240
Would he receive from you? Would ye take part

With him, or with the suitors? Frankly speak;
And tell me what your hearts would bid you do.”

Then answered thus the keeper of the herds: .

“O Father Jove! wouldst thou but grant my wish, 245

And let some god conduct him hither, then Shall it be seen what might is in these hands!”

So also did Eumaeus offer prayer
To all the deities, that speedily
The wise Ulysses might return; and when 250
The chief perceived in all its truth the thought

And purpose of their hearts, he spake and
said:—

“Know, then, that I myself am he, at home

Again, returning in the twentieth year,
And after many sufferings, to the land 255
That saw my birth. I know that I am come
Welcome to you alone of all my train

Of servants, since I hear no others pray
For my return. Hear, then, what I engage Shall be hereafter. If some god o'ercome
For me these arrogant suitors, I will give 261
To each of you a wife and lands, and build
For each a house near mine, and ye shall be
The friends and brothers of Telemachus

Thenceforth. And now, that ye may surely know 265

And trust me, I will show a token here,—
A scar which once the white tooth of a boar
Made, when long since, on the Parnassian mount,

I hunted with Autolycus's sons.”

Thus having said, he drew from the broad scar 270

The covering rags; they looked and knew it
well,

And wept, and round Ulysses threw their
arms,

And kissed in that embrace the hero's head
And shoulders, while Ulysses also kissed

Their heads and hands. The sun would have gone down 275

Upon their weeping, but for him. He said:—

“Cease now from tears, lest some one from the hall

Should see us, and report of us within.

Now let us enter, not in company,—

I first, and ye thereafter, one by one, 280

And let the sign be this: the others all—
The haughty suitors—will refuse to me
The bow and quiver. When thou bearest it,
My noble friend Eumæus, through the halls, Bring it and place it in my hands, and charge 285

The women to make fast the solid doors;
And then if any one of them should hear
A groan or other noise of men within,
Let her not issue forth, but silently Pursue her task. Meantime be it thy
care, 290

My good Philoetius, with a key to lock
The portals of the court and fix the chain.”

Thus having said, into that noble pile
He passed again, and took the seat from which

He lately rose, and afterward, in turn, 295
Entered the servants of the godlike chief.

Eurymachus was busy with the bow,
Turning and warming it before the blaze
On both its sides. He could not bend it
thus.

There came a deep sigh from his boastful
heart, 300

And greatly was he vexed, and sadly said:—
“Alas! great cause of grief indeed is here

For me and all. 'T is not that I lament
So much the losing of the bride, although
That also vexes me,—there yet remain 305

Many fair ladies of the Achaian stock,
Both in the sea-girt lands of Ithaca
And other regions,—yet if we be found
To fall in strength of arm so far below

The great Ulysses that we cannot bend 310
His bow, our sons will hear of it with shame.”

Eupeithes' son, Antinoüs, answered thus:
“Not so, Eurymachus, as thou thyself Shouldst know. This day is held a solemn feast

Of Phoebus by the people. Who would draw 315

The bow to-day? Nay, lay it by in peace,
And suffer all the rings to stand as now;
For no man, as I think, will dare to come
Into the palace of Laertes' son

And take them hence. Let him who bears the cup 320

Begin to serve the wine, that, having poured
Part to the gods, we may lay down the bow,
And with the morning let Melanthius
come,—

The goatherd,—bringing with him from the flock

The choicest goats, that we may burn the thighs, 325

An offering to the god of archery,
Apollo. Then will we again essay
The bow, and bring the contest to an end.”

So spake Antinoüs, and they all approved.
Then heralds came, and on the suitors'
hands 330

Poured water; youths filled up the cups with wine,

Beginning at the right, and gave to each
His share; and when they all had poured a part,

And each had drunk, the shrewd Ulysses thus With artful speech bespake the suitor-
train:— 335

“Hearken, ye suitors of the illustrious
queen,

To what my heart is prompting me to say;
But chiefly to Eurymachus I make
My suit, and to Antinoüs, who so well Hath counselled to lay by the bow and trust 340

The gods. To-morrow Phoebus will bestow
The needed strength on whomsoever he will;
But let me take that polished bow, and try Among you, whether still the power that dwelt

In these once pliant limbs abides in them, 345
Or whether happily it has passed from me
Amid my wanderings and a life of want.”

He spake, and all were vehemently moved With anger, for they feared that he would bend

The bow, and thus Antinoüs, railing,
spake:— 350

“Thou worthless vagabond, without a spark

Of reason, art thou not content to sit
And banquet with the proudest, where no
part

Of all the feast escapes thee, hearing all
That we are saying, which no other man, 355
Stranger and beggar, is allowed to hear!
This good wine makes thee foolish, as wine oft
Makes those who swallow it too greedily,
And drink not with due stint. It maddened
once

Eurytion, the famed Centaur, in the halls 360
Of the large-souled Pirithoüs. He had come
Among the Lapithæ, and when inflamed
With wine to madness, in those very halls Did lawless deeds. The heroes were incensed.

They rushed upon him, dragged him through the porch 365

And out of doors, and there cut off his nose
And ears, and he departed, frenzied still,
And bearing in bewilderment of mind
His punishment, whence war arose between Centaurs and men; yet surely he had
brought 370

The evil on himself, when overcome
With wine. Such fearful mischief I foretell Will light on thee, if thou shouldst bend this
bow,

Nor canst thou hope for favor here among
The people. We will send thee speedily, 375
In a black galley, to King Echetus,
The enemy of human kind, from whom Thou shalt find no escape. Drink, then, in peace

Thy wine, and seek no strife with younger
men."

Then spake the sage Penelope again: 380
"Truly, Antinoüs, it becomes thee not,
Nor is it just, to vex the stranger guests
Who seek the palace of Telemachus.
Dost thou, then, think that, should this stranger bend, 384

Proud as he is of his great strength of arm,
The mighty bow that once Ulysses bore,
He leads me hence a bride? No hope of that Is in his heart, and let no one of you Who banquet here allow a thought like that
To vex him; 't is a thing that cannot be." 390

Then to the queen, Eurymachus, the son
Of Polybus, replied: "We do not fear,
Sage daughter of Icarius, that this man
Will lead thee hence a bride; it cannot be.
We fear the speech of men and women both.
The very meanest of the Achaian race 396
Will say: 'Degenerate men are these, who seek

To wed the consort of a glorious chief,
Not one of whom can draw the bow he bore;
And now there comes a wandering beggar-
man, 400

Who draws the bow with ease, and sends a shaft

Through all the rings of steel.' Thus will they speak,

And this will be to us a cause of shame!"

And then the sage Penelope rejoined:

Eurymachus, it cannot be that those 405 Should earn the general praise who make the wealth

Of a most worthy man their spoil, and bring

Dishonor on his house. The stranger's frame
Is powerful and well knit; he claims to be
Of noble parentage. Now let him take 410
The bow, and we will see the event; but this
I promise, and will make my promise good;
If he should bend it,—if Apollo give
To him that glory,—he shall have from me
A tunic and a cloak, fair garments both, 415
And a keen javelin, his defence against Both dogs and men, a two-edged sword besides.

And sandals for his feet, and I engage
To send him whither he desires to go."

Then spake discreet Telemachus again:
"Mother, in all Achaia there is none 421
Who has more power than I can claim, to grant

Or to deny the bow to whom I will.

No one of those who rule the rugged coast
Of Ithaca, or isles where Elis breeds 425
Her mares, may interpose to thwart my will,
If on the stranger I bestow the bow
To be his own, and bid him take it hence.
Withdraw, O queen, into thy bower; direct Thy household tasks, the distaff and the web, 430

And bid thy maidens speed the work. The bow

Belongs to men, and most to me; for here,
Within these walls, the authority is mine."

The queen, astonished, heard him and withdrew,

But kept her son's wise sayings in her
heart 435

And then ascending to her bower, among
Her maids, she wept her well-beloved lord,
Ulysses, till the blue-eyed Pallas came,
And poured upon her lids the balm of sleep.

Meantime the worthy swineherd bore the
bow 440

In hand, and all along the palace-halls
The suitor-crew were chiding him aloud,
And thus an insolent youth among them
spake:—

"Thou awkward swineherd, whither goest
thou

With the curved bow? Thy own fleet dogs which thou 445

Hast reared shall soon devour thee, far from men

And midst thy herds of swine, if we find grace
With Phoebus and the other deathless gods."

Such were their words; the swineherd where he stood 449

Set down the bow in fear, for many a voice
Called to him in the hall. On the other side Shouted Telemachus with threatening
words:—

“Nay, father, carry on the bow, nor think
To stop at every man’s command; lest I, Though younger than thyself, cast stones at
thee, 455

And chase thee to the fields, for I in strength Excel thee. Would that I excelled as far
In strength of arm the suitors in these halls,
Then would I roughly through the palace-
gates 459

Drive many who are plotting mischief now.”
He spake, and all with hearty laughter
heard

His words, and for their sake allowed their
wrath

Against the prince to cool. The swineherd went

Forward, along the hall, and, drawing near
The wise Ulysses, gave into his hands 465
The bow; and then he called the nurse aside, Dame Eurycleia, and bespake her thus:—

“Sage Eurycleia, from Telemachus
I charge thee to make fast the solid doors,
And then, if any of the maids should hear 470
A groan or other noise of men within,
Let her not issue forth, but silently
Pursue the task in hand, and keep her
place.”

He spake, nor were his words in vain. The dame

Made fast the doors of that magnificent
hall, 475

While silently Philoetius hastened forth
And locked the portals of the high-walled
court.

A cable of the bark of Byblos lay
Beneath the portico,—it once had served A galley,—and with this the herdsman tied 480

The portals, and, returning, took the seat
Whence he had risen, but ever kept his eye Fixed on his lord. Ulysses, meantime, held
The bow, and, turning it, intently eyed 484
Side after side, and tried each part in turn,
For fear that worms, while he was far away,
Had pierced the horn. At this, a youth among

The suitors, turning to his neighbor, said:—

“Lo an inspector and a judge of bow!
Perhaps he has a bow like that at home, 490
Or else would make one like it. How I e shifts

The thing with busy hands from side to side,—

The vagabond, well trained in knavish tricks!”

Then also said another insolent youth:
“May he in all things be as fortunate 495
As now, when he shall try to bend that bow!”

Such was their talk; but when the wary chief

Had poised and shrewdly scanned the mighty
bow,

Then, as a singer, skilled to play the harp,
Stretches with ease on its new fastenings 500
A string, the twisted entrails of a sheep,

Made fast at either end, so easily Ulysses bent that mighty bow. He took
And drew the cord with his right hand; it twanged

With a clear sound as when a swallow screams. 505

The suitors were dismayed, and all grew pale.
Jove in loud thunder gave a sign from
heaven.

The much-enduring chief, Ulysses, heard
With joy the friendly omen, which the son
Of crafty Saturn sent him. He took up 510
A winged arrow, that before him lay Upon a table, drawn; the others still Were in the quiver’s womb; the Greeks were yet

To feel them. This he set with care against The middle of the bow, and toward him
drew 515

The cord and arrow-notch, just where he
sat,

And, aiming opposite, let fly the shaft.
He missed no ring of all; from first to last
The brass-tipped arrow threaded every one.
Then to Telemachus Ulysses said:— 520

“Telemachus, the stranger sitting here
Hath not disgraced thee. I have neither missed

The rings, nor found it hard to bend the bow;
Nor has my manly strength decayed, as these
Who seek to bring me to contempt pretend;
And now the hour is come when we prepare
A supper for Achaïans, while the day 527
Yet lasts, and after supper the delights
Of song and harp, which nobly grace a
feast.”

He spake, and nodded to Telemachus, 530
His well-beloved son, who girded on His trenchant sword, and took in hand his spear,

And, armed with glittering brass for battle,
 came
 And took his station by his father's seat.

BOOK XXII

THEN did Ulysses cast his rags aside,
 And, leaping to the threshold, took his stand
 On its broad space, with bow and quiver filled

With arrows. At his feet the hero poured
 The winged shafts, and to the suitors called:—
 "That difficult strife is ended. Now I take

Another mark, which no man yet has hit.
 Now shall I see if I attain my aim,
 And, by the aid of Phoebus, win renown."

He spake; and, turning, at Antinoüs aimed
 The bitter shaft,—Antinoüs, who just then Had grasped a beautiful two-eared cup of
 gold,

About to drink the wine. He little thought
 Of wounds and death; for who, when banqueting

Among his fellows, could suspect that one Alone against so many men would dare,
 However bold, to plan his death, and bring
 On him the doom of fate? Ulysses struck
 The suitor with the arrow at the throat.
 The point came through the tender neck
 behind,

Sideways he sank to earth; his hand let fall
 The cup; the dark blood in a thick warm stream

Gushed from the nostrils of the smitten
 man.

He spurned the table with his feet, and spilled
 The viands; bread and roasted meats were flung

To lie polluted on the floor. Then rose
 The suitors in a tumult, when they saw
 The fallen man; from all their seats they rose Throughout the hall, and to the massive walls

Looked eagerly; there hung no buckler
 there,

No sturdy lance for them to wield. They called

Thus to Ulysses with indignant words:—

"Stranger! in evil hour hast thou presumed

To aim at men; and thou shalt henceforth
 bear

Part in no other contest. Even now
 Is thy destruction close to thee. Thy hand Hath slain the noblest youth in Ithaca.
 The vultures shall devour thy flesh for this."

So each one said; they deemed he had not
 slain

The suitor wittingly; nor did they see,
 Blind that they were, the doom which in that hour

Was closing round them all. Then with a frown

The wise Ulysses looked on them, and said:—
 "Dogs! ye had thought I never would come back

From Ilium's coast, and therefore ye devoured

My substance here, and offered violence
 To my maid-servants, and pursued my wife
 As lovers, while I lived. Ye dreaded not The gods who dwell in the great heaven, nor feared

Vengeance hereafter from the hands of men;
 And now destruction overhangs you all."

He spake, and all were pale with fear, and each

Looked round for some escape from death.
 Alone

Eurymachus found voice, and answered
 thus:—

"If thou indeed be he, the Ithacan
 Ulysses, now returned to thine old home,
 Well hast thou spoken of the many wrongs
 Done to thee by the Achaïans in thy house
 And in thy fields. But there the man lies
 slain

Who was the cause of all. Antinoüs first Began this course of wrong. Nor were his thoughts

So much of marriage as another aim,—
 Which Saturn's son denied him,—to bear rule

Himself o'er those who till the pleasant fields
 Of Ithaca, first having slain thy son

In ambush. But he now has met his fate.
 Spare, then, thy people. We will afterward

Make due amends in public for the waste
 Here in thy palace of the food and wine.

For each of us shall bring thee twenty beeves,

And brass and gold, until thy heart shall be Content. Till then we cannot blame thy wrath."

Sternly the wise Ulysses frowned, and said:
 "Eurymachus, if thou shouldst offer me
 All that thou hast, thy father's wealth entire,
 And add yet other gifts, not even then
 Would I refrain from bloodshed, ere my hand
 Avenged my wrongs upon the suitor-crew.
 Choose then to fight or flee, whoever hopes Escape from death and fate; yet none of
 you
 Will now, I think, avoid that bitter doom."

He spake. At once their knees and head grew faint,

And thus Eurymachus bespake the rest:—

"This man, O friends, to his untamable
 arm

Will give no rest, but with that bow in
 hand,

And quiver, will send forth from where he stands

His shafts, till he has slain us all. Prepare For combat then, and draw your swords, and hold

The tables up against his deadly shafts,
 And rush together at him as one man,

And drive him from the threshold through the door.

Then, hurrying through the city, let us
 sound

The alarm, and soon he will have shot his last."

He spake, and, drawing his keen two-edged
 sword

Of brass, sprang toward him with a dreadful cry,

Just as the great Ulysses, sending forth
 An arrow, smote the suitor on the breast,

Beside the nipple. The swift weapon stood Fixed in his liver; to the ground he flung

The sword, and reeling giddily around
 The table, fell; he brought with him to earth

The viands and the double cup, and smote
 The pavement with his forehead heavily,

And in great agony. With both his feet
 He struck and shook his throne, and darkness

came Over his eyes. Then rushed Amphinomus

Against the glorious chief, and drew his
 sword

To thrust him from the door. Telemachus O'ertook him, and between his shoulders drove

A brazen lance. Right through his breast it went,

And he fell headlong, with his forehead dashed

Against the floor. Telemachus drew back,
 And left his long spear in Amphinomus,

Lest, while he drew it forth, some one among The Achaians might attack him with the

sword,
 And thrust him through or hew him down.

In haste
 He reached his father's side, and quickly
 said:—

"Now, father, will I bring to thee a shield,
 Two javelins, and a helmet wrought of brass,

Well fitted to the temples. I will case Myself in armor, and will also give

Arms to the swineherd, and to him who tends
 The beeves; for men in armor combat best."

And wise Ulysses answered: "Bring them
 then,

And quickly, while I yet have arrows here
 For my defence, lest, when I am alone,

They drive me from my station at the door."
 He spake. Obedient to his father's word,

Telemachus was soon within the room
 In which the glorious arms were laid. He took Four bucklers thence, eight spears, and helmets four

Of brass, each darkened with its horsehair crest,

And bore them forth, and quickly stood again
 Beside his father. But he first encased

His limbs in brass; his followers also put Their shining armor on, and took their place

Beside the wise Ulysses, eminent
 In shrewd devices. He, while arrows yet

Were ready to his hand, with every aim Brought down a suitor; side by side they fell.

 But when the shafts were spent, the archer-

king
 Leaned his good bow beside the shining wall,

Against a pillar of the massive pile,
 And round his shoulders slung a fourfold

shield,
 And crowned his martial forehead with a helm

 Wrought fairly, with a heavy horsehair crest

That nodded gallantly above, and took
 In hand the two stout lances tipped with brass.

 In the strong wall there was a postern door,

And, near the outer threshold of the pile,
 A passage from it to a narrow lane,

Closed with well-fitting doors. Ulysses bade
The noble swineherd take his station there,
And guard it well, as now the only way
Of entrance. Agelaüs called aloud 155
To all his fellows, and bespake them thus:—

“Friends! will no one among you all go up

To yonder postern door, and make our plight Known to the people? Then the alarm would spread, 159
And this man haply will have shot his last.”

Melanthius, keeper of the goats, replied:
“Nay, noble Agelaüs; ’t is too near
The palace gate; the entrance of the lane
Is narrow, and a single man, if brave,
Against us all might hold it. I will bring 165
Arms from the chamber to equip you all;
For there within, and nowhere else, I deem,
Ulysses and his son laid up their arms.”

Thus having said, the keeper of the goats, Melanthius, climbed the palace stairs, and gained 170

The chamber of Ulysses. Taking thence Twelve shields, as many spears, as many helms

Of brass, with each its heavy horsehair plume,

He came, and gave them to the suitors’
hands.

Then sank the hero’s heart, and his knees
shook 175

As he beheld the suitors putting on
Their armor, and uplifting their long spears.
The mighty task appalled him, and he thus Bespake Telemachus with winged words:—

“Telemachus, some woman here, or else
Melanthius, makes the battle hard for us.”

And thus discreet Telemachus replied: 182
“Father, I erred in this. I was the cause,
And no one else; I left the solid door
Ajar; the spy was shrewder far than I. 185
Now, good Eumaeus, shut the chamber door,
And see if any of the palace-maids
Have brought these arms, or if I rightly fix
The guilt upon Melanthius, Dolius’ son.”

So talked they with each other, while
again 190

Melanthius, stealing toward the chamber,
thought

To bring yet other shining weapons thence.
The noble swineherd marked him as he went,
And quickly drawing near Ulysses said:—

“Son of Laertes! nobly born and wise! 195
The knave whom we suspect is on his way

Up to thy chamber. Tell me now, I pray,
And plainly, shall I make an end of him,
If I may prove the stronger man, or bring
The wretch into thy presence, to endure 200
The vengeance due to all the iniquities
Plotted by him against thee in these halls?”

Ulysses, the sagacious, answered thus:

“Telemachus and I will keep at bay
The suitors in this place, however fierce 205
Their onset, while ye two bind fast his hands
And feet behind his back, and bringing him
Into the chamber, with the door made fast
Behind you, tie him with a double cord,
And draw him up a lofty pillar close 210
To the timbers of the roof, that, swinging
there,
He may live long and suffer grievous pain.”

He spake; they hearkened and obeyed, and went

Up to the chamber unperceived by him Who stood within and searched a nook for
arms. 215

On each side of the entrance, by its posts,
They waited for Melanthius. Soon appeared
The goatherd at the threshold of the room,
Bearing a beautiful helmet in one hand,
And in the other a broad ancient shield, 220
Defaced by age and mould. Laertes once,
The hero, bore it when a youth, but now
Long time it lay unused, with gaping seams.

They sprang and seized the goatherd,
dragging him 224

Back to the chamber by the hair; and there
They cast him, in an agony of fear,
Upon the floor, and bound his hands and feet
With a stout cord behind his back, as bade
The great Ulysses, much-enduring son Of old Laertes. Round him then they looped 230

A double cord, and swung him up beside
A lofty pillar, till they brought him near The timbers of the roof. And then didst
thou,

Eumaeus, say to him in jeering words:—

“Melanthius, there mayst thou keep watch
all night 235

On a soft bed, a fitting place for thee;
And when the Mother of the Dawn shall
come

Upon her golden seat from ocean’s streams, Thou wilt not fail to see her. Thou mayst
then

Drive thy goats hither for the suitors’
feast.” 240

They left him in that painful plight, and put
 Their armor on, and closed the shining door,
 And went, and by Ulysses, versed in wiles, Stood breathing valor. Four were they who stood 244
 Upon that threshold, while their foes within Were many and brave. Then Pallas, child of Jove,
 Drew near, like Mentor both in shape and voice.
 Ulysses saw her, and rejoiced and said:—
 "Come, Mentor, to the aid of one who loves 249
 And has befriended thee, thy peer in age."
 Thus said Ulysses, but believed he spake
 To Pallas, scatterer of hosts. Fierce shouts Came from the suitors in the hall, and first,
 Thus Agelaüs railed, Damastor's son:—
 "Mentor, let not Ulysses wheedle thee 255
 To join him, and make war on us, for this
 Our purpose is, and it will be fulfilled:
 When by our hands the father and the son
 Are slain, thou also shalt be put to death
 For this attempt, and thy own head shall
 be 260
 The forfeit. When we shall have taken thus Thy life with our good weapons, we will seize
 On all thou hast, on all thy wealth within Thy dwelling or without, and, mingling it
 With the possessions of Ulysses, leave 265
 Within thy palaces no son of thine
 Or daughter living, and no virtuous wife
 Of thine, abiding here in Ithaca."
 He spake, and woke new anger in the heart
 Of Pallas, and she chid Ulysses thus:— 270
 "Ulysses, thou art not, in might of arm
 And courage, what thou wert when waging war
 Nine years without a pause against the men
 Of Troy for Helen's sake, the child of Jove,
 And many didst thou slay in deadly strife,
 And Priam's city, with its spacious streets,
 Was taken through thy counsels. How is it 277
 That, coming to thy own possessions here
 And thy own palace, thou dost sadly find
 Thy ancient valor fail thee in the strife Against the suitors? Now draw near, my friend, 281
 And stand by me, and see what I shall do,
 And own that Mentor, son of Alcimus,
 Amid a press of foes requites thy love."
 She spake, but gave not to Ulysses yet 285

The certain victory; for she meant to put
 To further proof the courage and the might Both of Ulysses and his emulous son.
 To the broad palace roof she rose, and sat
 In shape a swallow. Agelaüs now, 290 Damastor's son, cheered on with gallant
 words
 His friends; so also did Amphimedon,
 Eurynomus, and Demoptolemus, Polyctor's son, Peisander, and with these Sagacious Polybus. These six excelled 295
 In valor all the suitors who survived,
 And they were fighting for their lives. The
 bow
 And the fleet shafts had smitten down their peers.
 Thus to his fellows Agelaüs spake:—
 "O friends, this man will now be forced to stay 300
 His fatal hand. See, Mentor leaves his side,
 After much empty boasting, and those four
 Are at the entrance gate alone. Now aim At him with your long spears,—not all at
 once,
 Let six first hurl their weapons, and may
 Jove 305
 Grant that we strike Ulysses down, and win
 Great glory! For the others at his side
 We care but little, if their leader fall."
 He spake; they hearkened. Eagerly they cast
 Their lances. Pallas made their aim to err.
 One struck a pillar of the massive pile; 311
 One struck the panelled door; one ashen
 shaft,
 Heavy with metal, rang against the wall.
 And when they had escaped that flight of spears,
 Hurl'd from the crowd, the much-enduring
 man, 315
 Ulysses, thus to his companions said:—
 "Now is the time, my friends, to send our spears
 Into the suitor-crowd, who, not content
 With wrongs already done us, seek our lives."
 He spake, and, aiming opposite, they cast Their spears. The weapon which Ulysses
 flung 321
 Slew Demoptolemus; his son struck down
 Euryades; the herdsman snote to death
 Peisander, and the swineherd Elatus.
 These at one moment fell, and bit the dust
 Of the broad floor. Back flew the suitorcrowd 326

To a recess; and after them the four Rushed on, and plucked their weapons from the dead.

Again the suitors threw their spears; again Did Pallas cause their aim to err. One struck 330

A pillar of the massive pile, and one
The panelled door; another ashen shaft,
Heavy with metal, rang against the wall.
Yet did the weapon of Amphimedon
Strike lightly on the wrist Telemachus. 335
The brass just tore the skin. Ctesippus grazed

The shoulder of Eumaeus with his spear,
Above the shield; the spear flew over it And fell to earth. Then they who stood beside

The sage Ulysses, versed in wiles, once
more 340

Flung their keen spears. The spoiler of walled towns,

Ulysses, slew Eurydamas; his son Struck down Amphimedon; the swineherd
took

The life of Polybus; the herdsman smote Ctesippus, driving through his breast the
spear, 345

And called to him, and gloried o'er his fall:—

“O son of Polytherse, prompt to rail!
Beware of uttering, in thy foolish pride,
Big words hereafter; leave it to the gods,
Mightier are they than we. See, I repay 350
The hospitable gift of a steer's foot,
Which once the great Ulysses from thy hand Received, as he was passing through this
hall.”

Thus spake the keeper of the horned herd.
Meantime, Ulysses slew Damastor's son 355
With his long spear, in combat hand to hand.
Telemachus next smote Evenor's son,
Leiocritus. He sent the brazen spear
Into his bowels; through his body passed
The weapon, and he fell upon his face. 360
His forehead struck the floor. Then Pallas
held

On high her fatal aegis. From the roof
She showed it, and their hearts grew wild with fear.

They fled along the hall as flees a herd
Of kine, when the swift gadfly suddenly 365
Has come among them, and has scattered
them

In springtime, when the days are growing
long.

Meantime, like falcons with curved claws and beaks,

That, coming from the mountain summits,
pounce

Upon the smaller birds, and make them fly Close to the fields among the snares they dread, 371

And seize and slay, nor can the birds resist
Or fly, and at the multitude of prey

The fowlers' hearts are glad; so did the four Smite right and left the suitors hurrying through 375

The palace-hall, and fearful moans arose
As heads were smitten by the sword, and all The pavement swam with blood. Leiodes
then 378

Sprang forward to Ulysses, clasped his knees,
And supplicated him with winged words:—

“I come, Ulysses, to thy knees. Respect
And spare me. Never have I said or done,
Among the women of thy household, aught
That could be blamed, and I essayed to check

The wrongs of other suitors. Little heed 385
They gave my counsels, nor withheld their
hands

From evil deeds, and therefore have they drawn

Upon themselves an evil fate. But I,
Who have done nothing,—I their soothsayer,—

Must I too die? Then is there no reward 390
Among the sons of men for worthy deeds.”

Ulysses, the sagacious, frowned and said:
“If then, in truth, thou wert as thou dost boast, 393

A soothsayer among these men, thy prayer
Within these palace-walls must oft have been
That far from me might be the blessed day
Of my return, and that my wife might take With thee her lot, and bring forth sons to
thee,

And therefore shalt thou not escape from
death.”

He spake, and seizing with his powerful
hand 400

A falcion lying near, which from the grasp
Of Agelaüs fell when he was slain,

Just at the middle of the neck he smote
Leiodes, while the words were on his lips,
And the head fell, and lay amid the dust. 405

Phemius, the son of Terpius, skilled in
song,

Alone escaped the bitter doom of death.

He by constraint had sung among the train
Of suitors, and was standing now beside
The postern door, and held his sweet-toned lyre, 410

And pondered whether he should leave the
hall,

And sit before the altar of the great
Herceian Jove, where, with Laertes, once
Ulysses oft had burned the thighs of beeves,
Or whether he should fling himself before 415
Ulysses, as a suppliant, at his knees.

This to his thought seemed wisest,—to approach

Laertes' son, and clasp his knees. He placed
His sweet harp on the floor, between the cup
And silver-studded seat, and went and clasped 420

The hero's knees, and said in winged
words:—

"I come, Ulysses, to thy knees. Respect
And spare me. It will be a grief to thee, Hereafter, shouldst thou slay a bard, who sings

For gods and men alike. I taught myself
This art; some god has breathed into my
mind 426

Songs of all kinds, and I could sing to thee
As to a god. O, seek not then to take My life! Thy own dear son Telemachus
Will bear me witness that not willingly 430
Nor for the sake of lucre did I come
To sing before the suitors at their feasts
And in thy palace, but was forced to come
By numbers and by mightier men than I."

He ceased; Telemachus, the mighty,
heard 435

And thus bespake his father at his side:—

"Refrain; smite not the guiltless with the
sword;

And be the herald, Medon, also spared,
Who in our palace had the care of me
Through all my childhood; if he be not slain
Already by Philoetius, or by him 441
Who tends the swine, or if he have not met Thyself, when thou wert ranging through the
hall."

He spake, and the sagacious Medon heard,
As crouching underneath a throne he lay, 445
Wrapped in the skin just taken from a steer,
To hide from the black doom of death. He came

From where he lay, and quickly flung aside
The skin, and, springing forward, clasped the knees

Of the young prince, and said in winged
words:—

"Dear youth, behold me here; be merciful; 450
Speak to thy father, that he put not forth
His sword to slay me, eager as he is
For vengeance, and incensed against the men Who haunt these halls to make his wealth a spoil, 455
And in their folly hold thyself in scorn."

He spake; the sage Ulysses smiled and
said:

"Be of good cheer, since this my son protects

And rescues thee. Now mayst thou well perceive,

And say to other men, how much more safe
Is doing good than evil. Go thou forth 461
Out of this slaughter to the open court,
Thou and the illustrious bard, and sit ye
there,

While here within I do what yet I must."

He spake; they moved away and left the
hall, 465

And by the altar of almighty Jove
Sat looking round them still in fear of death.

Meantime, Ulysses passed with searching look

O'er all the place, to find if yet remained
A single one of all the suitor-crew 470
Alive, and skulking from his bitter doom.

He saw that all had fallen in blood and dust,
Many as fishes on the shelving beach
Drawn from the hoary deep by those who tend
The nets with myriad meshes. Poured abroad 475

Upon the sand, while panting to return
To the salt sea they lie, till the hot sun
Takes their life from them; so the suitors lay Heaped on each other. Then Ulysses took The word, and thus bespake Telemachus:—

"Go now, Telemachus, and hither call 481
The nurse, Dame Eurycleia. I would say Somewhat to her that comes into my
thought."

So spake the chief. Telemachus obeyed
The word, and smote the door, and called the nurse:— 485

"Come hither, ancient dame, who hast in charge

To oversee the women in their tasks;
My father calls thee, and would speak with
thee."

He spake; nor flew the word in vain; she flung

Apart the portals of those stately rooms, 490
And came in haste. Before her went the prince.

Among the corpses of the slain they found Ulysses, stained with blood, and grimed with dust.

As when a lion, who has just devoured
A bullock of the pasture, moves away, 495
A terror to the sight, with breast and cheeks
All bathed in blood; so did Ulysses seem,
His feet and hands steeped in the blood of
men.

She, when she saw the corpses and the pools
Of blood, and knew the mighty task complete, 500

Was moved to shout for joy. Ulysses checked

Her eager zeal, and said in winged words:—

“Rejoice in spirit, dame, but calm thyself,
And shout not. To exult aloud o’er those Who lie in death is an unholy thing. 505
The pleasure of the gods, and their own
guilt,

Brought death on these; for no respect had
they

To any of their fellow-men,—the good
Or evil,—whosoever he might be

That came to them, and thus on their own heads 510

They drew this fearful fate. Now name to
me

The women of the palace; let me know
Who is disloyal, and who innocent.”

Then thus the well-beloved nurse replied:
“My son, I will declare the truth. There dwell 515

Here in thy palace fifty serving-maids, Whom we have taught to work, to comb the fleece

And serve the household. Twelve of these have walked

The way of shame. To me they give no heed,

Nor to Penelope herself. Thy son 520
Has just now grown to manhood, and the queen

Has never suffered him to rule the maids;
But let me now, ascending to her room,—
The royal bower,—apprise thy wife, to whom
Some deity has sent the gift of sleep.” 525

Ulysses, the sagacious, answered thus:
“Wake her not yet, but go and summon all
The women who have wrought these shameful deeds.”

He spake; the matron through the palace
went 529

To seek the women, and to bid them come.
Meanwhile, Ulysses called Telemachus,
The herdsman and the swineherd to his side,
And thus commanded them with winged
words:—

“Begin to carry forth the dead, and call
The women to your aid; and next make clean, 535

With water and with thirsty sponges, all The sumptuous thrones and tables. When ye thus

Have put the hall in order, lead away
The serving-maids, and in the space between
The kitchen vault and solid outer wall 540 Smite them with your long swords till they give up

The ghost, and lose the memory evermore
Of secret meetings with the suitor-train.”

He spake; the women came, lamenting loud
With many tears, and carried forth the dead,
Leaning upon each other as they went, 546
And placed them underneath the portico

Of the walled court. Ulysses gave command,
Hastening their task, as all unwillingly
They bore the corpses forth. With water next, 550

And thirsty sponges in their hands, they cleansed

The sumptuous thrones and tables. Then the prince,

Telemachus, with shovels cleared the floor,
The herdsman and the swineherd aiding him,
And made the women bear the rubbish forth.
And now when all within was once again 560

In seemly order, they led forth the maids
From that fair pile into the space between
The kitchen vault and solid outer wall,

A narrow space from which was no escape,
And thus discreet Telemachus began:— 561

“I will not take away these creatures’ lives
By a pure death,—these who so long have heaped

Reproaches on my mother’s head and mine,
And played the wanton with the suitor-
crew.” 565

He spake, and made the hawser of a ship
Fast to a lofty shaft; the other end

He wound about the kitchen vault. So high He stretched it that the feet of none who hung

On it might touch the ground. As when a flock 570

Of broad-winged thrushes or wild pigeons strike
A net within a thicket, as they seek Their perch, and find unwelcome durance
there,
So hung the women, with their heads a-row,
And cords about their necks, that they might die 575
A miserable death. A little while,
And but a little, quivered their loose feet
In air. They led Melanthius from the hall And through the porch, cut off his nose and ears,
Wrenched out the parts of shame, a bloody
meal 580
For dogs, and in their anger from the trunk Lopped hands and feet. Then, having duly washed
Their feet and hands, they came into the
hall,
And to Ulysses; they had done their work.
And then to the dear nurse Ulysses said:— “Bring sulphur, dame, the cure of noxious air, 586
And fire, that I may purge the hall with smoke;
And go, and bid Penelope come down,
With her attendant women, and command

That all the handmaids of the household
come.” 590
And thus in turn Dame Eurycleia spake:
“Well hast thou said, my son, but suffer me
To bring thee clothes, a tunic and a cloak,
Nor with those rags on thy broad shoulders
stand 594
In thine own palace; it becomes thee not.”
Ulysses, the sagacious, answered thus:
“First let a fire be kindled in this hall.”
He spake, and Eurycleia, the dear nurse, Obeyed, and brought the sulphur and the fire.
Ulysses steeped in smoke the royal pile. 600
Both hall and court. The matron, passing through
The stately palace of Ulysses, climbed
The stair to find and summon all the maids.
And forth they issued, bearing in their hands Torches, and, crowding round Ulysses, gave 605
Glad greeting, seized his hands, embraced him, kissed
His hands and brow and shoulders. The desire
To weep for joy o’ercame the chief; his eyes O’erflowed with tears; he sobbed; he knew them all.

VERGIL (B. C. 70–19)

THE ÆNEID¹

BOOK II

ARGUMENT

ÆNEAS relates how the city of Troy was taken after a ten years’ siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fix’d resolution he had taken not to survive the ruins of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defense of it. At last, having been before advis’d by Hector’s ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevail’d upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to do this, he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterward appears to him, and tells him the land which was design’d for him.

ALL were attentive to the godlike man,
When from his lofty couch he thus began:
“Great queen, what you command me to relate
Renews the sad remembrance of our fate:
An empire from its old foundations rent, 5
And ev’ry woe the Trojans underwent;
A peopled city made a desert place;
All that I saw, and part of which I was:
Not ev’n the hardest of our foes could hear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear. 10
And now the latter watch of wasting night,
And setting stars, to kindly rest invite;
But, since you take such int’rest in our woe,
And Troy’s disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell 15
What in our last and fatal night befell.
“By destiny compell’d, and in despair,

The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war,
 And by Minerva's aid a fabric rear'd,
 Which like a steed of monstrous height
 appear'd: 20
 The sides were plank'd with pine; they feign'd it made
 For their return, and this the vow they paid.
 Thus they pretend, but in the hollow side
 Selected numbers of their soldiers hide:
 With inward arms the dire machine they load, 25
 And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.
 In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle (While Fortune did on Priam's empire smile)
 Renown'd for wealth; but, since, a faithless bay,
 Where ships expos'd to wind and weather
 lay. 30
 There was their fleet conceal'd. We thought, for Greece
 Their sails were hoisted, and our fears release.
 The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so
 long,
 Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
 Like swarming bees, and with delight survey 35
 The camp deserted, where the Grecians lay:
 The quarters of the sev'ral chiefs they show'd;
 Here Phoenix, here Achilles, made abode;
 Here join'd the battles; there the navy rode.
 Part on the pile their wond'ring eyes employ: 40
 The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy.
 Thymœtes first ('t is doubtful whether hir'd,
 Or so the Trojan destiny requir'd)
 Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken
 down,
 To lodge the monster fabric in the town. 45
 But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
 The fatal present to the flames design'd,
 Or to the wat'ry deep; at least to bore
 The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore.
 The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide, 50
 With noise say nothing, and in parts divide.
 Laocoon, follow'd by a num'rous crowd,
 Ran from the fort, and cried, from far,
 aloud:
 'O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?

What more than madness has possess'd your brains? 55
 Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone?
 And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
 This hollow fabric either must inclose,
 Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
 Or 't is an engine rais'd above the town, 60
 T' o'erlook the walls, and then to batter
 down.
 Somewhat is sure design'd, by fraud or
 force:
 Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.
 Thus having said, against the steed he threw
 His forceful spear, which, hissing as it flew, 65
 Pierc'd thro' the yielding planks of jointed
 wood,
 And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
 The sides, transpierc'd, return a rattling
 sound,
 And groans of Greeks inclos'd come issuing thro' the wound.
 And, had not Heav'n the fall of Troy design'd, 70
 Or had not men been fated to be blind,
 Enough was said and done t' inspire a better
 mind.
 Then had our lances pierc'd the treach'rous
 wood,
 And IlIan tow'rs and Priam's empire stood.
 Meantime, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds bring 75
 A captive Greek, in bands, before the king; Taken, to take; who made himself their
 prey,
 T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray;
 Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
 To die undaunted, or to circumvent. 80
 About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
 All press to see, and some insult the foe.
 Now hear how well the Greeks their wiles
 disguis'd;
 Behold a nation in a man compris'd.
 Trembling and miscreant stood, unarm'd
 and bound; 85
 He star'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes around,
 Then said: 'Alas! what earth remains,
 what sea
 Is open to receive unhappy me?
 What fate a wretched fugitive attends, Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends?' 90

He said, and sigh'd, and cast a rueful eye.
Our pity kindles, and our passions die.
We cheer the youth to make his own defense,

And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
What news he could impart, we long to know, 95

And what to credit from a captive foe.

"His fear at length dismiss'd, he said:
'Whate'er

My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere:
I neither can nor dare my birth disclaim;
Greece is my country, Sinon is my name. 100
Tho' plung'd by Fortune's pow'r in misery,
'Tis not in Fortune's pow'r to make me lie.
If any chance has hither brought the name
Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame, 104
Who suffer'd from the malice of the times,
Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes,
Because these fatal wars he would prevent;
Whose death the wretched Greeks too late lament—

Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare
Of other means, committed to his care, 110
His kinsman and companion in the war.
While Fortune favor'd, while his arms support

The cause, and rul'd the counsels, of the court,

I made some figure there; nor was my name
Obscure, nor I without my share of fame: 115
But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,
Had made impression in the people's hearts,
And forg'd a treason in my patron's name
(I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
My kinsman fell. Then I, without support, 120

In private mourn'd his loss, and left the court.

Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state, 123

And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
'T was told again; and hence my ruin rose.
I threaten'd, if indulgent Heav'n once more
Would land me safely on my native shore,
His death with double vengeance to restore.
This mov'd the murderer's hate; and soon ensued 129

Th' effects of malice from a man so proud.
Ambiguous rumors thro' the camp he spread,

And sought, by treason, my devoted head;
New crimes invented; left unturn'd no stone,

To make my guilt appear, and hide his own;

Till Calchas was by force and threat'ning wrought— 135

But why—why dwell I on that anxious thought?

If on my nation just revenge you seek,
And 't is t' appear a foe, t' appear a Greek;
Already you my name and country know;
Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the blow: 140

My death will both the kingly brothers please,

And set insatiate Ithacus at ease.'

This fair unfinished tale, these broken starts,

Rais'd expectations in our longing hearts:
Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts. 145

His former trembling once again renew'd,
With acted fear, the villain thus pursued:

"Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless care,

And wearied with an unsuccessful war)
Resolv'd to raise the siege, and leave the town; 150

And, had the gods permitted, they had gone;

But oft the wintry seas and southern winds
Withstood their passage home, and chang'd their minds.

Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd;
But most, when this stupendous pile was rais'd: 155

Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,

And thunders rattled thro' a sky serene.
Dismay'd, and fearful of some dire event,
Eurpylus t' enquire their fate was sent.

He from the gods this dreadful answer brought: 160

"O Grecians, when the Trojan shores you sought,

Your passage with a virgin's blood was bought:

So must your safe return be bought again,
And Grecian blood once more atone the main."

The spreading rumor round the people ran; 165

All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the man.
Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright;
Call'd Calchas, and produc'd in open sight:
Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd by fate

The public victim, to redeem the state. 170
 Already some presag'd the dire event,
 And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.
 For twice five days the good old seer withstood
 Th' intended treason, and was dumb to
 blood,
 Till, tir'd with endless clamors and pursuit
 Of Ithacus, he stood no longer mute; 176
 But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I
 Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die.
 All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm should fall
 On one alone, whose fury threaten'd all. 180
 The dismal day was come; the priests
 prepare
 Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair.
 I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow
 I broke my bonds and fled the fatal blow.
 Hid in a weedy lake all night I lay, 185
 Secure of safety when they sail'd away.
 But now what further hopes for me remain,
 To see my friends, or native soil, again;
 My tender infants, or my careful sire,
 Whom they returning will to death require; 190
 Will perpetrate on them their first design,
 And take the forfeit of their heads for mine?
 Which, O! if pity mortal minds can move,
 If there be faith below, or gods above,
 If innocence and truth can claim desert, 195
 Ye Trojans, from an injur'd wretch avert.
 "False tears true pity move; the king commands
 To loose his fetters, and unbind his hands:
 Then adds these friendly words: 'Dismiss thy fears;
 Forget the Greeks; be mine as thou wert
 theirs. 200
 But truly tell, was it for force or guile,
 Or some religious end, you rais'd the pile?'
 Thus said the king. He, full of fraudful arts,
 This well-invented tale for truth imparts:
 'Ye lamps of heav'n!' he said, and lifted
 high 205
 His hands now free, 'thou venerable sky!
 Inviolable pow'rs, ador'd with dread!
 Ye fatal fillets, that once bound this head!
 Ye sacred altars, from whose flames I fled!
 Be all of you adjur'd; and grant I may, 210

Without a crime, th' ungrateful Greek;
 betray,
 Reveal the secrets of the guilty state,
 And justly punish whom I justly hate!
 But you, O king, preserve the faith you gave,
 If I, to save myself, your empire save. 215
 The Grecian hopes, and all th' attempts they made,
 Were only founded on Minerva's aid.
 But from the time when impious Diomede,
 And false Ulysses, that inventive head,
 Her fatal image from the temple drew, 220
 The sleeping guardians of the castle slew,
 Her virgin statue with their bloody hands
 Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands;
 From thence the tide of fortune left their
 shore,
 And ebb'd much faster than it flow'd before: 225
 Their courage languish'd, as their hopes decay'd;
 And Pallas, now averse, refus'd her aid.
 Nor did the goddess doubtfully declare
 Her alter'd mind and alienated care.
 When first her fatal image touch'd the
 ground, 230
 She sternly cast her glaring eyes around,
 That sparkled as they roll'd, and seem'd to threat:
 Her heav'nly limbs distill'd a briny sweat.
 Thrice from the ground she leap'd, was seen to wield
 Her brandish'd lance, and shake her horrid
 shield. 235
 Then Calchas bade our host for flight prepare,
 And hope no conquest from the tedious war,
 Till first they sail'd for Greece; with pray'rs besought
 Her injur'd pow'r, and better omens brought.
 And now their navy plows the wat'ry
 main, 240
 Yet soon expect it on your shores again,
 With Pallas pleas'd; as Calchas did ordain.
 But first, to reconcile the blue-ey'd maid
 For her stol'n statue and her tow'r betray'd,
 Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name 245
 We rais'd and dedicate this wondrous frame,
 So lofty, lest thro' your forbidden gates
 It pass, and intercept our better fates:
 For, once admitted there, our hopes are lost;

And Troy may then a new Palladium
boast; 250

For so religion and the gods ordain,
That, if you violate with hands profane Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn,

(Which omen, O ye gods, on Græcia turn!)
But if it climb, with your assisting hands, 255
The Trojan walls, and in the city stands;
Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenæ burn,
And the reverse of fate on us return.'

"With such deceits he gain'd their easy
hearts,

Too prone to credit his perfidious arts. 260
What Diomede, nor Thetis' greater son,
A thousand ships, nor ten years' siege, had done—

False tears and fawning words the city won.

"A greater omen, and of worse portent,
Did our unwary minds with fear torment,
Concurring to produce the dire event. 266

Laocoon, Neptune's priest by lot that year,
With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer;
When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spied

Two serpents, rank'd abreast, the seas
divide, 270

And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.
Their flaming crests above the waves they
show;

Their bellies seem to burn the seas below;
Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,

And on the sounding shore the flying billows
force. 275

And now the strand, and now the plain they
held;

Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd;

Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,

And lick'd their hissing jaws, that sputter'd flame.

We fled amaz'd; their destin'd way they take, 280

And to Laocoon and his children make;
And first around the tender boys they wind,
Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.

The wretched father, running to their aid
With pious haste, but vain, they next invade; 285

Twice round his waist their winding volumes
roll'd;

And twice about his gasping throat they fold.

The priest thus doubly chok'd, their crests
divide,

And tow'ring o'er his head in triumph ride.

With both his hands he labors at the knots;

His holy fillets the blue venom blots; 291

His roaring fills the flitting air around.

Thus, when an ox receives a glancing wound,

He breaks his bands, the fatal altar flies,

And with loud bellowings breaks the yielding skies. 295

Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit their
prey,

And to the tow'r of Pallas make their way:

Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there

By her large buckler and protended spear.

Amazement seizes all; the gen'ral cry 300

Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die,

Whose hand the will of Pallas had with-
stood,

And dar'd to violate the sacred wood.

All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid

And incense offer'd to th' offended maid. 305

A spacious breach is made; the town lies bare;

Some hoisting-levers, some the wheels prepare

And fasten to the horse's feet; the rest

With cables haul along th' unwieldy beast.

Each on his fellow for assistance calls; 310

At length the fatal fabric mounts the walls,

Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets
crown'd,

And choirs of virgins, sing and dance around.

Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending
down,

It enters o'er our heads, and threats the
town. 315

O sacred city, built by hands divine!

O valiant heroes of the Trojan line!

Four times he struck: as oft the clashing
sound

Of arms was heard, and inward groans rebound.

Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate, 320

We haul along the horse in solemn state;

Then place the dire portent within the tow'r.

Cassandra cried, and curs'd th' unhappy
hour;

Foretold our fate; but, by the god's decree,

All heard, and none believ'd the prophecy.
With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste, 326

In jollity, the day ordain'd to be the last.
Meantime the rapid heav'ns roll'd down the
light,

And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night;
Our men, secure, nor guards nor sentries
held, 330

But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.

The Grecians had embark'd their naval pow'rs

From Tenedos, and sought our well-known shores,

Safe under covert of the silent night,
And guided by th' imperial galley's light; 335
When Sinon, favor'd by the partial gods, Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark
abodes;

Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
Who joyful from their long confinement
rose.

Tysander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses down the cable slide: 341

Then Thoas, Athamas, and Pyrrhus haste;
Nor was the Podalirian hero last,
Nor injur'd Menelaüs, nor the fam'd
Epeüs, who the fatal engine fram'd. 345

A nameless crowd succeed; their forces join T' invade the town, oppress'd with sleep and wine.

Those few they find awake first meet their
fate;

Then to their fellows they unbar the gate. -
"T was in the dead of night, when sleep repairs 350

Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,

When Hector's ghost before my sight appears:

A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in
tears;

Such as he was, when, by Pelides slain, Thessalian coursers dragg'd him o'er the
plain. 355

Swol'n were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust

Thro' the bor'd holes; his body black with
dust;

Unlike that Hector who return'd from toils
Of war, triumphant, in Æacian spoils,

Or him who made the fainting Greeks retire, 360

And launch'd against their navy Phrygian
fire.

His hair and beard stood stiffen'd with his gore;

And all the wounds he for his country bore
Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran.

I wept to see the visionary man, 365
And, while my trance continued, thus began:

'O light of Trojans, and support of Troy, Thy father's champion, and thy country's
joy!

O, long expected by thy friends! from whence
Art thou so late return'd for our defense? 370
Do we behold thee, wearied as we are With length of labors, and with toils of war?

After so many fun'rals of thy own
Art thou restor'd to thy declining town?
But say, what wounds are these? What new disgrace 375

Deforms the manly features of thy face?'
"To this the specter no reply did frame,
But answer'd to the cause for which he came,
And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
This warning in these mournful words ex-
press'd: 380

'O goddess-born! escape, by timely flight,
The flames and horrors of this fatal night.
The foes already have possess'd the wall;
Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
Enough is paid to Priam's royal name, 385
More than enough to duty and to fame.

If by a mortal hand my father's throne
Could be defended, 't was by mine alone.

Now Troy to thee commends her future
state, 389

And gives her gods companions of thy fate:
From their assistance happier walls expect,
Which, wand'ring long, at last thou shalt erect.'

He said, and brought me, from their blest
abodes,

The venerable statues of the gods, 394
With ancient Vesta from the sacred choir,
The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.

"Now peals of shouts come thund'ring
from afar,

Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war:

The noise approaches, tho' our palace stood Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood. 400

Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms

Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms.
Fear broke my slumbers; I no longer stay,
But mount the terrace, thence the town survey,

And hearken what the frightful sounds convey. 405

Thus, when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
Crackling it rolls, and mows the standing corn;

Or deluges, descending on the plains,
Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains
Of lab'ring oxen and the peasant's gains; 410

Unroot the forest oaks, and bear away
Flocks, folds, and trees, an undistinguish'd prey:

The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees from far

The wasteful ravage of the wat'ry war. 414
Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd,
And Grecian frauds in open light appear'd.
The palace of Deïphobus ascends

In smoky flames, and catches on his friends.

Ucalegon burns next: the seas are bright
With splendor not their own, and shine with Trojan light. 420

New clamors and new clangors now arise,
The sound of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries.

With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms,
But first to gather friends, with them t' oppose 425

(If fortune favor'd) and repel the foes;
Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd,

With sense of honor and revenge inspir'd.
"Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,

Had scap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the flame: 430

With relics loaden, to my doors he fled,
And by the hand his tender grandson led.
'What hope, O Pantheus? whither can we run?

Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?'

Scarce had I said, when Pantheus, with a groan: 435

'Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town!
The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom

Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian hands.

The fire consumes the town, the foe commands; 440

And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
Break from the bowels of the fatal horse.

Within the gates, proud Sinon throws about
The flames; and foes for entrance press without, 444

With thousand others, whom I fear to name,
More than from Argos or Mycenæ came.

To sev'ral posts their parties they divide;
Some block the narrow streets, some scour the wide:

The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprise;
Who fights finds death, and death finds him who flies.

The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain.'

"I heard; and Heav'n, that well-born souls inspires,

Prompts me thro' lifted swords and rising fires

To run where clashing arms and clamor calls, 455

And rush undaunted to defend the walls.
Ripheus and Iph'itus by my side engage,

For valor one renown'd, and one for age.
Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew

My motions and my mien, and to my party drew; 460

With young Coræbus, who by love was led
To win renown and fair Cassandra's bed,
And lately brought his troops to Priam's aid,

Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.
Whom when I saw resolv'd in arms to fall,
And that one spirit animated all: 466

'Brave souls!' said I,—'but brave, alas! in vain—

Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain.
You see the desp'rate state of our affairs,
And heav'n's protecting pow'rs are deaf to pray'rs. 470

The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
To save a sinking town, involv'd in fire.

Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes: 475
Despair of life the means of living shows.'

So bold a speech encourag'd their desire
Of death, and added fuel to their fire.

"As hungry wolves, with raging appetite,

Scour thro' the fields, nor fear the stormy
night— 480

Their whelps at home expect the promis'd
food,

And long to temper their dry chaps in
blood—

So rush'd we forth at once; resolv'd to die,
Resolv'd, in death, the last extremes to try.
We leave the narrow lanes behind, and dare
Th' unequal combat in the public square: 486
Night was our friend; our leader was despair.
What tongue can tell the slaughter of that
night?

What eyes can weep the sorrows and af-fright?

An ancient and imperial city falls; 490

The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals;

Houses and holy temples float in blood,

And hostile nations make a common flood.

Not only Trojans fall; but, in their turn,

The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors
mourn. 495

Ours take new courage from despair and
night:

Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.

All parts resound with tumults, complaints, and fears;

And grisly Death in sundry shapes appears.

Androgeos fell among us, with his band, 500

Who thought us Grecians newly come to land.

'From whence,' said he, 'my friends, this long delay?

You loiter, while the spoils are borne away:

Our ships are laden with the Trojan store;

And you, like truants, come too late ashore.'

He said, but soon corrected his mistake, 506

Found, by the doubtful answers which we make:

Amaz'd, he would have shunn'd th' unequal fight;

But we, more num'rous, intercept his flight.

As when some peasant, in a bushy brake, 510

Has with unwary footing press'd a snake;

He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies

His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling eyes;

So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos flies.

In vain; for him and his we compass'd

round, 515

Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the
ground,

And of their lives an easy conquest found.

Thus Fortune on our first endeavor smil'd.

Coræbus then, with youthful hopes beguil'd,

Swoln with success, and of a daring mind, 520

This new invention fatally design'd.

'My friends,' said he, 'since Fortune shows
the way,

'Tis fit we should th' auspicious guide obey.

For what has she these Grecian arms bestow'd,

But their destruction, and the Trojans'
good?

Then change we shields, and their devices
bear:

Let fraud supply the want of force in war.

They find us arms.' This said, himself he dress'd

In dead Androgeos' spoils, his upper vest,

His painted buckler, and his plummy crest. 530

Thus Ripheus, Dymas, all the Trojan
train,

Lay down their own attire, and strip the
slain.

Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill pres-
age,

Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy
rage; 534

Unknown, assaulting whom we blindly meet,

And strew with Grecian carcasses the street.

Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,

Some to the shore and safer ships retreat;

And some, oppress'd with more ignoble fear,

Remount the hollow horse, and pant in secret there. 540

"But, ah! what use of valor can be made,

When heav'n's propitious pow'rs refuse their aid!

Behold the royal prophetess, the fair

Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevel'd hair,

Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred
bands, 545

In safety could protect from sacrilegious
hands:

On heav'n she cast her eyes, she sigh'd, she cried—

'T was all she could—her tender arms were tied.

So sad a sight Coræbus could not bear;

But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair,

Amid the barb'rous ravishers he flew: 551

Our leader's rash example we pursue.

But storms of stones, from the proud temple's height,

Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight:

We from our friends receiv'd this fatal blow, 555

Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in show.

They aim at the mistaken crests, from high;
And ours beneath the pond'rous ruin lie.

Then, mov'd with anger and disdain, to see
Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin free, 560

The Grecians rally, and their pow'rs unite,
With fury charge us, and renew the fight.

The brother kings with Ajax join their force,
And the whole squadron of Thessalian horse.

"Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try, 565

Contending for the kingdom of the sky,
South, east, and west, on airy coursers borne;

The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are torn:

Then Nereus strikes the deep; the billows rise,

And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute the skies. 570

The troops we squander'd first again appear

From sev'ral quarters, and enclose the rear.

They first observe, and to the rest betray,
Our different speech; our borrow'd arms survey.

Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Corœbus first,
At Pallas' altar, by Peneleus pierc'd. 576

Then Ripheus follow'd, in th' unequal fight;

Just of his word, observant of the right:

Heav'n thought not so. Dymas their fate attends,

With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends. 580

Nor, Pantheus, thee, thy miter, nor the bands
Of awful Phœbus, sav'd from impious hands.

Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear,
What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there;

No sword avoiding in the fatal strife, 585
Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life!

Witness, ye heav'ns! I live not by my fault:

I strove to have deserv'd the death I sought.
But, when I could not fight, and would have died,

Borne off to distance by the growing tide, 590

Old Iphitus and I were hurried thence,
With Pelias wounded, and without defense.

New clamors from th' invested palace ring:

We run to die, or disengage the king.

So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose, 596

As all the Dardan and Argolic race
Had been contracted in that narrow space;

Or as all Ilium else were void of fear,
And tumult, war, and slaughter, only there.

Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes, 601
Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:

Some mount the scaling ladders; some, more bold,

Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars hold;

Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th' ascent, 605

While with the right they seize the battlement.

From their demolish'd tow'rs the Trojans throw

Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush the foe;

And heavy beams and rafters from the sides
(Such arms their last necessity provides) 610

And gilded roofs, come tumbling from on high,

The marks of state and ancient royalty.

The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend
The charge undaunted, and the gate defend.

Renew'd in courage with recover'd breath,
A second time we ran to tempt our death, 616

To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
The weary living, and revenge the dead.

"A postern door, yet unobserv'd and free,

Join'd by the length of a blind gallery, 620

To the king's closet led: a way well known
To Hector's wife, while Priam held the throne,

Thro' which she brought Astyanax, unseen,
To cheer his grandsire and his grandsire's queen.

Thro' this we pass, and mount the tow'r, from whence 625

With unavailing arms the Trojans make defense.

From this the trembling king had oft descried

The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
Beams from its lofty height with swords we hew,

Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault renew; 630

And, where the rafters on the columns meet,

We push them headlong with our arms and feet.

The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,
Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:

Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath 635

Are piecemeal torn, or pounded into death.
Yet more succeed, and more to death are sent;

We cease not from above, nor they below
relent.

Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threat'ning
loud,

With glitt'ring arms conspicuous in the crowd. 640

So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,

Who slept the winter in a thorny brake,
And, casting off his slough when spring returns,

Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns;
Restor'd with pois'nous herbs, his ardent
sides 645

Reflect the sun; and rais'd on spires he rides;
High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,
And brandishes by fits his forky tongue.

Proud Periphas, and fierce Automedon,
His father's charioteer, together run 650

To force the gate; the Scyrian infantry
Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage
free.

Ent'ring the court, with shouts the skies
they rend;

And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
Himself, among the foremost, deals his blows, 655

And with his ax repeated strokes bestows
On the strong doors; then all their shoulders
ply,

Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.
He hews apace; the double bars at length
Yield to his ax and unresisted strength. 660

A mighty breach is made: the rooms con-ceal'd

Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd;
The halls of audience, and of public state,
And where the lonely queen in secret sate.
Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids are
seen, 665

With not a door, and scarce a space, between.

The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,

And shrieks of women rend the vaulted skies;

The fearful matrons run from place to place,
And kiss the thresholds, and the posts embrace. 670

The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
And all his father sparkles in his eyes;
Nor bars, nor fighting guards, his force sus-tain:

The bars are broken, and the guards are
slain.

In rush the Greeks, and all the apartments
fill; 675

Those few defendants whom they find, they kill.

Not with so fierce a rage the foaming flood Roars, when he finds his rapid course with-
stood;

Bears down the dams with unresisted sway,
And sweeps the cattle and the cots away. 680

These eyes beheld him when he march'd between

The brother kings: I saw th' unhappy queen,
The hundred wives, and where old Priam
stood,

To stain his hallow'd altar with his blood.
The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he,
So large a promise, of a progeny), 686

The posts, of plated gold, and hung with spoils,

Fell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
The Grecians enter and possess the place. 690

"Perhaps you may of Priam's fate enquire.
He, when he saw his regal town on fire,

His ruin'd palace, and his ent'ring foes,
On ev'ry side inevitable woes,

In arms, disus'd, invests his limbs, decay'd, 695

Like them, with age; a late and useless aid.
His feeble shoulders scarce the weight sustain;

Loaded, not arm'd, he creeps along with
pain,

Despairing of success, ambitious to be slain!
Uncover'd but by heav'n, there stood in
view 700

An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew, Dodder'd with age, whose boughs encompass
round

The household gods, and shade the holy
ground.

Here Hecuba, with all her helpless train
Of dames, for shelter sought, but sought in vain. 705

Driv'n like a flock of doves along the sky,

Their images they hug, and to their altars
 fly.
 The queen, when she beheld her trembling
 lord,
 And hanging by his side a heavy sword,
 'What rage,' she cried, 'has seiz'd my husband's mind?' 710
 What arms are these, and to what use de-
 sign'd?
 These times want other aids! Were Hector
 here.
 Ev'n Hector now in vain, like Priam, would appear.
 With us, one common shelter thou shalt
 find,
 Or in one common fate with us be join'd.' 715
 She said, and with a last salute embrac'd
 The poor old man, and by the laurel plac'd.
 Behold! Polites, one of Priam's sons,
 Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs.
 Thro' swords and foes, amaz'd and hurt, he flies 720
 Thro' empty courts and open galleries.
 Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
 And often reaches and his thrusts renews.
 The youth, transfix'd, with lamentable
 cries, 724
 Expires before his wretched parent's eyes:
 Whom gasping at his feet when Priam saw,
 The fear of death gave place to nature's law;
 And, shaking more with anger than with age,
 'The gods,' said he, 'requite thy brutal rage!
 As sure they will, barbarian, sure they must, 730
 If there be gods in heav'n, and gods be just—
 Who tak'st in wrongs an insolent delight;
 With a son's death t' infect a father's sight.
 Not he, whom thou and lying fame conspire
 To call thee his—not he, thy vaunted sire, Thus us'd my wretched age: the gods he
 fear'd, 736
 The laws of nature and of nations heard.
 He cheer'd my sorrows, and, for sums of gold,
 The bloodless carcass of my Hector sold;
 Pitied the woes a parent underwent, 740
 And sent me back in safety from his tent.'
 "This said, his feeble hand a javelin threw,
 Which, flutt'ring, seem'd to loiter as it flew:
 Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
 And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield.
 "Then Pyrrhus thus: 'Go thou from me to fate, 746
 And to my father my foul deeds relate.

Now die!' With that he dragg'd the trembling sire,
 Slidd'ring thro' clott'rd blood and holy mire,
 (The mingled paste his murder'd son had made,) 750
 Haul'd from beneath the violated shade,
 And on the sacred pile the royal victim laid.
 His right hand held his bloody fauchion bare,
 His left he twisted in his hoary hair;
 Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he
 found: 755
 The lukewarm blood came rushing thro' the wound,
 And sanguine streams distain'd the sacred
 ground.
 Thus Priam fell, and shar'd one common
 fate
 With Troy in ashes, and his ruin'd state:
 He, who the scepter of all Asia sway'd, 760
 Whom monarchs like domestic slaves obey'd.
 On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd
 king,
 A headless carcass, and a nameless thing.
 "Then, not before, I felt my cruddled
 blood
 Congeal with fear, my hair with horror
 stood: 765
 My father's image fill'd my pious mind,
 Lest equal years might equal fortune find.
 Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
 And trembled for my son's abandon'd life.
 I look'd about, but found myself alone, 770
 Deserted at my need! My friends were gone.
 Some spent with toil, some with despair
 oppress'd,
 Leap'd headlong from the heights; the flames
 consum'd the rest.
 Thus, wand'ring in my way, without a guide,
 The graceless Helen in the porch I spied 775
 Of Vesta's temple; there she lurk'd alone;
 Muffled she sate, and, what she could, unknown:
 But, by the flames that cast their blaze
 around,
 That common bane of Greece and Troy I
 found.
 For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan
 sword; 780
 More dreads the vengeance of her injur'd
 lord;
 Ev'n by those gods who refug'd her abhorr'd.
 Trembling with rage, the strumpet I regard,
 Resolv'd to give her guilt the due reward:

'Shall she triumphant sail before the wind,
And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
Shall she her kingdom and her friends review,
In state attended with a captive crew, 788
While unreveng'd the good old Priam falls,
And Grecian fires consume the Trojan walls?
For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian
flood 791

Were swell'd with bodies, and were drunk with blood?

'T is true, a soldier can small honor gain,
And boast no conquest, from a woman slain:
Yet shall the fact not pass without applause,
Of vengeance taken in so just a cause; 796
The punish'd crime shall set my soul at ease,
And murmur'ing manes of my friends appease.'

Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasing light Spread o'er the place; and, shining heav'nly
bright, 800

My mother stood reveal'd before my sight.
Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
Not her own star confess'd a light so clear:
Great in her charms, as when on gods above
She looks, and breathes herself into their love. 805

She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break;

Then from her rosy lips began to speak:
'My son, from whence this madness, this neglect

Of my commands, and those whom I protect?

Why this unmanly rage? Recall to mind 810 Whom you forsake, what pledges leave behind.

Look if your helpless father yet survive,
Or if Ascanius or Creüsa live. 813

Around your house the greedy Grecians err;
And these had perish'd in the nightly war,
But for my presence and protecting care.
Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault;
But by the gods was this destruction brought.
Now cast your eyes around, while I dissolve
The mists and films that mortal eyes involve, Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see 821

The shape of each avenging deity.
Enlighten'd thus, my just commands fulfil,
Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
Where yon disorder'd heap of ruin lies, 825 Stones rent from stones; where clouds of dust arise—

Amid that smother Neptune holds his place,

Below the wall's foundation drives his mace,
And heaves the building from the solid base.
Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands
Full in the Scæan gate, with loud commands,
Urging on shore the tardy Grecian bands.
See! Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud, 833 Bestrides the tow'r, refulgent thro' the clouds:

See! Jove new courage to the foe supplies,
And arms against the town the partial deities.
Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labor end:
Haste, where your trembling spouse and sire attend: 838

Haste; and a mother's care your passage shall befriend.'

She said, and swiftly vanish'd from my sight, Obscure in clouds and gloomy shades of
night. 841

I look'd, I listen'd; dreadful sounds I hear;
And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
Troy sunk in flames I saw (nor could prevent),

And Ilium from its old foundations rent; 845 Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds,

And stood the sturdy strokes of lab'ring
hinds.

About the roots the cruel ax resounds;
The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated wounds:

The war is felt on high; the nodding crown
Now threatens a fall, and throws the leafy honors down. 851

To their united force it yields, tho' late,
And mourns with mortal groans th' approaching fate:

The roots no more their upper load sustain;
But down she falls, and spreads a ruin thro'
the plain. 855

"Descending thence, I scape thro' foes
and fire:

Before the goddess, foes and flames retire.
Arriv'd at home, he, for whose only sake,
Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight,
I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height,* 861
Refus'd the journey, resolute to die
And add his fun'ral to the fate of Troy,
Rather than exile and old age sustain.

'Go you, whose blood runs warm in ev'ry vein. 865

Had Heav'n decreed that I should life enjoy,
Heav'n had decreed to save unhappy Troy.
'T is, sure, enough, if not too much, for one,

Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrown.
Make haste to save the poor remaining crew,
And give this useless corpse a long adieu. 871
These weak old hands suffice to stop my
breath;

At least the pitying foes will aid my death,
To take my spoils, and leave my body bare:
As for my sepulcher, let Heav'n take care.
'T is long since I, for my celestial wife 876
Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a ling-
'ring life;

Since ev'ry hour and moment I expire,
Blasted from heav'n by Jove's avenging
fire.'

This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die: 880
Myself, my wife, my son, my family,
Intreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry—
'What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
And in his ruin all his house involve!'

He still persists his reasons to maintain; 885
Our pray'rs, our tears, our loud laments, are vain.

"Urg'd by despair, again I go to try
The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die:
'What hope remains, but what my death must give?

Can I, without so dear a father, live? 890
You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
Could 'such a word from such a parent fall?
If Fortune please, and so the gods ordain,
That nothing should of ruin'd Troy remain,
And you conspire with Fortune to be slain,
The way to death is wide, th' approaches
near: 896

For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear, Reeking with Priam's blood—the wretch who slew

The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
And then the sire himself to the dire altar
drew. 900

O goddess mother, give me back to Fate;
Your gift was undesir'd, and came too late!
Did you, for this, unhappy me convey Thro' foes and fires, to see my house a prey?
Shall I my father, wife, and son behold, 905 Welt'ring in blood, each other's arms in-
fold?

Haste! gird my sword, tho' spent and over-
come:

'T is the last summons to receive our doom.
I hear thee, Fate; and I obey thy call!
Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall.
Restore me to the yet unfinish'd fight: 911
My death is wanting to conclude the night.'

Arm'd once again, my glitt'ring sword I wield,

While th' other hand sustains my weighty
shield,

And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd field.
I went; but sad Creüsa stopp'd my way, 916
And cross the threshold in my passage lay, Embrac'd my knees, and, when I would have gone,

Shew'd me my feeble sire and tender son:
'If death be your design, at least,' said she,
'Take us along to share your destiny. 921
If any farther hopes in arms remain,
This place, these pledges of your love, maintain.

To whom do you expose your father's life,
Your son's, and mine, your now forgotten
wife!' 925

While thus she fills the house with clam'rous
cries,

Our hearing is diverted by our eyes:
For, while I held my son, in the short space
Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace; 929
Strange to relate, from young Iulus' head
A lambent flame arose, which gently spread Around his brows, and on his temples fed.
Amaz'd, with running water we prepared To quench the sacred fire, and slake his
hair;

But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd 935
His hands to heav'n, and this request pre-ferr'd:

'If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
Thy will; if piety can pray'rs commend, Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send.'

Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we hear
A peal of rattling thunder roll in air: 941
There shot a streaming lamp along the sky,
Which on the winged lightning seem'd to fly;
From o'er the roof the blaze began to move,
And, trailing, vanish'd in th' Idæan grove.
It swept a path in heav'n, and shone a guide,
Then in a steaming stench of sulphur died.

"The good old man with suppliant hands
implor'd 948

The gods' protection, and their star ador'd.
'Now, now,' said he, 'my son, no more delay!

I yield, I follow where Heav'n shews the
way. 951

Keep, O my country gods, our dwelling
place,

And guard this relic of the Trojan race,

This tender child! These omens are your own,
And you can yet restore the ruin'd town. 955
At least accomplish what your signs fore-
show:

I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.'

"He said. The crackling flames appear on
high,

And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire, 960

And near our palace roll the flood of fire.
'Haste, my dear father ('t is no time to wait),

And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my care;
One death, or one deliv'rance, we will share.
My hand shall lead our little son; and you,
My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.
Next, you, my servants, heed my strict commands: 968

Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
To Ceres hallow'd once; a cypress nigh
Shoots up her venerable head on high, 971
By long religion kept; there bend your feet,
And in divided parties let us meet.

Our country gods, the relics, and the bands,
Hold you, my father, in your guiltless
hands: 975

In me 't is impious holy things to bear,
Red as I am with slaughter, new from war,
Till in some living stream I cleanse the guilt
Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.'
Thus, ord'ring all that prudence could provide, 980

I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide
And yellow spoils; then, on my bending
back,

The welcome load of my dear father take;
While on my better hand Ascanius hung,
And with unequal paces tripp'd along. 985
Creüsa kept behind; by choice we stray
Thro' ev'ry dark and ev'ry devious way.

I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
The Grecian darts and shock of lances bore,
At ev'ry shadow now am seiz'd with fear, 990
Not for myself, but for the charge I bear;
Till, near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
A frightful noise of trampling feet we hear.
My father, looking thro' the shades, with fear, 995

Cried out: 'Haste, haste, my son, the foes are nigh;

Their swords and shining armor I descry.'

Some hostile god, for some unknown offense,
Had sure bereft my mind of better sense;
For, while thro' winding ways I took my flight, 1000

And sought the shelter of the gloomy night,
Alas! I lost Creüsa: hard to tell
If by her fatal destiny she fell,
Or weary sate, or wander'd with affright;
But she was lost for ever to my sight. 1005
I knew not, or reflected, till I meet
My friends, at Ceres' now deserted seat.
We met: not one was wanting; only she Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched
me.

"What mad expressions did my tongue refuse! 1010

Whom did I not, of gods or men, accuse!
This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me more Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.

Stung with my loss, and raving with despair,

Abandoning my now forgotten care, 1015
Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
My sire, my son, my country gods I left.
In shining armor once again I sheathe
My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing
death.

Then headlong to the burning walls I run,
And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
I tread my former tracks; thro' night explore 1022

Each passage, ev'ry street I cross'd before.
All things were full of horror and affright,
And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night.
Then to my father's house I make repair,
With some small glimpse of hope to find her
there. 1027

Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met;
The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.

Driv'n on the wings of winds, whole sheets of fire, 1030

Thro' air transported, to the roofs aspire.
From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
And search the citadel and desert court.
Then, unobserv'd, I pass by Juno's church:
A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch;
There Phoenix and Ulysses watch the prey,
And thither all the wealth of Troy convey:
The spoils which they from ransack'd houses
brought, 1038

And golden bowls from burning altars
caught,

The tables of the gods, the purple vests,

The people's treasure, and the pomp of priests. 1041

A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd
hands,

And captive matrons, in long order stands.
Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
Thro' all the silent street, Creüsa's name:
Creüsa still I call; at length she hears, 1046
And sudden thro' the shades of night appears—

Appears, no more Creüsa, nor my wife,
But a pale specter, larger than the life.
Aghast, astonish'd, and struck dumb with
fear, 1050

I stood; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair.
Then thus the ghost began to soothe my
grief:

'Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead relief.

Desist, my much-lov'd lord, t' indulge your
pain;

You bear no more than what the gods or-dain. 1055

My fates permit me not from hence to fly;
Nor he, the great controller of the sky.

Long wand'ring ways for you the pow'r's decree;

On land hard labors, and a length of sea.

Then, after many painful years are past, 1060

On Latium's happy shore you shall be cast,

Where gentle Tiber from his bed beholds

The flow'ry meadows, and the feeding folds.

There end your toils; and there your fates provide

A quiet kingdom, and a royal bride: 1065

There fortune shall the Trojan line restore,
And you for lost Creüsa weep no more.

Fear not that I shall watch, with servile
shame,

Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian
dame; 1069

Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace

My goddess mother, or my royal race.

And now, farewell! The parent of the gods
Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:

I trust our common issue to your care.' 1074

She said, and gliding pass'd unseen in air.

I strove to speak: but horror tied my tongue:

And thrice about her neck my arms I flung,

And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces hung.

Light as an empty dream at break of day,

Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away. 1080

"Thus having pass'd the night in fruitless
pain,

I to my longing friends return again,

Amaz'd th' augmented number to behold,

Of men and matrons mix'd, of young and
old;

A wretched exil'd crew together brought,

With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught, 1086

Resolv'd, and willing, under my command,

To run all hazards both of sea and land.

The Morn began, from Ida, to display

Her rosy cheeks; and Phosphor led the day:

Before the gates the Grecians took their post, 1091

And all pretense of late relief was lost.

I yield to Fate, unwillingly retire,

And, loaded, up the hill convey my sire."

LAYS FROM THE ELDER EDDA¹

(c. Eleventh Century A. D.)

Sigurd the Volsung, married to Gudrun, the daughter of King Guiki, is the only warrior able to pass through the flames guarding his first love, the fair Brynhild. When Brynhild learns that her victor and lover is wedded to Gudrun, she demands vengeance. Guttorm, who is not under the oath of peace, stabs Sigurd in his bedchamber. Brynhild thereupon takes her life.

Of Gudrun's weary wandering unto naught,
Of utter love defeated utterly,
Of grief too strong to give Love time to die!"

WILLIAM MORRIS

THE LAY CALLED THE SHORT LAY OF SIGURD

SIGURD of yore,
Sought the dwelling of Giuki,
As he fared, the young Volsung,
After fight won;

"So draw ye round and hearken, English Folk,
Unto the best tale pity ever wrought!
Of how from dark to dark bright Sigurd broke,
Of Brynhild's glorious soul with love dis-
traught,

¹Translation by Magnússon and Morris.

Troth he took
From the two brethren;
Oath swore they betwixt them,
Those bold ones of deed.

A may¹ they gave to him
And wealth manifold,
Gudrun the young,
Giuki's daughter:
They drank and gave doom
Many days together,
Sigurd the young,
And the sons of Giuki.

Until they wended
For Brynhild's wooing,
Sigurd a-riding
Amidst their rout;
The wise young Volsung
Who knew of all ways—
Ah! he had wed her,
Had fate so willed it.

Southlander Sigurd
A naked sword,
Bright, well grinded,
Laid betwixt them;
No kiss he won
From the fair woman,
Nor in arms of his
Did the Hun King hold her,
Since he gat the young maid
For the son of Giuki.

No lack in her life
She wotted of now,
And at her death-day
No dreadful thing
For a shame indeed
Or a shame in seeming;
But about and betwixt
Went baleful fate.

Alone, abroad,
She sat of an evening,
Of full many things
She fell a-talking:
"O for my Sigurd!
I shall have death,
Or my fair, my lovely,
Laid in mine arms.

5 "For the word once spoken,
I sorrow sorely—
His queen is Gudrun,
I am wed to Gunnar;
The dread Norns wrought for us
A long while of woe."

55

10 Oft with heart deep
In dreadful thoughts,
O'er ice-fields and ice-hills
She fared a-night time,
When he and Gudrun
15 Were gone to their fair bed,
And Sigurd wrapped
The bed-gear round her.

60

20 "Ah! now the Hun King
His queen in arms holdeth,
While love I go lacking,
And all things longed for
With no delight
But in dreadful thought."

65

25 These dreadful things
Thrust her toward murder:
—"Listen, Gunnar,
For thou shalt lose
My wide lands,
30 Yea, me myself!
Never love I my life,
With thee for my lord—

75

35 "I will fare back thither
From whence I came,
To my nighest kin
And those that know me
There shall I sit
Sleeping my life away,
Unless thou slayest
80 Sigurd the Hun King,
40 Making thy might more E'en than his might was!

80

85

45 "Yea, let the son fare
After the father,
And no young wolf
A long while nourish!
For on each man lieth
Vengeance lighter,
And peace shall be surer
95 If the son live not."

90

50 Adrad was Gunnar,
Heavy-hearted was he,

95

¹Maid.

And in doubtful mood Day-long he sat. For naught he wotted, Nor might see clearly What was the seemliest Of deeds to set hand to; What of all deeds Was best to be done: For he minded the vows Sworn to the Volsung, And the sore wrong To be wrought against Sigurd.	100	The while we four Rule over the folk; While the bold in battle, The Hun King, bides living.	150
Wavered his mind A weary while, No wont it was Of those days worn by, That queens should flee From the realms of their kings.	105	"And no nobler kin Shall be known afied, If our five sons We long may foster; Yea, a goodly stem Shall surely wax. —But I clearly see In what wise it standeth, Brynild's sore urging O'ermuch on thee beareth.	155
"Brynild to me Is better than all, The child of Budli Is the best of women. Yea, and my life Will I lay down, Ere I am twinned From that woman's treasure."	110	"Guttorm shall we Get for the slaying, Our younger brother Bare of wisdom; For he was out of All the oaths sworn, All the oaths sworn, And the plighted troth."	160
He bade call Hogni To the place where he bided; With all the trust that might be, Trowed he in him.	115	Easy to rouse him Who of naught recketh! —Deep stood the sword In the heart of Sigurd.	165
"Wilt thou bewray Sigurd For his wealth's sake?— Good it is to rule O'er the Rhine's metal; And well content Great wealth to wield, Biding in peace And blissful days."	120	There, in the hall, Gat the high-hearted vengeance; For he cast his sword At the reckless slayer: Out at Guttorm Flew Gram the mighty, The gleaming steel From Sigurd's hand.	170
One thing alone Hogni Had for an answer: "Such doings for us Are naught seemly to do; To rend with sword Oaths once sworn, Oaths once sworn, And troth once plighted.	125	Down fell the slayer Smitten asunder; The heavy head And the hands fell one way, But the feet and such like Aback where they stood.	175
"Nor know we on mould, Men of happier days,	130	Gudrun was sleeping Soft in the bed, Empty of sorrow By the side of Sigurd: When she awoke With all pleasure gone, Swimming in blood Of Frey's beloved.	180

So sore her hands She smote together, That the great-hearted Gat raised in bed; —"O Gudrun, weep not So woefully, Sweet lovely bride, For thy brethren live for thee!	195 200	Then, quoth Gunnar, The king, the hawk-bearer, "Whereas, thou laughest, O hateful woman, Glad on thy bed, No good it betokeneth: Why lackest thou else Thy lovely hue? Feeder of foul deeds, Fey do I deem thee,	245 250
"A young child have I For heritor; Too young to win forth From the house of his foes.— Black deeds and ill Have they been a-doing, Evil rede Have they wrought at last.	 205 210	"Well worthy art thou Before all women, That thine eyes should see Atli slain of us; That thy brother's wounds Thou shouldst see a-bleeding, That his bloody hurts Thine hands should bind."	 255 260
"Late, late, rideth with them Unto the Thing, Such sister's son, Though seven thou bear,— —But well I wot Which way all goeth; Alone wrought Brynhild This bale against us.	 215 220	"No man blameth thee, Gunnar, Thou hast fulfilled death's measure But naught Atli feareth All thine ill will; Life shall he lay down Later than ye, And still bear more might Aloft than thy might.	 265 270
"That maiden loved me Far before all men, Yet wrong to Gunnar I never wrought; Brotherhood I heeded And all bounden oaths, That none should deem me His queen's darling."	 220 225	"I shall tell thee, Gunnar, Though well the tale thou knowest, In what early days Ye dealt abroad your wrong: Young was I then, Worn with no woe, Good wealth I had In the house of my brother!	 270 275
Weary sighed Gudrun, As the king gat ending, And so sore her hands She smote together, That the cups arow Rang out therewith, And the geese cried on high That were in the homefield.	 230	"No mind had I That a man should have me, Or ever ye Giukings, Rode into our garth; There ye sat on your steeds Three kings of the people— —Ah! that that faring Had never befallen!	 280
Then laughed Brynhild Budli's daughter, Once, once only, From out her heart; When to her bed Was borne the sound Of the sore greeting Of Giuki's daughter.	235 240	"Then spake Atli To me apart, And said that no wealth He would give unto me, Neither gold nor lands If I would not be wedded; Nay, and no part	285 290

Of the wealth apportioned, Which in my first days He gave me duly; Which in my first days He counted down.	295	Up rose Gunnar, The great men's leader, And cast his arms About the queen's neck; And all went nigh One after other, With their whole hearts Her heart to turn. But then all these From her neck she thrust, Of her long journey No man should let her.	340 345 350
"Wavered the mind Within me then, If to fight I should fall And the felling of folk, Bold in byrny Because of my brother; A deed of fame Had that been to all folk, But to many a man Sorrow of mind.	300 305	Then called he Hogni To have talk with him: "Let all folk go Forth into the hall, Thine with mine— —O need sore and mighty!— To wot if we yet My wife's parting may stay. Till with time's wearing Some hindrance wax."	355 360
"So I let all sink Into peace at the last: More grew I minded For the mighty treasure, The red-shining rings Of Sigmund's son; For no man's wealth else Would I take unto me.	310	One answer Hogni Had for all; "Nay, let hard need Have rule thereafter, And no man let her Of her long journey! Never born again, May she come back thence!	365
"For myself had I given To that great king Who sat amid gold On the back of Grani; Nought were his eyen Like to your eyen, Nor in any wise Went his visage with yours; Though ye might deem you Due kings of men.	315 320	"Luckless she came To the lap of her mother, Born into the world For utter woe, To many a man For heart-whole mourning."	370
"One I loved, One, and none other, The gold-decked may Had no doubtful mind; Thereof shall Atli Wot full surely, When he getteth to know I am gone to the dead.	325 330	Upraised he turned From the talk and the trouble, To where the gem-field Dealt out goodly treasure; As she looked and beheld All the wealth that she had, And the hungry bondmaids, And maids of the hall.	375 380
"Far be it from me, Feeble and wavering, Ever to love Another's love— —Yet shall my woe Be well avenged."	335	With no good in her heart She donned her gold byrny, Ere she thrust the sword-point Through the midst of her body: On the bolster's far side	385

Sank she adown, And, smitten with sword, Still bethought her of redes.	390	"There is a may born Reared by her mothe, Whiter and brighter Than is the bright day; She shall be Swanhild, She shall be Sunbeam.	435 440
"Let all come forth Who are fain the red gold, Or things less worthy To win from my hands; To each one I give A necklace gilt over, Wrought hangings and bed-gear, And bright woven weed."	395	"Thou shalt give Gudrun Unto a great one, Noble, well-praised Of the world's folk; Not with her goodwill, Or love shalt thou give her; Yet will Atli Come to win her, My very brother, Born of Budli.	 445 450
All they kept silence, And thought what to speak, Then all at once Answer gave: "Full enow are death-doomed, Fain are we to live yet, Maids of the hall All meet work winning."	400	—"Ah! many a memory Of how ye dealt with me, How sorely, how evilly Ye ever beguiled me, How all pleasure left me The while my life lasted!—	 455
From her wise heart at last The linen-clad damsel, The one of few years Gave forth the word: "I will that none driven By hand or by word For our sake should lose Well-loved life.	410	"Fain wilt thou be Oddrun to win, But thy good liking Shall Atli let; But in secret wise Shall ye win together, And she shall love thee As I had loved thee, If in such wise Fate had willed it.	 460 465
"Thou on the bones of you Surely shall burn, Less dear treasure At your departing Nor with Menia's Meal ¹ Shall ye come to see me."	415	"But with all ill Shall Atli sting thee, Into the strait worm-close Shall he cast thee.	 470
"Sit thee down, Gunnar, A word must I say to thee Of the life's ruin Of thy lightsome bride— —Nor shall thy ship Swim soft and sweetly For all that I Lay life adown.	425	"But no long space Shall slip away Ere Atli too All life shall lose. Yea, all his weal With the life of his sons, For a dreadful bed Dights Gudrun for him, From a heart sore laden, With the sword's sharp edge.	 475 480
"Sooner than ye might deem Shall ye make peace with Gudrun, For the wise woman Shall lull in the young wife The hard memory Of her dead husband.	430	"More seemly for Gudrun, Your very sister,

In death to wend after
Her love first wed;
Had but good rede
To her been given,
Or if her heart
Had been like to my heart.

But for our sake
Ne'er shall she lose
Her life beloved;
The sea shall have her,
High billows bear her Forth unto Jonakr's
Fair land of his fathers.

"There shall she bear sons,
Stays of a heritage,
Stays of a heritage,
Jonakr's sons;
And Swanhild shall she Send from the land,
That may born of her,
The may born of Sigurd.

And so is clean perished
All the kin of Sigurd,
Yea, and more greeting,
And more for Gudrun.

"And now one prayer
Yet pray I of thee—
The last word of mine
Here in the world—
So broad on the field
Be the burg of the dead
That fair space may be left
For us all to lie down,
All those that died
At Sigurd's death!

"Hang round that burg
Fair hangings and shields,
Web by Gauls woven;
And folk of the Gauls:
There burn the Hun King
Lying beside me.

Two hounds therewith,
And two hawks moreover:
Then is all dealt
With even dealing.

"Lay there amidst us
The ring-dight metal,
The sharp-edged steel,
That so lay erst;
When we both together
Into one bed went,
And were called by the name
Of man and wife.

"Never, then, belike
Shall clash behind him
Valhall's bright door
With rings bedight:
And if my fellowship

"For him shall follow
My five bondmaids,
My eight bondsmen,
No borel folk:
Yea, and my fosterer,
And my father's dower
That Budli of old days
Gave to his dear child.

My wounds are swelling—
Naught but truth have I told—

THE HELL-RIDE OF BRYNHILD

AFTER the death of Brynhild were made two bales, one for Sigurd, and that was first burned; but Brynhild was burned on the other, and she was in a chariot hung about with goodly hangings.

And so folk say that Brynhild drave in her chariot down along the way to Hell, and passed by an abode where dwelt a certain giantess, and the giantess spake:—

“Nay, with my goodwill
Never goest thou
Through this stone-pillared
Stead of mine!
More seemly for thee
To sit sewing the cloth,
Than to go look on
The love of another.

“What dost thou, going
From the land of the Gauls,
O restless head,
To this mine house?
Golden girl, hast thou not,
If thou listest to hearken,
In sweet wise from thy hands
The blood of men washen?”

BRYNHILD

“Nay, blame me naught,
Bride of the rock-hall,
Though I roved a warring
In the days that were;
The higher of us twain
Shall I ever be holden
When of our kind
Men make account.”

THE GIANT-WOMAN

“Thou, O Brynhild,
Budli’s daughter,
Wert the worst ever born
Into the world:
For Giuki’s children
Death hast thou gotten,
And turned to destruction
Their goodly dwelling.”

BRYNHILD

“I shall tell thee
True tale from my chariot,
O thou who naught wottest,
If thou listest to wot;
How for me they have gotten
Those heirs of Giuki,
A loveless life,
A life of lies.

“Hild under helm,
The Hlymdale people,

E’en those who knew me,
Ever would call me.

“The changeful shapes
Of us eight sisters,
The wise king bade
Under oak-tree to bear:
Of twelve winters was I,
If thou listest to wot,
When I sware to the young lord
Oaths of love.

“Thereafter gat I
Mid the folk of the Goths,
For Helmgunnar the old,
Swift journey to Hell,
And gave to Aud’s brother
The young, gain and glory;
Whereof overwrath
Waxed Odin with me.

“So he shut me in shield-wall
In Skata grove,
Red shields and white
Close set around me;
And bade him alone
My slumber to break
Who in no land
Knew how to fear.

“He set round my hall,
Toward the south quarter,
The Bane of all trees
Burning aloft;
And ruled that he only
Thereover should ride
Who should bring me the gold
O’er which Fafnir brooded.

“Then upon Grani rode
The goodly gold-strewer
To where my fosterer
Ruled his fair dwelling.
He who alone there
Was deemed best of all,
The War-lord of the Danes,
Well worthy of men.

“In peace did we sleep
Soft in one bed,
As though he had been Naught but my brother:
There as we lay
Through eight nights wearing,

No hand in love
On each other we laid.

"Yet thence blamed me, Gudrun,
Giuki's daughter,
That I had slept
In the arms of Sigurd;
And then I wotted
As I fain had not wotted,
That they had bewrayed me
In my betrothals.

"Ah! for unrest
All too long
Are men and women
Made alive!
Yet we twain together
Shall wear through the ages,
Sigurd and I.—
—Sink adown, O giant-wife!"

FRAGMENTS OF THE LAY OF BRYNHILD

HOGNI said:

WHAT hath wrought Sigurd
Of any wrong-doing
That the life of the famed one Thou art fain of taking?

GUNNAR said:

To me has Sigurd
Sworn many oaths,
Sworn many oaths,
And sworn them lying,
And he bewrayed me
When it behoved him
Of all folk to his troth
To be the most trusty.

HOGNI said:

Thee hath Brynhild
Unto all bale,
And all hate whetted,
And a work of sorrow;
For she grudges to Gudrun
All goodly life;
And to thee the bliss
Of her very body.

Some the wolf roasted,
Some minced the worm,

Some unto Guttorm
Gave the wolf-meat,
Or ever they might
In their lust for murder
On the high king
Lay deadly hand.

Sigurd lay slain
On the south of the Rhine.
High from the fair tree
Croaked forth the raven,
"Ah, yet shall Atli
On you redden edges,
The old oaths shall weigh
On your souls, O warriors."

Without stood Gudrun,
Giuki's daughter,
And the first word she said
Was even this word:
"Where then is Sigurd,
Lord of the Warfolk,
Since my kin
Come riding the foremost?"

One word Hogni
Had for an answer:
"Our swords have smitten
Sigurd asunder,
And the grey horse hangs drooping
O'er his lord lying dead."

Then quoth Brynhild,
Budli's daughter;
"Good weal shall ye have
Of weapons and lands,
That Sigurd alone
Would surely have ruled
If he had lived
But a little longer.

"Ah, nothing seemly
For Sigurd to rule
Giuki's house
And the folk of the Goths,
When of him five sons
For the slaying of men,
Eager for battle
Should have been begotten!"

Then laughed Brynhild—
Loud rang the whole house—
One laugh only
From out her heart:

"Long shall your bliss be Of lands and people, Whereas the famed lord You have felled to the earth!"	75	Dead-cold the hall was, And my bed was a-cold, And thou, lord, wert riding Reft of all bliss, Laden with fetters 'Mid the host of thy foemen.	120
Then spake Gudrun, Giuki's daughter; "Much thou speakest, Many things fearful, All grame be on Gunnar The bane of Sigurd! From a heart full of hate Shall come heavy vengeance."	80	So now all ye, O House of the Niblungs, Shall be brought to naught, O ye oath-breakers!	125
Forth sped the even Enow there was drunken, Full enow was there Of all soft speech; And all men got sleep When to bed they were gotten; Gunnar only lay waking Long after all men.	85	Think'st thou not, Gunnar, How that betid, When ye let the blood run Both in one footstep? With ill reward Hast thou rewarded His heart so fain To be the foremost!	130
His feet fell he to moving, Fell to speak to himself The waster of men, Still turned in his mind What on the bough Those twain would be saying, The raven and erne, As they rode their ways homeward.	90	As well was seen When he rode his ways, That king of all worth, Unto my wooing; How the host-destroyer Held to the vows Sworn beforetime, Sworn to the young king.	135
But Brynhild awoke, Budli's daughter, May of the shield-folk, A little ere morning: "Thrust ye on, hold ye back, —Now all harm is wrought,— To tell of my sorrow, Or to let all slip by me?"	100	For his wounding-wand All wrought with gold, The king beloved Laid between us; Without were its edges Wrought with fire, But with venom-drops Deep dyed within.	145
All kept silence After her speaking, None might know That woman's mind, Or why she must weep To tell of the work That laughing once Of men she prayed.	105	Thus this song telleth of the death of Sigurd, and setteth forth how that they slew him without doors; but some say that they slew him within doors, sleeping in his bed. But the Dutch Folk say that they slew him out in the wood: and so sayeth the ancient song of Gudrun, that Sigurd and the sons of Giuki were riding to the Thing whenas he was slain. But all with one accord say that they bewrayed him in their troth with him, and fell on him as he lay unarrayed and unawares.	150
BRYNHILD spake: In dreams, O Gunnar, Grim things fell on me;	110	115

THE NIBELUNGENLIED¹

(Twelfth Century)

HOW SIEGFRIED FIRST SAW KRIEMHILD

Now went she forth, the loveliest, as forth the morning goes
From misty clouds outbeaming; then all his weary woes
Left him, in heart who bore her, and so long time had done.
He saw there stately standing the fair, the peerless one.

Many a stone full precious flashed from her vesture bright; 5
Her rosy blushes darted a softer, milder
light.
Whate'er might be his wishes, each could not but confess
He ne'er on earth had witnessed such perfect loveliness.

As the moon arising outglitters every star
That through the clouds so purely glimmers
from afar, 10
E'en so love-breathing Kriemhild dimmed every beauty nigh.
Well might at such a vision many a bold heart beat high.

Rich chamberlains before them marched on
in order due;
Around th' high-mettled champions close and closer drew.
Each pressing each, and struggling to see the matchless maid. 15
Then inly was Sir Siegfried both well and ill
apaid.

Within himself thus thought he: "How could
I thus misdeem
That I should dare to woo thee? sure 'twas an idle dream!
Yet, rather than forsake thee, far better were I dead."
Thus thinking, thus impassioned, waxed he ever white and red. 20

So stood the son of Sieglind in matchless
grace arrayed,
As though upon a parchment in glowing hues portrayed
By some good master's cunning; all owned,
and could no less,
Eye had not seen a pattern of such fair
manliness.

Those who the dames attended bade all around make way; 25 Straight did the gentle warriors, as such became, obey.
There many a knight, enraptured, saw many a dame in place
Shine forth in bright perfection of courtliness and grace.

Then the bold Burgundian, Sir Gernot, spoke his thought:—
"Him who in hour of peril his aid so frankly
brought, 30
Requite, dear brother Gunther, as fits both him and you,
Before this fair assembly; th' advice I give,
I ne'er shall rue.

"Bid Siegfried come to Kriemhild; let each
the other meet:
'Twill sure be to our profit, if she the warrior greet.
'Twill make him ours for ever, this man of matchless might, 35
If she but gives him greeting, who never greeted knight."

Then went King Gunther's kinsmen, a high-born haughty band,
And found and fair saluted the knight of Netherland:—
"The king to court invites you, such favor have you won;
His sister there will greet you: this to honor
you is done." 40

Glad man was then Sir Siegfried at this unlooked-for gain;
His heart was full of pleasure without alloy of
pain,

¹Adventures 5, 14, 16, 39. Translation by Lettsom.

To see and meet so friendly fair Uta's fairer child.

Then greeted she the warrior maidenly and mild.

There stood he, the high-minded, beneath her star-bright eye, 45

His cheek as fire all glowing; then said she modestly,

"Sir Siegfried, you are welcome, noble knight and good!"

Yet loftier at that greeting rose his lofty mood.

He bowed with soft emotion, and thanked the blushing fair;

Love's strong constraint together impelled th' enamored pair; 50

Their longing eyes encountered, their glances every one

Bound knight and maid for ever; yet all by stealth was done.

That in the warmth of passion he pressed her lily hand,

I do not know for certain, but well understand

'Twere surely past believing they ventured not on this: 55

Two loving hearts, so meeting, else had done amiss.

No more in pride of summer nor in bloom of May

Knew he such heartfelt pleasure as on this happy day,

When she, than May more blooming, more bright than summer's pride,

His own, a dream no longer, was standing by his side. 60

Then thought full many a champion, "Would this had happed to me,

To be with lovely Kriemhild as Siegfried now I see,

Or closer e'en than Siegfried; well were I then, I ween."

Never yet was champion who so deserved a queen.

Whate'er the king or country of the guests assembled there, 65

All could look on nothing save on that gentle pair.

Now 'twas allowed that Kriemhild the peerless knight should kiss.

Ne'er in the world had drained he so full a draught of bliss. . . .

She now the minster entered; her followed many a dame;

There so her stately beauty her rich attire became, 70

That dropped each high aspiring, born but at once to die.

Sure was that maid created to ravish every eye.

Scarce could wait Sir Siegfried till the mass was sung.

Well might he thank his fortune that, all those knights among,

To him inclined the maiden whom still in heart he bore, 75

While he to her, as fitted, returned as much or more.

When now before the minster after the mass she stood,

Again to come beside her was called the champion good.

Then first by that sweet maiden thanks to the knight were given,

That he before his comrades so warrior-like had striven. 80

"God you reward, Sir Siegfried!" said the noble child,

"For all your high deservings in honor's bead-roll filed,

The which I know from all men have won you fame and grace."

Sir Siegfried, love-bewildered, looked Kriemhild in the face.

"Ever," said he, "your brethren I'll serve as best I may, 85

Nor once, while I have being, will head on pillow lay,

Till I have done to please them whate'er they bid me do;

And this, my lady Kriemhild, is all for love of you."

HOW THE TWO QUEENS
REVILED ONE ANOTHER

ONE day at th' hour of vespers a loud alarm
rose

From certain lusty champions that for their pastime chose

To prove themselves at tilting in the castle
court;

Then many a knight and lady ran thither to see the sport.

There were the proud queens sitting together,
as befell,

Each on a good knight thinking that either loved full well.

Then thus began fair Kriemhild, "My husband's of such might,

That surely o'er these kingdoms he ought to rule by right."

Then answered lady Brunhild, "Nay, how can that be shown?

Were there none other living but thou and he
alone,

Then might, no doubt, the kingdoms be ruled by him and thee;

But long as Gunther's living, that sure can never be."

Thereto rejoined fair Kriemhild, "See'st
thou how proud he stands,

How proud he stalks,—conspicuous among those warrior bands,

As doth the moon far-beaming the glimmering stars outshine?

Sure have I cause to pride me when such a knight is mine."

Thereto replied Queen Brunhild, "How brave soe'er he be,

How stout so'er or stately, one greater is than he:

Gunther, thy noble brother, a higher place
may claim,

Of knights and kings the foremost in merit
and in fame."

Thereto rejoined fair Kriemhild, "So worthy is my mate,

All praise that I can give him can ne'er be termed too great.

In all he does how matchless! In honor too how clear!

Believ'st thou this, Queen Brunhild? At least he's Gunther's peer."

"Thou shouldst not so perversely, Kriem-hild, my meaning take.

What I said, assure thee, with ample cause I
spake.

I heard them both allow it, then when both first I saw,

And the stout king in battle compelled me to his law.

"E'en then, when my affection he so
knightly wan,

'Twas fairly owned by Siegfried that he was Gunther's man.

Myself I heard him own it, and such I hold him still."

"Forsooth," replied fair Kriemhild, "they must have used me ill.

"How could my noble brethren their power
have so applied,

As to make me, their sister, a lowly vassal's bride?

For manners' sake then, Brunhild, this idle talk give o'er,

And by our common friendship, let me hear
no more."

"Give o'er will I never," the queen replied
again:

"Shall I renounce the service of all the
knightly train

That hold of him, our vassal, and are our vassals too?"

Into sudden anger at this fair Kriemhild
flew:

"Ay! but thou must renounce it, for never will he grace

Thee with his vassal service: he fills a higher
place

Than e'en my brother Gunther, noble though be his strain.

Henceforth thou shouldst be wiser, nor hold such talk again.

"I wonder too, since Siegfried thy vassal is
by right,

Since both of us thou rulest with so much power and might,

Why to thee his service so long he has denied.

Nay! I can brook no longer thy insolence and pride."

"Thyself too high thou bearest," Brunhild answer made:

"Fain would I see this instant whether to thee be paid Public respect and honor such as waits on me."

Then both the dames with anger lowering you might see.

"So shall it be," said Kriemhild: "to meet thee I'm prepared.

Since thou my noble husband a vassal hast declared,

By the men of both our consorts to-day it shall be seen,

That I the church dare enter before King Gunther's queen.

"To-day by proof thou'lt witness what lofty birth is mine,

And that my noble husband worthier is than thine;

Nor for this with presumption shall I be taxed, I trow;

To-day thou'lt see moreover thy lowly vassal go

"To court before the warriors here in Burgundy.

Assure thee, thou'lt behold me honored more royally

Than the proudest princess that ever here wore crown."

The dames their spite attested with many a scowl and frown.

"Since thou wilt be no vassal," Brunhild rejoined again,

"Then thou with thy women must apart remain

From my dames and damsels, as to the church we go."

Thereto Kriemhild answered, "Trust me it shall be so.

"Array ye now, my maidens," said Siegfried's haughty dame:

"You must not let your mistress here be put to shame;

That you have gorgeous raiment make plain to every eye.

What she has just asserted, she soon shall fain deny."

They needed not much bidding: all sought out their best;

Matrons alike and maidens each donned a glittering vest.

Queen Brunhild with her meiny was now upon her way.

By this was decked fair Kriemhild in royal rich array.

With three-and-forty maidens, whom she to Rhine had brought;

Bright stuffs were their apparel, in far Arabia wrought.

So towards the minster marched the maidens fair;

All the men of Siegfried were waiting for them there.

Strange thought it each beholder, what there by all was seen,

How with their trains far-sundered passed either noble queen,

No walking both together as was their wont before;

Full many a prowtest warrior thereafter rued it sore.

Now before the minster the wife of Gunther stood;

Meanwhile by way of pastime many a warrior good

Held light and pleasant converse with many a smiling dame;

When up the lovely Kriemhild with her radiant meiny came.

All that the noblest maidens had ever donned before

Was as wind to the splendor her dazzling ladies wore.

So rich her own apparel in gold and precious things,

She alone might outglitter the wives of 'irty kings.

Howe'er he might be willing, yet none could dare deny

That such resplendent vesture never met mortal eye

As on that fair retinue then sparkled to the
sun. 95
Except to anger Brunhild, Kriemhild had not so done.

Both met before the minster in all the people's sight;
There at once the hostess let out her deadly spite.
Bitterly and proudly she bade fair Kriem-hild stand:
"No vassalless precedeth the lady of the
land." 100

Out then spake fair Kriemhild (full of wrath was she),
"Couldst thou still be silent, better 'twere
for thee.
Thou'st made thy beauteous body a dishonored thing.
How can a vassal's leman be consort of a
king?"

"Whom here call'st thou leman?" said the queen again. 105
"So call I thee," said Kriemhild: "thy maidenly disdain
Yielded first to Siegfried, my husband,
Sigmund's son;
Ay! 'twas not my brother that first thy favors won.

"Why, where were then thy senses? sure
'twas a crafty train,
To take a lowly lover, to ease a vassal's
pain! 110
Complaints from thee," said Kriemhild,
"methinks are much amiss."
"Verily," said Brunhild, "Gunther shall hear of this."

"And why should that disturb me? thy pride
hath thee betrayed.
Why didst thou me, thy equal, with vassalship upbraid?
Know this for sure and certain (to speak it gives me pain), 115
Never can I meet thee in cordial love again."

Then bitterly wept Brunhild: Kriemhild no longer stayed;
Straight with all her followers before the queen she made

Her way into the minster; then deadly hate
'gan rise;
And starting tears o'erclouded the shine of brightest eyes. 120

For all the solemn service, for all the chanted
song,
Still it seemed to Brunhild they lingered all too long.
Both on her mind and body a load like lead
there lay.
Many a high-born hero for her sorrow was to pay.

Brunhild stopped with her ladies without the minster door. 125 Thought she, "This wordy woman shall tell me something more
Of her charge against me spread so loud and rife.
If he has but so boasted, let him look to his
life!"

Now came the noble Kriemhild begirt with many a knight;
Then spake the noble Brunhild, "Stop and do me right. 130
You've voiced me for a wanton: prove it ere
you go.
You and your foul speeches have wrought me pain and woe."

Then spake the lady Kriemhild, "'Twere wiser to forbear:
E'en with the gold I'll prove it that on my hand I wear;
'Twas this that Siegfried brought me from where by you he lay." 135 Never lived Queen Brunhild so sorrowful a
day.

Said she, "That ring was stolen from me who held it dear,
And mischievously hidden has since been many a year.
But now I've met with something by which the thief to guess."
Both the dames were frenzied with passion masterless. 140

"Thief?" made answer Kriemhild, "I will not brook the name.
Thou wouldst have kept silence, hadst thou a sense of shame.

By the girdle here about me prove full well I can
That I am ne'er a liar; Siegfried was indeed thy man."

'Twas of silk of Nineveh the girdle that she
brought,
With precious stones well garnished; a better
ne'er was wrought:
When Brunhild but beheld it, her tears she could not hold.
The tale must needs to Gunther and all his men be told.

HOW SIEGFRIED PARTED FROM KRIEM- HILD

GUNTHER and Hagan, the warriors fierce and bold,
To execute their treason, resolved to scour
the wold,
The bear, the boar, the wild bull, by hill or dale or fen,
To hunt with keen-edged javelins: what fitter sport for valiant men?

In lordly pomp rode with them Siegfried the champion strong.
Good store of costly viands they brought with them along.
Anon by a cool runnel he lost his guiltless life.
'Twas so devised by Brunhild, King Gunther's moody wife.

But first he sought the chamber where he his lady found.
He and his friend already had on the sump-ters bound
Their gorgeous hunting raiment; they o'er the Rhine would go.
Never before was Kriemhild sunk so deep in
woe.

On her mouth of roses he kissed his lady
dear:
"God grant me, dame, returning in health to see thee here;
So may those eyes see me too: meanwhile be blithe and gay
Among the gentle kinsmen; I must hence
away."

Then thought she on the secret (the truth she durst not tell)

How she had told it Hagan; then the poor lady fell

To wailing and lamenting that ever she was born.

Then wept she without measure, sobbing and sorrow-worn.

She thus bespake her husband: "Give up that chase of thine.

I dreamt last night of evil,—how two fierce forest swine

Over the heath pursued thee; the flowers turned bloody red.

I cannot help thus weeping: I'm chilled with mortal dread.

"I fear some secret treason, and cannot lose thee hence,

Lest malice should be borne thee for misconceived offense.

Stay, my beloved Siegfried, take not my words amiss,—

'Tis the true love I bear thee that bids me counsel this."

"Back shall I be shortly, my own beloved mate;

Nor a soul in Rhineland know I who bears me hate:

I'm well with all thy kinsmen; they're all my firm allies:

Nor have I from any e'er deserved otherwise."

"Nay! do not, dearest Siegfried! 'tis e'en thy death I dread.

Last night I dreamt two mountains fell thundering on thy head,

And I no more beheld thee: if thou from me
wilt go,

My heart will sure be breaking with bitterness of woe."

Round her peerless body his clasping arms he threw;

Lovingly he kissed her, that faithful wife and
true;

Then took his leave, and parted: in a moment all was o'er;—

Living, alas poor lady! she saw him never-
more.

HOW SIEGFRIED WAS SLAIN

THE noble knight Sir Siegfried with thirst was sore oppress;
So earlier rose from the table, and could no longer rest,
But straight would to the mountain the running brook to find,—
And so advanced the treason his faithless foes designed.

Meanwhile were slowly lifted on many a groaning wain⁵
The beasts in that wild forest by Siegfried's manhood slain.
Each witness gave him honor, and loud his praises spoke.
Alas, that with him Hagan his faith so foully broke!

Now when to the broad linden they all would take their way,
Thus spake the fraudulent Hagan, "Full oft have I heard say,¹⁰
That none a match in swiftness for Kriem-hild's lord can be,
Whene'er to race he pleases: would he grant us this to see?"

Then spake the Netherlander, Siegfried, with open heart:—
"Well then! let's make the trial! Together we will start
From hence to yonder runnel; let us at once begin:¹⁵
And he shall pass for winner who shall be seen to win."

"Agreed!" said treacherous Hagan, "let us each other try."
Thereto rejoined stout Siegfried, "And if you pass me by,
Down at your feet I'll lay me humbled on the grass."
When these words heard Gunther, what joy could his surpass?²⁰

Then said the fearless champion, "And this I tell you more:
I'll carry all the equipment that in the chase
I wore,—

My spear, my shield, my vesture,—leave will
I nothing out."
His sword then and his quiver he girt him quick about.

King Gunther and Sir Hagan to strip were nothing slow;²⁵
Both for the race stood ready in shirts as white as snow.
Long bounds, like two wild panthers, o'er the grass they took,
But seen was noble Siegfried before them at the brook.

Whate'er he did, the warrior high o'er his fellows soared.
Now laid he down his quiver, and quick un-girt his sword;³⁰
Against the spreading linden he leaned his mighty spear:
So by the brook stood waiting the chief without a peer.

In every lofty virtue none with Sir Siegfried vied:
Down he laid his buckler by the water's side;
For all the thirst that parched him, one drop
he never drank³⁵
Till the king had finished: he had full evil thank.

Cool was the little runnel, and sparkled
clear as glass;
O'er the rill King Gunther knelt down upon the grass;
When he his draught had taken he rose and stepped aside.
Full fain alike would Siegfried his thirst have satisfied.⁴⁰

Dear paid he for his courtesy: his bow, his matchless blade,
His weapons all, Sir Hagan far from their lord conveyed,
Then back sprung to the linden to seize his
ashen spear,
And to find out the token surveyed his vesture near;

Then, as to drink Sir Siegfried down kneeling there he found,⁴⁵
He pierced him through the croslet, that sudden from the wound

Forth the life-blood spouted e'en o'er his murderer's weed.
Never more will warrior dare so foul a
deed.

Between his shoulders sticking he left the deadly spear.
Never before Sir Hagan so fled for ghastly
fear, 50
As from the matchless champion whom he had butchered there.
Soon as was Sir Siegfried of the mortal wound aware,

Up he from the runnel started as he were
wood;
Out from betwixt his shoulders his own huge boar-spear stood!
He thought to find his quiver or his broad-sword true; 55
The traitor for his treason had then received his due:

But ah! the deadly wounded nor sword nor quiver found:
His shield alone beside him lay there upon the ground;
This from the bank he lifted, and straight at Hagan ran:
Him could not then by fleetness escape
King Gunther's man. 60

E'en to the death though wounded, he hurled it with such power,
That the whirling buckler scattered wide a shower
Of the most precious jewels, then straight in shivers broke:
Full gladly had the warrior ta'en vengeance with that stroke.

E'en as it was, his manhood fierce Hagan
leveled low; 65
Loud all around the meadows rang with the wondrous blow:
Had he in hand good Balmung, the murderer
he had slain.
His wound was sore upon him; he writhed in mortal pain.

His lively color faded; a cloud came o'er his sight:
He could stand no longer; melted all his
might. 70

In his paling visage the mark of death he bore.
Soon many a lovely lady sorrowed for him
sore.

So the lord of Kriemhild among the flowerets
fell;
From the wound fresh gushing his heart's blood fast did well.
Then thus amidst his tortures, e'en with his failing breath, 75
The false friends he upbraided who had contrived his death.

Thus spake the deadly wounded:—"Ay!
cowards false as hell!
To you I still was faithful; I served you long and well:
But what boots all? for guerdon, treason and death I've won;
By your friends, vile traitors! foully have
you done. 80

Whoever shall hereafter from your loins be born
Shall take from such vile fathers a heritage of scorn.
On me you have wreaked malice where gratitude was due;—
With shame shall you be banished by all good knights and true."

Thither ran all the warriors where in his blood he lay; 85
To many of that party sure 'twas a joyless
day;
Whoe'er were true and faithful, they sorrowed for his fall,—
So much the peerless champion had merited
of all.

With them the false king Gunther bewept
his timeless end.
Then spake the deadly wounded, "Little it boots your friend 90 Yourself to plot his murder, and then the deed deplore:
Such is a shameful sorrow; better at once
'twere o'er."

Then spake the low'ring Hagan, "I know not why you moan.
Our cares all and suspicions are now for ever flown."

Who now are left, against us who'll dare to make defense? 95
Well's me, for all this weeping, that I have rid him hence."

"Small cause hast thou," said Siegfried, "to glory in my fate.
Had I weened thy friendship cloaked such murderous hate,
From such as thou full lightly could I have kept my life.
Now grieve I but for Kriemhild, my dear,
my widowed wife. 100

"Now may God take pity, that e'er I had a
son,
Who this reproach must suffer from deed so
foully done,
That by his murderous kinsmen his father
thus was slain.
Had I but time to finish, of this I well might
plain.

"Surely so base a murder the world did never
see," 105
Said he, and turned to Gunther, "as you have done on me.
I saved your life and honor from shame and danger fell,
And thus am I requited by you I served so
well."

Then further spake the dying, and speaking sighed full deep:—
"O King! if thou a promise with any one wilt keep, 110
Let me in this last moment thy grace and favor find
For my dear love and lady, the wife I leave behind.

"Remember, she's thy sister: yield her a sister's right;
Guard her with faith and honor, as thou'rt a king and knight.
My father and my followers for me they long must wait, 115
Comrade ne'er found from comrade so sorrowful a fate."

In his mortal anguish he writhed him to and fro,
And then said, deadly groaning, "This foul and murderous blow

Deep will ye rue hereafter; this for sure truth retain,
That in slaying Siegfried you yourselves have slain." 120

With blood were all bedabbled the flowerets of the field.
Some time with death he struggled, as though he scorned to yield E'en to the foe whose weapon strikes down
the loftiest head.
At last prone in the meadow lay mighty
Siegfried dead.

HOW KRIEMHILD SLEW HAGAN AND WAS HER- SELF SLAIN

TO THE cell of Hagan eagerly she went;
Thus the knight bespake she, ah! with what fell intent!
"Wilt thou but return me what thou from me hast ta'en
Back thou mayst go living to Burgundy
again."

Then spake grim-visaged Hagan, "You throw away your prayer, 5
High-descended lady: I took an oath whilere,
That while my lords were living, or of them
only one,
I'd ne'er point out the treasure: thus 'twill be given to none."

Well knew the subtle Hagan she ne'er would let him 'scape.
Ah! when did ever falsehood assume so foul a shape? 10
He feared that soon as ever the queen his life
had ta'en,
She then would send her brother to Rhineland back again.

"I'll make an end, and quickly," Kriemhild fiercely spake.
Her brother's life straight bade she in his dungeon take.
Off his head was smitten; she bore it by the hair 5
To the lord of Trony: such sight he well could spare.

Awhile in gloomy sorrow he viewed his master's head;
 Then to remorseless Kriemhild thus the warrior said:—
 "E'en to thy wish this business thou to an end hast brought,—
 To such an end, moreover, as Hagan ever
 thought. 20

"Now the brave king Gunther of Burgundy
 is dead;
 Young Giselher and eke Gernot alike with him are sped:
 So now, where lies the treasure, none knows
 save God and me,
 And told shall it be never, be sure, shefiend! to thee."

Said she, "Ill hast thou quitted a debt so deadly scored; 25
 At least in my possession I'll keep my Siegfried's sword;
 My lord and lover bore it, when last I saw him go.
 For him woe wrung my bosom, that passed all other woe."

Forth from the sheath she drew it,—that could not he prevent;
 At once to slay the champion was Kriem-hild's stern intent. 30
 High with both hands she heaved it, and off his head did smite.
 That was seen of King Etzel; he shuddered
 at the sight.

"Ah!" cried the prince impassioned, "harrow and welaway!
 That the hand of a woman the noblest knight should slay
 That e'er struck stroke in battle, or ever buckler bore! 35
 Albeit I was his foreman, needs must I sorrow sore."

Then said the aged Hildebrand, "Let not her boast of gain,
 In that by her contrivance this noble chiel
 was slain;
 Though to sore strait he brought me, let ruin on me light,
 But I will take full vengeance for Trony's murdered knight." 40

Hildebrand the aged fierce on Kriemhild
 sprung;
 To the death he smote her as his sword he swung.
 Sudden and remorseless he his wrath did wreak:
 What could then avail her her fearful thrilling shriek?

There now, the dreary corpses stretched all around were seen; 45
 There lay, hewn in pieces, the fair and noble
 queen.
 Sir Dietrich and King Etzel, their tears began to start;
 For kinsmen and for vassals each sorrowed in his heart.

The mighty and the noble lay together
 dead;
 For this had all the people dole and dreari-
 head. 50
 The feast of royal Etzel was thus shut in woe.
 Pain in the steps of Pleasure treads ever here
 below.

'Tis more than I can tell you what afterwards befell,
 Save that there was weeping for friends beloved so well;
 Knights and squires, dames and damsels,
 were seen lamenting all. 55
 So here I end my story. This the THE NIBE-LUNGENS' FALL.

THE SONG OF ROLAND (c. 1100 A. D.)¹

The heroic tale of the rearguard action of Roland, Oliver, and their following, against the Saracen hordes in the pass of Roncesvalles, the blowing of Roland's mighty horn the sound of which penetrated to the host of Charlemagne on the other side of the mountains, the death of the Paladins, and the vengeance of their master, grew out of legendary stories, or sagas, of the early struggles by the Frankish peoples against the onrush of the Moors from the south, finally saving Europe from Mahommedan domination. This is the heroic background of the history of the nation of France. It is interesting to note that at the Battle of Hastings, in 1066, Taillefer, the Norman minstrel, marched ahead of the invading army singing the lines of this poem as a kind of defiance of the Anglo-Saxon host.

DEATH OF OLIVIER

CLXIV

WHEN Roland saw the abhorred race,
Than blackest ink more black in face,
Who have nothing white but the teeth alone,
"Now," he said, "it is truly shown,
That the hour of our death is close at hand. 5
Fight, my Franks, 't is my last command."
Said Olivier, "Shame is the laggard's due."
And at his word they engage anew.

CLXV

When the heathen saw that the Franks were few, 9
Heart and strength from the sight they drew;
They said, "The Emperor hath the worse."
The Algalif sat on a sorrel horse;
He pricked with spurs of the gold refined,
Smote Olivier in the back behind. 14
On through his harness the lance he pressed,
Till the steel came out at the baron's breast.
"Thou hast it!" the Algalif, vaunting cried,
"Ye were sent by Karl in an evil tide.
Of his wrongs against us he shall not boast;
In thee alone I avenge our host." 20

CLXVI

Olivier felt the deadly wound,
Yet he grasped Hauteclere, with its steel embrowned;
He smote on the Algalif's crest of gold,—

¹Translation by O'Hagan.

Gem and flowers to the earth were rolled;
Clave his head to the teeth below, 25
And struck him dead with the single blow.
"All evil, caitiff, thy soul pursue.
Full well our Emperor's loss I knew;
But for thee—thou goest not hence to boast
To wife or dame on thy natal coast, 30
Of one denier from the Emperor won,
Or of scathe to me or to others done."
Then Roland's aid he called upon.

CLXXI

When Roland saw that life had fled,
And with face to earth his comrade dead. 35
He thus bewept him, soft and still:
"Ah, friend, thy prowess wrought thee ill!
So many days and years gone by
We lived together, thou and I:
And thou hast never done me wrong, 40
Nor I to thee, our lifetime long.
Since thou art dead, to live is pain."
He swooned on Veillantif again,
Yet may not unto earth be cast,
His golden stirrups held him fast. 45

CLXXII

When passed away had Roland's swoon,
With sense restored, he saw full soon
What ruin lay beneath his view.
His Franks have perished all save two—
The archbishop and Walter of Hum alone. 50
From the mountain-side hath Walter flown,
Where he met in battle the bands of Spain,
And the heathen won and his men were slain
In his own despite to the vale he came;
Called unto Roland, his aid to claim. 55
"Ah, count! brave gentleman, gallant peer!
Where art thou? With thee I know not fear.
I am Walter, who vanquished Maelgut of
yore,
Nephew to Drouin, the old and hoar.
For knightly deeds I was once thy friend. 60
I fought the Saracen to the end;
My lance is shivered, my shield is cleft,
Of my broken mail are but fragments left.
I bear in my body eight thrusts of spear;
I die, but I sold my life right dear." 65
Count Roland heard as he spake the word,
Pricked his steed, and anear him spurred.

CLXXIII

"Walter," said Roland, "thou hadst affray
With the Saracen foe on the heights to-day.
Thou wert wont a valorous knight to be: 70
A thousand horsemen gave I thee;
Render them back, for my need is sore."

"Alas, thou seest them never more!

Stretched they lie on the dolorous ground,
Where myriad Saracen swarms we found,— Armenians, Turks, and the giant brood 76
Of Balisa, famous for hardihood,
Bestriding their Arab Coursers fleet,
Such host in battle 't was ours to meet;
Nor vaunting thence shall the heathen go,—
Full sixty thousand on earth lie low. 81
With our brands of steel we avenged us well,
But every Frank by the foeman fell.
My hauberk plates are riven wide,
And I bear such wounds in flank and side, 85
That from every part the bright blood flows,
And feebler ever my body grows.
I am dying fast, I am well aware:
Thy liegeman I, and claim thy care.
If I fled perforce, thou wilt forgive, 90
And yield me succor while thou dost live."
Roland sweated with wrath and pain,
Tore the skirts of his vest in twain,
Bound Walter's every bleeding vein.

CLXXIV

In Roland's sorrow his wrath arose, 95
Hotly he struck at the heathen foes,
Nor left he one of a score alive;
Walter slew six, the archbishop five.
The heathens cry, "What a felon three!
Look to it, lords, that they shall not flee. 100
Dastard is he who confronts them not;
Craven, who lets them depart this spot."
Their cries and shoutings begin once more,
And from every side on the Franks they pour.

CLXXV

Count Roland in sooth is a noble peer; 105
Count Walter, a valorous cavalier;
The archbishop, in battle proved and tried,
Each struck as if knight there were none beside.

From their steeds a thousand Saracens leap,
Yet forty thousand their saddles keep; 110
I trow they dare not approach them near,
But they hurl against them lance and spear,
Pike and javelin, shaft and dart.
Walter is slain as the missiles part;

The archbishop's shield in pieces shred, 115
Riven his helm, and pierced his head;
His corselet of steel they rent and tore;
Wounded his body with lances four;
His steed beneath him dropped withal:
What woe to see the archbishop fall! 120

CLXXVI

When Turpin felt him flung to ground,
And four lance wounds within him found,
He swiftly rose, the dauntless man,
To Roland looked, and nigh him ran.
Spake but, "I am not overthrown— 125
Brave warrior yields with life alone."
He drew Almace's burnished steel,
A thousand ruthless blows to deal.
In after time, the Emperor said
He found four hundred round him spread,—
Some wounded, others cleft in twain; 131
Some lying headless on the plain.
So Giles the saint, who saw it, tells,
For whom High God wrought miracles.
In Laon cell the scroll he wrote; 135
He little weets who knows it not.

CLXXVII

Count Roland combateth nobly yet,
His body burning and bathed in sweat;
In his brow a mighty pain, since first, 139
When his horn he sounded, his temple burst;
But he yearns of Karl's approach to know,
And lifts his horn once more—but oh!
How faint and feeble a note to blow!
The Emperor listened, and stood full still.
"My lords," he said, "we are faring ill. 145
This day is Roland my nephew's last;
Like dying man he winds that blast.
On! Who would aid, for life must press.
Sound every trump our ranks possess."
Peal sixty thousand clarions high, 150
The hills re-echo, the vales reply.
It is now no jest for the heathen band.
"Karl!" they cry, "it is Karl at hand!"

CLXXVIII

They said, "'Tis the Emperor's advance,
We hear the trumpets resound of France. 155
If he assail us, hope in vain;
If Roland live, 'tis war again,
And we lose for aye the land of Spain."
Four hundred in arms together drew,
The bravest of the heathen crew; 160

With serried power they on him press,
And dire in sooth is the count's distress.

CLXXIX

When Roland saw his coming foes,
All proud and stern his spirit rose;
Alive he shall never be brought to yield: 165
Veillantif spurred he across the field,
With golden spurs he pricked him well,
To break the ranks of the infidel;
Archbishop Turpin by his side. 169
"Let us flee, and save us," the heathen cried;
"These are the trumpets of France we hear—
It is Karl, the mighty Emperor, near."

CLXXX

Count Roland never hath loved the base,
Nor the proud of heart, nor the dastard
race,—
Nor knight, but if he were vassal good,— 175
And he spake to Turpin, as there he stood;
"On foot are you, on horseback I;
For your love I halt, and stand you by.
Together for good and ill we hold;
I will not leave you for man of mould. 180
We will pay the heathen their onset back,
Nor shall Durindana of blows be slack."
"Base," said Turpin, "who spares to smite:
When the Emperor comes, he will all re-quite."

CLXXXI

The heathens said, "We were born to shame.
This day for our disaster came: 186
Our lords and leaders in battle lost,
And Karl at hand with his marshalled host;
We hear the trumpets of France ring out,
And the cry 'Montjoie!' their rallying shout.
Roland's pride is of such a height, 191
Not to be vanquished by mortal wight;
Hurl we our missiles, and hold aloof." And the word they spake, they put in proof,—

They flung, with all their strength and craft,
Javelin, barb, and plumed shaft. 196
Roland's buckler was torn and frayed,
His cuirass broken and disarrayed,
Yet entrance none to his flesh they made.
From thirty wounds Veillantif bled, 200
Beneath his rider they cast him, dead;
Then from the field have the heathen flown:
Roland remaineth, on foot, alone.

THE LAST BENEDICTION OF THE ARCHBISHOP

CLXXXII

THE heathens fly in rage and dread;
To the land of Spain have their footsteps
sped;
Nor can Count Roland make pursuit—
Slain is his steed, and he rests afoot;
To succor Turpin he turned in haste, 5
The golden helm from his head unlaced,
Ungirt the corselet from his breast,
In stripes divided his silken vest;
The archbishop's wounds hath he staunched
and bound,
His arms around him softly wound; 10
On the green sward gently his body laid,
And, with tender greeting, thus him prayed:
"For a little space, let me take farewell;
Our dear companions, who round us fell,
I go to seek; if I haply find, 15
I will place them at thy feet reclined."
"Go," said Turpin; "the field is thine—
To God the glory, 't is thine and mine."

CLXXXIII

Alone seeks Roland the field of fight,
He searcheth vale, he searcheth height. 20
Ivon and Ivor he found, laid low,
And the Gascon Engelier of Bordeaux,
Gerein and his fellow in arms, Gerier;
Otho he found, and Berengier;
Samson the duke, and Anseis bold, 25
Gerard of Roussillon, the old.
Their bodies, one after one, he bore,
And laid them Turpin's feet before.
The archbishop saw them stretched arow,
Nor can he hinder the tears that flow; 30
In benediction his hands he spread:
"Alas! for your doom, my lords," he said,
"That God in mercy your souls may give,
On the flowers of Paradise to live;
Mine own death comes, with anguish sore 35
That I see mine Emperor never more."

CLXXXIV

Once more to the field doth Roland wend,
Till he findeth Olivier, his friend;
The lifeless form to his heart he strained,
Bore him back with what strength remained,
On a buckler laid him, beside the rest, 41
The archbishop assoiled them all, and blessed.

Their dole and pity anew find vent,
 And Roland maketh his fond lament:
 "My Olivier, my chosen one, 45
 Thou wert the noble Duke Renier's son,
 Lord of the March unto River vale.
 To shiver lance and shatter mail,
 The brave in council to guide and cheer,
 To smite the miscreant foe with fear,— 50
 Was never on earth such cavalier."

CLXXXV

Dead around him his peers to see,
 And the man he loved so tenderly,
 Fast the tears of Count Roland ran,
 His visage discolored became, and wan, 55
 He swooned for sorrow beyond control.
 "Alas," said Turpin, "how great thy dole!"

CLXXXVI

To look on Roland swooning there,
 Surpassed all sorrow he ever bare;
 He stretched his hand, the horn he took,— 60
 Through Roncesvalles there flowed a brook,—
 A draught to Roland he thought to bring;
 But his steps were feeble and tottering,
 Spent his strength, from waste of blood,—
 He struggled on for scarce a rood, 65
 When sank his heart, and drooped his frame,
 And his mortal anguish on him came.

CLXXXVII

Roland revived from his swoon again;
 On his feet he rose, but in deadly pain;
 He looked on high, and he looked below, 70
 Till, a space his other companions fro,
 He beheld the baron, stretched on sword,
 The archbishop, vicar of God our Lord.
 Mea Culpa was Turpin's cry,
 While he raised his hands to heaven on high,
 Imploring Paradise to gain. 76
 So died the soldier of Carlemaine,—
 With word or weapon, to preach or fight,
 A champion ever of Christian right,
 And a deadly foe of the infidel. 80
 God's benediction within him dwell!

CLXXXVIII

When Roland saw him stark on earth
 (His very vitals were bursting forth,
 And his brain was oozing from out his head),
 He took the fair white hands outspread, 85

Crossed and clasped them upon his breast,
 And thus plaint to the dead addressed,—
 So did his country's law ordain:—
 "Ah, gentleman of noble strain, 90
 I trust thee unto God the True,
 Whose service never man shall do
 With more devoted heart and mind:
 To guard the faith, to win mankind,
 From the apostles' day till now,
 Such prophet never rose as thou. 95
 Nor pain or torment thy soul await,
 But of Paradise the open gate."

THE DEATH OF ROLAND

CLXXXIX

ROLAND feeleth his death is near,
 His brain is oozing by either ear.
 For his peers he prayed—God keep them
 well;
 Invoked the angel Gabriel.
 That none reproach him, his horn he clasped;
 His other hand Durindana grasped; 6
 Then, far as quarrel from crossbow sent,
 Across the march of Spain he went,
 Where, on a mound, two trees between,
 Four flights of marble steps were seen; 10
 Backward he fell, on the field to lie;
 And he swooned anon, for the end was nigh.

CXC

High were the mountains and high the trees,
 Bright shone the marble terraces;
 On the green grass Roland hath swooned
 away. 15
 A Saracen spied him where he lay:
 Stretched with the rest he had feigned him
 dead,
 His face and body with blood bespread.
 To his feet he sprang, and in haste he died,—
 In pride and wrath he was overbold,— 20
 And on Roland, body and arms, laid hold.
 "The nephew of Karl is overthrown!
 To Araby bear I this sword, mine own."
 He stooped to grasp it, but as he drew,
 Roland returned to his sense anew. 25

CXCI

He saw the Saracen seize his sword;
 His eyes he oped, and he spake one word—
 "Thou art not one of our band, I trow,"
 And he clutched the horn he would ne'er forego;

On the golden crest he smote him full, 30
 Shattering steel and bone and skull,
 Forth from his head his eyes he beat,
 And cast him lifeless before his feet.
 "Miscreant, makest thou then so free,
 As, right or wrong, to lay hold on me? 35
 Who hears it will deem thee a madman born;
 Behold the mouth of mine ivory horn
 Broken for thee, and the gems and gold Around its rim to earth are rolled."

CXCII

Roland feeleth his eyesight reft, 40
 Yet he stands erect with what strength is
 left;
 From his bloodless cheek is the hue dispelled,
 But his Durindana all bare he held.
 In front a dark brown rock arose—
 He smote upon it ten grievous blows. 45
 Grated the steel as it struck the flint,
 Yet it brake not, nor bore its edge one dint.
 "Mary, Mother, be thou mine aid!
 Ah, Durindana, my ill-starred blade,
 I may no longer thy guardian be! 50
 What fields of battle I won with thee!
 What realms and regions 't was ours to gain,
 Now the lordship of Carlemaine!
 Never shalt thou possessor know
 Who would turn from face of mortal foe; 55
 A gallant vassal so long thee bore,
 Such as France the free shall know no more."

CXCIII

He smote anew on the marble stair.
 It grated, but breach nor notch was there.
 When Roland found that it would not break,
 Thus he his plaint to make. 61
 "Ah, Durindana, how fair and bright
 Thou sparklest, flaming against the light!
 When Karl in Maurienne valley lay,
 God sent his angel from heaven to say— 65
 'This sword shall a valorous captain's be,'
 And he girt it, the gentle king, on me.
 With it I vanquished Poitou and Maine,
 Provence I conquered and Aquitaine;
 I conquered Normandy the free, 70
 Anjou, and the marches of Brittany;
 Romagna I won, and Lombardy,
 Bavaris, Flanders from side to side,
 And Burgundy, and Poland wide;
 Constantinople affiance vowed, 75
 And the Saxon soil to his bidding bowed;
 Scotia, and Wales, and Ireland's plain,
 Of England made he his own domain.

What mighty regions I won of old,
 For the hoary-headed Karl to hold! 80
 But there presses on me a grievous pain,
 Lest thou in heathen hands remain.
 O God our Father, keep France from stain!"

CXCIV

His strokes once more on the brown rock fell,
 And the steel was bent past words to tell; 85
 Yet it brake not, nor was notched the grain,
 Erect it leaped to the sky again.
 When he failed at the last to break his blade,
 His lamentation he inly made.
 "Oh, fair and holy, my peerless sword, 90
 What relics lie in thy pommel stored!
 Tooth of Saint Peter, Saint Basil's blood,
 Hair of Saint Denis beside them strewed,
 Fragment of holy Mary's vest.
 'Twere shame that thou with the heathen
 rest; 95
 Thee should the hand of a Christian serve
 One who would never in battle swerve.
 What regions won I with thee of yore,
 The empire now of Karl the hoar!
 Rich and mighty is he therefore." 100

CXCV

That death was on him he knew full well;
 Down from his head to his heart it fell.
 On the grass beneath a pine-tree's shade,
 With face to earth, his form he laid, 104
 Beneath him placed he his horn and sword,
 And turned his face to the heathen horde.
 Thus hath he done the sooth to show,
 That Karl and his warriors all may know,
 That the gentle count a conqueror died.
 Mea Culpa full oft he cried; 110
 And, for all his sins, unto God above,
 In sign of penance, he raised his glove.

CXCVI

Roland feeleth his hour at hand;
 On a knoll he lies towards the Spanish land.
 With one hand beats he upon his breast: 115
 "In thy sight, O God, be my sins confessed.
 From my hour of birth, both the great and small,
 Down to this day, I repent of all."
 As his glove he raised to God on high,
 Angels of heaven descend him nigh. 120

CXCVII

Beneath a pine was his resting-place,
 To the land of Spain hath he turned his face,

On his memory rose full many a thought—
 Of the lands he won and the fields he fought;
 Of his gentle France, of his kin and line; 125
 Of his nursing father, King Karl benign;—
 He may not the tear and sob control,
 Nor yet forgets he his parting soul.
 To God's compassion he makes his cry:
 "O Father true, who canst not lie, 130
 Who didst Lazarus raise unto life agen,
 And Daniel shield in the lions' den;
 Shield my soul from its peril, due

For the sins I sinned my lifetime through."
 He did his right-hand glove uplift— 135
 Saint Gabriel took from his hand the gift;
 Then drooped his head upon his breast,
 And with clasped hands he went to rest.
 God from on high sent down to him
 One of his angel Cherubim— 140
 Saint Michael of Peril of the sea,
 Saint Gabriel in company—
 From heaven they came for that soul of price,
 And they bore it with them to Paradise.

DANTE (1265-1321)

THE DIVINE COMEDY¹

HELL

CANTO VIII

MY THEME pursuing, I relate, that ere
 We reached the lofty turret's base, our eyes
 Its height ascended, where we marked up-
 hung
 Two cressets, and another saw from far
 Return the signal, so remote, that scarce 5
 The eye could catch its beam. I, turning
 round
 To the deep source of knowledge, thus inquired:
 "Say what this means; and what, that other
 light
 In answer set: what agency doth this?"
 "There on the filthy waters," he replied, 10
 "E'en now what next awaits us mayst thou
 see,
 If the marsh-gendered fog conceal it not."
 Never was arrow from the cord dismissed,
 That ran its way so nimbly through the air,
 As a small bark, that through the waves I
 spied 15
 Toward us coming, under the sole sway
 Of one that ferried it, who cried aloud:
 "Art thou arrived, fell spirit?"—"Phlegyas, Phlegyas,
 This time thou criest in vain," my lord replied;
 "No longer shalt thou have us, but while o'er 20
 The slimy pool we pass." As one who hears
 Of some great wrong he hath sustained,
 whereat

Inly he pines: so Phlegyas inly pined
 In his fierce ire. My guide, descending, stepped
 Into the skiff, and bade me enter next, 25
 Close at his side; nor, till my entrance, seemed
 The vessel freighted. Soon as both embarked,
 Cutting the waves, goes on the ancient prow,
 More deeply than with others it is wont.

While we our course o'er the dead channel
 held, 30
 One drenched in mire before me came, and
 said:
 "Who art thou, that thus comest ere thine
 hour?"
 I answered: "Though I come, I tarry not:
 But who art thou, that are become so foul?"
 "One, as thou seest, who mourn:" he straight replied. 35
 To which I thus: "In mourning and in
 woe,
 Curst spirit! tarry thou. I know thee well, E'en thus in filth disguised." Then stretched he forth
 Hands to the bark; whereof my teacher sage Aware, thrusting him back: "Away! down
 there 40
 To the other dogs!" then, with his arms my neck
 Encircling, kissed my cheek, and spake: "O
 soul,
 Justly disdainful! blest was she in whom Thou wast conceived. He in the world was one
 For arrogance noted: to his memory 45
 No virtue lends its lustre; even so

¹Translation by Cary.

Here is his shadow furious. There above,
How many now hold themselves mighty
kings,

Who here like swine shall wallow in the mire,
Leaving behind them horrible dispraise." 50

I then: "Master! him fain would I behold Whelmed in these dregs, before we quit the lake."

He thus: "Or ever to thy view the shore
Be offered, satisfied shall be that wish, Which well deserves completion." Scarce his
words 55

Were ended, when I saw the miry tribes
Set on him with such violence, that yet
For that render I thanks to God, and praise.
"To Filippo Argenti!" cried they all:

And on himself the moody Florentine 60 Turned his avenging fangs. Him here we left,

Nor speak I of him more. But on mine ear
Sudden a sound of lamentation smote,
Whereat mine eye unbarred I sent abroad.

And thus the good instructor: "Now, my
son 65

Draws near the city, that of Dis is named,
With its grave denizens, ^{et. gino} mighty throng."

I thus: "The minarets already, Sir!
There, certes, in the valley I descry,
Gleaming vermilion, as if they from fire 70
Had issued." He replied: "Eternal fire,
That inward burns, shows them with ruddy
flame

Illumed; as in this nether hell thou seest."

We came within the fosses deep, that moat
This region comfortless. The walls appeared 75

As they were framed of iron. We had made Wide circuit, ere a place we reached, where loud

The mariner cried vehemently: "Go forth:
The entrance is here." Upon the gates I spied More than a thousand, who of old from
heaven 80

Were showered. With ireful gestures, "Who is this,"

They cried, "that, without death first felt, goes through

The regions of the dead?" My sapient ^{wisdom}
guide

Made sign that he for secret parley wished;
Whereat their angry scorn abating, thus 85
They spake: "Come thou alone; and let him
go,

Who hath so hardily entered this realm.

Alone return he by his witless way;
If well he know it, let him prove. For thee,
Here shalt thou tarry, who through clime so dark 90

Hast been his escort." Now bethink thee, reader!

What cheer was mine at sound of those curst
words.

I did believe I never should return.

"O my loved guide! who more than seven times

Security hast rendered me, and drawn 95
From peril deep, whereto I stood exposed,
Desert me not," I cried, "in this extreme.
And, if our onward going be denied,
Together trace we back our steps with speed." 99

My liege, who thither had conducted me,
Replied: "Fear not: for of our passage none
Hath power to disappoint us, by such high Authority permitted. But do thou Expect me here; meanwhile, thy wearied spirit 104

Comfort, and feed with kindly hope, assured

I will not leave thee in this lower world."

This said, departs the sire benevolent,
And quits me. Hesitating I remain At war, 'twixt will and will not, in my thoughts.

I could not hear what terms he offered
them, 110

But they conferred not long, for all at once Pellmell rushed back within. Closed were the gates,

By those our adversaries, on the breast
Of my liege lord: excluded, he returned
To me with tardy steps. Upon the ground
His eyes were bent, and from his brow erased
All confidence, while thus in sighs he spake:
"Who hath denied me these abodes of woe?"
Then thus to me: "That I am angered, think
No ground of terror: in this trial I 120 Shall vanquish, use what arts they may within

For hindrance. This their insolence, not new,

Erewhile at gate less secret they displayed,
Which still is without bolt; upon its arch 124
Thou saw'st the deadly scroll; and even now,
On this side of its entrance, down the steep,
Passing the circles, unescorted, comes
One whose strong might can open us this land."

CANTO IX

The hue, which coward dread on my pale cheeks
 Imprinted when I saw my guide turn back,
 Chased that from his which newly they had worn,
 And inwardly restrained it. He, as one
 Who listens, stood attentive: for his eye
 Not far could lead him through the sable air,
 And the thick-gathering cloud. "It yet behoves
 We win this fight;" thus he began: "if not,—
 Such aid to us is offered,—Oh! how long Meseems it, ere the promised help arrive." 10
 I noted, how the sequel of his words
 Cloaked their beginning; for the last he spake Agreed not with the first. But not the less
 My fear was at his saying; sith I drew
 To import worse, perchance, than that he held, 15
 His mutilated speech. "Doth ever any Into this rueful concave's extreme depth
 Descend, out of the first degree, whose pain
 Is deprivation merely of sweet hope?"
 Thus I inquiring. "Rarely," he replied, 20
 "It chances, that among us any makes
 This journey, which I wend. Erewhile, 'tis true,
 Once came I here beneath, conjured by fell
 Erichtho, sorceress, who compelled the shades
 Back to their bodies. No long space my flesh 25
 Was naked of me, when within these walls
 She made me enter, to draw forth a spirit
 From out of Judas' circle. Lowest place
 Is that of all, obscurest, and removed Furthest from heaven's all-circling orb. The road 30
 Full well I know; thou therefore rest secure.
 That lake, the noisome stench exhaling,
 round
 The city of grief encompasses, which now
 We may not enter without rage." Yet more
 He added; but I hold it not in mind, 35
 For that mine eye toward the lofty tower
 Had drawn me wholly, to its burning top;
 Where, in an instant, I beheld uprisen
 At once three hellish furies stained with blood.
 In limb and motion feminine they seemed; 40
 Around them greenest hydras twisting rolled
 Their volumes; adders and cerastes crept

Instead of hair, and their fierce temples bound.
 He, knowing well the miserable hags
 Who tend the queen of endless woe, thus spake:
 "Mark thou each dire Erinnyes. To the left, 45
 This is Megaera; on the right hand, she Who wails, Alecto; and Tisiphone
 I' th' midst." This said, in silence he remained.
 Their breast they each one clawing tore;
 themselves 50
 Smote with their palms, and such shrill clamor raised,
 That to the bard I clung, suspicion-bound.
 "Hasten Medusa: so to adamant Him shall we change;" all looking down exclaimed:
 "E'en when by Theseus' might assailed, we took 55
 No ill revenge." "Turn thyself round, and keep Thy countenance hid; for if the Gorgon dire
 Be shown, and thou shouldst view it, thy return
 Upwards would be forever lost." This said,
 Himself, my gentle master, turned me round;
 Nor trusted he my hands, but with his own
 He also hid me. Ye of intellect 62
 Sound and entire, mark well the lore concealed Under close texture of the mystic strain
 And now there came o'er the perturbed waves 65
 Loud-crashing, terrible, a sound that made Either shore tremble, as if of a wind
 Impetuous, from conflicting vapors sprung,
 That 'gainst some forest driving all his might,
 Plucks off the branches, beats them down,
 and hurls 70
 Afar; then, onward passing, proudly sweeps
 His whirlwind rage, while beasts and shepherds fly.
 Mine eye he loosed, and spake: "And now *direct
 Thy visual nerve along that ancient foam,
 There, thickest where the smoke ascends,"
 As frogs 75
 Before their foe the serpent, through the wave
 Ply swiftly all, till at the ground each one Lies on a heap; more than a thousand spirits

Destroyed, so saw I fleeing before one Who passed with unwet feet the Stygian
sound. 80

He, from his face removing the gross air, Oft his left hand forth stretched, and seemed
alone

By that annoyance wearied. I perceived That he was sent from heaven; and to my
guide

Turned me, who signal made, that I should
stand 85

Quiet, and bend to him. Ah me! how full
Of noble anger seemed he. To the gate
He came, and with his wand touched it,
whereat

Open without impediment it flew.

"Outcasts of heaven! O abject race, and scorned!" 90

Began he, on the horrid grunsel standing,
"Whence doth this wild excess of insolence Lodge in you? wherefore kick you 'gainst that will

Ne'er frustrate of its end, and which so oft
Hath laid on you enforcement of your pangs?
What profits, at the fates to butt the horn?
Your Cerberus, if ye remember, hence 97
Bears still, peeled of his hair, his throat and maw."

This said, he turned back o'er the filthy
way,

And syllable to us spake none; but wore 100
The semblance of a man by other care
Beset, and keenly prest, than thought of him Who in his presence stands. Then we our steps

Toward that territory moved, secure 104
After the hallowed words. We, unopposed,
There entered; and, my mind eager to learn
What state a fortress like to that might hold,
I, soon as entered, throw mine eye around,
And see, on every part, wide-stretching space,

Replete with bitter pain and torment ill. 110
As where Rhone stagnates on the plains of Arles,

Or as at Pola, near Quarnaro's gulf,
That closes Italy and laves her bounds,
The place is all thick spread with sepulchres;
So was it here, save what in horror here 115 Excelled: for 'midst the graves were scattered flames,

Wherewith intensely all throughout they burned,

That iron for no craft there hotter needs.

Their lids all hung suspended; and beneath,
From them forth issued lamentable moans, 120

Such as the sad and tortured well might raise.
I thus: "Master! say who are these, interred Within these vaults, of whom distinct we hear

The dolorous sighs." He answer thus returned:

"The arch-heretics are here, accompanied By every sect their followers; and much
more, 126

Than thou believest, the tombs are freighted:
like

With like is buried; and the monuments
Are different in degrees of heat." This said,
He to the right hand turning, on we passed
Betwixt the afflicted and the ramparts high.

PURGATORY

CANTO XX

ILL strives the will, 'gainst will more wise that strives:

His pleasure therefore to mine own preferred,
I drew the sponge yet thirsty from the wave.

Onward I moved: he also onward moved,
Who led me, coasting still, wherever place 5
Along the rock was vacant; as a man
Walks near the battlements on narrow wall.
For those on the other part, who drop by drop
Wring out their all-infecting malady, Too closely press the verge. Accurst be
thou, 10

Inveterate wolf!¹ Whose gorge ingluts more
prey,

Than every beast beside, yet is not filled;
So bottomless thy maw.—Ye spheres of
heaven!

To whom there are, as seems, who attribute
All change in mortal state, when is the day 15
Of his appearing, for whom fate reserves
To chase her hence?²—With wary steps and slow

We passed; and I attentive to the shades,
Whom piteously I heard lament and wail; 19
And, 'midst the wailing, one before us heard
Cry out "O blessed Virgin!" as a dame
In the sharp pangs of childbed; and "How poor

Thou wast," it added, "witness that low roof
Where thou didst lay thy sacred burden
down.

¹Avarice.

²Can Grande della Scala.

O good Fabricius!¹ thou didst virtue chuse 25
With poverty, before great wealth with vice."

The words so pleased me, that desire to
know

The spirit, from whose lip they seemed to
come,

Did draw me onward. Yet it spake the gift
Of Nicholas, which on the maidens he 30 Bounteous bestowed, to save their youthful prime

Unblemished. "Spirit! who dost speak of
deeds

So worthy, tell me who thou wast," I said,

"And why thou dost with single voice renew

Memorial of such praise. That boon vouchsafed 35

Haply shall meet reward; if I return

To finish the short pilgrimage of life,

Still speeding to its close on restless wing."

"I," answered he, "will tell thee; not for help, 39

Which thence I look for; but that in thyself

Grace so exceeding shines, before thy time

Of mortal dissolution. I was root

Of that ill plant whose shade such poison sheds

O'er all the Christian land, that seldom thence

Good fruit is gathered. Vengeance soon should come, 45

Had Ghent and Douay, Lille and Bruges
power;

And vengeance I of heaven's great Judge
implore;

Hugh Capet was I hight: from me descend

The Philips and the Louis, of whom France

Newly is governed: born of one, who plied 50

The slaughterer's trade at Paris. When the race

Of ancient kings had vanished (all save one

Wrapt up in sable weeds) within my gripe

I found the reins of empire, and such powers

Of new acquirement, with full store of
friends, 55

That soon the widowed circlet of the crown

Was girt upon the temples of my son,

He, from whose bones the anointed race begins.

Till the great dower of Provence had removed

¹A Roman general who refused the bribes of Pyrrhus,
King of Epirus.

The stains, that yet obscured our lowly
blood, 60

Its sway indeed was narrow; but howe'er

It wrought no evil: there, with force and lies,

Began its rapine: after, for amends,

Poitou it seized, Navarre and Gascony.

To Italy came Charles; and for amends, 65

Young Conradine, an innocent victim, slew;

And sent the angelic teacher² back to heaven,

Still for amends. I see the time at hand;

That forth from France invites another

Charles³ 69

To make himself and kindred better known.

Unarmed he issues, saving with that lance,

Which the arch-traitor tilted with; and that

He carries with so home a thrust, as rives

The bowels of poor Florence. No increase

Of territory hence, but sin and shame 75

Shall be his guerdon; and so much the more

As he more lightly deems of such foul wrong.

I see the other (who a prisoner late

Had slept on shore) exposing to the mart

His daughter, whom he bargains for, as do 80

The Corsairs for their slaves. O avarice!

What canst thou more, who hast subdued our

blood

So wholly to thyself, they feel no care

Of their own flesh? To hide with drier guilt

Past ill and future, lo! the flower-de-luce 85

Enters Alagna; in his Vicar Christ

Himself a captive, and his mockery

Acted again.⁴ Lo! to his holy lip

The vinegar and gall once more applied;

And he 'twixt living robbers doomed to bleed. 90

Lo! the new Pilate, of whose cruelty

Such violence cannot fill the measure up,

With no decree of sanction, pushes on

Into the temple his yet eager sails.

"O sovran Master! when shall I rejoice 95

To see the vengeance, which thy wrath, well-pleased,

In secret silence broods?—While daylight lasts,

So long what thou didst hear of her, sole spouse

Of the Great Spirit, and on which thou turnedst

To me for comment, is the general theme 100

Of all our prayers: but, when it darkens, then

²St. Thomas Aquinas.

³Charles of Valois, who drove Dante into exile.

⁴Reference to the quarrels between France and the Pope.

A different strain we utter; then record Pygmalion, whom his gluttonous thirst of
gold

Made traitor, robber, parricide: the woes
Of Midas, which his greedy wish ensued, 105
Marked for derision to all future times:

And the fond Achan,¹ how he stole the prey,
That yet he seems by Joshua's ire pursued.
Sapphira² with her husband next we blame;
And praise the forefeet, that with furious ramp 110

Spurned Heliodorus.³ All the mountain
round

Rings with the infamy of Thracia's king,
Who slew his Phrygian charge: and last a shout

Ascends: 'Declare, O Crassus! for thou
know'st, 114

The flavor of thy gold.' The voice of each
Now high, now low, as each his impulse prompts,

Is led through many a pitch, acute or grave.
Therefore, not singly, I erewhile rehearsed

That blessedness we tell of in the day: 119
But near me, none, beside, his accent raised."

From him we now had parted, and essayed
With utmost efforts to surmount the way;

When I did feel, as nodding to its fall,
The mountain tremble; whence an icy chill
Seized on me, as on one to death conveyed.

So shook not Delos, when Latona there 126 Couched to bring forth the twin-born eyes of
heaven.

Forthwith from every side a shout arose
So vehement, that suddenly my guide

Drew near, and cried: "Doubt not, while I conduct thee." 130

"Glory!" all shouted (such the sounds mine
ear

Gathered from those, who near me swelled
the sounds)

"Glory in the highest be to God." We stood Immoveably suspended, like to those,

The shepherds, who first heard in Bethlehem's field 135

That song: till ceased the trembling, and the
song

Was ended: then our hallowed path resumed,
Eying the prostrate shadows, who renewed Their customary mourning. Never in my breast

Did ignorance so struggle with desire 140

Of knowledge, if my memory do not err,
As in that moment; nor through haste dared
I

To question, nor myself could aught discern.
So on I fared, in thoughtfulness and dread.

CANTO XXI

The natural thirst, ne'er quenched but from the well

Whereof the woman of Samaria craved,
Excited; haste, along the cumbered path,
After my guide, impelled; and pity moved
My bosom for the 'vengeful doom though just. 5

When lo! even as Luke relates, that Christ
Appeared unto the two upon their way,
New-risen from his vaulted grave; to us
A shade appeared, and after us approached,
Contemplating the crowd beneath its feet. 10
We were not ware of it; so first it spake, Saying, "God give you peace, my brethren!"
then

Sudden we turned: and Virgil such salute,
As fitted that kind greeting, gave; and cried:

"Peace in the blessed council be thy lot, 15
Awarded by that righteous court which me
To everlasting banishment exiles."

"How!" he exclaimed, nor from his speed
meanwhile

Desisting; "If that ye be spirits whom God Vouchsafes not room above; who up the
height 20

Has been thus far your guide?" To whom the bard:

"If thou observe the tokens, which this man,
Traced by the finger of the angel, bears;

'T is plain that in the kingdom of the just He needs must share. But sithence she, whose wheel 25

Spins day and night, for him not yet had drawn

That yarn, which on the fatal distaff plied, Clotho apportions to each wight that breathes;

His soul, that sister is to mine and thine, 29
Not of herself could mount; for not like ours
Her ken: whence I, from forth the ample gulf
Of hell, was ta'en, to lead him, and will lead

Far as my lore avails. But, if thou know, Instruct us for what cause, the mount ere-while

Thus shook, and trembled: wherefore all at once 35

¹Joshua, VII. ²Acts, V. ³2 Maccabees, III, 25.

Seemed shouting, even from his wave-washed foot."

That questioning so tallied with my wish,
The thirst did feel abatement of its edge E'en from expectance. He forthwith replied:

"In its devotion, naught irregular 40
This mount can witness, or by punctual rule Unsanctioned; here from every change exempt,

Other than that, which heaven in itself
Doth of itself receive, no influence
Can reach us. Tempest none, shower, hail, or snow, 45

Hoar frost, or dewy moistness, higher falls
Than that brief scale of threefold steps: thick
clouds,

Nor scudding rack, are ever seen: swift glance
Ne'er lightens; nor Thaumantian Iris gleams,
That yonder often shifts on each side heaven.
Vapor adust doth never mount above 51
The highest of the trinal stairs, where on Peter's vicegerent stands. Lower perchance, With various motion rocked, trembles the soil:

But here, through wind in earth's deep hollow pent, 55

I know not how, yet never trembled: then Trembles, when any spirit feels itself
So purified, that it may rise, or move
For rising; and such loud acclaim ensues.

Purification, by thy will alone, 60
Is proved, that free to change society
Seizes the soul rejoicing in her will.

Desire of bliss is present from the first;
But strong propension hinders, to that wish
By the just ordinance of heaven opposed; 65
Propension now as eager to fulfil

The allotted torment, as erewhile to sin.
And I, who in this punishment had lain Five hundred years and more, but now have felt

Free wish for happier clime. Therefore thou felt'st 70

The mountain tremble; and the spirits devout

Heard'st, over all his limits, utter praise
To that liege Lord, whom I entreat their joy To hasten." Thus he spake: and, since the draught

Is grateful ever as the thirst is keen, 75
No words may speak my fulness of content.

"Now," said the instructor sage, "I see the net

That takes ye here; and how the toils are loosed;

Why rocks the mountain, and why ye rejoice.
Vouchsafe, that from thy lips I next may learn 80

Who on the earth thou wast; and wherefore
here,

So many an age, wert prostrate."—"In that
time,

When the good Titus, with Heaven's King to
help,

Avenge those piteous gashes, whence the
blood

By Judas sold did issue; with the name 85
Most lasting and most honored, there, was I Abundantly renowned," the shade replied,
"Not yet with faith endued. So passing sweet

My vocal spirit; from Tolosa, Rome
To herself drew me, where I merited 90
A myrtle garland to inwreath my brow.

Statius they name me still. Of Thebes I sang,
And next of great Achilles;¹ but i' the way
Fell with the second burthen. Of my flame Those sparkles were the seeds, which I derived 95

From the bright fountain of celestial fire
That feeds unnumbered lamps; the song I mean

Which sounds Aeneas' wanderings: that the breast

I hung at; that the nurse, from whom my veins

Drank inspiration: whose authority 100
Was ever sacred with me. To have lived Coeval with the Mantuan, I would bide
The revolution of another sun

Beyond my stated years in banishment."

The Mantuan, when he heard him, turned to me; 105

And holding silence, by his countenance Enjoined me silence: but the power, which wills,

Bears not supreme control: laughter and
tears

Follow so closely on the passion prompts
them,

They wait not for the motions of the will 110
In natures most sincere. I did but smile,

As one who winks; and thereupon the shade Broke off, and peered into mine eyes, where best

¹The Thebaid and the Achilleid.

Our looks interpret. "So to good event Mayst thou conduct such great emprise," he cried, 115
 "Say, why across thy visage beamed, but
 now,
 The lightning of a smile." On either part
 Now am I straitened; one conjures me speak,
 The other to silence binds me: whence a sigh
 I utter, and the sigh is heard. "Speak on,"
 The teacher cried: "and do not fear to speak;
 But tell him what so earnestly he asks." 122 Whereon I thus: "Perchance, O ancient spirit!
 Thou marvel'st at my smiling. There is room
 For yet more wonder. He, who guides my ken 125
 On high, he is that Mantuan, led by whom Thou didst presume of men and gods to sing.
 If other cause thou deemedst for which I smiled,
 Leave it as not the true one: and believe Those words, thou spakest of him, indeed the cause." 130
 Now down he bent to embrace my teacher's feet;
 But he forbade him: "Brother! do it not:
 Thou art a shadow, and behold'st a shade."
 He, rising, answered thus: "Now hast thou proved 134
 The force and ardor of the love I bear thee,
 When I forget we are but things of air,
 And, as a substance, treat an empty shade."

PARADISE CANTO XIV

FROM centre to the circle, and so back
 From circle to the centre, water moves
 In the round chalice, even as the blow
 Impels it, inwardly, or from without.
 Such was the image glanced into my mind, 5
 As the great spirit of Aquinum ceased;
 And Beatrice, after him, her words Resumed alternate: "Need there is (though
 yet
 He tells it to you not in words, not e'en
 In thought) that he should fathom to its depth 10
 Another mystery. Tell him, if the light, Wherewith your substance blooms, shall stay with you
 Eternally, as now; and, if it doth,
 How, when ye shall regain your visible forms,

The sight may without harm endure the
 change, 15
 That also tell." As those, who in a ring
 Tread the light measure, in their fitful mirth Raise loud the voice, and spring with gladder
 bound;
 Thus, at the hearing of that pious suit,
 The saintly circles, in their tourneying 20
 And wondrous note, attested new delight.
 Whoso laments, that we must doff this garb
 Of frail mortality, thenceforth to live
 Immortally above; he hath not seen
 The sweet refreshing of that heavenly shower. 25
 Him, who lives ever, and forever reigns
 In mystic union of the Three in One,
 Unbounded, bounding all, each spirit thrice
 Sang, with such melody, as, but to hear,
 For highest merit were an ample meed. 30
 And from the lesser orb the goodliest light,
 With gentle voice and mild, such as perhaps
 The angel's once to Mary, thus replied:
 "Long as the joy of Paradise shall last,
 Our love shall shine around that raiment,
 bright 35
 As fervent; fervent as, in vision, blest;
 And that as far, in blessedness, exceeding,
 As it hath grace, beyond its virtue, great.
 Our shape, regarmented with glorious weeds
 Of saintly flesh, must, being thus entire, 40 Show yet more gracious. Therefore shall increase
 Whate'er, of light, gratuitous imparts
 The Supreme Good; light, ministering aid,
 The better to disclose his glory: whence,
 The vision needs increasing, must increase 45
 The fervor, which it kindles; and that too
 The ray, that comes from it. But as the gleam
 Which gives out flame, yet in its whiteness shines
 More lively than that, and so preserves
 Its proper semblance; thus this circling sphere
 Of splendor shall to view less radiant seem, 50
 Than shall our fleshly robe, which yonder
 earth
 Now covers. Nor will such excess of light
 O'erpower us, in corporeal organs made Firm, and susceptible of all delight."
 So ready and so cordial an "Amen" 55
 Followed from either choir, as plainly spoke Desire of their dead bodies; yet perchance

Not for themselves, but for their kindred
 dear,
 Mothers and sires, and those whom best they loved
 Ere they were made imperishable flame. 60
 And lo! forthwith, there rose up round about
 A lustre, over that already there;
 Of equal clearness, like the brightening up
 Of the horizon. As at evening hour
 Of twilight, new appearances through heaven
 Peer with faint glimmer, doubtfully described; 66
 So, there, new substances, methought, began
 To rise in view beyond the other twain,
 And wheeling, sweep their ampler circuit
 wide.
 O genuine glitter of eternal Beam! 70
 With what a sudden whiteness did it flow,
 O'erpowering vision in me. But so fair,
 So passing lovely, Beatrice showed,
 Mind cannot follow it, nor words express Her infinite sweetness. Thence mine eyes regained 75
 Power to look up; and I beheld myself,
 Sole with my lady, to more lofty bliss
 Translated: for the star, with warmer smile
 Impurpled, well denoted our ascent.
 With all the heart, and with that tongue which speaks 80
 The same in all, an holocaust I made
 To God befitting the new grace vouchsafed.
 And from my bosom had not yet upsteamed
 The fuming of that incense, when I knew 84
 The rite accepted. With such mighty sheen
 And mantling crimson, in two listed rays
 The splendors shot before me, that I cried,
 "God of Sabaoth! that dost prank them
 thus!"
 As leads the galaxy from pole to pole,
 Distinguished into greater lights and less, 90
 Its pathway, which the wisest fail to spell;
 So thickly studded, in the depth of Mars,
 Those rays described the venerable sign,
 That quadrants in the round conjoining frame.
 Here memory mocks the toil of genius.
 Christ 95
 Beamed on that cross; and pattern fails me
 now.
 But whoso takes his cross, and follows
 Christ,
 Will pardon me for that I leave untold,
 When in the fleckered dawning he shall spy

The glitterance of Christ. From horn to horn, 100
 And 'tween the summit and the base, did move
 Lights, scintillating, as they met and passed.
 Thus oft are seen with ever-changeful glance,
 Straight or athwart, now rapid and now slow,
 The atomies of bodies, long or short, 105
 To move along the sunbeam, whose slant line
 Checkers the shadow interposed by art Against the noontide heat. And as the chime
 Of minstrel music, dulcimer, and harp 109
 With many strings, a pleasant dinning makes
 To him, who heareth not distinct the note;
 So from the lights, which there appeared to
 me,
 Gathered along the cross a melody,
 That, indistinctly heard, with ravishment
 Possessed me. Yet I marked it was a hymn
 Of lofty praises; for there came to me 116
 "Arise," and "Conquer," as to one who hears
 And comprehends not. Me such ecstasy O'ercame, that never, till that hour, was thing
 That held me in so sweet imprisonment. 120
 Perhaps my saying overbold appears,
 Accounting less the pleasure of those eyes,
 Whereon to look fulfilleth all desire
 But he, who is aware those living seals
 Of every beauty work with quicker force, 125
 The higher they are risen; and that there
 I had not turned me to them; he may well
 Excuse me that, whereof in my excuse
 I do accuse me, and may own my truth;
 That holy pleasure here not yet revealed, 130
 Which grows in transport as we mount aloof.

CANTO XV

True love, that ever shows itself as clear
 In kindness, as loose appetite in wrong,
 Silenced that lyre harmonious, and stilled
 The sacred chords, that are by heaven's right
 hand Unwound and tightened. How to righteous prayers 5
 Should they not hearken, who, to give me will
 For praying, in accordance thus were mute?
 He hath in sooth good cause for endless grief
 Who, for the love of thing that 'asteth not,
 Despoils himself forever of that love. 10
 As oft along the still and pure serene,
 At nightfall, glides a sudden trail of fire,

Attracting with involuntary heed
 The eye to follow it, erewhile at rest;
 And seems some star that shifted place in
 heaven, 15
 Only that, whence it kindles, none is lost,
 And it is soon extinct: thus from the horn,
 That on the dexter of the cross extends,
 Down to its foot, one luminary ran
 From mid the cluster shone there; yet no gem 20
 Dropped from its foil: and through the beamy list,
 Like flame in alabaster, glowed its course.
 So forward stretched him (if of credence aught
 Our greater muse may claim) the pious ghost
 Of old Anchises, in the Elysian bower, 25
 When he perceived his son. "O thou, my
 blood!
 O most exceeding grace divine! to whom,
 As now to thee, hath twice the heavenly gate
 Been e'er unclosed?" So spake the light:
 whence I
 Turned me toward him; then unto my dame
 My sight directed: and on either side 31
 Amazement waited me; for in her eyes
 Was lighted such a smile, I thought that mine
 Had dived unto the bottom of my grace
 And of my bliss in Paradise. Forthwith, 35
 To hearing and to sight gratefully alike,
 The spirit to his poem added things
 I understood not, so profound he spake:
 Yet not of choice, but through necessity,
 Mysterious; for his high conception soared 40 Beyond the mark of mortals. When the flight
 Of holy transport had so spent its rage,
 That nearer to the level of our thought
 The speech descended; the first sounds I heard
 Were, "Blest be thou, Triunal Deity! 45
 That hast such favor in my seed vouchsafed."
 Then followed: "No unpleasant thirst,
 though long,
 Which took me reading in the sacred book,
 Whose leaves or white or dusky never
 change,
 Thou hast allayed, my son!¹ within this
 light, 50

From whence my voice thou hear'st: more thanks to her
 Who, for such lofty mounting, has with plumes
 Begirt thee. Thou dost deem thy thoughts
 to me
 From Him transmitted, who is first of all,
 E'en as all numbers ray from unity; 55
 And therefore dost not ask me who I am,
 Or why to thee more joyous I appear,
 Than any other in this gladsome throng.
 The truth is as thou deem'st; for in this life
 Both less and greater in that mirror look, 60
 In which thy thoughts, or e'er thou think'st are shown.
 But, that the love, which keeps me wakeful
 ever,
 Urging with sacred thirst of sweet desire,
 May be contented fully; let thy voice, 64
 Fearless, and frank, and jocund, utter forth
 Thy will distinctly, utter forth the wish,
 Whereto my ready answer stands decreed."
 I turned me to Beatrice; and she heard
 Ere I had spoken, smiling and assent,
 That to my will gave wings; and I began: 70
 "To each among your tribe, what time ye kenned
 The nature, in whom naught unequal dwells,
 Wisdom and love were in one measure dealt;
 For that they are so equal in the sun,
 From whence ye drew your radiance and your heat, 75
 As makes all likeness scant. But will and means,
 In mortals, for the cause ye will discern
 With unlike wings are fledge. A mortal, I Experience inequality like this;
 And therefore give no thanks, but in the
 heart, 80
 For thy paternal greeting. This howe'er
 I pray thee, living topaz! that ingemm'st
 This precious jewel; let me hear thy name."
 "I am thy root, O leaf! whom to expect Even, hath pleased me." Thus the prompt reply 85
 Prefacing, next it added: "He, of whom Thy kindred appellation comes, and who,
 These hundred years and more, on its first ledge
 Hath circuited the mountain, was my son,
 And thy great-grandsire. Well befits, his
 long 90
 Endurance should be shortened by thy deeds.
 "Florence, within her ancient limit-mark,

¹Cacciaguida, ancestor of Dante, is speaking.

Which 'calls her still to matin prayers and noon,

Was chaste and sober, and abode in peace.
She had no armlets and no head-tires then; 95
No purpled dames; no zone, that caught the eye

More than the person did. Time was not
yet,

When at his daughter's birth the sire grew pale,

For fear the age and dowry should exceed,
On each side, just proportion. House was none 100

Void of its family: nor yet had come Sardanapalus, to exhibit feats

Of chamber prowess. Montemalo yet
O'er our suburban turret rose; as much
To be surpast in fall, as in its rising. 105

I saw Bellincion Berti¹ walk abroad
In leathern girdle, and a clasp of bone;

And, with no artful coloring on her cheeks,
His lady leave the glass. The sons I saw

Of Nerli, and of Vecchio, well content 110
With unrobed jerkin; and their good dames handling

The spindle and the flax: O happy they!
Each sure of burial in her native land,

And none left desolate a-bed for France.
One waked to tend the cradle, hushing it 115

With sounds that lulled the parent's infancy:

¹A citizen of Florence.

Another, with her maidens, drawing off
The tresses from the distaff, lectured them
Old tales of Troy, and Fiesole, and Rome.
A Salterello and Cianghella² we 120
Had held as strange a marvel, as ye would
A Cincinnatus or Cornelia now.

"In such composed and seemly fellowship,
Such faithful and such fair equality,
In so sweet household, Mary at my birth 125 Bestowed me, called on with loud cries; and
there,

In your old baptistery, I was made Christian at once and Cacciaguida; as were My brethren Eliseo and Moronto. 129

"From Vladipado came to me my spouse;
And hence thy surname grew. I followed
then

The Emperor Conrad: and his knighthood he Did gird on me; in such good part he took My valiant service. After him I went

To testify against that evil law, 135
Whose people, by the shepherd's fault, possess

Your right usurped. There I by that foul
crew,

Was disentangled from the treacherous world

Whose base affection many a spirit soils;
And from the martyrdom came to this
peace." 140

SIR THOMAS MALORY (c. 1400-1471)

MORTE D'ARTHUR

LAUNCELOT AND GUENEVER

IN THE beginning of Arthur, after he was 5 chosen king by adventure and by grace,—for the most part of the barons knew not that he was Uther Pendragon's son, but as Merlin made it openly known,—many kings and lords made great war against him for that 10 cause; but well Arthur overcame them all;
for the most part of the days of his life he was ruled much by the counsel of Merlin. So it fell on a time king Arthur said unto Merlin,
My barons will let me have no rest, but needs 15
I must take a wife, and I will none take but by thy counsel and by thine advice. It is well done, said Merlin, that ye take a wife, for a man of your bounty and nobleness should not be without a wife. Now is there any that ye love more than another? Yea, said king Arthur, I love Guenever, the daughter of king Leodegrance, of the land of Cameliard, which Leodegrance holdeth in his house the Table Round, that ye told he had of my father, Uther. And this damsel is the most valiant and fairest lady that I know living, or yet that ever I could find.

Sir, said Merlin, as of her beauty and fairness she is one of the fairest on live. But and ye loved her not so well as ye do, I could find you a damsel of beauty and of goodness that should like you and please you, and your heart were not set; but there as a man's heart is set, he will be loth to return. That is truth, said king Arthur. But Merlin warned the king covertly that Guenever was not wholesome for him to take to wife, for he warned him that Launcelot should love her, and she him again; and so he turned his tale to the adventures of the Sangreal. 5 Then Merlin desired of the king to have men with him that should enquire of Guenever, and so the king granted him. And Merlin went forth to king Leodegrance of Cameliard, and told him of the desire of the king that he 10 would have unto his wife Guenever his daughter. That is to me, said king Leodegrance, the best tidings that ever I heard, that so worthy a king of prowess and noblesse will wed my daughter. And as for my lands 15 I will give him wist I it might please him, but he hath lands enough, him needeth none, but I shall send him a gift shall please him much more, for I shall give him the Table Round, the which Uther Pendragon 20 gave me, and when it is full complete there is an hundred knights and fifty. And as for an hundred good knights I have myself, but I lack fifty, for so many have been slain in my days. And so king Leodegrance de- 25 livered his daughter Guenever unto Merlin, and the Table Round, with the hundred knights, and so they rode freshly, with great royalty, what by water and what by land, till they came nigh unto London.

HOW SIR LAUNCELOT WAS SHRIVEN, AND WHAT SORROW HE MADE; AND OF THE GOOD ENSAMPLES WHICH WERE SHEWED HIM.

Then Sir Launcelot wept with heavy cheer, and said, Now I know well ye say me sooth. Sir, said the good man, hide none old sin from me. Truly, said Sir Launcelot, that 40 were me full loth to discover. For this fourteen years I never discovered one thing that I have used, and that may I now blame my shame and my misadventure. And then he told there that good man all his life, and how he had loved a queen unmeasurably, and out of measure long;—and all my great deeds of arms that I have done, I did the most part for the queen's sake, and for her sake would I do battle were it right or 50 wrong, and never did I battle all only for God's sake, but for to win worship, and to cause me to be the better beloved, and little or nought I thanked God of it. Then Sir

Launcelot said, I pray you counsel me. I will counsel you, said the hermit, if ye will ensure me that ye will never come in that queen's fellowship, as much as ye may forbear. And then Sir Launcelot promised him he would not, by the faith of his body. Look that your heart and your mouth ensure you ye shall have more worship than ever ye had. Holy father, said Sir Launcelot, I 10 marvel of the voice that said to me marvelous words, as ye have heard toforehand. Have ye no marvel, said the good man, thereof; for it seemeth well God loveth you; for men may understand a stone is hard of kind, and namely one more than another, that is to understand by thee Sir Launcelot, for thou wilt not leave thy sin for no goodness that God hath sent thee, therefore thou art more than any stone, and never wouldest thou be made soft nor by water nor by fire, and that is, the heat of the Holy Ghost may not enter in thee. Now take heed; in all the world men shall not find one knight to whom our Lord hath given so much of grace 25 as He hath given you: for He hath given you fairness with seemliness; He hath given thee wit, discretion to know good from evil: He hath given thee prowess and hardiness; and given thee to work so largely that thou hast had at all days the better wheresoever thou 30 camest. And now our Lord will suffer thee no longer, but that thou shalt know Him, whether thou wilt or nilt. And why the voice called thee bitterer than wood, for 35 where over-much sin dwelleth, there may be but little sweetness, wherefore thou art likened to an old rotten tree. Now have I shewed thee why thou art harder than the stone, and bitterer than the tree. Now shall I shew thee why thou art more naked and barer than the fig-tree. It befell that our Lord on Palm-Sunday preached in Jerusalem, and there He found in the people that all hardness was harboured in them, and there 45 He found in all the town not one that would harbour Him. And then He went without the town, and found in the midst of the way a fig-tree, the which was right fair and well garnished of leaves, but fruit had it none. Then our Lord cursed the tree that bare no fruit; that betokeneth the fig-tree into Jerusalem, that had leaves and no fruit. So thou, Sir Launcelot, when the holy Graile was brought afore thee, He found in thee no fruit, nor good thought nor good will, and defouled with lechery. Certes, said Sir Launcelot, all that ye have said is true, and from henceforward I cast me by the grace of God never to be so wicked as I have been, but as to follow knighthood, and to do feats of arms. Then the good man enjoined Sir Launcelot such penance as he might do, and to sue knighthood, and so he assoiled him and prayed Sir Launcelot to abide with him all that day. I will well, said Sir Launcelot, for I have neither helm, nor horse, nor sword. As for that, said the good man, I shall help you or to-morn at even of an horse, and all that longeth unto you. And then Sir Launcelot repented him greatly.

OF THE JOY KING ARTHUR AND THE QUEEN HAD OF THE ACHIEVEMENT OF
THE SANGREAL; AND HOW LAUNCELOT FELL TO HIS OLD LOVE AGAIN.

So after the quest of the Sangreal was fulfilled, and all knights that were left on live were come again unto the Table Round, as the book of the Sangreal maketh mention, then was there great joy in the court, and in especial king Arthur and queen Guenever made great joy of the remnant that was come home, and passing glad was the king and the queen of Sir Launcelot and of Sir Bors. For they had been passing long away in the quest of the Sangreal. Then, as the book saith, Sir Launcelot began to resort unto queen Guenever again, and forgot the promise and the perfection that he made in the quest. For, as the book saith, had not Sir Launcelot been in his privy thoughts and in his mind so set inwardly to the queen, as he was in seeming outward to God, there had no knight passed him in the quest of the Sangreal: but ever his thoughts were privily on the queen, and so they loved together more hotter than they did toforehand, that many in the court spake of it, and in especial Sir Agravaire, Sir Gawaine's brother, for he was ever open mouthed. So befell that Sir Launcelot had many resorts of ladies and damsels, that daily resorted unto him, that besought him to be their champion. And in all such matters of right Sir Launcelot appealed him daily to do for the pleasure of our Lord Jesu Christ. And ever as much as he might he withdrew him from the company and fellowship of queen Guenever, for to eschew the slander and noise: wherefore the queen waxed wroth with Sir Launcelot, and upon a day she called Sir Launcelot unto her chamber, and said thus: Sir Launcelot, I see and feel daily that thy love beginneth to slake, for thou hast no joy to be in my presence, but ever thou art out of this court, and quarrels and matters thou hast now adays for ladies and gentlewomen, more than ever thou were wont to have aforehand. Ah, madam, said Launcelot, in this ye must hold me excused for divers causes. One is, I was but late in the quest of the Sangreal, and I thank God, of his great mercy, and never of my deserving, that I saw in that my quest as much as ever saw any sinful man, and so was it told me. And if I had not had my privy thoughts to return to your love again as I do, I had seen as great mysteries as ever saw my son Galahad, or Percivale, or Sir Bors, and therefore, madam, I was but late in that quest. Wit ye well, madam, it may not be yet lightly forgotten the high service in whom I did my diligent labour. Also, madam, wit ye well that there be many men speak of our love in this court, and have you and me greatly in a wait, as Sir Agravaire, and Sir Mordred: and, madam, wit ye well, I dread them more for your sake than for any fear that I have of them myself, for I may happen to escape and rid myself in a great need, where ye must abide all that will be said unto you. And then, if that ye fall in any distress through wilful folly, then is there none other remedy or help but by me and my blood. And wit ye well, madam, the boldness of you and me will bring us to great shame and slander, and that were me loth to see you dishonoured. And that is the cause that I take upon me more for to do for damsels and maidens than ever I did tofore, that men should understand my joy and my delight is my pleasure to have ado for damsels and maidens.

All this while the queen stood still, and let Sir Launcelot say what he would. And when he had all said, she brast out on weeping, and so she sobbed and wept a great while: and when she might speak, she said, Launcelot, now I well understand that thou art a false recreant knight, and lovest and holdest other ladies, and by me thou hast disdain and scorn. For wit thou well, she said, now I understand thy falsehood, and therefore shall I never love thee no more, and never be thou so hardy to come in my sight, and right here I discharge thee this court, that thou never come within it, and I forfend thee my fellowship, and upon pain of thy head that thou see me no more. Right so Sir Launcelot parted with great heaviness, that hardly he might sustain himself for great dole making. Then he called Sir Bors, Sir Ector de Maris, and Sir Lionel, and told them how the queen had forfend him the court, and so he was in will to depart into his own country. Fair sir, said Sir Bors de Ganis, ye shall not depart out of this land by mine advice; ye must remember in what honour ye are renowned, and called the noblest knight of the world, and many great matters ye have in hand, and women in their hastiness will do oftentimes that sore repenteth them, and therefore by mine advice ye shall take your horse, and ride to the good hermitage here besides Windsor, that sometime was a good knight, his name is Sir Brasias, and there shall ye abide till I send you word of better tidings. Brother, said Sir Launcelot, wit ye well I am full loth to depart out of this realm, but the queen hath defended me so highly that me seemeth she will never be my good lady as she hath been. Say ye never so, said Sir Bors, for many times or this time she hath been wroth with you, and after it she was the first that repented it. Ye say well, said Launcelot, for now will I do by your counsel, and take mine horse and my harness, and ride to the hermit Sir Brasias, and there will I repose me until I hear some manner of tidings from you. But, fair brother, I pray you get me the love of my lady queen Guenever, and ye may. Sir, said Sir Bors, ye need not to move me of such matters, for well ye wot I will do what I may, to please you. And then the noble knight Sir Launcelot departed with right heavy cheer, suddenly, that none earthly creature wist of him, nor where he was become, but Sir Bors. So when Sir Launcelot was departed, the queen made no manner of sorrow in shewing, to none of his blood, nor to none other: but, wit ye well, inwardly, as the book saith, she took great thought, but she bare it out with a proud countenance, as though she felt nothing nor danger.

Then came Sir Bors de Ganis, and said, My lord Sir Launcelot, what think ye for to do, now to ride in this realm? wit thou well ye shall find new friends. Be as be may, said Sir Launcelot, keep you still here, for I will forth on my journey, and no man nor child shall go with me. So it was no boot to strive, but he departed and rode westerly, and there he sought a seven or eight days, and at the last he came to a nunnery, and then was queen Guenever ware of Sir Launcelot as he walked in the cloister, and when she saw him there she swooned thrice, that all the ladies and gentlewomen had work enough to hold the queen up. So when she might speak, she called ladies and gentlewomen to her, and said, Ye marvel, fair ladies, why I make this fare. Truly, she said, it is for the sight of yonder knight that yonder standeth: wherefore, I pray you all, call him to me. When Sir Launcelot was brought to her, then she said to all the ladies, Through this man and me hath all this war been wrought, and the death of the most noblest knights of the world; for through our love that we have loved together is my most noble lord slain. Therefore, Sir Launcelot, wit thou well I am set in such a plight to get my soul's health; and yet I trust, through God's grace, that after my death to have a sight of the blessed face of Christ, and at doomsday to sit on his right side, for as sinful as ever I was are saints in heaven. Therefore, Sir Launcelot, I require thee and beseech thee heartily, for all the love that ever was betwixt us, that thou never see me more in the visage; and I command thee on God's behalf, that thou forsake my company, and to thy kingdom thou turn again and keep well thy realm from war and wrack. For as well as I have loved thee, mine heart will not serve me to see thee; for through thee and me is the flower of kings and knights destroyed. Therefore, Sir Launcelot, go to thy realm, and there take thee a wife, and live with her with joy and bliss, and I pray thee heartily amend my misliving. Now, sweet madam, said Sir Launcelot, would ye that I should return again unto my country, and there to wed a lady? Nay, madam, wit you well that shall I never do: for I shall never be so false to you of that I have promised, but the same destiny that ye have taken you to, I will take me unto, for to please Jesu, and ever for you I cast me specially to pray. If thou wilt do so, said the queen, hold thy promise; but I may never believe but that thou wilt turn to the world again. Well, madam, said he, ye say as pleaseth you, yet wist you me never false of my promise, and God defend but I should forsake the world as ye have done. For in the quest of the Sangreal I had forsaken the vanities of the world, had not your lord been. And if I had done so at that time with my heart, will, and thought, I had passed all the knights that were in the Sangreal, except Sir Galahad my son. And therefore, lady, sithen ye have taken you to perfection, I must needs take me to perfection of right. For I take record of God, in you I have had mine earthly joy. And if I had found you now so disposed, I had cast me to have had you into mine own realm.

But sithen I find you thus disposed, I insure you faithfully I will ever take me to penance, and pray while my life lasteth, if that I may find any hermit either grey or white that will receive me. Wherefore, madam, I pray you kiss me, and never no more. Nay, said the queen, that shall I never do, but abstain you from such works. And they departed. But there was never so hard an hearted man, but he would have wept to see the dolour that they made. For there was lamentation as they had been stung with spears, and many times they swooned. And the ladies bare the queen to her chamber, and Sir Launcelot awoke, and went and took his horse, and rode all that day and all that night in a forest, weeping. And at the last he was ware of an hermitage and a chapel stood betwixt two cliffs, and then he heard a little bell ring to mass, and thither he rode and alight, and tied his horse to the gate, and heard mass. And he that sang mass was the bishop of Canterbury. Both the bishop and Sir Bedivere knew Sir Launcelot, and they spake together after mass. But when Sir Bedivere had told his tale all whole, Sir Launcelot's heart almost brast for sorrow, and Sir Launcelot threw his arms abroad, and said, Alas, who may trust this world! And then he kneeled down on his knees, and prayed the bishop to shrive him and assolt him. And then he besought the bishop that he might be his brother. Then the bishop said, I will gladly: and there he put an habit upon Sir Launcelot and there he served God day and night with prayers and fastings.

Then Sir Launcelot rose up or day, and told the hermit. It were well done, said the hermit, that ye made you ready, and that ye disobey not the vision. Then Sir Launcelot took his seven fellows with him, and on foot they went from Glastonbury to Almesbury, the which is little more than thirty miles. And thither they came within two days, for they were weak and feeble to go. And when Sir Launcelot was come to Almesbury, within the nunnery, queen Guenever died but half an hour before. And the ladies told Sir Launcelot that queen Guenever told them all, or she passed, that Sir Launcelot had been priest near a twelvemonth,—And hither he cometh as fast as he may to fetch my corpse: and beside my lord king Arthur he shall bury me. Wherefore the queen said in hearing of them all, I beseech Almighty God that I may never have power to see Sir Launcelot with my worldly eyes. And thus, said all the ladies, was ever her prayer these two days, till she was dead. Then Sir Launcelot saw her visage, but he wept not greatly, but sighed. And so he did all the observance of the service himself, both the Dirige, and on the morn he sang mass. And there was ordained an horse bier; and so with an hundred torches ever burning about the corpse of the queen, and ever Sir Launcelot with his eight fellows went about the horse bier singing and reading many an holy orison, and frankincense upon the corpse incensed. Thus Sir Launcelot and his eight fellows went on foot from Almesbury unto Glastonbury; and when they were come to the chapel and the hermitage, there she had a Dirige with great devotion. And on the morn the hermit, that sometime was bishop of Canterbury, sang the mass of Requiem with great devotion: and Sir Launcelot was the first that offered, and then all his eight fellows. And then she was wrapped in cered cloth of Raines, from the *op to the toes in thirty fold, and after she was put in a web of lead, and then in a coffin of marble. And when she was put in the earth, Sir Launcelot swooned, and lay long still, while the hermit came out and awaked him, and said, Ye be to blame, for ye displease God with such manner of sorrow making. Truly, said Sir Launcelot, I trust I do not displease God, for He knoweth mine intent, for my sorrow was not, nor is not, for any rejoicing of sin, but my sorrow may never have end. For when I remember of her beauty, and of her noblesse, that was both with her king and with her; so when I saw his corpse and her corpse lie together, truly mine heart would not serve to sustain my careful body. Also when I remember me, how by my default, mine orgule, and my pride, that they were both laid full low, that were peerless that ever was living of christian people, wit you well, said Sir Launcelot, this remembered, of their kindness and mine unkindness, sank so to my heart, that I might not sustain myself.

 Then Sir Launcelot never after eat but little meat, nor drank, till he was dead; for then he sickened more and more, and dried and dwined away; for the bishop nor none of his fellows might not make him to eat, and little he drank, that he was waxen by a cubit shorter than he was, that the people could not know him; for evermore day and night he prayed, but sometime he slumbered a broken sleep, and ever he was lying groveling on the tomb of king Arthur and queen Guen-ever. And there was no comfort that the bishop, nor Sir Bors, nor none of his fellows could make him, it availed not. So within six weeks after, Sir Launcelot fell sick, and lay in his bed; and then he sent for the bishop that there was hermit, and all his true fellows. Then Sir Launcelot said with dreary voice, Sir bishop, I pray you give to me all my rights that longeth to a christian man. It shall not need you, said the hermit and all his fellow, it is but heaviness of your blood: ye shall be well amended by the grace of God to-morn. My fair lords, said Sir Launcelot, wit you well, my careful body will into the earth. I have warning more then now I will say, therefore give me my rights. So when he was houseled and eneled, and had all that a christian man ought to have, he prayed the bishop that his fellows might bear his body to Joyous Gard. Some men say it was Anwick, and some men say it was Bamborow. Howbeit, said Sir Launcelot, me repenteth sore, but I made mine avow sometime that in Joyous Gard I would be buried, and because of breaking of mine avow, I pray you all lead me thither.

 Then there was weeping and wringing of hands among his fellows. So at a season of the night they went all to their beds, for they all lay in one chamber. And so after midnight, against day, the bishop that was hermit, as he lay in his bed asleep, he fell upon a great laughter; and therewith all the fellowship awoke, and came unto the bishop, and asked him what he ailed. Alas, said the bishop, why did ye awake me, I was never in all my life so merry and so well at ease. Wherefore? said Sir Bors. Truly, said the bishop, here was Sir Launcelot with me, with more angels than ever I saw men upon one day; and I saw the angels heave Sir Launcelot unto heaven, and the gates of heaven opened against him. It is but the vexing of dreams, said Sir Bors, for I doubt not Sir Launcelot aileth nothing but good.
 It may well be, said the bishop, go ye to his bed, and then shall ye prove the sooth. So when Sir Bors and his fellow came to his bed they found him stark dead, and he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savour about him that ever they felt. Then was there weeping and wringing of hands and the greatest dole they made that ever made men.
 And on the morn the bishop did his mass of Requiem; and after the bishop and all the nine knights put Sir Launcelot in the same horse bier that queen Guenever was laid in tofore that she was buried: and so the bishop and they altogether went with the corpse of Sir Launcelot daily, till they came to Joyous Gard, and ever they had an hundred torches burning about him; and so within fifteen days they came to Joyous Gard. And there they laid his corpse in the body of the quire, and sang and read many psalters and prayers over him and about him; and ever his vis-age was laid open and naked, that all folk might behold him; for such was the custom in those days, that all men of worship should so lie with open visage till that they were buried.

Then went Sir Bors unto Sir Ector, and told him how there lay his brother Sir Launcelot dead. And then Sir Ector threw his shield, sword, and helm from him; and when he beheld Sir Launcelot's visage he fell down in a swoon. And when he awaked it were hard any tongue to tell the doleful complaints that he made for his brother. Ah, Launcelot, he said, thou were head of all christian knights; and now I dare say, said Sir Ector, thou Sir Launcelot, there thou liest, that thou were never matched of earthly knight's hand; and thou were the courtiest knight that ever bare shield; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse; and thou were the truest lover of a sinful man that ever loved woman; and thou were the kindest man that ever strake with sword; and thou were the goodliest person ever came among press of knights; and thou was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies; and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in the rest.

Then there was weeping and dolour out of measure. Thus they kept Sir Launcelot's corpse on loft fifteen days, and then they buried it with great devotion. . . .

ARIOSTO (1474-1533)

ORLANDO FURIOSO¹

OF LOVES and ladies, knights and arms, I sing,

Of courtesies, and many a daring feat;

And from those ancient days my story bring,
When Moors from Afric passed in hostile fleet,

And ravaged France, with Agramant their King,

Flushed with his youthful rage and furious heat,

Who on King Charles the Roman emperor's head

Had vowed due vengeance for Troyano dead.

In the same strain of Roland will I tell

Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme,
On whom strange madness and rank fury fell,

A man esteemed so wise in former time;

If she, who to like cruel pass has well

Nigh brought my feeble wit which fain would climb

And hourly wastes my sense, concede me skill

And strength my daring promise to fulfil.

Roland, who long the lady of Catay,

Angelica, had loved, and with his brand

Raised countless trophies to that damsel gay,

In India, Median, and Tartarian land,

Westward with her had measured back his way;

Where, nigh the Pyrenees, with many a band

Of Germany and France, King Charlemagne
Had camped his faithful host upon the plain.

To make King Agramant, for penance, smite

His cheek, and rash Marsilius rue the hour;

This, when all trained with lance and sword to fight,

He led from Africa to swell his power;

That other when he pushed, in fell despite,

Against the realm of France Spain's martial flower.

'Twas thus Orlando came where Charles was tented

In evil hour, and soon the deed repented.

For here was seized his dame of peerless charms,

(How often human judgment wanders wide!)

Whom in long warfare he had kept from harms,

From western climes to eastern shores

her guide

In his own land, 'mid friends and kindred arms,

Now without contest severed from his side,

Fearing the mischief kindled by her eyes,

From him the prudent Emperor reft the prize.

For bold Orlando and his cousin, free

Rinaldo, late contended for the maid,

Enamored of what beauty rare; since she

Alike the glowing breast of either swayed.

¹From Cantos 1, 5, 7, 17. Translation by Rose.

But Charles, who little liked such rivalry, 45
And drew an omen thence of feebler aid,
To abate the cause of quarrel, seized the fair,
And placed her in Bavarian Namus' care.

After Angelica had shaped her course
By the great sea that laves the Gascon
shore, 50
Still keeping to the rippling waves her horse,
Where best the moistened sand the palfrey
bore,
Him, plunged into the brine, the fiend perforce
Dragged, till he swam amid the watery roar.
Nor what to do the timid damsel knew, 55
Save that she closer to her saddle grew.

She cannot, howsoe'er the rein she ply,
Govern the horse, which swims the surge to meet.

Her raiment she collects and holds it high; 59
And, not to wet them, gathers up her feet.
Her tresses, which the breeze still wantonly
Assaults, disheveled on her shoulders beat,
The louder winds are hushed, perchance in duty,
Intent, like ocean, on such sovereign beauty.

Landward in vain her eyes the damsel bright Directs, which water face and breast with
tears, 66

And ever sees, decreasing to her right,
The beach she left, which less and less appears.

The courser, which was swimming to the right,

After a mighty sweep, the lady bears 70
To shore, where rock and cavern shag the brink,
As nigh upon the land begins to sink.

"Fortune, what more remains, that thou on
me

Shouldst not now satiate thy revengeful
thirst? 74

What more," said she, "can I bestow on thee
Than, what thou seekest not, this life
accurst?

Thou wast in haste to snatch me from the sea,

Where I had ended its sad days, immersed;
Because to torture me with further ill
Before I die, is yet thy cruel will. 80

"But what worse torment still remains in store

Beyond, I am unable to descry;
By thee from my fair throne, which never-
more

I hope to repossess, compelled to fly:
I, what is worse, my honor lost deplore; 85

For if I sinned not in effect, yet I Give matter by my wanderings to be stung
For wantonness of every carping tongue."

From the extremest height the hermit hoar
Of that high rock above her had surveyed
Angelica, arrived upon the shore, 91
Beneath the cliff, afflicted and dismayed.
He to that place had come six days before;
For him by path untrod had fiend conveyed.

And he approached her, feigning such a call
As e'er Hilarion might have had, or Paul. 96

When him, yet unagnized, she saw appear,
The lady took some comfort, and laid by,
Emboldened by degrees, her former fear;
Though still her visage was of death-like
dye. 100

"Misericord! father," when the friar was
near,

She said, "for brought to evil pass am I."
And told, still broke by sobs, in doleful tone,
The story, to her hearer not unknown.

This while round Paris-walls the leaguer lay
Of famed Troyano's son's besieging band,
Reduced to such extremity one day, 107

That it nigh fell into the foeman's hand;
And, but that vows had virtue to allay

The wrath of Heaven, whose waters drenched the land, 110

That day had perished by the Moorish lance
The holy empire and great name of France.

To memory now returned that lady gay,
Who ne'er was banished from Orlando's
breast;

And fanned the secret fire, which through the day, 115

Now kindled into flame, had seemed at
rest;

That in his escort even from Catay
Of farthest Ind, had journeyed to the west;

There lost: Of whom he had discerned no token Since Charles's power near Bordeaux-town was broken. 120

To good Orlando it appeared as he,
Mid odorous flowers, upon a grassy bed,
Were gazing on that beauteous ivory,
Which Love's own hand had tinged with native red; 124

And those two stars of pure transparency,
With which he in Love's toils his fancy fed;

Of those bright eyes, and that bright face, I
say,

Which from his breast had torn his heart
away. 128

Meanwhile the unhappy lover lost the dame
In that dim air, nor how he lost her, weets;
And, roving far and near, her beauteous name
Through every sounding wood and plain repeats.

And while "Oh, wretched me!" is his exclaim,
"Who has to poison changed my promised sweets?"

He of his sovereign lady who with tears 135
Demands his aid, the lamentation hears.

Thither, whence comes the sound, he swiftly
hies,

And toils, now here, now there, with labor
sore,

Oh! what tormenting grief, to think his eyes
Cannot again the lovely rays explore! 140

Lo! other voice from other quarters cries:
"Hope not on earth to enjoy the blessing
more."

At that alarming cry he woke, and found Himself in tears of bitter sorrow drowned.

Not thinking that like images are vain, 145
When fear, or when desire disturbs our rest,
The thought of her, exposed to shame and
pain,

In such a mode upon his fancy pressed,
He, thundering, leaped from bed, and with what chain

And plate behooed, his limbs all over dressed: 150

Took Brigliadoro from the stall he filled,
Nor any squire attendant's service willed.

What time Rogero sees the fair array,
Whose bands to succor ravaged France
prepare, 154

And notes and talks of ensigns they display,
And names of British lords, to him repair

One and another, crowding to survey
His courser, single of its kind, or rare:
All thither hasten, wondering and astound,
And compassing the warrior, from around.

So that to raise more wonder in the train, 163
And to make better sport, as him they eyed.

Rogero shook the flying courser's rein,
And lightly with the rowels touched his
side:

He toward heaven uprising, soared amain,
And left behind each gazer stupefied. 166

Having from end to end the English force
So viewed, he next for Ireland shaped his course;

And saw the fabulous Hibernia, where 169

The godly, sainted elder made the cave,
In which men cleansed from all offences are;
Such mercy there, it seems, is found to save.

Thence o'er that sea he spurred, through yielding air,

Whose briny waves the lesser Britain lave;
And, looking down, Angelica descried 175

In passing, to the rock with fetters tied;

Bound to the naked rock upon the strand,
In the Isle of Tears; for the Isle of Tears was hight

That which was peopled by the inhuman
band,

So passing fierce and full of foul despite; 180
Who, as I told above, on every hand

Cruised with their scattered fleet by day or
night;

And every beauteous woman bore away,
Destined to be a monster's evil prey: 184

There but that morning bound in cruel wise;
Where (to devour a living damsel sped)

The orc, that measureless sea-monster, hies,
Which on abominable food is fed.

How on the beach the maid became the prize
Of the rapacious crew, above was said, 190

Who found her sleeping near the enchanter
hoar,

Who her had thither brought by magic lore.

The cruel and inhospitable crew
 To the voracious beast the dame expose
 Upon the sea-beat shore, as bare to view 195
 As nature did at first her work compose.
 Not even a veil she has, to shade the hue
 Of the white lily and vermilion rose,
 Which mingled in her lovely members meet,
 Proof to December snow and July heat. 200

And as he fastened his on her fair eyes,
 His Bradamant he called to mind again.
 Pity and love within his bosom rise
 At once, and ill he can from tears refrain;
 And in soft tone he to the damsel cries, 205
 When he has checked his flying courser's
 rein,
 "O lady, worthy but that chain to wear,
 With which Love's faithful servants fettered are,

"And most unworthy this or other ill, 209
 What wretch has had the cruelty to wound
 And gall those snowy hands with livid stain,
 Thus painfully with grinding fetters
 bound?"

At this she cannot choose but show like grain,
 Of crimson spreading on an ivory ground;
 Knowing those secret beauties are espied, 215
 Which, howsoever lovely, shame would hide;

And gladly with her hands her face would hood,
 Were they not fastened to the rugged
 stone:

But with her tears (for this at least she could)
 Bedewed it, and essayed to hold it down.
 Sobbing some while the lovely damsel stood;
 Then loosed her tongue and spake in feeble tone; 222

But ended not, arrested in mid-word,
 By a loud noise which in the sea was heard.

Lo and behold! the unmeasured beast appears, 225
 Half surging and half hidden, in such sort
 As sped by roaring and long carack steers
 From north or south, toward her destined port.

So the sea-monster to his food repairs:
 And now the interval between is short. 230
 Half dead the lady is through fear endured,
 Till by that other's comfort reassured.

Rogero overhand, not in the rest,
 Carries his lance, and beats, with downright blow,
 The monstrous orc. What this resembled
 best, 235
 But a huge, writhing mass, I do not know;
 Which were no form of animal exprest, Save in the head, with eyes and teeth of sow.

His forehead, 'twixt the eyes, Rogero smites,
 But as on steel or rock the weapon lights. 240

When he perceives the first of no avail,
 The knight returns to deal a better blow;
 The orc, who sees the shifting shadows sail
 Of those huge pinions on the sea below,
 In furious heat, deserts his sure regale 245
 On shore, to follow that deceitful show;
 And rolls and reels behind it, as it fleets.
 Rogero drops, and oft the stroke repeats.

But the fell orc Rogero does not smite
 With lance or falchion where the tushes grow, 250

But aims that 'twixt the ears his blow may
 light;

Now on the spine, or now on tail below.
 And still in time descends or soars upright,
 And shifts his course, to cheat the veering
 foe:

But as if beating on a jasper block, 255
 Can never cleave the hard and rugged rock.

He then new counsel took, and 'twas the
 best,

With other arms the monster to pursue;
 And lifting from his shield the covering vest,
 To dazzle with the light his blasted view, Landward toward the rock-chained maid he pressed, 261

And on her little finger, lest a new Mischance should follow, slipt the ring, which brought

The enchantment of the magic shield to nought.

He gave it now Angelica; for he 265 Feared lest the buckler's light should be impaired,

And willed as well those beauteous eyes should be

Defended, which had him already snared.

Pressing beneath his paunch full half the sea,
Now to the shore the monstrous whale repaired. 270

Firm stood Rogero, and the veil undone
Appeared to give the sky another sun.

He in the monster's eye the radiance throws,
Which works as it was wont in other time.
As trout or grayling to the bottom goes 275

In stream, which mountaineer disturbs with lime;

So the enchanted buckler overthrows

The orc, reversed among the foam and slime

Rogero here and there the beast astound 279

Still beats, but cannot find the way to wound.

This while the lady begs him not to bray

Longer the monster's rugged scale in vain.

"For heaven's sake, turn and loose me," did she say,

Still weeping, "ere the orc awake again,

Bear me with thee, and drown me in mid-
way. 285

Let me not this foul monster's food remain."

By her just plaint Rogero moved, forebore, Untied the maid, and raised her from the shore.

The course in pathless woods, which, without
rein, 289

The Tartar's charger had pursued astray,

Made Roland for two days, with fruitless pain,

Follow him, without tidings of his way.

Orlando reached a rill of crystal vein,

On either bank of which a meadow lay;

Which, stained with native hues and rich,

he sees, 295

And dotted o'er with fair and many trees.

The mid-day fervor made the shelter sweet

To hardy herd as well as naked swain;

So that Orlando, well beneath the heat

Some deal might wince, oppressed with plate and chain. 300

He entered, for repose, the cool retreat,

And found it the abode of grief and pain;

And place of sojourn more accursed and fell,

On that unhappy day, than tongue can tell.

Turning him round, he there, on many a tree, 305

Beheld engraved, upon the woody shore,

What as the writing of his deity

He knew, as soon as he had marked the lore.

This was a place of those described by me,

Whither oftentimes, attended by Medore,

From the near shepherd's cot and wont to stray 311

The beauteous lady, sovereign of Catay.

In a hundred knots, amid those green abodes,

In a hundred parts, their cyphered names are dight;

Whose many letters are so many goads, 315

Which love has in his bleeding heart-core pight.

He would discredit in a thousand modes

That which he credits in his own despite;

And would perforce persuade himself, that rhind

Other Angelica than his had signed. 320

Here from his horse the sorrowing County lit,

And at the entrance of the grot surveyed

A cloud of words, which seemed but newly-writ,

And which the young Medoro's hand had
made.

On the great pleasure he had known in it, 325

This sentence he in verses had arrayed;

Which in his tongue, I deem, might make pretence

To polished phrase; and such in ours the sense.

"Gay plants, green herbage, rill of limpid
vein,

And, grateful with cool shade, thou gloomy
cave, 330

Where oft, by many wooed with fruitless
pain,

Beauteous Angelica, the child of grave

King Galaphron, within my arms has lain;

For the convenient harborage you gave,

I, poor Medoro, can but in my lays, 335

As recompense, forever sing your praise.

"And any loving lord devoutly pray,

Damsel and cavalier, and every one,

Whom choice or fortune hither shall convey,

Stranger or native;—to this crystal run, 340

Shade, caverned rock, and grass and plants,
to say

Benignant be to you the fostering sun

And moon, and may the choir of nymphs
provide,
That never swain his flock may hither
guide!"

Orlando lost all feeling; so a prey 345
Wholly was he to that o'ermastering woe.
This is a pang, believe the experienced say
Of him who speaks, which does all griefs outgo.

His pride had from his forehead passed away,
His chin had fallen upon his breast below;
Nor found he, so grief barred each natural
vent, 351
Moisture for tears, or utterance for lament.

Still with vain hope he wrought himself to cheat,
And manned some deal his spirits and awoke;

Then pressed the faithful Briigliadoro's seat,
As on the sun's retreat his sister broke. 356
Nor far the warrior had pursued his beat,
Ere eddying from a roof he saw the smoke;
Heard noise of dog and kine, a farm espied,
And thitherward in quest of lodging hied. 360

Languid, he lit, and left his Briigliador
To a discreet attendant, one undrest
His limbs, one doffed the golden spurs he wore,

And one bore off, to clean, his iron vest.
This was the homestead where the young Medore 365
Lay wounded, and was here supremely
blest.

Orlando here, with other food unfed,
Having supped full of sorrow, sought his bed.

Little availed the Count his self-deceit;
For there was one who spake of it unsought; 370
The shepherd-swain, who to allay the heat,
With which he saw his guest so troubled,
thought

The tale which he was wonted to repeat —Of the two lovers, to each listener
taught,

A history which many loved to hear— 375
He now, without reserve, 'gan tell the peer.

Now to the Count such delay hatred breed
That bed, that house, that swain, he will not stay

Till the morn break, or till the dawn succeed,

Whose twilight goes before approaching
day. 380

In haste, Orlando takes his arms and steed,
And to the deepest greenwood wends his
way.

And when assured that he is there alone,
Gives utterance to his grief in shriek and groan.

Never from tears, never from sorrowing, 385
He paused: nor found he peace by night or
day:

He fled from town, in forest harboring.
And in the open air on hard earth lay.
He marveled at himself, how such a spring 389

Of water from his eyes could stream away,
And breath was for so many sobs supplied;
And thus oft-times, amid his mourning, cried:

"I am not—am not what I seem to sight:
What Roland was is dead and under
ground,

Slain by that most ungrateful lady's spite, 395
Whose faithlessness inflicted such a wound.
Divided from the flesh, I am his sprite,
Which in this hell, tormented, walks its
round,

To be, but in its shadow left above,
A warning to all such as trust in love." 400

All night about the forest roved the Count,
And, at the break of daily light, was
brought

By his unhappy fortune to the fount,
Where his inscription young Medora
wrought. 404

To see his wrongs inscribed upon that mount,
Inflamed his fury so, in him was nought
But turned to hatred, frenzy, rage, and spite;
Nor paused he more, but bared his falchion
bright;

Cleft through the writing; and the solid block,

Into the sky, in tiny fragments sped. 410
Wo worth each sapling and that caverned
rock,

Where Medore and Angelica were read!
So scathed that they to shepherd or to flock Thenceforth shall never furnish shade or bed.

And that sweet fountain, late so clear and pure, 415
From such tempestuous wrath was ill secure.

For he turf, stone, and trunk, and shoot, and lop

Cast without cease into the beauteous source.

Till, turbid from the bottom to the top, 419
Never again was clear the troubled course.

At length, for lack of breath, compelled to stop,

(When he is bathed in sweat, and wasted
force

Serves not his fury more) he falls, and lies

Upon the mead, and, gazing upward, sighs.

Wearied and woe-begone, he fell to ground,
And turned his eyes toward heaven; nor spake he aught, 426

Nor ate, nor slept, till in his daily round
The golden sun had broken thrice, and sought

His rest anew; nor ever ceased his wound 429

To rankle, till it marred his sober thought,
At length, impelled by frenzy, the fourth day
He from his limbs tore plate and mail away.

So fierce with rage, so fierce his fury grew,
That all obscured remained to the warrior's sprite;

Nor, for forgetfulness, his sword he drew, 435
Or wondrous deeds, I trow, had wrought
the knight;

But neither this, nor bill, nor axe to hew,
Was needed by Orlando's peerless might.
He of his prowess gave high proofs and full,
Who a tall pine uprooted at a pull. 440

He many others, with as little let
As fennel, walwort-stem, or dill, up tore;
And ilex knotted oak, and fir upset,
And beech, and mountain ash, and elm-tree hoar.

He did what fowler ere he spreads his net, 445
Do to, to prepare the campaign for his lore,

By stubble, rush, and nettle-stalk; and broke
Like these old sturdy trees and stems of oak.

Viewing the madman's wondrous feats more
near,

The frighted band of rustics turned and fled; 450

But they, in their disorder, knew not where,
As happens oftentimes in sudden dread.

The madman in a thought is in their rear,
Seizes a shepherd, and plucks off his head!
And this as easily as one might take 455
Apple from tree, or blossom from the brake.

He by one leg the heavy trunk in air Upheaved, and made a mace the rest to bray.

Astounded, upon earth he stretched one pair,
Who haply may awake at the last day. 460

The rest, who well advised and nimble are,
At once desert the field and scour away:

Nor had the madman their pursuit deferred.
Had he not turned already on their herd.

By such examples warned, the rustic crew Abandoned in the fields pick, scythe, and plough, 466

And to the roof of house and temple flew,
For ill secure was elm or willow's bough.

From hence the maniac's horrid rage they
view;

Who dealing kick, and bite, and scratch,
and blow, 470

Horses and oxen slew, his helpless prey;
And well the courser ran that 'scaped that
day.

Already might'st thou hear how loudly ring
The hubbub and the din from neighboring farms,

Outcry and horn, and rustic trumpeting; 475
And faster sound of bells; with various
arms,

By thousands, with spontoon, bow, spit and
sling,

Lo! from the hills the rough militia swarms.

As many peasants from the vale below,
To make rude war upon the madman go. 480

Twice he ten peasants slaughtered in his mood

Who, charging him in disarray, were slain;
And this experiment right clearly showed

To stand aloof was safest for the train.
Was none who from his body could draw
blood; 485

For iron smote the impassive skin in vain.
So had the heaven's King preserved the Count from scathe,

To make him guardian of his holy faith.

He would have been in peril on that day,
 Had he been made of vulnerable mould;⁴⁹⁰
 And might have learned what 'twas to cast
 away

His sword, and, weaponless, so play the bold.

The rustic troop retreated from the fray,
 Seeing no stroke upon the madman told.

Since him no other enemy attends,⁴⁹⁵
 Orlando to a neighboring township wends.

Since every one had left the place for dread,
 No wight he found within it, small or great.
 But here, was homely food in plenty spread, Victual, well sorting with the pastoral state.⁵⁰⁰

Here, acorns undistinguishing from bread,
 By tedious fast and fury driven to state
 His hunger, he employed his hand and jaw
 On what he first discovered, cooked or raw.

Thence, repossessed with the desire to rove,
 He, through the land, did man and beast pursue;⁵⁰⁶

And scouring, in his frenzy, wood and grove,
 Took sometimes goat or doe of dappled hue Often with bear and with wild boar he strove,

And with his naked hand the brutes o'er-threw;⁵¹⁰

And gorging oftentimes the savage fare,
 Swallowed the prey with all its skin and hair.

TASSO (1544-1595)

JERUSALEM DELIVERED¹

THE CRUSADERS REACH JERUSALEM

THE purple morning left her crimson bed,
 And don'd her robe of pure vermilion hue;
 Her amber locks she crown'd with roses red,
 In Eden's flowery gardens gathered new;
 When through the camp a murmur shrill was spread;⁵

Arm, arm, they cried; arm, arm, the trumpets blew;

Their merry noise prevents the joyful blast,
 So hum small bees, before their swarms
 they cast.

Their captain rules their courage, guides
 their heat,

Their forwardness he stay'd with gentle rein;¹⁰

And yet more easy, haply, were the feat,
 To stop the current near Charybdis'
 main,

Or calm the blust'ring winds on mountains great,

Than fierce desires of warlike hearts restrain;

He rules them yet, and ranks them in their haste,¹⁵

For well he knows disord'ed speed makes waste.

Feath'ed their thought, their feet in wings were dight,

Swiftly they march'd yet were not tir'd thereby,

For willing minds make heaviest burdens
 light;

But when the gliding sun was mounted high,²⁰

Jerusalem, behold, appear'd in sight,

Jerusalem they view, they see, they spy;
 Jerusalem with merry noise they greet,
 With joyful shouts, and acclamations sweet.

As when a troop of jolly sailors row,²⁵
 Some new found land and country to descry;

Through dang'rous seas and under stars un-
 know,

Thrall to the faithless waves, and trothless
 sky;

If once the wished shore begin to show,

They all salute it with a joyful cry,³⁰
 And each to other show the land in haste, Forgetting quite their pains and perils
 past.

To that delight which their first sight did
 breed,

That pleased so the secret of their thought,
 A deep repentance did forthwith succeed,³⁵
 That rev'rend fear and trembling with it
 brought.

¹Translation by Fairfax.

Scantly they durst their feeble eyes dispread Upon that town, where Christ was sold and bought,

Where for our sins he, faultless, suff' red pain,
There where he died, and where he liv'd
again. 40

Soft words, low speech, deep sobs, sweet sighs, salt tears,

Rose from their breasts, with joy and pleasure mixt;

For thus fares he the Lord aright that fears,
Fear on devotion, joy on faith is fixt:

Such noise their passions make, as when one hears 45

The hoarse sea-waves roar hollow rocks
betwixt;

Or as the wind in hoults and shady greaves
A murmur makes, among the boughs and leaves.

Their naked feet trod on the dusty way,
Following th' ensample of their zealous
guide; 50

Their scars, their crests, their plumes, and feathers gay,

They quickly doft, and willing laid aside;
Their molten hearts their wonted pride alay,
Along their watery cheeks warm tears
down slide,

And then such secret speech as this, they us'd, 55

While to himself, each one himself accused:

Flowers of goodness, root of lasting bliss,
Thou well of life, whose streams were purple blood

That flowed here, to cleanse the foul amiss

Of sinful man, behold this brinish flood, 60

That from my melting heart distilled is;

Receive in gree these tears, O lord so good,

For never wretch with sin so overgone,
Had fitter time, or greater cause to moan.

This while the wary watchman looked over,
From tops of Sion's towers, the hills and dales, 66

And saw the dust the fields and pastures
cover,

As when thick mists arise from moory
vales:

At last the sun-bright shields he 'gan discover,

And glist'ring helms, for violence none that fails, 70

The metal shone like lightning bright in skies,

And man and horse amid the dust descries.

Then loud he cries, Oh, what a dust ariseth!
Oh, how it shines with shields and targets clear!

Up, up, to arms, for valiant heart despiseth
The threat'nd storm of death, and danger
near; 76

Behold your foes: then further thus de-viseth;

Haste, haste, for vain delay increaseth
fear,

These horrid clouds of dust, that yonder fly,
Your coming foes do hide, and hide the sky.

The tender children, and the fathers old, 81

The aged matrons, and the virgin chaste,
That durst not shake the spear, nor target
hold,

Themselves devoutly in their temples
plac'd;

The rest, of members strong and courage
bold, 85

On hardy breasts their harness don'd in haste,

Some to the walls, some to the gates them
dight;

Their king meanwhile directs them all aright.

ARMIDA, THE SORCERESS

The town Damascus and the lands about

Rul'd Hidraort, a wizard grave and sage,

Acquainted well with all the damned rout

Of Pluto's reign, ev'n from his tender age;

Yet of this war he could not figure out 5

The wished ending, or success presage;

For neither stars above, nor powers of hell,

Nor skill, nor art, nor charm, nor devil could tell.

And yet he thought, O vain conceit of man!

Which as thou wishest judgest things to
come, 10

That the French host to sure destruction
ran,

Condemned quite by heav'n's eternal
doom:

He thinks no force withstand or vanquish
can

Th' Egyptian strength, and therefore would that some

Both of the prey and glory of the fight, 15
Upon his Syrian folk should haply light.

But for he held the Frenchmen's worth in
prise,
And fear'd the doubtful gain of bloody
war

He, that was closely false and silly wise, Cast how he might annoy them most from far: 20

And as he 'gan upon this point devise (As counsellors in ill still nearest are),
At hand was Satan, ready ere men need,
If once they think to make them do the
deed.

He counsel'd him how best to hunt his game,
What dart to cast, what net, what toil to pitch: 26

A niece he had, a nice and tender dame,
Peerless in wit, in nature's blessings rich,
To all deceit she could her beauty frame,
False, fair, and young, a virgin and a witch; 30

To her he told the sum of this emprise,
And prais'd her thus, for she was fair and
wise:

My dear, who underneath these locks of gold,
And native brightness of thy lovely hue,
Hidest grave thoughts, ripe wit, and wisdom
old, 35

More skill than I, in all mine arts untrue,
To thee my purpose great I must unfold,
This enterprise thy cunning must pursue,
Weave thou to end this web which I begin,
I will the distaff hold, come thou and spin. 40

Go to the Christians' host, and there assay
All subtle sleights that women use in love, Shed brinish tears, sob, sigh, entreat, and
pray,

Wring thy fair hands, cast up thine eyes
above,
For mourning beauty hath much power, men
say, 45

The stubborn hearts with pity frail to
move;

Look pale for dread, and blush sometime for
shame,

In seeming troth thy lies will soonest frame.

Take with the bait Lord Godfrey, if thou may'st,

Frame snares of looks, trains of alluring
speech; 50

For if he love, the conquest then thou hast:
Thus purpos'd war thou may'st with ease
impeach;

Else lead the other lords to deserts waste,
And hold them slaves far from their leader's reach. 54

This taught he her, and for conclusion saith,
All things are lawful for our lands and faith.

The sweet Armida took this charge on hand,
A tender piece, for beauty, sex and age,
The sun was sunken underneath the land
When she began her wanton pilgrimage; 60
In silken weeds she trusteth to withstand,
And conquer knights in warlike equipage.
Of their night-ambling dame the Syrians prated,

Some good, some bad, as they her lov'd or hated.

Within few days the nymph arrived there, 65
Where puissant Godfrey had his tents
upight;

Upon her strange attire, and visage clear,
Gazed each soldier, gazed every knight:
As when a comet doth in skies appear,
The people stand amazed at the light, 70
So wonder'd they, and each at other sought,
What mister wight she was, and whence ybrought.

Yet never eye to Cupid's service vow'd
Beheld a face of such a lovely pride;
A tinsel veil her amber locks did shroud, 75
That strove to cover what it could not hide;

The golden sun, behind a silver cloud,
So streameth out his beams on every side;
The marble goddess, set at Guido's, naked,
She seem'd, were she uncloth'd, or that awaked. 80

The gamesome wind among her tresses plays,
And curlth up those glowing riches short;
Her spareful eye to spread his beams denays,
But keeps his shot where Cupid keeps his fort;

The rose and lily on her cheek assays 85
To paint true fairness out in bravest sort;
Her lips, where blooms naught but the single
rose,
Still blush, for still they kiss while still they close.

Her breasts, two hills o'erspread with purest
snow,
Sweet, smooth and supple, soft and gently
swelling, 90
Between them lies a milken dale below,
Where love, youth, gladness, whiteness make their dwelling;
Her breasts half hid, and half were laid to
show;
Her envious vesture greedy sight repell-
ing:
So was the wanton clad, as if thus much 95
Should please the eye, the rest unseen the touch.
As when the sunbeams dive through Tagus'
wave,
To spy the storehouse of his springing gold,
Love-piercing thought so through her mantle
drave, 99
And in her gentle bosom wander'd bold:
It view'd the wondrous beauty virgins have,
And all to fond desire with vantage told:
Alas! what hope is left to quench the fire,
That kindled is by sight, blown by desire.
Thus past she, praised, wish'd, and wond' red at, 105
Among the troops who were encamped lay,
She smiled for joy, but well dissembled that
Her greedy eye chose out her wished prey;
On all her gestures seeming virtue sat, Towards th' imperial tent she ask'd the
way: 110
With that she met a bold and lovesome
knight,
Lord Godfrey's youngest brother, Eustace
hight.
This was the fowl that first fell in the snare,
He saw her fair, and hop'd to find her kind;
The throne of Cupid hath an easy stair, 115
His bark is fit to sail with every wind,
The breach he makes no wisdom can repair.
With rev'rence meet the baron low in-clin'd,
And thus his purpose to the virgin told,
For youth, use, nature, all had made him
bold: 120
Lady, if thee beseem a stile so low,
In whose sweet looks such sacred beauties
shine,
For never yet did heav'n such grace bestow
On any daughter born of Adam's line,

Thy name let us, though far unworthy,
know, 125
Unfold thy will, and whence thou art in fine,
Lest my audacious boldness learn too late,
What honors due become thy high estate.
Sir knight, quoth she, your praises reach too
high
Above her merit you commend so, 130
A hapless maid I am, both born to die,
And dead to joy, that live in care and wo,
A virgin helpless, fugitive pardie,
My native soil and kingdom thus forego.
To seek Duke Godfrey's aid, such store men
tell 135
Of virtuous ruth doth in his bosom dwell.
Conduct me then that mighty Duke before,
If you be courteous, sir, as well you seem,— Content, quoth he; since of one womb
ybore,
We brothers are, your fortune good esteem
T' encounter me, whose word prevaieth
more 141
In Godfrey's hearing than you haply deem,
Mine aid I grant, and his I promise too,
All that his sceptre, or my sword, can do.
He led her eas'ly forth when this was said,
Where Godfrey sat among his lords and
peers; 146
She rev'rence did, then hush'd as one dis-may'd
To speak, for secret wants and inward
fears;
It seem'd a bashful shame her speeches
stay'd.
At last the courteous Duke her gently
cheers; 150
Silence was made, and she began her tale.
They sit to hear, thus sung the nightingale:
Victorious prince, whose honorable name
Is held so great among our pagan kings,
That to those lands thou dost by conquest tame, 155
That thou hast won them some content it brings;
Well known to all is thy immortal fame.
The earth thy worth, thy foe thy praises
sings,

And painims wronged come to seek thine aid,
So doth thy virtue, so thy power persuade.

This said, his answer did the nymph attend;
Her looks, her sighs, her gestures all did pray him; 162

But Godfrey wisely did his grant suspend,
He doubts the worst, and that awhile did stay him;

He knows, who fears no God, he loves no
friend, 165

He fears the heathen false would thus betray him:

But yet such ruth dwelt in his princely mind,
That, 'gainst his wisdom, pity made him
kind.

Besides the kindness of his gentle thought,
Ready to comfort each distressed
wight, 170

The maiden's offer profit with it brought;
For if the Syrian kingdom were her right,
That won, the way were easy which he
sought,

To bring all Asia subject to his might;
There might be raised munition, arms, and treasures, 175
To work th' Egyptian king and his displeasure.

Thus was his noble heart long time betwixt Fear and remorse, not granting nor deny-
ing,

Upon his eyes the dame her lookings fix'd,
As if her life and death lay on his saying;
Some tears she shed, with sighs and sobbings
mix'd, 181

As if her hope were dead through his delaying.

At last her earnest suit the Duke deny'd,
But with sweet words thus would content the
maid:

If not in service of our God we fought, 185
In meaner quarrel if this sword were shaken,

Well might thou gather in thy gentle
thought,

So fair a Princess should not be forsaken;
But since these armies, from the world's end
brought, 189

To free this sacred town have undertaken,
It were unfit we turned our strength away,
And victory, even in her coming, stay.

I promise thee, and on my princely word
The burden of thy wish and hope repose, 194

That when this chosen temple of the Lord
Her holy doors shall to his saints unclose
In rest and peace, then this victorious sword

Shall execute due vengeance on thy foes:
But if, for pity of a worldly dame, 199
I left his work, such pity were my shame.—

THE CRUSADERS GO IN PROCESSION TO MASS

Next morn the bishops twain, the heremite,
And all the clerks and priests of less estate,

Did in the midst of the camp unite
Within a place for prayer consecrate: 4
Each priest adorned was in a surplice white,
The bishops donned their albes and copes
of state;

Above their rochets buttoned fair before,
And mitres on their heads like crowns they wore.

Peter alone, before, spread to the wind
The glorious sign of our salvation great: 10
With easy pace the choir came all behind,
And hymns and psalms in order true repeat;

With sweet response in harmonious kind,
Their humble song the yielding air doth beat.

Lastly together went the reverend pair 15
Of prelates sage, William and Ademare.

The mighty duke came next, as princes do,
Without companion, marching all alone;
The lords and captains came by two and
two;

The soldiers for their guard were armed each one. 20

With easy pace thus ordered, passing through The trench and rampire, to the fields they
gone;

No thundering drum, no trumpet shrill they hear,—

Their godly music psalms and prayers were.

To thee, O father, Son, and sacred Spright, 25
One true, eternal, everlasting King,
To Christ's dear mother Mary, virgin bright, Psalms of thanksgiving and of praise they sing;

To them that angels down from heaven, to fight
'Gainst the blasphemous beast and dragon,
bring; 30
To him also that of our Savior good
Washed the sacred front in Jordan's flood;
Him likewise they invoke, called the rock Whereon the Lord, they say, his Church did rear,
Whose true successors close or else unlock 35
The blessed gates of grace and mercy dear;
And all th' elected twelve, the chosen flock,
Of his triumphant death who witness bear;
And them by torment, slaughter, fire and
sword,
Who martyrs died to confirm his word; 40
And them also whose books and writings tell What certain path to heavenly bliss us leads;
And hermits good and anch'resses, that
dwell
Mewed up in walls and mumble on their beads;
And virgin nuns in close and private cell, 45

Where (but shrift fathers) never mankind treads:
On these they called, and on all the rout
Of angels, martyrs, and of saints devout.
Singing and saying thus, the camp devout Spread forth her zealous squadrons broad and wise; 50
Towards Mount Olivet went all this rout,—
So called of olive-trees the hill which hide;
A mountain known by fame the world
throughout,
Which riseth on the city's eastern side,
From it divided by the valley green 55
Of Iosaphat, that fills the space between.

Hither the armies went, and chaunted shrill,
That all the deep and hollow dales resound;
From hollow mounts and caves in every hill
A thousand echoes also sung around: 60
It seemed some choir that sung with art and skill
Dwelt in those savage dens and shady
ground,
For oft resounded from the banks they hear
The name of Christ and of his mother dear.

CANTO IV

*To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa guides the faithfull knight,
Where brothers death to wreak Sansjoy doth challenge him to fight.*

I

YOUNG knight, what ever that dost armes
professe,
And through long labours huntest after
fame,
Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
In choice, and change of thy deare lovéd
Dame,
Least thou of her beleeve too lightly blame, 5
And rash misweening doe thy hart remove:
For unto knight there is no greater shame,
Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample plainly prove.

II

Who after that he had faire Una lorne, 10
Through light misdeeming of her loialtie,
And false Duessa in her sted had borne,
Calléd Fidess', and so supposed to bee;
Long with her traveild, till at last they see
A goodly building, bravely garnishéd, 15
The house of mightie Prince it seemed to bee:
And towards it a broad high way that led,
All bare through peoples feet, which thither traveiléd.

III

Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
Both day and night, of each degree and place,
But few returnéd, having scapéd hard, 21
With balefull beggerie, or foule disgrace,
Which ever after in most wretched case,
Like loathsome lazars, by the hedges lay.
Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace: 25
For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
And also nigh consuméd is the lingring day.

IV

A stately Pallace built of squaréd bricke,
Which cunningly was without mortar laid,
Whose wals were high, but nothing strong,
nor thick, 30
And golden foile all over them dislaid,
That purest skye with brightnesse they dis-
maid:
High lifted up were many loftie towres,
And goodly galleries farre over laid,
Full of faire windowes, and delightfull
bowres; 35
And on the top a Diall told the timely howres.

V

It was a goodly heape for to behould,
And spake the praises of the workmans wit;
But full great pittie, that so faire a mould
Did on so weake foundation ever sit: 40
For on a sandie hill, that still did flit,
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shakéd it:
And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

VI

Arrivéd there they passéd in forth right; 46
For still to all the gates stood open wide,
Yet charge of them was to a Porter hight
Cald Malveni, who entrance none denide:
Thence to the hall, which was on every side
With rich array and costly arras dight: 51
Infinite sorts of people did abide
There waiting long, to win the wishéd sight
Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

VII

By them they passe, all gazing on them
round, 55
And to the Presence mount; whose glorious
vew
Their frayle amazéd senses did confound:
In living Princes court none ever knew Such endlesse riches; and so sumptuous shew;
Ne Persia selfe, the nourse of pompous pride
Like ever saw. And there a noble crew 61
Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side,
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

VIII

High above all a cloth of State was spred,
And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day, 65
On which there sate most brave embellishéd
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene, that shone as Titans ray,
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious
stone:
Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay 70
To dim the brightnesse of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

IX

Exceeding shone, like Phæbus fairest childe,
That did presume his fathers fire wayne,
And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted
wilde 75
Through highest heaven with weaker hand
to rayne;
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble
eyen,
He leaves the welkin way most beaten plaine,
And rapt with whirling wheelles, inflames the skyen, 80
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.

X

So proud she shynéd in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven, for earth she did dis-
dayne;
And sitting high, for lowly she did hate:
Lo underneath her scornfull feete was layne 85
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,
And in her hand she held a mirrhour bright,
Wherein her face she often vewéd fayne,
And in her selfe-lov'd semblance tooke de-
light;
For she was wondrous faire, as any living
wight. 90

XI

Of griesly Pluto she the daughter was,
And sad Proserpina the Queene of hell;
Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,
And thundring Jove, that high in heaven doth
dwell, 95

And wield the world, she clayméd for her syre,
Or if that any else did Jove excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought higher were then that, did it desyre.

XII

And proud Lucifera men did her call, 100
That made her selfe a Queene, and crowned to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at 'all,
Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie 104
Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,
And strong advizement of six wizards old,
That with their counsels bad her kingdome did uphold.

XIII

Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
And false Duessa seeming Lady faire, 110
A gentle Husher, Vanitie by name Made rowme, and passage for them did prepaire:

So goodly brought them to the lowest staire
Of her high throne, where they on humble knee 114

Making obeysaunce, did the cause declare,
Why they were come, her royall state to see,
To prove the wide report of her great Majes-tee. 117

XIV

With loftie eyes, halfe loth to looke so low,
She thankéd them in her disdaine full wise,
Ne other grace vouchsaféd them to show
Of Princesse worthy, scarce them bad arise.
Her Lordes and Ladies all this while devise Themselves to setten forth to straungers
sight:

Some frounce their curléd haire in courtly guise,

Some prancke their ruffes, and others trimly
dight 125

Their gay attire: each others greater pride does spight.

XV

Goodly they all that knight do entertaine, Right glad with him to have increast their
crew:

But to Duess' each one himselfe did paine
All kindnesse and faire courtesie to shew; 130

For in that court whylome her well they knew:

Yet the stout Faerie mongst the middest
crowd

Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly
vew,

And that great Princesse too exceeding prowd,

That to strange knight no better countenance allowd. 135

XVI

Suddein upriseth from her stately place

The royall Dame, and for her coche doth
call:

All hurtlen forth, and she with Princely pace,

As faire Aurora in her purple pall, 139

Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode

doth blaze;

The heapes of people thronging in the hall,
Do ride each other, upon her to gaze:

Her glorious glitterand light doth all mens eyes amaze.

XVII

So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme, 145

Adornéd all with gold, and girlonds gay,

That seemed as fresh as Flora in her prime,

And strove to match, in royall rich array,

Great *Juno*s golden chaire, the which they
say

The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride 150

To Joves high house through heavens braspavéd way

Drawne of faire Pecoeks, that excell in pride,

And full of Argus eyes their tailes dispredden wide.

XVIII

But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,
On which her six sage Counsellours did ryde,

Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts, 156

With like conditions to their kinds applyde:

Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,

Was sluggish Idlenesse the nourse of sin;

Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde, 160

Arayd in habit blacke, and amis thin,

Like to an holy Monck. the service to begin.

XIX

And in his hand his Portesse still he bare,
That much was worne, but therein little red,
For of devotion he had little care, 165
Still drown'd in sleepe, and most of his dayes
ded;

Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
To looken, whether it were night or day:
May seeme the wayne was very evill led,
When such an one had guiding of the way,
That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray. 171

XX

From worldly cares himselfe he did esloyne,
And greatly shunnéd manly exercise,
From every worke he chalengéd essayne,
For contemplation sake: yet otherwise, 175
His life he led in lawlesse riotise;
By which he grew to grievous malady;
For in his lustlesse limbs through evill guise
A shaking fever raignd continually: 179
Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

XXI

And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deforméd creature, on a filthie swyne,
His belly was up-blowne with luxury,
And eke with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,
And like a Crane his necke was long and fyne, 185
With which he swallowd up excessive feast,
For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spuéd up his gorge, that all did him deteast.

XXII

In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
For other clothes he could not weare for heat,
And on his head an yvie girland had, 192
From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:

Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
And in his hand did beare a bouzing can, 195
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His dronken corse he scarce upholden can,
In shape and life more like a monster, then a man.

XXIII

Unfit he was for any worldly thing,
And eke unhable once to stirre or go, 200

Not meet to be of counsell to a king,
Whose mind in meat and drinke was drownéd
so,

That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:

Full of diseases was his carcas blew,
And a dry dropsie through his flesh did flow: 205

Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

XXIV

And next to him rode lustfull Lechery,
Upon a bearded Goat, whose rugged haire,
And whally eyes (the signe of gelosy) 210
Was like the person selfe, whom he did beare:
Who rough, and blacke, and filthy did ap-peare,

Unseemely man to please faire Ladies eye;
Yet he of Ladies oft was lovéd deare,
When fairer faces were bid standen by: 215
O who does know the bent of womens fantasy?

XXV

In a greene gowne he clothéd was full faire,
Which underneath 'did hide his filthinesse,
And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
Full of vaine follies, and new fanglenesse: 220
For he was false, and fraught with fickle-
nesse,

And learnéd had to love with secret lookes,
And well could daunce, and sing with rueful-
nesse,

And fortunes tell, and read in loving bookes,
And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes. 225

XXVI

Inconstant man, that lovéd all he saw,
And lusted after all, that he did love,
Ne would his looser life be tide to law,
But joyd weake wemens hearts to tempt and prove

If from their loyall loves he might them
move; 230

Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine

Of that fowle evill, which all men reprove,
That rots the marrow, and consumes the braine:

Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

XXVII

And greedy Avarice by him did ride, 235
 Upon a Camell loaden all with gold;
 Two iron coffers hong on either side,
 With precious mettall full, as they might
 hold,
 And in his lap an heape of coine he told;
 For of his wicked pelfe his God he made, 240
 And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
 Accurséd usurie was all his trade,
 And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.

XXVIII

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,
 And thred-bare cote, and cobled shoes he ware, 245
 Ne scarce good morsell all his life did tast,
 But both from backe and belly still did spare,
 To fill his bags, and richesse to compare;
 Yet chylde ne kinsman living had he
 none 249
 To leave them to; but thorough daily care
 To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
 He led a wretched life unto him selfe un-knowne.

XXIX

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice,
 Whose greedy lust did lacke in greatest store,
 Whose need had end, but no end covetise, 255
 Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
 Who had enough, yet wishéd ever more;
 A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand
 A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
 That well he could not touch, nor go, nor
 stand: 260
 Such was one Avarice, the fourth of his faire band.

XXX

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
 Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw
 Betweene his cankred teeth a venomous tode,
 That all the poison ran about his chaw; 265
 But inwardly he chawéd his owne maw
 At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
 For death it was, when any good he saw,
 And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
 But when he heard of harme, he wexéd wondrous glad. 270

XXXI

All in a kirtle of disclourd say
 He clothéd was, ypainted full of eyes;
 And in his bosome secretly there lay
 An hatefull Snake, the which his taile uptyes 275
 In many folds, and mortall sting implyes.
 Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
 Those heapes of gold with griple Covetysse,
 And grudgéd at the great felicitie
 Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

XXXII

He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
 And him no lesse, that any like did use, 281
 And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
 His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;
 So every good to bad he doth abuse:
 And eke the verse of famous Poets witt 285
 He does backebite, and spightfull poison
 spues
 From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
 Such one vile Envie was, that fite in row did sitt.

XXXIII

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
 Upon a Lion, loth for to be led; 290
 And in his hand a burning brond he hath,
 The which he brandiseth about his hed;
 His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
 And staréd sterne on all, that him beheld,
 As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded; 295
 And on his dagger still his hand he held, Trembling through hasty rage, when choler in him sweld.

XXXIV

His ruffin raiment all was staine with blood,
 Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,
 Through unadvised rashnesse woxen wood;
 For of his hands he had no government, 301
 Ne'car'd for blood in his avengement:
 But when the furious fit was overpast,
 His cruell facts he often would repent;
 Yet wilfull man he never would forecâst, 305
 How many mischieves should ensue his heed-lesse hast.

XXXV

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath:
 Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strire,
 Unmanly murder, and unthrifty scath,
 Bitter despight, with rancours rusty knife,

And fretting grieve the enemy of life; 311
 All these, and many evils moe haunt ire,
 The swelling Splene, and Frenzy raging rife,
 The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces
 fire:
 Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungodly
 tire. 315

XXXVI

And after all, upon the wagon beame
 Rode Satan, with a smarting whip in hand,
 With which he forward lasht the laesie
 teme,
 So oft as Slowth still in the mire did stand.
 Huge routs of people did about them band,
 Showing for joy, and still before their way
 A foggy mist had covered all the land; 322
 And underneath their feet, all scattered lay Dead sculs and bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

XXXVII

So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,
 To take the solace of the open aire, 326
 And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
 Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
 The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
 Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine: 330
 But that good knight would not so nigh re-
 paire,
 Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce
 vaine,
 Whose fellowship seemed far unfit for warlike swaine.

XXXVIII

So having solacéd themselves a space 334
 With pleasaunce of the breathing fields yfed,
 They backe returnéd to the Princely Place;
 Whereas an errant knight in armes ycléd,
 And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
 Was writ Sans joy, they new arrivéd find:
 Enflam'd with fury and fiers hardy-hed, 340
 He seemed in hart to harbour thoughts un-
 kind,
 And nourish bloody vengeance in his bitter mind.

XXXIX

Who when the shaméd shield of slaine Sans
foy
 He spide with that same Faery champions
 page,

Bewraying him, that did of late destroy 345
 His eldest brother, burning all with rage
 He to him leapt, and that same envious gage
 Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
 But th'Elfin knight, which ought that warlike wage,
 Disdained to loose the meed he wonne in fray,
 And him rencounting fierce, reskewd the noble pray. 351

XL

Therewith they gan to hurtlen greedily,
 Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,
 And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
 That with their sturre they troubled all the
 traine; 355
 Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
 Of high displeasure, that ensewen might,
 Commanded them their fury to refrain,
 And if that either to that shield had right,
 In equall lists they should the morrow next it fight. 360

XLI

Ah dearest Dame (quoth then the Paynim
 bold),
 Pardon the errour of enragéd wight, Whom great grieve made forget the raines to
 hold
 Of reasons rule, to see this recreant knight,
 No knight, but treachour full of false de-
 spight 365
 And shamefull treason, who through guile hath slayn
 The prowtest knight, that ever field did fight, Even stout Sans foy (O who can then re-frayn?)
 Whose shield he beares renverst, the more to heape disdayn.

XLII

And to augment the glorie of his guile, 370
 His dearest love the faire Fidessa loe
 Is there possesséd of the traytour vile,
 Who reapes the harvest sown by his foe,
 Sown in bloody field, and bought with woe:
 That brothers hand shall dearly well requight 375
 So be, O Queene, you equall favour shoue.
 Him litle answerd th'angry Elfin knight;
 He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

XLIII

But threw his gauntlet as a sacred pledge,
 His cause in combat the next day to try: 380
 So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
 To be aveng'd each on his enemy.
 That night they pas in joy and jollity, Feasting and courting both in bowre and
 hall;
 For Steward was excessive Gluttonie, 385
 That of his plenty poured forth to all;
 Which doen, the Chamberlain Slowth did to rest them call.

XLIV

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
 Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,
 The warlike youthes on dayntie couches
 layd, 390
 Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish
 eye,
 To muse on meanes of hopéd victory.
 But whenas Morpheus had with leaden mace
 Arrested all that courtly company,
 Up-rose Duessa from her resting place, 395
 And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

XLV

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,
 Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,
 And him amoves with speaches seeming
 fit:
 Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans
 foy, 400
 Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
 Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
 And greev'd, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
 That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
 Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye. 405

XLVI

With gentle wordes he can her fairly greet,
 And bad say on the secret of her hart.
 Then sighing soft, I learne that litle sweet Oft tempred is (quoth she) with muchell smart:
 For since my brest was launcht with lovely
 dart 410
 Of deare Sansfoy, I never joyéd howre,
 But in eternall woes my weaker hart

Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
 And for his sake have felt full many an heavie stowre.

XLVII

At last when perils all I weened past, 415
 And hop'd to reape the crop of all my care,
 Into new woes unweeting I was cast,
 By this false faytor, who unworthy ware
 His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
 Entrappéd slew, and brought to shamefull
 grave. 420
 Me silly maid away with him he bare,
 And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
 For that I would not yeeld, that to Sans-foy
 I gave.

XLVIII

But since faire Sunne hath sperst that low-ring clowd,
 And to my loathéd life now shewes some
 light, 425
 Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,
 From dreaded storme of his disdainfull
 spight:
 To you th'inheritance belongs by right
 Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs his love.
 Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright
 Be unreveng'd, that calles to you above 431
 From wandering Stygian shores, where it doth endlesse move.

XLIX

Thereto said he, faire Dame be nought dis-
 maid
 For sorrowes past; their griefe is with them
 gone:
 Ne yet of present perill be affraid; 435
 For needlesse feare did never vantage none,
 And helpelesse hap it booteth not to mone,
 Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall paines are past, Though greevéd ghost for vengeance deepe
 do grone:
 He lives, that shall him pay his dewties last, 439
 And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast.

L

O but I feare the fickle freakes (quoth shee)
 Of fortune false, and oddes of armes in field.
 Why dame (quoth he) what oddes can ever
 bee,

Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?
 Yea but (quoth she) he beares a charmed
 shield,
 And eke enchanted armes, that none can perce,
 Ne none can wound the man, that does them
 wield.
 Charmd or enchanted (answerd he then ferce)
 I no whit reck, ne you the like need to re-herce. 450

LI

But faire Fidessa, sithens fortunes guile,
 Or enimies powre hath now captivèd you,
 Returne from whence ye came, and rest a
 while 453
 Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
 And with Sans-foyes dead dowry you endew.
 Ay me, that is a double death (she said)
 With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
 Where ever yet I be, my secret aid Shall follow you, So passing forth she him obaid.

TWO CANTOS OF MUTABILITY

CANTO VI

*Proud Change (not pleased in mortal things Beneath the moon to reign)
 Pretends, as well of gods as men,
 To be the sovereign.*

I

WHAT man that sees the ever-whirling wheel
 Of Change, the which all mortal things doth sway,
 But that thereby doth find, and plainly feel,
 How Mutability in them doth play
 Her cruel sports to many men's decay? 5
 Which that to all may better yet appear,
 I will rehearse, that whylome I heard say,
 How she at first herself began to rear
 Gainst all the gods, and th' empire sought from them to bear.

II

But first, here falleth fittest to unfold 10
 Her antique race and lineage ancient,
 As I have found it regist'ed of old
 In Faery land mongst records permanent.
 She was, to weet, a daughter by descent 14
 Of those old Titans that did whylome strive
 With Saturn's son for heaven's regiment;

Whom though high Jove of kingdom did deprive,
 Yet many of their stem long after did survive:

III

And many of them afterwards obtain'd
 Great power of Jove, and high authority: 20
 As Hecatè, in whose almighty hand
 He placed all rule and principality,
 To be by her disposèd diversely
 To gods and men, as she them list divide;
 And dread Bellona, that doth sound on high Wars and alarums unto nations wide, 26
 That makes both heaven and earth to tremble at her pride.

IV

So likewise did this Titaness aspire
 Rule and dominion to herself to gain;
 That as a goddess men might her admire, 30
 And heavenly honours yield, as to them
 twain,
 And first, on earth she sought it to obtain:
 Where she such proof and sad examples
 shew'd
 Of her great power, to many one's great
 pain,
 That not men only (whom she soon subdued) 35
 But eke all other creatures her bad doings
 rued.

V

For she the face of earthly things so changed,
 That all which Nature had establish'd first,
 In good estate, and in meet order ranged, 39
 She did pervert, and all their statutes burst:
 And all the world's fair frame (which none
 yet durst
 Of gods or men to alter or misguide)
 She alter'd quite; and made them all accurst
 That God had blest, and did at first provide
 In that still happy state for ever to abide. 45

VI

Ne she the laws of nature only brake,
 But eke of justice, and of policy:
 And wrong of right, and bad of good did
 make,
 And death for life exchanged foolishly:
 Since which, all living wights have learn'd to die. 50
 And all this world is waxen daily worse.
 O piteous work of Mutability,

By which we all are subject to that curse,
And Death instead of Life, have suckèd from our nurse!

VII

And now, when all the earth she thus had
brought 55

To her behest and thrallèd to her might,
She gan to cast in her ambitious thought
T' attempt the empire of the heavens' height,
And Jove himself to shoulder from his right.
And first, she pass'd the region of the air 60
And of the fire, whose substance thin and slight

Made no resistance, ne could her contraire,
But ready to her pleasure did prepare.

VIII

Thence to the circle of the moon she clamb,
Where Cynthia reigns in everlasting glory,
To whose bright shining palace straight she
came, 66

All fairly deck'd with heaven's goodly story; Whose silver gates (by which there satè an hoary

Old agèd sire, with hour-glass in hand, Hight Time,) she enter'd, were he lief or sorry; 70

Ne stay'd till she the highest stage had scann'd

Where Cynthia did sit, that never still did stand.

IX

Her sitting on an ivory throne she found,
Drawn of two steeds, th' one black, the other white,

Environ'd with ten thousand stars around,
That duly her attended day and night; 76
And by her side there ran a page, that hight
Vesper, whom we the evening-star intend;
That with his torch, still twinkling like twilight,

Her lighten'd all the way where she would wend, 80

And joy to weary wand'ring travellers did lend.

X

That when the hardy Titaness beheld
The goodly building of her palace bright,
Made of the heavens' substance, and upheld,
With thousand crystal pillars of huge height;

She gan to burn in her ambitious spright 86
And t' envy her that in such glory reign'd.
Eftsoones she cast by force and tortious
might.

Her to displace, and to herself t' have gain'd
The kingdom of the Night, and waters by her waned. 90

XI

Boldly she bid the goddess down descend,
And let herself into that ivory throne;
For she herself more worthy thereof ween'd,
And better able it to guide alone; 94
Whether to men whose fall she did bemoan,
Or unto gods whose state she did malign,
Or to th' infernal pow'rs her need give loan
Of her fair light and bounty most benign, Herself of all that rule she deemèd most condign. 99

XII

But she that had to her that sovereign seat
By highest Jove assign'd, therein to bear Night's burning lamp, regarded not her
threat,

Ne yielded ought for favour or for fear:
But, with stern countenance and disdainful
cheer 104

Bending her hornèd brows, she put her back;
And, boldly blaming her for coming there,
Bade her at once from heaven's coast to pack,
Or at her peril bide the wrathful thunder's wrack.

XIII

Yet nathèmore the giantess forbare;
But boldly pressing on, raught forth her
hand 110

To pluck her down perforce from off her chair;

And, therewith lifting up her golden wand,
Threaten'd to strike her if she did withstand:
Whereat the stars, which round about her blazed,

And eke the moon's bright waggon still did
stand, 115

All being with so bold attempt amazed,
And on her uncouth habit and stern look still gazed.

XIV

Meanwhile the lower world, which nothing
knew
Of all that chancèd here, was dark'ned quite;
And eke the heavens, and all the heavenly
crew 120

Of happy wights, now unpurvey'd of light,
 Were much afraid and wond' red at that
 sight;
 Fearing lest Chaos broken had his chain,
 And brought again on them eternal night;
 But chiefly Mercury, that next doth reign, Ran forth in haste unto the king of gods to plain. 126

XV

All ran together with a great outcry
 To Jove's fair palace fix'd in heaven's height;
 And, beating at his gates full earnestly,
 Gan call to him aloud with all their might,
 To know what meant that sudden lack of
 light. 131
 The Father of the gods, when this he heard,
 Was troubled much at their so strange
 affright,
 Doubting lest Typhon were again uprear'd,
 Or other his old foes that once him sorely fear'd. 135

XVI

Eftsoones the son of Maia forth he sent Down to the circle of the moon to know
 The cause of this so strange astonishment,
 And why she did her wonted course fore-
 slow;
 And, if that any were on earth below 140
 That did with charms or magic her molest,
 Him to attach, and down to hell to throw;
 But if from heaven it were, then to arrest
 The author, and him bring before his presence prest. 145

XVII

The wing'd foot god so fast his plumes did
 beat, 145
 That soon he came whereas the Titaness
 Was striving with fair Cynthia for her seat;
 At whose strange sight and haughty hardiness
 He wond' red much, and fear'd her no less:
 Yet, laying fear aside to do his charge, 150
 At last he bade her, with bold steadfastness,
 Cease to molest the moon to walk at large,
 Or come before high Jove her doings to discharge.

XVIII

And therewithal he on her shoulder laid His snaky-wreath'd mace, whose awful pow'r 155
 Doth make both gods and hellish fiends afraid.

Whereat the Titaness did sternly lour,
 And stoutly answered; That in evil hour
 He from his Jove such message to her
 brought, 159
 To bid her leave fair Cynthia's silver bower;
 Sith she his Jove and him esteem'd nought,
 No more than Cynthia's self; but all their kingdoms sought.

XIX

The heaven's Herald stay'd not to reply,
 But pass'd away, his doings to relate 164
 Unto his lord; who now, in th' highest sky,
 Was plac'd in his principal estate,
 With all the gods about him congregate:
 To whom when Hermes had his message told,
 It did them all exceedingly amate,
 Save Jove; who changing nought his count'-
 nance bold, 170
 Did unto them at length these speeches wise unfold.

XX

"Hearken to me awhile, ye heavenly pow'rs:
 Ye may remember since th' earth's cursed seed
 Sought to assail the heavens' eternal tow'rs,
 And to us all exceeding fear did breed: 175
 But, how we then defeated all their deed,
 Ye all do know, and them destroy'd quite;
 Yet not so quite, but that there did succeed
 An offspring of their blood, which did alight
 Upon the fruitful earth, which doth us yet despite. 180

XXI

"Of that bad seed is this bold woman bred,
 That now with bold presumption doth aspire
 To thrust fair Phœbe from her silver bed,
 And eke ourselves from heavens' high empire,
 If that her might were match to her desire
 Wherefore it now behoves us to advise 186
 What way is best to drive her to retire;
 Whether by open force, or counsel wise:
 Aread, ye sons of God, at best ye can devise."

XXII

So having said, he ceased; and with his brow
 (His black eye-brow, whose doomful dreaded beck 191
 Is wont to wield the world unto his vow,
 And even the highest pow'rs of heaven to check,).

Made sign to them in their degrees to speak:
Who straight gan cast their counsel grave
and wise. 195

Meanwhile the earth's daughter, though she nought did reckon

Of Hermes' message, yet gan now advise What course were best to take in this hot bold emprise.

XXIII

Eftsoones she thus resolved; that whilst the gods

(After return of Hermes' embassy) 200

Were troubled, and amongst themselves at odds;

Before they could new counsels re-ally,
To set upon them in that extacy,
And take what fortune, time, and place would lend: 204

So forth she rose, and through the purest sky
To Jove's high palace straight cast to ascend,
To prosecute her plot: good onset bodes good end.

XXIV

She there arriving boldly it did pass;
Where all the gods she found in counsel
close, 209

All quite unarm'd, as then their manner was.
At sight of her they sudden all arose

In great amaze, ne wist what way to chose:
But Jove, all fearless, forced them to aby;
And in his sovereign throne gan straight dispose

Himself, more full of grace and majesty, 215
That mote encheer his friends, and foes mote terrify.

XXV

That when the haughty Titaness beheld,
All were she fraught with pride and impu-
dence,

Yet with the sight thereof was almost quell'd;

And, inly quaking, seem'd as reft of sense 220
And void of speech in that dread audience;

Until that Jove himself herself bespake:

"Speak, thou frail woman, speak with confidence;

Whence art thou, and what dost thou here
now make?

What idle errand hast thou earth's mansion to forsake?" 225

XXVI

She, half confusèd with his great command,
Yet gathering spirit of her nature's pride,
Him boldly answer'd thus to his demand;
"I am a daughter, by the mother's side,
Of her that is grandmother magnified 230
Of all the gods, great Earth, great Chaos'
child:

But by the fathers's, be it not envied,
I greater am in blood, whereon I build,
Than all the gods, though wrongfully from heaven exiled.

XXVII

"For Titan, as ye all acknowledge must, 235
Was Saturn's elder brother by birthright;
Both sons of Uranus; but by unjust
And guileful means, through Corybantes' sleight,

The younger thrust the elder from his
right:

Since which thou, Jove, injuriously hast
held 240

The heavens' rule from Titan's sons by
might;

And them to hellish dungeons down hast
fell'd:

Witness, ye heavens, the truth of all that I have tell'd!"

XXVIII

Whilst she thus spake, the gods that gave good ear

To her bold words, and markèd well her grace, 245

(Being of stature tall as any there
Of all the gods, and beautiful of face

As any of the goddesses in place,)
Stood all astonied; like a sort of steers,

Mongst whom some beast of strange and foreign race 250

Unawares is chanced, for straying from his
peers:

So did their ghastly gaze bewray their hidden fears.

XXIX

Till, having paused awhile, Jove thus be-
spake;

"Will never mortal thoughts cease to aspire
In this bold sort to heaven claim to make, 255

And touch celestial seats with earthly mire?

I would have thought that bold Procrustes'
hire,
Or Typhon's fall, or proud Ixion's pain,
Or great Prometheus testing of our ire,
Would have sufficed the rest for to restrain,
And warn'd all men, by their example, to refrain. 261

XXX

"But now this off-scum of that cursèd fry
Dare to renew the like bold enterprize,
And challenge th' heritage of this our sky;
Whom what should hinder, but that we likewise 265
Should handle as the rest of her allies,
And thunder-drive to hell?" With that he shook
His nectar-dewèd locks, with which the skies
And all the world beneath for terror quooke,
And eft his burning levin-brand in hand he took. 270

XXXI

But when he lookèd on her lovely face,
In which fair beams of beauty did appear That could the greatest wrath soon turn to
grace,
(Such sway did beauty even in heaven
bear,)
He stay'd his hand; and, having changed his cheer, 275
He thus again in milder wise began;
"But ah! if gods should strive with flesh
yfere,
Then shortly should the progeny of man
Be rooted out, if Jove should do still what he can!

XXXII

"But thee, fair Titans' child, I rather ween, Through some vain error, or inducement
light, 281
To see that mortal eyes have never seen;
Or through ensample of thy sister's might.
Bellona, whose great glory thou dost spite, Since thou hast seen her dreadful power below: 285
Mongst wretched men, dismay'd with her
affright,
To bandy crowns, and kingdoms to bestow.
And sure thy worth no less than hers doth seem to show.

XXXIII

"But wot thou this, thou hardy Titaness,
That not the worth of any living wight 290
May challenge ought in heaven's interest;
Much less the title of old Titan's right:
For we by conquest, of our sovereign might,
And by eternal doom of Fate's decree,
Have won the empire of the heavens bright:
Which to ourselves we hold, and to whom we Shall worthy deem partakers of our bliss to
be. 297

XXXIV

"Then cease thy idle claim, thou foolish girl;
And seek by grace and goodness to obtain
That place, from which by folly Titan fell;
Thereto thou mayst perhaps, if so thou fain,
Have Jove thy gracious lord and sovereign."
So having said, she thus to him replied;
"Cease, Saturn's son, to seek by proffers vain
Of idle hopes t' allure me to thy side, 305
For to betray my right before I have it tried.

XXXV

"But thee, O Jove, no equal judge I deem
Of my desert, or of my dueful right;
That in thine own behalf mayst partial
seem:
But to the highest Him, that is beight 310
Father of gods and men by equal might
To weet, the God of Nature, I appeal."
Thereat Jove waxèd wrath, and in his spright
Did inly grudge, yet did well conceal;
And bade Dan Phœbus' scribe her appellation seal. 315

XXXVI

Eftsoones the time and place appointed were,
Where all, both heavenly powers and earthly wights,
Before great Nature's presence should appear,
For trial of their titles and best rights:
That was, to weet, upon the highest heights
Of Arlo-hill (who knows not Arlo-hill?) 321
That is the highest head, in all men's sights,
Of my old father MOLE, whom Shepherd's quill Renownèd hath with hymns fit for a rural skill.

XXXVII

And, were it not ill fitting for this file 325
To sing of hills and woods mongst wars and knights,

I would abate the sternness of my stile, Mongst these stern stounds to mingle soft delights;

And tell how Arlo, through Diana's spites,
(Being of old the best and fairest hill 330
That was in all this Holy-Island's heights,)
Was made the most unpleasant and most ill:
Meanwhile, O Clio, lend Calliope thy quill.

XXXVIII

Whylome when Ireland flourishèd in
fame 334

Of wealth and goodness, far above the rest
Of all that bear the British Islands' name,
The gods then used, for pleasure and for rest,

Oft to resort thereto, when seem'd them
best:

But none of all therein more pleasure found
Than Cynthia, that is sovereign queen pro-fest 340

Of woods and forests, which therein abound, Sprinkled with wholesome waters more than most on ground:

XXXIX

But mongst them all, as fittest for her game, (Either for chase of beasts with hound or
bow,

Or for to shroud in shade from Phœbus'
flame, 345

Or bathe in fountains that do freshly flow,
Or from high hills, or from the dales below,)

She chose this Arlo; where she did resort
With all her nymphs enrangèd on a row,
With whom the woody gods did oft consort;
For with the nymphs the satyrs love to play and sport: 351

XL

Amongst the which there was a nymph that hight

Molanna: daughter of old Father Mole,
And sister unto Mulla, fair and bright: 354
Unto whose bed false Bregog whylome stole
That Shepherd Colin dearly did condole,
And made her luckless loves well known to
be:

But this Molanna, were she not so shoal,

Were no less fair and beautiful than she: 359
Yet, as she is, a fairer flood may no man see.

XLI

For first she springs out of two marble rocks,
On which a grove of oaks high-mounted grows

That as a garland seems to deck the locks
Of some fair bride, brought forth with pompous shows 364

Out of her bow'r, that many flowers strows;
So through the flowery dales she tumbling
down

Through many woods and shady coverts
flows

That on each side her silver channel crown Till to the plain she come, whose valleys she doth drown.

XLII

In her sweet streams Diana usèd oft, 370
After her sweaty chase and toilsome play,
To bathe herself; and, after, on the soft

And downy grass her dainty limbs to lay
In covert shade, where none behold her may.

For much she hated sight of living eye 375
Foolish god Faunus, though full many a
day

He saw her clad, yet longèd foolishly
To see her naked mongst her nymphs in privacy.

XLIII

No way he found to compass his desire,
But to corrupt Molanna, this her maid, 380
Her to discover for some secret hire:

So her with flattering words he first assay'd;
And, after, pleasing gifts for her purvey'd, Queen-apples, and red cherries from the tree,

With which he her allurèd and betray'd 385
To tell what time he might her lady see When she herself did bathe, that he might secret be.

XLIV

Thereto he promised, if she would him
pleasure

With this small boon to quit her with a better;
To weet, that whereas she had out of measure
Long loved the Fanchin, who by nought did set her, 391

That he would undertake for this to get her
 To be his love, and of him likèd well:
 Besides all which, he vow'd to be her debtor
 For many more good turns than he would tell; 395
 The least of which this little pleasure should excel.

XLV

The simple maid did yield to him anon;
 And eft him placèd where he close might
 view
 That never any saw, save only one,
 Who, for his hire to so foolhardy due, 400
 Was of his hounds devour'd in hunter's hue.
 Tho, as her manner was on sunny day,
 Diana, with her nymphs about her, drew
 To this sweet spring; where, doffing her array,
 She bath'd her lovely limbs, for Jove a likely prey 405

XLVI

There Faunus saw that pleasèd much his eye,
 And made his heart to tickle in his breast,
 That, for great joy of somewhat he did spy,
 He could him not contain in silent rest;
 But, breaking forth in laughter, loud pro-fess'd 410
 His foolish thought: a foolish faun indeed,
 That couldst not hold thyself so hidden
 blest,
 But wouldest needs thine own conceit ared;
 Babblers unworthy been of so divine a meed.

XLVII

The goddess, all abashèd with that noise, 415
 In haste forth started from the guilty brook;
 And, running straight whereas she heard his
 voice,
 Enclosed the bush about, and there him took
 Like darrèd lark, not daring up to look 419
 On her whose sight before so much he sought.
 Thence forth they drew him by the horns,
 and shook
 Nigh all to pieces, that they left him nought;
 And then into the open light they forth him
 brought.

XLVIII

Like as an housewife, that with busy
 care 424
 Thinks of her dairy to make wondrous gain,
 Finding whereas some wicked beast unware

That breaks into her dair' house, there doth drain
 Her creaming pans, and frustrate all her
 pain;
 Hath, in some snare or gin set close behind,
 Entrappèd him, and caught into her trayne,
 Then thinks what punishment were best assign'd, 431
 And thousand deaths deviseth in her vengeful mind;

XLIX

So did Diana and her maidens all
 Use silly Faunus, now within their bail:
 They mock and scorn him, and him foul miscall; 435
 Some by the nose him pluck, some by the tail;
 And by his goatish beard some did him hale:
 Yet he (poor soul!) with patience all did bear;
 For nought against their wills might countervail:
 Ne ought he said, whatever he did hear; 440
 But, hanging down his head, did like a Mome appear.

L

At length, when they had flouted him their fill,
 They gan to cast what penance him to give.
 Some would have gelt him; but that same would spill
 The wood-gods' breed, which must for ever live: 445
 Others would through the river have him drive
 And duckèd deep; but that seem'd penance
 light:
 But most agreed, and did this sentence give,
 Him in deer's skin to clad; and in that plight
 To hunt him with their hounds, himself save how he might. 450

LI

But Cynthia's self, more angry than the rest,
 Thought not enough to punish him in sport,
 And of her shame to make a gamesome jest:
 But gan examine him in straighter sort,
 Which of her nymphs, or other close consort,
 Him thither brought, and her to him be-
 tray'd. 456
 He, much afeard, to her confessèd short
 That 'twas Molanna which her so bewray'd.
 Then all at once their hands upon Molanna laid.

LII

But him (according as they had decreed) 460
 With a deer's-skin they cover'd, and then chased
 With all their hounds that after him did
 speed;
 But he, more speedy, from them fled more fast
 Than any deer; so sore him dread aghast.
 They after follow'd all with shrill outcry, 465 Shouting as they the heavens would have brast;
 That all the woods and dales, where he did
 fly,
 Did ring again, and loud re-echo to the sky.

LIII

So they him follow'd till they weary were;
 When, back returning to Molann' again, 470
 They, by commandment of Diana, there Her whelmed with stones: Yet Faunus, for her pain,
 Of her beloved Fanchin did obtain,
 That her he would receive unto his bed.
 So now her waves pass through a pleasant
 plain, 475
 Till with the Fanchin she herself do wed,
 And, both combined, themselves in one fair river spread.

LIV

Nathless Diana, full of indignation,
 Thenceforth abandon'd her delicious brook:
 In whose sweet stream, before that bad occasion, 480
 So much delight to bathe her limbs she took:
 Ne only her, but also quite forsook
 All those fair forests about Arlo hid;
 And all that mountain, which doth overlook
 The richest champaign that may else be read; 485
 And the fair Suir, in which are thousand salmons bred.

LV

Them all, and all that she so dear did weigh, Thenceforth she left; and, parting from the
 place,
 Thereon an heavy hapless curse did lay;
 To weet, that wolves, where she was wont to space, 490
 Should harbour'd be and all those woods de-
 face.

And thieves should rob and speil that coast
 around.

Since which, those woods, and all that goodly chase

Doth to this day with wolves and thieves
 abound:

Which too-too true that land's in-dwellers
 since have found. 495

CANTO VII

*'Pealing from Jove to Nature's bar,
 Bold Alteration pleads
 Large evidence: but Nature soon
 Her righteous doom areads.*

I

Ah! whither dost thou now, thou greater Muse,

Me from these woods and pleasing forest-
 bring?

And my frail spirit, that doth oft refuse
 This too high flight unfit for her weak wing,
 Lift up aloft, to tell of heaven's king 5
 (Thy sovereign sire) his fortunate success;
 And victory in bigger notes to sing,
 Which he obtain'd against the Titaness,
 That him of heaven's empire sought to dispossess?

II

Yet, sith I needs must follow thy behest, 10
 Do thou my weaker wit with skill inspire,
 Fit for this turn; and in my sable breast
 Kindle fresh sparks of that immortal fire Which learn'd minds inflameth with desire 14

Of heavenly things: for who, but thou alone
 That art yborn of heaven and heavenly sire,
 Can tell things done in heaven so long ygone,
 So far past memory of man that may be known?

III

Now, at the time that was before agreed,
 The gods assembled all on Arlo Hill; 20
 As well those that are sprung of heavenly
 seed,

As those that all the other world do fill,
 And rule both sea and land unto their will:
 Only th' infernal pow'rs might not appear;
 As well for horror of their count'nance ill, 25
 As for th' unruly fiends which they did fear;
 Yet Pluto and Prosérpina were present, there.

IV

And thither also came all other creatures,
 Whatever life or motion do retain, 29
 According to their sundry kinds of features;
 That Arlo scarcely could them all contain;
 So full they fillèd every hill and plain:
 And had not Nature's Sergeant (that is Order)

Them well disposèd by his busy pain,
 And rangèd far abroad in every border, 35
 They would have causèd much confusion and disorder.

V

Then forth issued (great goddess) great Dame Nature,
 With goodly port and gracious majesty,
 Being far greater and more tall of stature
 Than any of the gods or powers on high; 40
 Yet certes by her face and phys'onomy,
 Whether she man or woman inly were,
 That could not any creature well descry;
 For, with a veil that wimpled everywhere,
 Her head and face was hid that mote to none
 appear. 45

VI

That, some do say, was so by skill devised,
 To hide the terror of her uncouth hue
 From mortal eyes that should be sore
 agrized;
 For that her face did like a lion shew,
 That eye of wight could not endure to view:
 But others tell that it so beauteous was, 51
 And round about such beams of splendour
 threw,
 That it the sun a thousand times did pass,
 Ne could be seen but like an image in a glass.

VII

That well may seemen true; for well I ween
 That this same day, when she on Arlo sat,
 Her garment was so bright and wondrous sheen, 57
 That my frail wit cannot devise to what
 It to compare, nor find like stuff to that:
 As those three sacred saints, though else
 most wise, 60
 Yet on Mount Tabor quite their wits forgot
 When they their glorious Lord in strange disguise
 Transfigured saw; His garments so did daze their eyes.

VIII

In a fair plain upon an equal hill
 She placèd was in a pavilion; 65
 Not such as craftsmen by their idle skill
 Are wont for princes' states to fashion;
 But th' earth herself, of her own motion,
 Out of her fruitful bosom made to grow
 Most dainty trees that shooting up anon, 70
 Did seem to bow their blooming heads full
 low
 For homage unto her, and like a throne did show

IX

So hard it is for any living wight
 All her array and vestiments to tell,
 That old Dan Geoffrey (in whose gentle spright, 75
 The pure well-head of poesy did dwell)
 In his Fowls' Parley durst not with it mell,
 But it transferr'd to Alane, who he thought
 Had in his Plaint of Kinds described it well:
 Which who will read set forth so as it ought,
 Go seek he out that Alane where he may be sought. 81

X

And all the earth far underneath her feet
 Was dight with flowers, that voluntary grew Out of the ground, and sent forth odours
 sweet;
 Ten thousand mores of sundry scent and hue,
 That might delight the smell, or please the
 view, 86
 The which the nymphs from all the brooks
 thereby
 Had gatherèd, they at her foot-stool threw;
 The richer seem'd than any tapestry,
 That princes' bow'rs adorn with painted imagery. 90

XI

And Mole himself, to honour her the more,
 Did deck himself in freshest fair attire;
 And his high head, that seemeth always hoar
 With hard'ned frosts of former winters' ire,
 He with an oaken garland now did tire, 95
 As if the love of some new nymph late seen
 Had in him kindled youthful fresh desire,
 And make him change his gray attire to
 green:
 Ah! gentle Mole, such joyance hath thee wel beseen.

XII

Was never so great joyance since the day 100
 That all the gods whylome assembled were
 On Hæmus' hill in their divine array,
 To celebrate the solemn bridal cheer Twixt Peleus and Dame Thetis' pointed
 there;
 Where Phœbus self, that god of poets hight,
 They say, did sing the spousal hymn full
 clear, 106
 That all the gods were ravish'd with delight
 Of his celestial song and music's wondrous might.

XIII

This great grandmother of all creatures
 bred,
 Great Nature, ever young, yet full of eld; 110
 Still moving, yet unmoved from her stead;
 Unseen of any, yet of all beheld;
 Thus sitting in her throne, as I have tell'd,
 Before her came Dame Mutability;
 And, being low before her presence fell'd 115
 With meek obeisance and humility, Thus gan her plaintiff plea with words to amplify:

XIV

"To thee, O greatest goddess, only great,
 An humble suppliant lo! I lowly fly,
 Seeking for right, which I of thee entreat; 120
 Who right to all dost deal indifferently,
 Damning all wrong and tortious injury,
 Which any of thy creatures do to other
 Oppressing them with pow'r unequally,
 Sith of them all thou art the equal mother,
 And knittest each to each, as brother unto brother. 126

XV

"To thee therefore of this same Jove I
 'plain,
 And of his fellow gods that fain to be,
 That challenge to themselves the whole world's reign,
 Of which the greatest part is due to me, 130
 And heaven itself by heritage in fee:
 For heaven and earth I both alike to deem,
 Sith heaven and earth are both alike to thee;
 And gods no more than men thou dost esteem:
 For even the gods to thee, as men to gods,
 do seem. 135

XVI

"Then weight, O sovereign goddess, by what
 right
 These gods do claim the world's whole sovereignty;
 And that is only due unto thy might Arrogate to themselves ambitiously:
 As for the gods' own principality, 140
 Which Jove usurps unjustly, that to be
 My heritage, Jove's self cannot deny,
 From my great grandsire Titan unto me Derived by due descent; and is well known to thee. 144

XVII

"Yet maugre Jove, and all his gods beside
 I do possess the world's most regiment;
 As if ye please it into parts divide,
 And every part's inholders to convent,
 Shall to your eyes appear incontinent. 149
 And first, the earth (great mother of us all)
 That only seems unmoved and permanent,
 And unto Mutability not thrall, Yet is she changed in part, and eke in general:

XVIII

"For all that from her springs, and is ybred.
 However fair it flourish for a time, 155
 Yet see we soon decay; and, being dead,
 To turn again unto their earthly slime:
 Yet, out of their decay and mortal crime,
 We daily see new creatures to arise,
 And of their Winter spring another Prime,
 Unlike in form, and changed by strange
 disguise 161
 So turn they still about, and change in restless wise.

XIX

"As for her tenants; that is, man and beasts;
 The beasts we daily see massâcred die 164
 And thralls and vassals unto men's behests;
 And men themselves do change continually,
 From youth to eld, from wealth to poverty,
 From good to bad, from bad to worst of
 all:
 Ne do their bodies only flit and fly;
 But eke their minds (which they immortal
 call) 170
 Still change and vary thoughts, as new occasions fall.

XX

"Ne is the water in more constant case;
Whether those same on high, or these below:

For th' ocean moveth still from place to place;

And every river still doth ebb and flow; 175
Ne any lake, that seems most still and slow,
Ne pool so small, that can his smoothless hold

When any wind doth under heaven blow;
With which the clouds are also toss'd and roll'd,

Now like great hills; and straight like sluices, them unfold. 180

XXI

"So likewise are all wat'ry living wights
Still toss'd and turnèd with continual change,
Never abiding in their steadfast plights:
The fish, still floating, do at random range,
And never rest, but evermore exchange 185
Their dwelling places, as the streams them carry:

Ne have the wat'ry fowls a certain grange
Wherein to rest, ne in one stead to tarry;
But flitting still do fly, and still their places vary.

XXII

"Next is the air: which who feels not by sense 190

(For of all sense it is the middle mean)
To flit still, and with subtile influence
Of his thin spirit all creatures to maintain
In state of life? O weak life! that does lean
On thing so tickle as th' unsteady air, 195
Which every hour is changed, and alt' red clean

With every blast that bloweth foul or fair:
The fair doth it prolong; the foul doth it impair.

XXIII

"Therein the changes infinite behold,
Which to her creatures every minute chance;
Now boiling hot; straight freezing deadly cold; 201

Now fair sunshine, that makes all skip and dance;

Straight bitter storms, and baleful countenance

That makes them all to shiver and to shake;
Rain, hail, and snow do pay them sad penance, 205

And dreadful thunder-claps (that make them quake)

With flames and flashing lights that thousand changes make.

XXIV

"Last is the fire; which, though it live for ever,

Ne can be quenched quite; yet, every day,
We see his parts, so soon as they do sever, 210
To lose their heat and shortly to decay;
So makes himself his own consuming prey;
Ne any living creatures doth he breed;
But all, that are of others' bred, doth slay;
And with their death his cruel life doth feed; 215

Nought leaving but their barren ashes without seed.

XXV

"Thus all these four (the which the ground-work be

Of all the world and of all living wights)
To thousand sorts of change we subject see:
Yet are they changed by other wondrous slights 220

Into themselves, and lose their native might;

The fire to air, and th' air to water sheer,
And water into earth; yet water fights
With fire, and air with earth, approaching near; 224

Yet all are in one body, and as one appear

XXVI

"So in them all reigns Mutability;
However these, that gods themselves do call,
Of them do claim the rule and sovereignty;
As Vesta, of the fire æthereal; 230
Vulcan, of this with us so usual;
Ops, of the earth; and Juno, of the air;
Neptune, of seas; and nymphs, of rivers all:
For all those rivers to me subject are;
And all the rest, which they usurp, be all my share.

XXVII

"Which to approven true, as I have told, 235
Vouchsafe, O goddess, to thy presence call
The rest which do the world in being hold;
As times and seasons of the year that fall:

Of all the which demand in general,
Or judge thyself, by verdict of thine eye, 240
Whether to me they are not subject all."
Nature did yield thereto; and by and by Bade Order call them all before her majesty.

XXVIII

So forth issued the Seasons of the year:
First, lusty Spring all dight in leaves of flow'rs 245
That freshly budded and new blooms did
bear.
In which a thousand birds had built their bow'rs
That sweetly sung to call forth paramours;
And in his hand a javelin he did bear,
And on his head (as fit for warlike stoures)
A gilt engraven morion he did wear; 251
That as some did him love, so others did him fear.

XXIX

Then came the jolij Summer, being dight
In a thin silken cassock colour'd green,
That was unlinèd all, to be more light: 255
And on his head a garland well beseen
He wore, from which as he had chauffèd been
The sweet did drop; and in his hand he bore
A bow and shafts, as he in forest green
Had hunted late the libbard or the boar,
And now would bathe his limbs with labour heated sore. 261

XXX

Then came the Autumn all in yellow clad
As though he joyèd in his plenteous store, Laden with fruits that made him laugh, full glad
That he had banish'd hunger, which to-fore
Had by the belly oft him pinchèd sore: 266
Upon his head a wreath, that was enroll'd
With ears of corn of every sort, he bore,
And in his hand a sickle he did hold,
To reap the ripen'd fruits the which the earth had yold. 270

XXXI

Lastly, came Winter clothèd all in frieze, Chattering his teeth for cold that did him
chill;
Whilst on his hoary beard his breath did freeze,
And the dull drops, that from his purpled
bill

As from a limbec did adown distil: 275
In his right hand a tippèd staff he held,
With which his feeble steps he stayèd still;
For he was faint with cold, and weak with
eld;

That scarce his loosèd limbs he able was to weld. 279

XXXII

These, marching softly, thus in order went:
And after them the months all riding came:
First, sturdy March, with brows full sternly
bent
And armèd strongly, rode upon a ram,
The same which over Hellespontus swam;
Yet in his hand a spade he also hent, 285
And in a bag all sorts of seeds ysame,
Which on the earth he strewèd as he went,
And fill'd her womb with fruitful hope of nourishment.

XXXIII

Next came fresh April, full of lustyhed,
And wanton as a kid whose horn new buds:
Upon a bull he rode, the same which led 291
Europa floating through th' Argolic floods:
His horns were gilden all with golden studs,
And garnishèd with garlands goodly dight
Of all the fairest flow'rs and freshest buds 295
Which th' earth brings forth; and wet he seem'd in sight
With waves, through which he waded for his love's delight.

XXXIV

Then came fair May, the fairest maid on
ground, 298
Deck'd all with dainties of her season's pride,
And throwing flow'rs out of her lap around;
Upon two brethren's shoulders she did ride,
The twins of Leda; which on either side
Supported her like to their sovereign queen:
Lord! how all creatures laugh'd when her
they spied,
And leap'd and danced as they had ravish'd
been! 305
And Cupid 'self about her flutt'ed all in green.

XXXV

And after her came jolly June, array'd
All in green leaves, as he a player were:
Yet in his time he wrought as well as play'd,
That by his plough-irons mote right well
appear: 310

Upon a crab he rode, that him did bear
 With crookèd crawling steps an uncouth
 pace,
 And backward yode, as bargemen wont to fare
 Bending their force contráry to their face;
 Like that ungracious crew which feigns de-murest grace. 315

XXXVI

Then came hot July boiling like to fire,
 That all his garments he had cast away:
 Upon a lion raging yet with ire
 He boldly rode, and made him to obey: 319
 (It was the beast that whylome did forray
 The Némæan forest, till th' Amphytrionide Him slew, and with his hide did him array:)
 Behind his back a scythe, and by his side
 Under his belt he bore a sickle circling wide.

XXXVII

The sixth was August, being rich array'd
 In garment all of gold down to the
 ground 326
 Yet rode he not, but led a lovely maid Forth by the lily hand, the which was crown'd
 With ears of corn, and full her hand was
 found:
 That was the righteous Virgin, which of old Lived here on earth, and plenty made abound; 331
 But, after Wrong was loved and Justice sold,
 She left th' unrighteous world, and was to heaven extoll'd.

XXXVIII

Next him September marchèd eke on foot;
 Yet was he heavy laden with the spoil 335
 Of harvest's riches, which he made his boot,
 And him enrich'd with bounty of the soil:
 In his one hand, as fit for harvest's toil,
 He held a knife-hook; and in th' other hand
 A pair of weights, with which he did assoil Both more and less, where it in doubt did
 stand, 341
 An equal gave to each as Justice duly scann'd.

XXXIX

Then came October full of merry glee;
 For yet his noule was totty of the must,

Which he was treading in the wine-fats'
 sea 345
 And of the joyous oil, whose gentle gust
 Made him so frolic, and so full of lust:
 Upon a dreadful scorpion he did ride,
 The same which by Diana's doom unjust
 Slew great Orion; and eke by his side 350
 He had his ploughing-share and coulter ready tied.

XL

Next was November; he full gross and fat
 As fed with lard, and that right well might seem;
 For he had been a fatting hogs of late,
 That yet his brows with sweat did reek and steam, 355
 And yet the season was full sharp and breem;
 In planting eke he took no small delight:
 Whereon he rode, not easy was to deem;
 For it a dreadful centaur was in sight,
 The seed of Saturn and fair Nais, Chiron
 light. 360

XLI

And after him came next the chill December:
 Yet he, through merry feasting which he
 made
 And great bonfires, did not the cold remember;
 His Saviour's birth his mind so much did
 glad.
 Upon a shaggy-bearded goat he rode, 365
 The same wherewith Dan Jove in tender
 years,
 They say, was nourish'd by th' Idæan maid;
 And in his hand a broad deep bowl he bears,
 Of which he freely drinks an health to all his peers.

XLII

Then came old January, wrappèd well 370
 In many weeds to keep the cold away;
 Yet did he quake and quiver like to quell,
 And blow his nails to warm them if he may;
 For they were numb'd with holding all the
 day
 An hatchet keen, with which he fellèd wood
 And from the trees did lop the needless spray: 376
 Upon an huge great earth-pot steane he
 stood,
 From whose wide mouth there flowèd forth
 the Roman flood.

XLIII

And lastly came cold February, sitting
In an old waggon, for he could not ride, 380
Drawn of two fishes for the season fitting,
Which through the flood before did softly slide

And swim away; yet had he by his side
His plough and harness fit to till the ground,
And tools to prune the trees, before the pride 385
Of hasting Prime did make them bourgeon
round.

So pass'd the twelve months forth, and their due places found.

XLIV

And after these there came the Day and Night,

Riding together both with equal pace; 389
Th' one on a palfrey black, the other white:
But Night had cover'd her uncomely face
With a black veil, and held in hand a mace,
On top whereof the moon and stars were
pight,

And Sleep and Darkness round about did trace. 394

But Day did bear upon his sceptre's height
The goodly sun encompass'd all with beam's bright.

XLV

Then came the Hours, fair daughters of high
Jove

And timely Night; the which were all en-
dued

With wondrous beauty fit to kindle love;
But they were virgins all, and love eschewed
That might foreslack the charge to them
foreshew'd 401

By mighty Jove; who did them porters
make

Of heaven's gate (whence all the gods issued)

Which they did daily watch, and nightly wake
By even turns, ne ever did their charge forsake. 405

XLVI

And after all came Life; and lastly Death:
Death with most grim and grisly visage
seen,

Yet is he nought but parting of the breath
Ne ought to see, but like a shade to ween,

Unbodi'd, unsoul'd, unheard, unseen: 410
But Life was like a fair young lusty boy,
Such as they feign Dan Cupid to have been,
Full of delightful health and lively joy, Deck'd all with flow'rs, and wings of gold fit to employ.

XLVII

When these were past, thus gan the Titaness; 415

"Lo! mighty mother, now be judge and say
Whether in all thy creatures more or less CHANGE doth not reign and bear the greatest sway;

For who sees not that time on all doth prey?
But times do change and move continually:
So nothing here long standeth in one
stay: 421

Wherefore this lower world who can deny
But to be subject still to Mutability?"

XLVIII

Then thus gan Jove; "Right true it is, that these

And all things else that under heaven dwell
Are changed of time, who doth them all dis-
seize 426

Of being: but who is it (to me tell)

That Time himself doth move and still compel

To keep his course? Is not that namely We,
Which pour that virtue from our heavenly cell 430

That moves them all, and makes them
chang'd be?

So them we gods do rule, and in them also
thee."

XLIX

To whom thus Mutability; "The things, Which we see not how they are moved and sway'd,

Ye may attribute to yourselves as kings, 435
And say, they by your secret pow'r are
made:

But what we see not, who shall us persuade?
But were they so, as ye them feign to be,
Moved by your might, and order'd by your
aid,

Yet what if I can prove, that even ye 440 Yourselves are likewise changed, and subject unto me?

L

"And first, concerning her that is the first,
 Even you, fair Cynthia; whom so much ye
 make Jove's dearest darling, she was bred and nursed
 On Cynthus' hill, whence she her name did
 take; 445
 Then is she mortal born, howso ye crake:
 Besides, her face and countenance every day
 We changèd see and sundry forms partake,
 Now horn'd, now round, now bright, now
 brown and gray;
 So that as changeful as the moon men used
 to say. 450

LI

"Next Mercury; who though he less appear
 To change his hue, and always seems as one;
 Yet he his course doth alter every year,
 And is of late far out of order gone:
 So Venus eke, that goodly paragon, 455
 Though fair all night, yet is she dark all day:
 And Phœbus' self, who lightsome is alone,
 Yet is he oft eclipsèd by the way,
 And fills the dark'ned world with terror and dismay.

LII

"Now Mars, that valiant man, is changèd most; 460
 For he sometimes so far runs out of square,
 That he his way doth seem quite to have lost,
 And clean without his usual sphere to fare;
 That even these star-gazers 'stonish'd are
 At sight thereof, and damn their lying books:
 So likewise grim Sir Saturn oft doth
 spare 466
 His stern aspect, and calm his crabbèd looks
 So many turning cranks these have, so many crooks.

LIII

"But you, Dan Jove, that only constant are,
 And king of all the rest, as ye do claim, 470
 Are you not subject eke to this misfare?
 Then let me ask you this withouten blame;
 Where were ye born? Some say in Crete
 by name,
 Others in Thebes, and others elsewhere;
 But, wheresoever they comment the same,
 They all consent that ye begotten were 476
 And born here in this world: ne other can appear.

LIV

"Then are ye mortal born, and thrall to me;
 Unless the kingdom of the sky ye make Immortal and unchangable to be: 480
 Besides, that pow'r and virtue which ye
 spake,
 That ye here work, doth many changes take,
 And your own natures change: for each of
 you,
 That virtue have or this or that to make,
 Is check'd and changèd from his nature
 true, 485
 By others' opposition or obliquèd view.

LV

"Besides, the sundry motions of your spheres,
 So sundry ways and fashions as clerks feign,
 Some in short space, and some in longer
 years,
 What is the same but alteration plain? 490
 Only the starry sky doth still remain:
 Yet do the stars and signs therein still move,
 And even itself is moved, as wizards sayne:
 But all that moveth doth mutation love:
 Therefore both you and them to me I subject prove. 495

LVI

"Then since within this wide great universe
 Nothing doth firm and permanent appear,
 But all things toss'd and turnèd by transverse;
 What then should let, but I aloft should rear
 My trophy, and from all the triumph bear?
 Now judge then, O thou greatest goddess
 true, 501
 According as thyself dost see and hear,
 And unto me addoom that is my due:
 That is, the rule of all; all being ruled by
 you."

LVII

So having ended, silence long ensued; 505
 Ne Nature to or fro spake for a space,
 But with firm eyes affix'd the ground still view'd.
 Meanwhile all creatures looking in her face,
 Expecting th' end of this so doubtful case,
 Did hang in long suspense what would ensue, 510
 To whether side should fall the sovereign
 place:

At length she, looking up with cheerful
view,
The silence brake, and gave her doom in speeches few:

LVIII

"I well consider all that ye have said;
And find that all things steadfastness do hate ⁵¹⁵
And changèd be; yet, being rightly weigh'd,
They are not changèd from their first estate;
But by their change their being do dilate;
And, turning to themselves at length again,
Do work their own perfection so by fate: ⁵²⁰
Then over them Change doth not rule and reign;
But they reign over Change, and do their states maintain.

LIX

"Cease therefore, daughter, further to aspire,
And thee content thus to be ruled by me:
For thy decay thou seekst by thy desire: ⁵²⁵
But time shall come that all shall changèd
be;
And from thenceforth none no more change shall see!"
So was the Titaness put down and whist,
And Jove confirm'd in his imperial See.
Then was that whole assembly quite dismiss'd, ⁵³⁰
And Nature's self did vanish, whither no man wist.

A FRAGMENT

I

WHEN I bethink me on that speech whyleare
Of Mutability, and well it weigh;
Meseems, that though she all unworthy
were
Of the heav'n's rule; yet, very sooth to say,
In all things else she bears the greatest sway; ⁵
Which makes me loathe this state of life so tickle,
And love of things so vain to cast away:
Whose flow'ring pride, so fading and so fickle,
Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle!

II

Then gin I think on that which Nature said,
Of that same time when no more change
shall be, ¹¹
But steadfast rest of all things, firmly stay'd
Upon the pillars of Eternity,
That is contrare to Mutability:
For all that moveth doth in change delight:
But thenceforth all shall rest eternally ¹⁶
With Him that is the God of Sabaoth
hight:
O! that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabbath's sight!

JOHN MILTON (1608-1674)

PARADISE LOST

BOOK I

ARGUMENT

THIS First Book proposes, first in brief, the whole subject,—Man's disobedience, and the loss thereupon of Paradise, wherein he was placed:
then touches the prime cause of his fall,—the serpent, or rather Satan in the serpent; who, revolting from God, and drawing to his side many legions of angels, was, by the command of God, driven out of heaven, with all his crew, into the great deep. Which action passed over, the poem hastens into the midst of things, presenting Satan, with his angels, now fallen into hell, described here, not in the center (for heaven and earth may be supposed as yet not made, certainly not yet accursed), but in a place of utter darkness, fit-liest called Chaos: here Satan with his angels, lying on the burning lake, thunderstruck and astonished, after a certain space recovers, as from confusion, calls up him who next in order and dignity lay by him. They confer of their miserable fall; Satan awakens all his legions, who lay till then in the same manner confounded. They rise; their numbers; array of battle; their chief leaders named, according to the idols known afterwards in Canaan and the countries adjoining. To these Satan directs his speech, comforts them with hope yet of regaining heaven, but tells them lastly of a new

As from the center thrice to the utmost pole.
O, how unlike the place from whence they
fell!

There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelmed

With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous
fire,

He soon discerns; and weltering by his side
One next himself in power, and next in crime,
Long after known in Palestine, and named so Beëlzebub. To whom the arch-enemy,
And thence in heaven called Satan, with bold
words

Breaking the horrid silence, thus began:—

“If thou beest he—but O, how fall’n!
how changed

From him who, in the happy realms of light, Clothed with transcendent brightness, didst outshine

Myriads, though bright! If he, whom mutual league,

United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
And hazard in the glorious enterprise, Joined with me once, now misery hath joined

In equal ruin; into what pit thou seest
From what height fall’n, so much the stronger proved

He with his thunder: and till then who knew The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,

Nor what the potent victor in his rage
Can else inflict, do I repent or change, Though changed in outward luster, that fixed mind,

And high disdain from sense of injured merit,
That with the Mightiest raised me to contend,

And to the fierce contention brought along Innumerable force of spirits armed,
That durst dislike his reign, and, me preferring

His utmost power with adverse power opposed

In dubious battle on the plains of heaven,
And shook his throne. What though the field be lost?

All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield,
And what is else not to be overcome;

That glory never shall his wrath or might Extort from me. To bow and sue for grace
With suppliant knee, and deify his power

Who from the terror of this arm so late
Doubted his empire—that were low indeed,
That were an ignominy, and shame beneath

This downfall; since, by fate, the strength of gods,

And this empyreal substance, cannot fail:
Since, through experience of this great event,

In arms not worse, in foresight much advanced,

We may with more successful hope resolve
To wage by force or guile eternal war,
Irreconcilable to our grand foe,

Who now triumphs, and, in the excess of
joy

Sole reigning, holds the tyranny of heaven.”
So spake the apostate angel, though in
pain,

Vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair

And him thus answered soon his bold com-peer:—

“O prince, O chief of many-thronèd
powers

That led the embattled seraphim to war
Under thy conduct and in dreadful deeds
Fearless, endangered heaven’s perpetual
King,

And put to proof his high supremacy,
Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or
fate;

Too well I see, and rue the dire event,
That with sad overthrow, and foul defeat,
Hath lost us heaven, and all this mighty host

In horrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as gods and heavenly essences
Can perish: for the mind and spirit remain
Invincible, and vigor soon returns,

Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
Here swallowed up in endless misery.

But what if he our Conqueror (whom I now
Of force believe Almighty, since no less Than such could have o’erpowered such force as ours)

Have left us this our spirit and strength entire.

Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
That we may so suffice his vengeful ire,
Or do him mightier service as his thralls
By right of war, whate’er his business be,
Here in the heart of hell to work in fire,
Or do his errands, in the gloomy deep?

What can it then avail, though yet we feel Strength undiminished, or eternal being
To undergo eternal punishment?" 155

Whereto with speedy words the arch-fiend
replied:—

"Fallen cherub, to be weak is miserable,
Doing or suffering; but of this be sure,
To do aught good never will be our task,
But ever to do ill our sole delight, 160
As being the contrary to his high will Whom we resist. If then his providence
Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
Our labor must be to pervert that end,
And out of good still to find means of evil, 165
Which ofttimes may succeed, so as perhaps Shall grieve him, if I fail not, and disturb His inmost counsels from their destined aim.

But see, the angry Victor hath recalled
His ministers of vengeance and pursuit 170
Back to the gates of heaven; the sulphurous
hail,

Shot after us in storm, o'erblown, hath laid
The fiery surge, that from the precipice Of heaven received us falling; and the thunder,

Winged with red lightning and impetuous
rage, 175

Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases
now

To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.

Let us not slip the occasion, whether scorn
Or satiate fury yield it from our foe.

Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild, 180

The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid flames

Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend

From off the tossing of these fiery waves;
There rest, if any rest can harbor there; 185
And, re-assembling our afflicted powers,
Consult how we may henceforth most offend
Our enemy; our own loss how repair;
How overcome this dire calamity; 189
What reinforcement we may gain from hope;
If not, what resolution from despair."

Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate,
With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed; his other parts besides 194

Prone on the flood, extended long and large,

Lay floating many a rood; in bulk as huge
As whom the fables name of monstrous size,
Titanian, or Earth-born, that warred on
Jove;

Briareos or Typhon, whom the den
By ancient Tarsus held; or that sea-beast 200
Leviathan, which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim the ocean stream.
Him, haply, slumbering on the Norway
foam,

The pilot of some small night-foundered
skiff,

Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell, 205
With fixed anchor in his scaly rind
Moors by his side under the lee, while night
Invests the sea, and wished morn delays:
So stretched out huge in length the archfiend lay

Chained on the burning lake: nor ever thence 210

Had risen, or heaved his head; but that the will

And high permission of all-ruling Heaven
Left him at large to his own dark designs;
That with reiterated crimes he might Heap on himself damnation, while he sought
Evil to others; and, enraged, might see 216
How all his malice served but to bring forth
Infinite goodness, grace, and mercy, shown
On man by him seduced; but on himself Treble confusion, wrath, and vengeance poured. 220

Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool

His mighty stature; on each hand the flames,
Driven backward, slope their pointing spires, and rolled

In billows, leave i' the midst a horrid vale.
Then with expanded wings he steers his flight 225

Aloft, incumbent on the dusky air,
That felt unusual weight; till on dry land
He lights, if it were land that ever burned
With solid, as the lake with liquid fire;
And such appeared in hue, as when the force
Of subterranean wind transports a hill 231
Torn from Pelorus, or the shattered side
Of thundering Etna, whose combustible
And fuelled entrails thence conceiving fire,
Sublimed with mineral fury, aid the winds,
And leave a singed bottom, all involved 236
With stench and smoke: such resting found the sole

Of unblest feet. Him followed his next mate:

Both glorying to have 'scaped the Stygian
flood,
As gods, and by their own recovered strength,
Not by the sufferance of supernal power. 241
"Is this the region, this the soil, the clime,"
Said then the lost archangel, "this the seat
That we must change for heaven; this mournful gloom 244
For that celestial light? Be it so, since he,
Who now is Sovereign, can dispose and bid
What shall be right: farthest from him is
best,
Whom reason hath equaled, force hath made supreme Above his equals. Farewell, happy fields, Where joy for ever dwells! Hail, horrors!
hail 250
Infernal world! and thou profoundest hell,
Receive thy new possessor—one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time:
The mind is its own place, and in itself 254
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
What matter where, if I be still the same,
And what I should be; all but less than he Whom thunder hath made greater? Here at least
We shall be free: the Almighty hath not built
Here for his envy, will not drive us hence: 260
Here we may reign secure, and, in my choice,
To reign is worth ambition, though in hell;
Better to reign in hell, than serve in heaven.
But wherefore let we then our faithful
friends, 264
The associates and co-partners of our loss,
Lie thus astonished on the oblivious pool,
And call them not to share with us their part
In this unhappy mansion; or once more
With rallied arms to try what may be yet Regained in heaven, or what more lost in
hell?" 270
So Satan spake, and him Beëlzebub
Thus answered: "Leader of those armies
bright,
Which, but the Omnipotent, none could have foiled,
If once they hear that voice, their liveliest pledge
Of hope in fears and dangers, heard so oft 275
In worst extremes, and on the perilous edge
Of battle when it raged, in all assaults
Their surest signal, they will soon resume
New courage and revive; though now they lie

Groveling and prostrate on yon lake of
fire, 280
As we erewhile, astounded and amazed;
No wonder, fall'n such a pernicious height."
He scarce had ceased, when the superior fiend
Was moving toward the shore: his ponderous
shield 284
Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast; the broad circumference Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening, from the top of Fesolè,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands, 290
Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.
His spear, to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great admiral, were but a wand.
He walked with, to support uneasy steps 295
Over the burning marl, not like those steps
On heaven's azure, and the torrid clime Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with
fire:
Nathless he so endured, till on the beach
Of that inflamèd sea he stood, and called 300
His legions, angel forms, who lay entranced, Thick as autumnal leaves, that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa, where the Etrurian shades, High over-arched, embower; or scattered sedge 304
Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion armed Hath vexed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew
Busiris and his Memphian chivalry,
While with perfidious hatred they pursued
The sojourners of Goshen, who beheld 309
From the safe shore their floating carcasses
And broken chariot-wheels; so thick bestrewn,
Abject and lost lay these, covering the flood,
Under amazement of their hideous change.
He called so loud, that all the hollow deep
Of hell resounded. "Princes, potentates, Warriors, the flower of heaven, once yours,
now lost, 316
If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal spirits; or have ye chosen this place
After the toil of battle to repose
Your wearied virtue, for the ease you find 320
To slumber here, as in the vales of heaven?
Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
To adore the Conqueror? who now beholds
Cherub and seraph rolling in the flood 324

With scattered arms and ensigns, till anon
His swift pursuers from heaven-gates discern
The advantage, and descending, tread us
down

Thus drooping, or with linkèd thunderbolts
Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf?

Awake, arise, or be for ever fall'n!" 330

They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung

Upon the wing; as when men, wont to watch

On duty, sleeping found by whom they dread,

Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.
Nor did they not perceive the evil plight 335

In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;

Yet to their general's voice they soon obeyed,

Innumerable. As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,

Waved round the coast, up called a pitchy
cloud 340

Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind,
That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh

hung

Like night, and darkened all the land of Nile:

So numberless were those bad angels seen
Hovering on wing under the cope of hell, 345

'Twixt upper, nether, and surrounding fires;
Till, at a signal given, the uplifted spear

Of their great sultan waving to direct Their course, in even balance down they

light

On the firm brimstone, and fill all the
plain: 350

A multitude like which the populous north
Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass

Rhine or the Danube, when her barbarous
sons

Came like a deluge on the south and spread
Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands. 355

Forthwith from every squadron and each
band

The heads and leaders thither haste where stood

Their great commander; godlike shapes and forms

Excelling human; princely dignities;
And powers that erst in heaven sat on thrones, 360

Though of their names in heavenly records
now

Be no memorial; blotted out and rased
By their rebellion from the books of life.

Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve Got them new names; till, wandering o'er

the earth, 365

Through God's high sufferance, for the trial of man,

By falsities and lies the greater part
Of mankind they corrupted to forsake

God their Creator, and the invisible
Glory of him that made them, to transform

Of to the image of a brute, adorned 371
With gay religions, full of pomp and gold,

And devils to adore for deities:
Then were they known to men by various

names,

And various idols through the heathen
world. 375

Say, Muse, their names then known, who first, who last,

Roused from the slumber on that fiery
couch,

At their great emperor's call, as next in
worth,

Came singly where he stood on the bare
strand,

While the promiscuous crowd stood yet
aloof. 380

The chief were those who from the pit of
hell,

Roaming to seek their prey on earth, durst fix

Their seats long after next the seat of God,
Their altars by his altar, gods adored 384

Among the nations round, and durst abide Jehovah thundering out of Sion, throned

Between the cherubim; yea, often placed Within his sanctuary itself their shrines,

Abominations; and with cursèd things 389
His holy rites and solemn feasts profaned,

And with their darkness durst affront his
light.

First, Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with
blood

Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels

loud,

Their children's cries unheard, that passed through fire 395

To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
Worshipped in Rabba and her watery plain,

In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such

Audacious neighborhood, the wisest heart

Of Solomon he led by fraud to build 401
 His temple right against the temple of God,
 On that opprobrious hill; and made his grove
 The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet
 thence
 And black Gehenna called, the type of hell.
 Next, Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's
 sons, 406
 From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild
 Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
 And Horonáim, Seon's realm, beyond
 The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines,
 And Eleále to the asphaltic pool; 411
 Peor his other name, when he enticed
 Israel in Sittim, on their march from Nile,
 To do him wanton rites, which cost them
 woe.
 Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged 415
 Even to that hill of scandal, by the grove
 Of Moloch homicide: lust hard by hate;
 Till good Josiah drove them thence to hell.
 With these came they who, from the bordering flood
 Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts 420
 Egypt from Syrian ground, had general
 names
 Of Baälim and Ashtaroth; those male,
 These feminine; for spirits, when they please,
 Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
 And uncompounded is their essence pure; 425
 Not tied or manacled with joint or limb, Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
 Like cumbrous flesh; but, in what shape
 they choose,
 Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
 Can execute their aëry purposes, 430
 And works of love or enmity fulfil.
 For those the race of Israel oft forsook
 Their living Strength, and unfrequented left
 His righteous altar, bowing lowly down To bestial gods; for which their heads as
 low 435
 Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
 Of despicable foes. With these in troop Came Astoreth, whom the Phenicians called Astarté, queen of heaven, with crescent horns;
 To whose bright image nightly by the moon 440
 Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs;
 In Sion also not unsung, where stood
 Her temple on the offensive mountain, built

By that uxorious king, whose heart, though large,
 Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell 445
 To idols foul. Thammuz came next behind,
 Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
 The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
 In amorous ditties all a summer's day; 449
 While smooth Adonis from his native rock
 Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
 Of Thammuz yearly wounded; the love-tale
 Infected Sion's daughters with like heat;
 Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
 Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led, 455
 His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
 Of alienated Judah. Next came one Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
 Maimed his brute image, head and hands
 lopped off
 In his own temple, on the grunsel edge, 460
 Where he fell flat, and shamed his worshippers;
 Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
 And downward fish; yet had his temple high
 Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
 Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon, 465
 And Accaron and Gazar's frontier bounds.
 Him followed Rimmon, whose delightful
 seat
 Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
 Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams. 469
 He also 'gainst the house of God was bold:
 A leper once he lost, and gained a king;
 Ahaz his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
 God's altar to disparage and displace
 For one of Syrian mode, whereon to burn
 His odious offerings, and adore the gods 475 Whom he had vanquished. After these appeared
 A crew who, under names of old renown,
 Osiris, Isis, Orus, and their train,
 With monstrous shapes and sorceries abused
 Fanatic Egypt and her priests, to seek 480
 Their wandering gods disguised in brutish
 forms
 Rather than human. Nor did Israel 'scape
 The infection, when their borrowed gold composed
 The calf in Oreb; and the rebel king
 Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan, 485
 Likening his Maker to the grazèd ox—
 Jehovah, who in one night, when he passed
 From Egypt marching, equaled with one stroke

Both her first-born and all her bleating gods.
 Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd 490
 Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
 Vice for itself; to him no temple stood,
 Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
 In temples and at altars, when the priest
 Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons, who filled 495
 With lust and violence the house of God?
 In courts and palaces he also reigns,
 And in luxurious cities, where the noise
 Of riot ascends above their loftiest towers,
 And injury and outrage: and when night 500 Darkens the streets, then wander forth the
 sons
 Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.
 Witness the streets of Sodom, and that night
 In Gibeah, when the hospitable door
 Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape. 505
 These were the prime in order and in
 might:
 The rest were long to tell, though far renowned,
 The Ionian gods—of Javan's issue held Gods, yet confessed later than heaven and
 earth,
 Their boasted parents: Titan, heaven's first-
 born 510
 With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
 By younger Saturn; he from mightier Jove,
 His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;
 So Jove usurping reigned: these first in Crete
 And Ida known, thence on the snowy top 515
 Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,
 Their highest heaven; or on the Delphian
 cliff,
 Or in Dodona, and through all the bounds
 Of Doric land: or who with Saturn old
 Fled over Adria to the Hesperian fields, 520
 And o'er the Celtic roamed the utmost isles.
 All these and more came flocking, but with looks Downcast and damp; yet such wherein appeared
 Obscure some glimpse of joy, to have found their chief
 Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost 525
 In loss itself; which on his countenance cast
 Like doubtful hue; but he, his wonted pride
 Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised

Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears. 530
 Then straight commands that at the warlike sound
 Of trumpets loud and clarions be upreared
 His mighty standard; that proud honor claimed
 Azazel as his right, a cherub tall;
 Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled 535
 The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
 Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind,
 With gems and golden luster rich emblazed,
 Seraphic arms and trophies, all the while Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds: 540
 At which the universal host up-sent A shout, that tore hell's concave, and beyond
 Frighted the reign of Chaos and old Night.
 All in a moment through the gloom were
 seen
 Ten thousand banners rise into the air, 545
 With orient colors waving; with them rose
 A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
 Appeared, and serried shields in thick array
 Of depth immeasurable; anon they move
 In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood 550
 Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
 To height of noblest temper heroes old
 Arming to battle, and instead of rage, Deliberate valor breathed, firm and un-
 moved
 With dread of death to flight or foul retreat; 555
 Nor wanting power to mitigate and 'suage
 With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase
 Anguish, and doubt, and fear, and sorrow, and pain
 From mortal or immortal minds. Thus
 they,
 Breathing united force, with fixèd thought,
 Moved on in silence, to soft pipes, that charmed 561
 Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil: and
 now
 Advanced in view they stand; a horrid front
 Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
 Of warriors old with ordered spear and
 shield, 565
 Awaiting what command their mighty chief
 Had to impose: he through the armed files
 Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse

The whole battalion views, their order due,
 Their visages and stature as of gods; 570 Their number last he sums. And now his
 heart
 Dists with pride, and hardening in his strength
 Glories: for never since created man Met such embodied force as, named with these,
 Could merit more than that small infantry
 Warred on by cranes: though all the giant brood 576
 Of Phlegra with the heroic race were joined
 That fought at Thebes and Ilium, on each side
 Mixed with auxiliar gods; and what resounds
 In fable or romance of Uther's son 580
 Begirt with British and Armoric knights;
 And all who since, baptized or infidel,
 Jousted in Aspramont, or Montalban,
 Damascus, or Morocco, or Trebizond,
 Or whom Biserta sent from Afric shore, 585
 When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
 By Fontarabbia. Thus far these beyond
 Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed
 Their dread commander; he, above the rest
 In shape and gesture proudly eminent, 590
 Stood like a tower; his form had yet not lost
 All its original brightness; nor appeared
 Less than archangel ruined, and the excess Of glory obscured: as when the sun, new risen,
 Looks through the horizontal misty air 595 Shorn of his beams, or from behind the
 moon,
 In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
 On half the nations, and with fear of change Perplexes monarchs. Darkened so, yet shone
 Above them all the archangel; but his face Deep scars of thunder had entrenched; and
 care 601
 Sat on his faded cheek; but under brows
 Of dauntless courage, and considerate pride
 Waiting revenge; cruel his eye, but cast
 Signs of remorse and passion, to behold 605
 The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
 For ever now to have their lot in pain;
 Millions of spirits for his fault amerced
 Of heaven, and from eternal splendors
 flung 610
 For his revolt; yet faithful how they stood,
 Their glory withered; as when heavens' fire

Hath scathed the forest oaks, or mountain pines,
 With singed top their stately growth, though
 bare,
 Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared 615
 To speak; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
 From wing to wing, and half enclose him
 round
 With all his peers: attention held them mute.
 Thrice he essayed, and thrice, in spite of
 scorn,
 Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth; at
 last 620
 Words, interwove with sighs, found out their
 way. 627
 "O myriads of immortal spirits! O powers Matchless, but with the Almighty; and that strife
 Was not inglorious, though the event was dire, 624
 As this place testifies, and this dire change,
 Hateful to utter! but what power of mind;
 Forseeing or presaging, from the depth Of knowledge, past or present, could have feared
 How such united force of gods, how such As stood like these, could ever know repulse? 630
 For who can yet believe, though after loss,
 That all these puissant legions, whose exile
 Hath emptied heaven, shall fail to reascend
 Self-raised, and repossess their native seat?
 For me, be witness all the host of heaven, 635
 If counsels different, or dangers shunned
 By me, have lost our hopes. But he who reigns
 Monarch in heaven, till then as one secure
 Sat on this throne upheld by old repute,
 Consent or custom; and his regal state 640
 Put forth at full, but still his strength concealed,
 Which tempted our attempt, and wrought
 our fall.
 Henceforth his might we know, and know
 our own;
 So as not either to provoke, or dread
 New war, provoked; our better part remains, 645
 To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
 What force effected not; that he no less
 At length from us may find, who overcomes
 By force, hath overcome but half his foe.

Space may produce new worlds; whereof so rife 650
 There went a fame in heaven that he ere
 long 651
 Intended to create, and therein plant
 A generation, whom his choice regard
 Should favor equal to the sons of heaven:
 Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps 655
 Our first eruption; thither, or elsewhere;
 For this infernal pit shall never hold Celestial spirits in bondage, nor the abyss Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts
 Full counsel must mature; peace is despaired; 660
 For who can think submission? War, then,
 war,
 Open or understood, must be resolved."
 He spake; and, to confirm his words, outflew
 Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
 Of mighty cherubim; the sudden blaze 665
 Far round illumined hell; highly they raged Against the Highest, and fierce with grasped
 arms
 Clashed on their sounding shields the din of
 war,
 Hurling defiance toward the vault of heaven.
 There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire 671
 Shone with a glossy scurf, undoubted sign
 That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
 The work of sulphur. Thither, winged with speed,
 A numerous brigade hastened: as when
 bands 675
 Of pioneers, with spade and pickaxe armed,
 Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
 Or cast a rampart. Mammon led them on:
 Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell
 From heaven; for even in heaven his looks and thoughts 680
 Were always downward bent, admiring more
 The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden
 gold,
 Than aught, divine or holy, else enjoyed
 In vision beatific; by him first
 Men also, and by his suggestion taught, 685
 Ransacked the center, and with impious
 hands
 Rifled the bowels of their mother earth
 For treasures, better hid. Soon had his crew

Opened into the hill a spacious wound,
 And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire 690
 That riches grow in hell; that soil may best Deserve the precious bane. And here let those
 Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell
 Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings, Learn how their greatest monuments of
 fame, 695
 And strength and art, are easily outdone
 By spirits reprobate, and in an hour
 What in an age they with incessant toil
 And hands innumerable scarce perform.
 Nigh on the plain, in many cells prepared,
 That underneath had veins of liquid fire 701
 Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
 With wondrous art founded the massy ore.
 Severing each kind, and scummed the bullion dross;
 A third as soon had formed within the ground
 A various mold, and from the boiling cells,
 By strange conveyance, filled each hollow nook, 707
 As in an organ, from one blast of wind,
 To many a row of pipes the sound-board
 breathes.
 Anon, out of the earth a fabric huge 710
 Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
 Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
 Built like a temple, where pilasters round
 Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid 714
 With golden architrave; nor did there want Cornice or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven:
 The roof was fretted gold. Not Babylon,
 Nor great Alcairo, such magnificence
 Equaled in all their glories, to enshrine
 Belus or Serapis their gods, or seat 720
 Their kings, when Egypt with Assyria
 strove
 In wealth and luxury. The ascending pile Stood fixed her stately height: and straight
 the doors,
 Opening their brazen folds, discover, wide
 Within, her ample spaces, o'er the smooth
 And level pavement; from the archèd roof,
 Pendent by subtle magic, many a row 727
 Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
 With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
 As from a sky. The hasty multitude 730 Admiring entered; and the work some praise,

And some the architect: his hand was known
In heaven by many a towered structure high
Where sceptered angels held their residence,
And sat as princes; whom the supreme
King

735

Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.
Nor was his name unheard or unadored
In ancient Greece; and in Ausonian land
Men called him Mulciber; and how he fell
From heaven they fabled, thrown by angry

Jove

Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn

To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
A summer's day; and with the setting sun
Dropped from the zenith like a falling star,
On Lemnos, th' Ægean isle: thus they relate,
Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
To have built in heaven high towers; nor did he 'scape

By all his engines, but was headlong sent
With his industrious crew to build in hell.

750

Meanwhile, the wingèd heralds, by command

Of sovereign power, with awful ceremony
And trumpet's sound, throughout the host proclaim

A solemn council, forthwith to be held
At Pandemonium, the high capital

755

Of Satan and his peers: their summons called
From every band and squared regiment
By place or choice the worthiest; they anon,
With hundreds and with thousands, trooping came,

760

Attended; all access was thronged; the gates
And porches wide, but chief the spacious
hall

(Though like a covered field, where champions bold

Wont ride in armed, and at the soldan's chair
Defied the best of paynim chivalry

765

To mortal combat, or career with lance), Thick swarmed, both on the ground and in the air,

Brushed with the hiss of rustling wings.
As bees

In spring-time, when the sun with Taurus
rides,

Pour forth their populous youth about the hive

770

In clusters; they among fresh dews and flowers

Fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank.

The suburb of their straw-built citadel,
New rubbed with balm, expatiate, and confer
Their state affairs; so thick the aëry crowd Swarmed and were straitened; till, the signal given,

776

Behold a wonder! They, but now who seemed

In bigness to surpass earth's giant sons,
Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow
room

Throng numberless, like that Pygmæan race
Beyond the Indian mount, or faëry elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest side

Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees, while over head the moon

Sits arbitress, and nearer to the earth Wheels her pale course; they, on their mirth and dance

785

Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large,

790

Though without number still, amidst the
hall

Of that infernal court. But far within,
And in their own dimensions, like themselves,
The great seraphic lords and cherubim

In close recess and secret conclave sat;
A thousand demi-gods on golden seats

795

Frequent and full. After short silence then,
And summons read, the great consult began.

BOOK II

ARGUMENT

THE consultation begun, Satan debates whether another battle be to be hazarded for the recovery of Heaven: some advise it, others dissuade. A third proposal is preferred, mentioned before by Satan—to search the truth of that prophecy or tradition in Heaven concerning another world, and another kind of creature, equal, or not much inferior, to themselves, about this time to be created. Their doubt who shall be sent on this difficult search; Satan, their chief, undertakes alone the voyage; is honored and applauded. The council thus ended, the rest betake them several ways and to several employments, as their inclinations lead them, to entertain the time till Satan return. He passes on his journey to Hell-gates; finds them shut, and who sat there to guard them; by whom at length they are opened, and discover to him the great gulf between Hell and Heaven. With what difficulty he passes through, directed by Chaos, the Power of that place, to the sight of this new World which he sought.

HIGH on a throne of royal state, which far Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind,
Or where the gorgeous East, with richest
hand,

Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold,
Satan exalted sat, by merit raised 5
To that bad eminence; and from despair
Thus high uplifted beyond hope, aspires
Beyond thus high, insatiate to pursue Vain war with Heaven; and, by success un-
taught,

His proud imaginations thus displayed:— 10
“Powers and dominions, deities of heaven;
For since no deep within her gulf can hold Immortal vigor, though oppressed and fallen,

I give not heaven for lost. From this descent
Celestial virtues rising, will appear 15
More glorious and more dread than from no fall,

And trust themselves to fear no second fate.
Me, though just right, and the fixed laws of
heaven,

Did first create your leader; next, free choice,
With what besides, in council or in fight, 20
Hath been achieved of merit; yet this loss,
Thus far at least recovered, hath much more Established in a safe unenvied throne, Yielded with full consent. The happier
state

In heaven, which follows dignity, might draw 25

Envy from each inferior; but who here
Will envy whom the highest place exposes Foremost to stand against the Thunderer’s
aim,

Your bulwark, and condemns to greatest share

Of endless pain? Where there is then no
good 30

For which to strive, no strife can grow up
there

From faction; for none sure will claim in hell
Precedence; none whose portion is so small
Of present pain, that with ambitious mind
Will covet more. With this advantage,
then, 35

To union, and firm faith, and firm accord,

More than can be in heaven, we now return

To claim our just inheritance of old,
Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us; and, by what best
way, 40

Whether of open war or covert guile,
We now debate: who can advise, may speak.”

He ceased; and next him Moloch, scaptered king,

Stood up, the strongest and the fiercest spirit That fought in heaven, now fiercer by despair. 45

His trust was with the Eternal to be deemed Equal in strength; and rather than be less,
Cared not to be at all; with that care lost
Went all his fear: of God, or hell, or worse.
He recked not; and these words thereafter
spake:— 50

“My sentence is for open war: of wiles,
More unexpert, I boast not; them let those Contrive who need, or when they need, not
now.

For, while they sit contriving, shall the
rest,

Millions that stand in arms, and longing
wait 55

The signal to ascend, sit lingering here
Heaven’s fugitives, and for their dwelling
place

Accept this dark, opprobrious den of shame,
The prison of his tyranny who reigns
By our delay? No, let us rather choose, 60
Armed with hell-flames and fury, all at once, O’er heaven’s high towers to force resistless
way,

Turning our tortures into horrid arms Against the torturer; when, to meet the noise

Of his almighty engine, he shall hear 65
Infernal thunder; and, for lightning, see
Black fire and horror shot with equal rage
Among his angels; and his throne itself
Mixed with Tartarean sulphur, and strange
fire,

His own invented torments. But perhaps
The way seems difficult and steep to scale 71
With upright wing against a higher foe.

Let such bethink them, if the sleepy drench
Of that forgetful lake benumb not still,
That in our proper motion we ascend 75
Up to our native seat; descent and fall
To us is adverse. Who but felt of late,
When the fierce foe hung on our broken rear

Insulting, and pursued us through the deep,
 With what compulsion and laborious flight 80
 We sunk thus low? The ascent is easy
 then;
 The event is feared; should we again provoke
 Our stronger, some worse way his wrath may find
 To our destruction; if there be in hell Fear to be worse destroyed; what can be worse 85
 Than to dwell here, driven out from bliss, condemned
 In this abhorrèd deep to utter woe;
 Where pain of unextinguishable fire
 Must exercise us without hope of end,
 The vassals of his anger, when the scourge 90
 Inexorable, and the torturing hour, Calls us to penance? More destroyed than
 thus,
 We should be quite abolished, and expire.
 What fear we, then? what doubt we to incense 94
 His utmost ire? which, to the height enraged,
 Will either quite consume us, and reduce
 To nothing this essential (happier far Than miserable to have eternal being),
 Or, if our substance be indeed divine,
 And cannot cease to be, we are at worst 100
 On this side nothing; and by proof we feel
 Our power sufficient to disturb his heaven,
 And with perpetual inroads to alarm,
 Though inaccessible, his fatal throne;
 Which, if not victory, is yet revenge." 105
 He ended frowning, and his look denounced
 Desperate revenge, and battle dangerous
 To less than gods. On the other side uprose Belial, in act more graceful and humane;
 A fairer person lost not heaven; he seemed
 For dignity composed, and high exploit: 111
 But all was false and hollow, though his
 tongue
 Dropt manna, and could make the worse
 appear
 The better reason, to perplex and dash Maturest counsels: for his thoughts were
 low: 115
 To vice industrious, but to nobler deeds Timorous and slothful; yet he pleased the
 ear,
 And with persuasive accent thus began:—
 "I should be much for open war, O peers,
 As not behind in hate; if what was urged 120

Main reason to persuade immediate war, Did not dissuade me most, and seem to cast
 Ominous conjecture on the whole success
 When he who most excels in fact of arms,
 In what he counsels and in what excels 125
 Mistrustful, grounds his courage on despair
 And utter dissolution as the scope
 Of all his aim, after some dire revenge.
 First, what revenge? The towers of heaven are filled
 With armèd watch, that render all access 130
 Impregnable; oft on the bordering deep
 Encamp their legions; or, with obscure wing,
 Scout far and wide into the realm of night, Scorning surprise. Or could we break our
 way
 By force, and at our heels all hell should rise 135
 With blackest insurrection, to confound
 Heaven's purest light; yet our great enemy,
 All incorruptible, would on his throne
 Sit unpolled, and the ethereal mold,
 Incapable of stain, would soon expel 140
 Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire,
 Victorious. Thus repulsed, our final hope
 Is flat despair: we must exasperate
 The almighty Victor to spend all his rage,
 And that must end us; that must be our cure,
 To be no more. Sad cure! for who would lose, 146
 Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
 Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
 To perish rather, swallowed up and lost
 In the wide womb of uncreated night, 150 Devoid of sense and motion? And who knows,
 Let this be good, whether our angry foe
 Can give it, or will ever? how he can,
 Is doubtful; that he never will, is sure.
 Will he, so wise, let loose at once his ire 155
 Belike through impotence, or unaware,
 To give his enemies their wish, and end
 Them in his anger whom his anger saves.
 To punish endless? 'Wherefore cease we
 then?'
 Say they who counsel war. 'We are decreed, 160
 Reserved, and destined to eternal woe;
 Whatever doing, what can we suffer more,
 What can we suffer worse?' Is this then worst,
 Thus sitting, thus consulting, thus in arms?

What, when we fled amain, pursued, and
 struck 165
 With heaven's afflicting thunder, and besought
 The deep to shelter us? this hell then seemed
 A refuge from those wounds; or when we lay Chained on the burning lake? that sure was worse.
 What if the breath that kindled those grim fires, 170
 Awaked, should blow them into sevenfold
 rage,
 And plunge us in the flames? or, from
 above,
 Should intermitted vengeance arm again
 His red right hand to plague us? What if
 all 174
 Her stores were opened, and this firmament
 Of hell should spout her cataracts of fire,
 Impendent horrors, threatening hideous fall
 One day upon our heads; while we, perhaps,
 Designing or exhorting glorious war,
 Caught in a fiery tempest, shall be hurled 180
 Each on his rock transfixed, the sport and
 prey
 Of racking whirlwinds; or for ever sunk
 Under yon boiling ocean, wrapt in chains;
 There to converse with everlasting groans,
 Unrespired, unpitied, unreprieved, 185
 Ages of hopeless end? This would be worse.
 War, therefore, open or concealed, alike
 My voice dissuades; for what can force or guile
 With him, or who deceive his mind, whose
 eye
 Views all things at one view? He from heaven's height 190
 All these our motions vain sees and derides:
 Not more almighty to resist our might,
 Than wise to frustrate all our plots and wiles.
 Shall we then live thus vile, the race of
 heaven
 Thus trampled, thus expelled, to suffer
 here 195
 Chains and these torments? Better these than worse,
 By my advice; since fate inevitable
 Subdues us, and omnipotent decree,
 The victor's will. To suffer, as to do,
 Our strength is equal, nor the law unjust 200
 That so ordains; this was at first resolved,
 If we were wise, against so great a foe

Contending, and so doubtful what might fall.
 I laugh, when those who at the spear are bold
 And venturous, if that fail them, shrink and fear 205
 What yet they know must follow, to endure.
 Exile, or ignominy, or bonds, or pains,
 The sentence of their conqueror; this is
 now
 Our doom; which if we can sustain and bear,
 Our supreme foe in time may much remit 210
 His anger; and perhaps, thus far removed,
 Not mind us not offending, satisfied
 With what is punished; whence these raging
 fires
 Will slacken, if his breath stir not their flames.
 Our purer essence then will overcome 215
 Their noxious vapor; or, inured, not feel;
 Or, changed at length, and to the place conformed
 In temper and in nature, will receive
 Familiar the fierce heat, and void of pain;
 This horror will grow mild, this darkness
 light; 220
 Besides what hope the never-ending flight
 Of future days may bring, what chance, what change
 Worth waiting; since our present lot appears
 For happy though but ill, for ill not worst,
 If we procure not to ourselves more woe." 225
 Thus Belial, with words clothed in reason's
 garb,
 Counseled ignoble ease, and peaceful sloth,
 Not peace; and after him thus Mammon
 spake:—
 "Either to disenthroned the King of heaven
 We war, if war be best, or to regain 230
 Our own right lost: him to unthroned we then
 May hope, when everlasting fate shall yield
 To fickle chance, and Chaos judge the strife:
 The former, vain to hope, argues as vain
 The latter; for what place can be for us 235
 Within heaven's bound, unless heaven's Lord supreme
 We overpower? Suppose he should relent,
 And publish grace to all, on promise made
 Of new subjection; with what eyes could we Stand in his presence humble, and receive 240
 Strict laws imposed, to celebrate his throne
 With warbled hymns, and to his Godhead
 sing
 Forced hallelujahs, while he lordly sits

Our envied sovereign, and his altar breathes
Ambrosial odors and ambrosial flowers, 245
Our servile offerings? This must be our task

In heaven, this our delight; how wearisome
Eternity so spent, in worship paid
To whom we hate! Let us not then pursue
By force impossible, by leave obtained 250
Unacceptable, though in heaven, our state
Of splendid vassalage; but rather seek Our own good from ourselves, and from our own

Live to ourselves, though in this vast recess,
Free, and to none accountable, preferring 255
Hard liberty before the easy yoke
Of servile pomp. Our greatness will appear Then most conspicuous, when great things of small,

Useful of hurtful, prosperous of adverse,
We can create; and in what place soe'er 260 Thrive under evil, and work ease out of
pain,

Through labor and endurance. This deep world

Of darkness do we dread? How oft amidst Thick clouds and dark doth heaven's all-ruling Sire

Choose to reside, his glory unobscured, 265
And with the majesty of darkness round Covers his throne; from whence deep thunders roar,

Mustering their rage, and heaven resembles
hell!

As he our darkness, cannot we his light 269
Imitate when we please? This desert soil Wants not her hidden luster, gems and
gold;

Nor want we skill or art, from whence to raise

Magnificence; and what can heaven show
more?

Our torments also may in length of time
Become our elements; these piercing fires 275
As soft as now severe, our temper changed
Into their temper; which must needs remove
The sensible of pain. All things invite
To peaceful counsels, and the settled state
Of order, how in safety best we may 280
Compose our present evils, with regard
Of what we are, and where; dismissing quite All thoughts of war. Ye have what I advise."

He scarce had finished, when such murmur filled

The assembly, as when hollow rocks retain 285

The sound of blustering winds which all night long

Had roused the sea, now with hoarse cadence lull

Seafaring men o'er-watched, whose bark by chance

Or pinnace anchors in a craggy bay
After the tempest: such applause was
heard 290

As Mammon ended, and his sentence pleased,
Advising peace; for such another field

They dreaded worse than hell; so much the
fear

Of thunder and the sword of Michael Wrought still within them, and no less
desire 295

To found this nether empire, which might rise
By policy, and long process of time,

In emulation opposite to heaven.

Which when Beëlzebub perceived, than whom,

Satan except, none higher sat, with grave 300

Aspect he rose, and in his rising seemed

A pillar of state; deep on his front engraven

Deliberation sat, and public care;

And princely counsel in his face yet shone,

Majestic, though in ruin; sage he stood. 305

With Atlantean shoulders fit to bear

The weight of mightiest monarchies; his look

Drew audience and attention still as night

Or summer's noontide air, while thus he
spake:—

"Thrones and imperial powers, offspring of heaven, 310

Ethereal virtues! or these titles now

Must we renounce, and, changing style, be called

Princes of hell, for so the popular vote

Inclines, here to continue and build up here

A growing empire; doubtless, while we dream, 315

And know not that the King of heaven hath doomed

This place our dungeon; not our safe retreat

Beyond his potent arm; to live exempt

From heaven's high jurisdiction, in new league

Banded against his throne, but to remain 320

In strictest bondage, though thus far removed,

Under the inevitable curb, reserved

His captive multitude; for he, be sure;
 In height or depth, still first and last will reign
 Sole king, and of his kingdom lose no part 325
 By our revolt, but over hell extend
 His empire, and with iron scepter rule
 Us here, as with his golden those in heaven.
 What sit we then projecting peace and war?
 War hath determined us, and foiled with loss 330
 Irreparable; terms of peace yet none Vouchsafed or sought; for what peace will be given
 To us enslaved but custody severe,
 And stripes, and arbitrary punishment
 Inflicted? and what peace can we return, 335
 But to our power hostility and hate,
 Untamed reluctance, and revenge, though
 slow,
 Yet ever plotting how the Conqueror least May reap his conquest, and may least rejoice
 In doing what we most in suffering feel? 340
 Nor will occasion want, nor shall we need
 With dangerous expedition to invade Heaven, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,
 Or ambush from the deep. What if we find
 Some easier enterprise? There is a place 345
 (If ancient and prophetic fame in heaven
 Err not), another world, the happy seat
 Of some new race, called Man, about this
 time
 To be created like to us, though less 349
 In power and excellence, but favored more
 Of him who rules above; so was his will Pronounced among the gods; and by an oath
 That shook heaven's whole circumference confirmed.
 Thither let us bend all our thoughts, to learn 354
 What creatures there inhabit, of what mold Or substance, how endued, and what their
 power,
 And where their weakness, how attempted
 best,
 By force or subtlety. Though heaven be shut,
 And heaven's high Arbitrator sit secure
 In his own strength, this place may lie exposed, 360
 The utmost border of his kingdom, left
 To their defense who hold it; here perhaps

Some advantageous act may be achieved
 By sudden onset; either with hell-fire
 To waste his whole creation, or possess 365
 All as our own, and drive, as we were driven,
 The puny habitants; or, if not drive,
 Seduce them to our party, that their God
 May prove their foe, and with repenting
 hand Abolish his own works. This would surpass 370
 Common revenge, and interrupt his joy
 In our confusion, and our joy upraise
 In his disturbance, when his darling sons, Hurl'd headlong to partake with us, shall curse
 Their frail original and faded bliss, 375
 Faded so soon. Advise, if this be worth
 Attempting, or to sit in darkness here
 Hatching vain empires." Thus Beëlzebub
 Pleaded his devilish counsel, first devised 379
 By Satan, and in part proposed: for whence
 But from the author of all ill could spring
 So deep a malice, to confound the race
 Of mankind in one root, and earth with
 hell
 To mingle and involve, done all to spite
 The great Creator? But their spite still serves 385
 His glory to augment. The bold design
 Pleas'd highly those infernal states, and joy
 Sparkled in all their eyes: with full assent
 They vote: whereat his speech he thus renews:—
 "Well have ye judged, well ended long debate, 390
 Synod of gods, and, like to what ye are,
 Great things resolved, which from the lowest
 deep
 Will once more lift us up, in spite of fate.
 Nearer our ancient seat: perhaps in view
 Of those bright confines, whence, with neighboring arms, 395
 And opportune excursion, we may chance
 Re-enter heaven; or else in some mild zone
 Dwell, not unvisited of heaven's fair light,
 Secure; and at the brightening orient beam
 Purge off this gloom; the soft delicious air,
 To heal the scar of these corrosive fires, 401 Shall breathe her balm. But first, whom shall we send
 In search of this new world? whom shall we
 find Sufficient? who shall tempt with wandering feet

The dark, unbottomed, infinite abyss, 405
 And through the palpable obscure find out
 His uncouth way, or spread his æery flight,
 Upborne with indefatigable wings,
 Over the vast abrupt, ere he arrive
 The happy isle? What strength, what art, can then 410
 Suffice, or what evasion bear him safe
 Through the strict senteries and stations thick
 Of angels watching round? Here he had need
 All circumspection, and we now no less Choice in our suffrage; for, on whom we send, 415
 The weight of all, and our last hope relies."
 This said, he sat; and expectation held
 His look suspense, awaiting who appeared
 To second, or oppose, or undertake
 The perilous attempt: but all sat mute, 420
 Pondering the danger with deep thoughts;
 and each
 In other's countenance read his own dismay,
 Astonished: none among the choice and prime
 Of those heaven-warring champions could be found
 So hardy as to proffer* or accept, 425
 Alone, the dreadful voyage; till at last Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised
 Above his fellows, with monarchal pride, Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus
 spake:— 429
 "O progeny of heaven! empyreal thrones!
 With reason hath deep silence and demur Seized us, though undismayed. Long is the way
 And hard, that out of hell leads up to light;
 Our prison strong; this huge convex of fire,
 Outrageous to devour, immurèd us round 435
 Ninefold; and gates of burning adamant,
 Barred over us, prohibit all egress.
 These passed, if any pass, the void profound
 Of unessential night receives him next,
 Wide-gaping, and with utter loss of being 440
 Threatens him plunged in that abortive gulf.
 If thence he 'scape into whatever world
 Or unknown region, what remains him less
 Than unknown dangers and as hard escape?
 But I should ill become this throne, O peers,
 And this imperial sovereignty, adorned 446
 With splendor, armed with power, if aught proposed

And judged of public moment, in the shape
 Of difficulty or danger, could deter Me from attempting. Wherefore do I assume 450
 These royalties, and not refuse to reign,
 Refusing to accept as great a share
 Of hazard as of honor, due alike
 To him who reigns, and so much to him due
 Of hazard more, as he above the rest 455
 High honored sits? Go, therefore, mighty powers.
 Terror of heaven, though fallen; intend at
 home
 (While here shall be our home) what best may ease
 The present misery, and render hell
 More tolerable; if there be cure or charm 460
 To respite, or deceive, or slack the pain
 Of this ill mansion; intermit no watch
 Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad
 Through all the coasts of dark destruction
 seek Deliverance for us all: this enterprise 465 None shall partake with me." Thus saying,
 rose
 The monarch, and prevented all reply;
 Prudent, lest from his resolution raised
 Others among the chief might offer now (Certain to be refused) what erst they feared; 470
 And, so refused, might in opinion stand
 His rivals; winning cheap the high repute
 Which he through hazard huge must earn.
 But they Dreaded not more the adventure than his voice 474
 Forbidding; and at once with him they
 rose.
 Their rising all at once was as the sound
 Of thunder heard remote. Towards him they bend
 With awful reverence prone; and as a god
 Extol him equal to the Highest in heaven.
 Nor failed they to express how much they praised 480
 That for the general safety he despised
 His own: for neither do the spirits damned Lose all their virtue; lest bad men should boast
 Their specious deeds on earth, which glory
 excites 484
 Or close ambition varnished o'er with zeal.
 Thus they their doubtful consultations
 dark

Ended, rejoicing in their matchless chief.
 As when from mountain-tops the dusky
 clouds
 Ascending, while the north wind sleeps, o'erspread 489
 Heaven's cheerful face, the louring element Scowls o'er the darkened landscape snow or shower;
 If chance the radiant sun, with farewell
 sweet,
 Extend his evening beam, the fields revive,
 The birds their notes renew, and bleating
 herds 494

Attest their joy, that hill and valley rings.
 O shame to men! devil with devil damned
 Firm concord holds, men only disagree
 Of creatures rational, though under hope
 Of heavenly grace; and, God proclaiming
 peace,
 Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife 500
 Among themselves, and levy cruel wars,
 Wasting the earth, each other to destroy:
 As if (which might induce us to accord)
 Man had not hellish foes enough besides, 504
 That day and night for his destruction wait.

TRAGEDY

TRAGEDY

DRAMA of any kind is a struggle between man and some contending force, with the victory awarded to one of the antagonists; tragic drama represents the will of man asserting itself against powers too great for it, and going down to disaster, a defeat of the individual will by the destructive fate inherent in human life. The tragic hero may meet the catastrophe heroically—as in the tragedy of the Greeks and for the most part in Shakespeare—thereby tending to create a sense of reconciliation between the moral order of the universe and the individual soul; or he may meet it miserably in futile revolt against the tyranny of social laws or inherited weakness, as is the case in Ibsen and in most of modern tragedy. Whatever the emphasis, tragedy is always character in action, and the spectator learns through silent participation in tragic action the tremendous possibilities of conflict in his own life and in the lives of others.

Tragedy, says Aristotle¹, is the imitation of an action that is serious, complete, and of a certain magnitude; embellished by poetic language; through pity and fear effecting a purgation of the passions (emotions). The drama of ancient Athens was indeed serious and complete, and the magnitude of character and action is made evident by the fact that demigods and heroes chosen out of the legendary past became the tragic victims of universal fate. It was composed in dramatic and lyric verse, the choric odes being worked out according to an elaborate metrical scheme. Finally, Attic tragedy, through the qualities of pity and fear, purged the spectator's feelings; that is to say, it cleansed them of pettiness and meanness and the other impurities of everyday life by conveying the spectator out of and above himself as he watched the working of universal law in the downfall of a great and noble character. Without pity, the action would be too painful to be witnessed, and therefore the tragic hero must be nobly and sympathetically drawn; without fear for one's own fate under like circumstances the action would remain merely pathetic, and the spectator's feelings would dissolve in sentimental tears. These are the main qualities of Athenian tragedy as Aristotle has defined them, and the great critic wrote his fragmentary treatise² after the illustrious period of drama had run its course.

Tragedy in Athens, as elsewhere, originated in religious ceremonial and always remained in close relation to the state religion. The festivals of Dionysus celebrating the return of spring and the infusion of new life into all growing things, included, at first, choric dances in honor of the god, which gradually developed into antiphonal responses between the two groups of the dancers. Gradually a single actor took the place of one of these groups, and Attic tragedy was born. Throughout the great age of Greek drama, however, the processional in honor of the god always preceded the dramatic performances.

Of the three great tragic playwrights who brought glory to the Attic theatre, Aeschylus (525-456 B. C.) was the earliest and, in some respects, the greatest. Seventy dramas are reputed to have come from his hand, but only seven are extant. Prometheus Bound and Agamemnon tower above the others in moral grandeur and gigantic power. Punishment of pride, or hubris, is their theme, the reassertion of the moral order after its violation by presumptuous man. Deep religious feeling and poetic sublimity are the poet's characteristic notes.

Perfection in form, a greater humanity, and tragic intensity distinguish Sophocles (496-406 B. C.), the complete expression of the Greek genius during the age of Attic supremacy. Sophocles, by adding a third actor to the Æschylean drama of two actors and a chorus, measurably increased the possibilities of complication and conflict. The inevitable fate descending upon Œdipus and the struggle of Antigone against the stubborn Creon in the name of a higher moral law than that of the state are two of the most memorable and enthralling actions in the history of tragedy.

In Euripides (480-407 B. C.) we discover a decline in the spirit of Greek tragedy. The growing skepticism introduced into Greek life by the Sophists—a skepticism which was beginning to undermine faith in the justice of the gods—finds its place in the plays of this very human and very tragic dramatist. Revolt against conventional theology and conventional moral sanctions, and indignation against injustice characterize his plays. They therefore lean toward a passionate and romantic melodrama. And yet, withal, Euripides chose materials from the heroic legends of Greece and was nearly always a great poet. Hippolytus is punished for an overweening pride in his own chastity, and goes to his death for neglecting due service to Aprodite. Thus in the poet's greatest play the Greek feeling for a complete humanity causes an otherwise ideal hero to be punished for the crime of neglecting one side of his nature.

The drama of the Middle Ages, like that of Athens, traces its origin to the influence of religion. The need felt by the Church for popular religious instruction resulted in a dramatic representation of the burying of the Cross on Good Friday and its resurrection on Easter Sunday, and in appropriate exercises before the manger on Christmas Eve. Out of this grew the presentation in the vernacular, of the whole Scriptural story, first by monks and then by the Trade Guilds, upon the great festival days of the Church. This custom created the Miracle play, which flourished for nearly three centuries before it was secularized and the modern drama was born. A late development of the Miracle play was the Morality, which gave attention exclusively to moral instruction. In this the good and evil qualities constituting man's nature fought for the supremacy, and the audience was duly edified, or horrified, by the victory of the powers of good or evil, respectively. This extensive use of allegory to depict the moral struggle within the breast of man passed into the great Elizabethan age and may be discovered in weakened form in such a play as Marlowe's The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus. Everyman, thought by some scholars to have been a translation from the Dutch, is the most perfect specimen of the Morality—in fact, of the whole medieval drama—in English. The pathos and the dramatic suspense and the universality of theme make it one of the genuine tragedies of the world.

The "spacious times of great Elizabeth" witnessed the second great flowering in the history of the drama. The abounding vitality of this period, its inheritance of a free technique from the drama of the Middle Ages, its extravagance, its adventurous and experimental spirit—all these created extraordinary conditions under which the new drama grew. The problem of evil had been derived from the past, and to it was added the tragic conflict of men as they labor under adverse fates.

Materials for dramatic treatment were drawn from all possible sources—from Plutarch and other classical writers, from the romantic literature of Italy, and from the historical and legendary English past. A free and romantic technique left the playwright opportunity to form his drama as he pleased, or as conditions imposed. Perhaps it is as a kind of sublimated melodrama that we can best view Elizabethan tragedy as a whole.

William Shakespeare (1564-1616) marked the culmination of the English Renaissance. He comprehended within himself all the impulses that made this period so very great: its magnificence, its overmastering passion to know, to do, to express the utmost reach of human thought. No other touched the heights and depths of human experience as did he, and no other equally expressed the infinite human diversity and waste. His magnificent group of tragedies reveals the romantic and the humanistic and the medieval influences inextricably bound together. King Lear, the play chosen for this book, is almost too colossal for the limitations of action upon the stage. The King's folly and his madness, his defiance of the pitiless storm and his broken submission to an unbending fate, and, finally, his tragic reconciliation with life just before he dies of a broken heart, make this play one of those Titanic creations of which human genius is occasionally capable.

To pass from Shakespeare to Racine

(1639-1699) is to leave a marvelous Gothic cathedral for the elegant drawing-room of the court of Louis XIV. Pseudo-classical rules imposed upon a playwright wholly amenable to their spirit formed a tragedy characterized by formal restraint, observation of the Three Unities of Time, Place, and Action, and concentration upon a single episode. Racine's tragedy was a kind of feminization of the Greek willingness to submit to necessary restriction. The interest centred itself upon some consuming passion—ambition, love, or jealousy—which brought about the tragic downfall of the hero, or oftener the heroine. Despite some resemblance to the elegance of the dancing-master, Racine does rise to great heights of passion, and his insight into the heart of woman is profoundly true. Athaliah (1691), his last dramatic work, draws its materials from Biblical history (II Kings 11 and II Chronicles 22 and 23). The frantic effort of the queen to avoid the fate revealed to her in a dream makes up the substance of this lofty and impressive play.

Modern tragedy reverses nearly every one of the dicta of Aristotle. Magnitude, and heroic sentiments, and the expansion of the feelings through the classical katharsis are abandoned in favor of a narrow scene, ordinary, middle-class characters, commonplace dialogue such as may be found among any group of average people, and a sense of contraction. Natural science has pretty well destroyed our belief in the heroic—in fact, it is struggling to annihilate the freedom of our wills, and our responsibility for our conduct. In place of the moral order of the universe which the Greek hero defied, and accordingly was punished by the just gods, we face today another abstraction which we name society, and which must bear the burden of our sins. Social forces, taints of blood, and often blind circumstance are the modern tragic protagonists. Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906), the grim Norwegian analyst in a series of compact and intensely realistic plays, reveals the sores of the modern world. Extravagantly individualistic, he calls for a permanent release from the corroding sins of hypocrisy, complacency, and social contentment. A Doll's House, perhaps the play freest from a depiction of abnormal states of mind, emphasizes the modern woman's need to free herself from the tyranny of masculine control.

Faust, the great dramatic poem, by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) does not fall into ordinary classifications. A poem of philosophical import and of epic quality (for its tragic theme is the struggle by the powers of Good and Evil for the possession of a man's soul), it tells of Faust's efforts to satisfy every desire of mind and body and his final salvation through service to his fellows. The theme and materials of this supreme expression of the romantic genius are drawn from common folk-lore sources. According to the medieval legend, a learned scholar sells his soul to the Devil for a few years of power and glory; in Goethe's hands the tale becomes a profound study of the human soul. Part I is a moving account of Faust's seduction of Margaret, the simple peasant girl whom Mephistopheles had thrown in his way. In the end she is purified through suffering, and as she dies she finds spiritual salvation. Faust, after manifold experiences of mind and senses, achieves salvation, and escapes payment of his bond, as noted above, through humanitarian service. With this rendering should be compared Marlowe's Doctor Faustus.

Each of these great dramas, including Faust, represents the struggle of the will of the hero against some species of destiny. And it is this tragic conception of life, which the author holds to the exclusion of every other point of view, that binds together all examples of the type. Whatever differences there may be in the Greek, the Renaissance, and the modern attitudes toward life, there remains this fatal conflict with destiny—and this is the essence of tragedy.

ARGUMENT

TEN years had passed since Agamemnon, son of Atreus, king of Mykenæ, had led the Hellenes to Troïa to take vengeance on Alexandros (also known as Paris), son of Priam. For Paris had basely wronged Menelaos, king of Sparta, Agamemnon's brother, in that, being received by him as a guest, he enticed his wife Helena to leave her lord and go with him to Troïa. And now the tenth year had come, and Paris was slain, and the city of the Trojans was taken and destroyed, and Agamemnon and the Hellenes were on their way homeward with the spoil and prisoners they had taken. But meanwhile Clytæmnestra too, Agamemnon's queen, had been unfaithful, and had taken as her paramour Ægisthos, son of that Thyestes whom Atreus, his brother, had made to eat, unknowing, of the flesh of his own children. And now, partly led by her adulterer, and partly seeking to avenge the death of her daughter Iphigeneia, whom Agamemnon had sacrificed to appease the wrath of Artemis, and partly also jealous because he was bringing back Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his concubine, she plotted with Ægisthos against her husband's life. But this was done secretly, and she stationed a guard on the roof of the royal palace to give note when he saw the beacon-fires, by which Agamemnon had promised that he would send tidings that Troia was taken.

SCENE:—Argos. The Palace of AGAMEMNON; statues of the Gods in front. Watchman on the roof. Time, night.

WATCHMAN. I ask the Gods a respite from these toils,
This keeping at my post the whole year round,
Wherein, upon the Atreidæ's roof reclined,
Like dog, upon my elbow, I have learnt
To know night's goodly company of stars, 5

And those bright lords that deck the firmament,

And winter bring to men, and harvest-tide;
[The rising and the setting of the stars.]

And now I watch for sign of beacon-torch,
The flash of fire that bringeth news from Troïa, 10

And tidings of its capture. So prevails
A woman's manly-purposed, hoping heart;
And when I keep my bed of little ease,
Drenched with the dew, unvisited by dreams,
(For fear, instead of sleep, my comrade is, 15
So that in sound sleep ne'er I close mine eyes,)

And when I think to sing a tune, or hum,
(My medicine of song to ward off sleep.)
Then weep I, wailing for this house's chance,
No more, as erst, right well administered. 20
Well! may I now find blest release from toils,
When fire from out the dark brings tidings good.

Pauses, then springs up suddenly, seeing a light in the distance.

Hail! thou torch-bearer of the night, that shedd'st

Light as of morn, and bringest full array
Of many choral bands in Argos met, 25
Because of this success. Hurrah! hurrah!
So clearly tell I Agamemnon's queen,
With all speed rising from her couch to raise Shrill cry of triumph o'er this beacon-fire
Throughout the house, since Ilion's citadel 30
Is taken, as full well that bright blaze shows.
I, for my part, will dance my prelude now;

Leaps and dances.

For I shall score my lord's new turn of luck,
This beacon-blaze may throw of triple six.
Well, would that I with this mine hand may touch 35
The dear hand of our king when he comes home!

As to all else, the word is "Hush!" An ox Rests on my tongue; had the house a voice
'Twould tell too clear a tale. I'm fain to speak

To those who know, forget with those who know not. 40

Exit.

¹Translation by Plumptre

Enter Chorus of twelve Argive elders, chanting as they march to take up their position in the centre of the stage. A procession of women bearing torches is seen in the distance.

Lo! the tenth year now is passing
 Since, of Priam great avengers,
 Menelaos, Agamemnon,
 Double-throned and doubled-sceptred,
 Power from sovran Zeus deriving— 45
 Mighty pair of the Atreidæ—
 Raised a fleet of thousand vessels
 Of the Argives from our country,
 Potent helpers in their warfare,
 Shouting cry of Ares fiercely; 50
 E'en as vultures shriek who hover,
 Wheeling, whirling o'er their eyrie,
 In wild sorrow for their nestlings,
 With their oars of stout wings rowing,
 Having lost the toil that bound them 55
 To their callow fledglings' couches.
 But on high One,—or Apollo,
 Zeus, or Pan,—the shrill cry hearing,
 Cry of birds that are his clients,
 Sendeth forth on men transgressing, 60
 Erinnyes, slow but sure avenger;
 So against young Alexandros
 Atreus' sons the great King sendeth,
 Zeus, of host and guest protector: 65
 He, for bride with many a lover,
 Will to Danai give and Troïans
 Many conflicts, men's limbs straining,
 When the knee in dust is crouching,
 And the spear-shaft in the onset
 Of the battle snaps asunder. 70
 But as things are now, so are they,
 So, as destined, shall the end be.
 Nor by tears, nor yet libations
 Shall he soothe the wrath unbending
 Caused by sacred rites left fireless. 75
 We, with old frame little honoured,
 Left behind that host are staying,
 Resting strength that equals childhood's
 On our staff: for in the bosom
 Of the boy, life's young sap rushing, 80
 Is of old age but the equal;
 Ares not as yet is found there:
 And the man in age exceeding,
 When the leaf is sere and withered,
 Goes with three feet on his journey; 85
 Not more Ares-like than boyhood,
 Like a day-seen dream he wanders.

Thou, of Tyndareus the daughter,
 Queen of Argos, Clytæmnestra,
 What has happened? what news cometh? 90
 What perceiving, on what tidings
 Leaning, dost thou put in motion
 All this solemn, great procession?
 Of the Gods who guard the city,
 Those above and those beneath us, 95
 Of the heaven, and of the market,
 Lo! with thy gifts blaze the altars;
 And through all the expanse of Heaven,
 Here and there, the torch-fire rises,
 With the flowing, pure persuasion 100
 Of the holy unguent nourished,
 And the chrism rich and kingly
 From the treasure-store's recesses,
 Telling what of this thou canst tell,
 What is right for thee to utter, 105
 Be a healer of my trouble,
 Trouble now my soul disturbing,
 While anon fond hope displaying Sacrificial signs propitious,
 Wards off care that no rest knoweth, 110
 Sorrow mind and heart corroding.

The Chorus, taking their places round the central thymele, begin their song.

STROPHE

Able am I to utter, setting forth
 The might from omens sprung
 What met the heroes as they journeyed on,
 (For still, by God's great gift, 115
 My age, yet linked with strength,
 Breathes suasive power of song.)
 How the Achæans' twin-throned majesty,
 Accordant rulers of the youth of Hellas,
 With spear and vengeful hand, 120
 Were sent by fierce, strong bird 'gainst
 Teucrian shore,
 Kings of the birds to kings of ships appearing,
 One black, with white tail one,
 Near to the palace, on the spear-hand side,
 On station seen of all, 125
 A pregnant hare devouring with her young,
 Robbed of all runs to come:
 Wail as for Linos, wail, wail bitterly,
 And yet may good prevail!

ANTISTROPHE

And the wise prophet of the army seeing 130
 The brave Atreidæ twain
 Of diverse mood, knew those that tore the hare,

Enter CLYTÆMNESTRA, followed by the procession of torch-bearers.

And those that led the host;
 And thus divining spake:
 "One day this armament 135
 Shall Priam's city sack, and all the herds Owned by the people, countless, by the towers,

Fate shall with force lay low.
 Only take heed lest any wrath of Gods
 Blunt the great curb of Troïa yet encamped,
 Struck down before its time; 141
 For Artemis the chaste that house doth hate,
 Her father's wingèd hounds,
 Who slay the mother with her unborn young,
 And loathes the eagles' feast. 145
 Wail as for Linos, wail, wail bitterly;
 And yet may good prevail!

EPODE

"For she, the fair One, though so kind of
 heart
 To fresh-dropt dew from mighty lion's womb,
 And young that suck the teats 150
 Of all that roam the fields,
 Yet prays Him bring to pass
 The portents of those birds,
 The omens good yet also full of dread.
 And Pæan I invoke 155
 As Healer, lest she on the Danaï send Delays that keep the ships
 Long time with hostile blasts,
 So urging on a new, strange sacrifice,
 Unblest, unfestivalled, 160
 By natural growth artificer of strife,
 Bearing far other fruit than wife's true fear,
 For there abideth yet,
 Fearful, recurring still, 164
 Ruling the house, full subtle, unforgetting,
 Vengeance for children slain."
 Such things, with great good mingled, Cal-
 chas spake,
 In voice that pierced the air,
 As destined by the birds that crossed our path
 To this our kingly house: 170
 And in accord with them,
 Wail as for Linos, wail, wail bitterly;
 And yet may good prevail.

STROPHE I

O Zeus—whate'er He be,
 If that Name please Him well, 175
 By that on Him I call:

Weighing all other names I fail to guess
 Aught else but Zeus, if I would cast aside,
 Clearly, in every deed,
 From off my soul this idle weight of care. 180

ANTISTROPHE I

Nor He who erst was great,
 Full of the might to war,
 Avails now; He is gone;
 And He who next came hath departed too,
 His victor meeting; but if one to Zeus, 185
 High triumph-praise should sing,
 His shall be all the wisdom of the wise;

STROPHE II

Yea, Zeus, who leadeth men in wisdom's way,
 And fixeth fast the law,
 That pain is gain; 190
 And slowly dropping on the heart in sleep
 Comes woe-recording care,
 And makes the unwilling yield to wiser
 thoughts:
 And doubtless this too comes from grace of
 Gods,
 Seated in might upon their awful thrones. 195

ANTISTROPHE II

And then of those Achæan ships the chief,
 The elder, blaming not
 Or seer or priest;
 But tempered to the fate that on him
 smote. . . .
 When that Achæan host 200
 Were vexed with adverse winds and failing stores,
 Still kept where Chalkis in the distance lies,
 And the vexed waves in Aulis ebb and flow;

STROPHE III

And breezes from the Strymon sweeping
 down,
 Breeding delays and hunger, driving forth
 Our men in wandering course, 206
 On seas without a port.
 Sparing nor ships, nor rope, nor sailing gear
 With doubled months wore down the Argive
 host;
 And when, for that wild storm, 210
 Of one more charm far harder for our chiefs
 The prophet told, and spake of Artemis,
 In tone so piercing shrill,

The Atreidæ smote their staves upon the
ground,
And could not stay their tears. 215

ANTISTROPHE III

And then the old king lifted up his voice,
And spake, "Great woe it is to disobey;
Great too to slay my child,
The pride and joy of home,
Polluting with the streams of maiden's
blood 220
Her father's hands upon the altar steps.
What course is free from ill?
How lose my ships and fail of mine allies?
'Tis meet that they with strong desire should seek
A rite the winds to soothe, 225
E'en though it be with blood of maiden pure;
May all end well at last!"

STROPHE III

So when he himself had harnessed
To the yoke of Fate unbending,
With a blast of strange, new feeling, 230
Sweeping o'er his heart and spirit,
Aweless, godless, and unholy,
He his thoughts and purpose altered
To full measure of all daring,
'Still base counsel's fatal frenzy, 235
Wretched primal source of evils,
Gives to mortal hearts strange boldness.)
And at last his heart he hardened
His own child to slay as victim,
Help in war that they were waging, 240
To avenge a woman's frailty.
Victim for the good ship's safety.

ANTISTROPHE III

All her prayers and eager callings,
On the tender name of Father,
All her young and maiden freshness, 245
They but set at nought, those rulers,
In their passion for the battle.
And her father gave commandment
To the servants of the Goddess,
When the prayer was o'er, to lift her, 250
Like a kid, above the altar,
In her garments wrapt, face downwards,—
Yea, to seize with all their courage,
And that o'er her lips of beauty
Should be set a watch to hinder 255
Words of curse against the houses,
With the gag's strength silence-working.

STROPHE IV

And she upon the ground
Pouring rich folds of veil in saffron dyed, Cast at each one of those who sacrificed 260
A piteous glance that pierced,
Fair as a pictured form;
And wishing,—all in vain,—
To speak; for oftentimes
In those her father's hospitable halls 265
She sang, a maiden pure with chastest song,
And her dear father's life
That poured its threefold cup of praise to God,
Crowned with all choicest good,
She with a daughter's love 270
Was wont to celebrate.

ANTISTROPHE IV

What then ensued mine eyes
Saw not, nor may I tell, but Calchas' arts Were found not fruitless. Justice turns the scale
For those to whom through pain 275
At last comes wisdom's gain.
But for our future fate,
Since help for it is none,
Good-bye to it before it comes, and this
Has the same end as wailing premature; 280
For with to-morrow's dawn
It will come clear; may good luck crown our fate!
So prays the one true guard,
Nearest and dearest found,
Of this our Apian land. 285

The Chief of the Chorus turns to CLYTÆMNES-TRA, and her train of handmaids, who are seen approaching.

CHOR. I come, O Clytæmnestra, honouring
Thy majesty: 'tis meet to pay respect
To a chief's wife, the man's throne empty
left:
But whether thou hast heard good news, or else
In hopes of tidings glad dost sacrifice, 290
I fain would hear, yet will not silence blame.
CLYTÆM. May Morning, as the proverb runs, appear
Bearing glad tidings from his mother Night!
Joy thou shalt learn beyond thy hope to hear;
For Argives now have taken Priam's city. 295

CHOR. What? Thy words sound so strange they flit by me.

CLYTÆM. The Achæans hold Troia. Speak I clear enough?

CHOR. Joy creeps upon me, drawing forth my tears.

CLYTÆM. Of loyal heart thine eyes give token true.

CHOR. What witness sure hast thou of these events? 300

CLYTÆM. Full clear (how else?) unless the God deceive.

CHOR. Reliest thou on dreams or visions seen?

CLYTÆM. I place no trust in mind weighed down with sleep.

CHOR. Hath then some wingless omen charmed thy soul?

CLYTÆM. My mind thou scorn'st, as though 'twere but a girl's. 305

CHOR. What time has passed since they the city sacked?

CLYTÆM. This very night, the mother of this morn.

CHOR. What herald could arrive with speed like this?

CLYTÆM. Hephæstos flashing forth bright flames from Ida:

Beacon to beacon from that courier-fire 310
Sent on its tidings; Ida to the rock
Hermæan named, in Lemnos: from the isle
The height of Athos, dear to Zeus, received
A third great torch of flame, and lifted up,
So as on high to skim the broad sea's back, 315
The stalwart fire rejoicing went its way;
The pine-wood, like a sun, sent forth its light
Of golden radiance to Makistos' watch;
And he, with no delay, nor unawares
Conquered by sleep, performed his courier's part: 320
Far off the torch-light, to Eurîpos' straits
Advancing, tells it to Messapion's guards:
They, in their turn, lit up and passed it on,
Kindling a pile of dry and aged heath.
Still strong and fresh the torch, not yet grown dim, 325
Leaping across Asôpos' plain in guise
Like a bright moon, towards Kithæron's rock,
Roused the next station of the courier flame.
And that far-travelled light the sentries there Refused not, burning more than all yet named: 330

And then the light swooped o'er Gorgôpis' lake,
And passing on to Ægiplanctos' mount,
Bade the bright fire's due order tarry not;
And they, enkindling boundless store, send on
A mighty beard of flame, and then it passed
The headland e'en that looks on Saron's gulf,
Still blazing. On it swept, until it came 337
To Arachnæan heights, the watch-tower near;
Then here on the Atreidæ's roof it swoops,
This light, of Ida's fire no doubtful heir. 340
Such is the order of my torch-race games;
One from another taking up the course,
But here the winner is both first and last;
And this sure proof and token now I tell thee,
Seeing that my lord hath sent it me from
Troia. 345
CHOR. I to the Gods, O Queen, will pray hereafter,
But fain would I hear all thy tale again,
E'en as thou tell'st, and satiate my wonder.
CLYTÆM. This very day the Achæans Troia hold.
I trow full diverse cry pervades the town: 350
Pour in the same vase vinegar and oil,
And you would call them enemies, not
friends;
And so from conquerors and from captives
now
The cries of varied fortune one may hear.
For these, low-fallen on the carcases 355
Of husbands and of brothers, children too
By aged fathers, mourn their dear ones' death
And that with throats that are no longer free.
And those the hungry toil of sleepless guard,
After the battle, at their breakfast sets; 360
Not billeted in order fixed and clear,
But just as each his own chance fortune
grasps,
They in the captive houses of the Troians Dwell, freed at last from all the night's chill frosts,
And dews of heaven, for now, poor wretches,
they 365
Will sleep all night without the sentry's
watch;
And if they reverence well the guardian Gods
Of that new-conquered country, and their shrines,
Then they, the captors, will not captured be.
Ah! let no evil lust attack the host 370 Conquered by greed, to plunder what they ought not:

For yet they need return in safety home,
Doubling the goal to run their backward
race.

But should the host come sinning 'gainst the Gods, 374

Then would the curse of those that perished
Be watchful, e'en though no quick ill might fall.

Such thoughts are mine, mere woman though
I be.

May good prevail beyond all doubtful chance!

For I have got the blessing of great joy.

CHOR. Thou, lady, kindly, like a sage, dost speak, 380

And I, on hearing thy sure evidence,
Prepare myself to give the Gods due thanks;
For they have wrought full meed for all our toil.

Exit CLYTÆMNESTRA with her train.

O Zeus our King! O Night beloved,
Mighty winner of great glories, 385
Who upon the towers of Troia
Casted'st snare of closest meshes,
So that none full-grown or youthful
Could o'erleap the net of bondage,
Woe of universal capture;— 390
Zeus, of host and guest protector,
Who hath brought these things, I worship;
He long since on Alexandros
Stretched his bow that so his arrow
Might not sweep at random, missing, 395
Or beyond the stars shoot idly.

STROPHE I

Yes, one may say, 'tis Zeus, whose blow they feel;

This one may clearly trace:

They fared as He decreed:

Yea, one there was who said, 400

"The Gods deign not to care for mortal men
By whom the grace of things inviolable
Is trampled under foot."

No fear of God had he:

Now is it to the children manifest 405

Of those who, overbold,

Breathed rebel War beyond the bounds of Right,

Their houses overfilled with precious store
Above the golden mean.

Ah! let our life be free from all that hurts, 410

So that for one who gains

Wisdom in heart and soul,
That lot may be enough.
Since still there is no bulwark strong in wealth

Against destruction's doom, 415
For one who in the pride of wantonness
Spurns the great altar of the Right and Just.

ANTISTROPHE I

Him woeful, subtle Impulse urges on,
Resistless in her might,
Atē's far-scheming child: 420
All remedy is vain.

It is not hidden, but is manifest,
That mischief with its horrid gleaming light;
And, like to worthless bronze,
By friction tried and tests, 425

It turns to tarnished blackness in its hue:
Since, boy-like, he pursues
A bird upon its flight, and so doth bring Upon his city shame intolerable:
And no God hears his prayer, 430
But bringeth low the unjust,
Who deals with deeds like this.
Thus Paris came to the Atreidæ's home,
And stole its queen away,
And so left brand of shame indelible 435
Upon the board where host and guest had sat.

STROPHE II

She, leaving to her countrymen at home
Wild din of spear and shield and ships of war,
And bringing, as her dower,

To Ilion doom of death, 440
Passed very swiftly through the palace gates,
Daring what none should dare;

And many a wailing cry
They raised, the minstrel prophets of the house,

"Woe for that kingly home! 445
Woe for that kingly home and for its chiefs!
Woe for the marriage-bed and traces left
Of wife who loved her lord!"

There stands he silent; foully wronged and
yet

Uttering no word of scorn, 450
In deepest woe perceiving she is gone;
And in his yearning love

For one beyond the sea,
A ghost shall seem to queen it o'er the house;
The grace of sculptured forms 455
Is loathed by her lord,

And in the penury of life's bright eyes
 All Aphrodite's charm
 To utter wreck has gone.

ANTISTROPHE II

And phantom shades that hover round in dreams 460
 Come full of sorrow, bringing vain delight;
 For vain it is, when one
 Sees seeming shows of good,
 And gliding through his hands the dream is
 gone,
 After a moment's space, 465
 On wings that follow still Upon the path where sleep goes to and fro.
 Such are the woes at home
 Upon the altar hearth, and worse than these.
 But on a wider scale for those who went 470
 From Hellas' ancient shore,
 A sore distress that causeth pain of heart
 Is seen in every house.
 Yea, many things there are that touch the quick:
 For those whom each did send 475
 He knoweth; but, instead Of living men, there come to each man's
 home
 Funeral urns alone,
 And ashes of the dead.

STROPHE III

For Ares, trafficking for golden coin 480
 The lifeless shapes of men,
 And in the rush of battle holding scales,
 Sends now from Ilion
 Dust from the funeral pyre,
 A burden sore to loving friends at home, 485
 And bitterly bewailed,
 Filling the brazen urn
 With well-smoothed ashes in the place of
 men;
 And with high praise they mourn
 This hero skilled and valiant in the fight, 490
 And that who in the battle nobly fell,
 All for another's wife:
 And other words some murmur secretly;
 And jealous discontent
 Against the Atreidæ, champions in the suit,
 Creeps on all stealthily; 496
 And some around the wall,
 In full and goodly form have sepulture
 There upon Ilion's soil,
 And their foes' land inters its conquerors. 500

ANTISTROPHE III

And so the murmurs of their subjects rise
 With sullen discontent,
 And do the dread work of a people's curse;
 And now my boding fear
 Awaits some news of ill, 505
 As yet enwrapt in blackness of the night.
 Not heedless are the Gods
 Of shedders of much blood,
 And the dark-robed Erinnyes in due time,
 By adverse chance of life, 510
 Place him who prospers in unrighteousness
 In gloom obscure; and once among the un-
 seen,
 There is no help for him:
 Fame in excess is but a perilous thing;
 For on men's quivering eyes 515
 Is hurled by Zeus the blinding thunder-bolt.
 I praise the good success
 That rouses not God's wrath;
 Ne'er be it mine a city to lay waste.
 Nor, as a prisoner, see 520
 My life wear on beneath another's power!

EPODE

And now at bidding of the courier flame,
 The herald of good news,
 A rumour swift spreads through the city streets,
 But who knows clearly whether it be true,
 Or whether God has mingled lies with it? 526
 Who is so childish or so reft of sense,
 As with his heart a-glow
 At that fresh uttered message of the flame,
 Then to wax sad at changing rumour's sound?
 It suits the mood that sways a woman's
 mind 531
 To pour thanksgiving ere the truth is seen:
 Quickly, with rapid steps, too credulous,
 The limit which a woman sets to trust
 Advances evermore; 535
 And with swift doom of death
 A rumour spread by woman perishes.
As the Chorus ends, a Herald is seen approaching, his head wreathed with olive.
 Soon we shall know the sequence of the torches
 Light-giving, and of all the beacon-fires,
 If they be true; or if, as 'twere a dream, 540
 This sweet light coming hath beguiled our minds.
 I see a herald coming from the shore,

With olive boughs o'ershadowed, and the
dust,
Dry sister-twin of mire, announces this,
That neither without voice, nor kindling blaze 545
Of wood upon the mountains, he will signal
With smoke from fire, but either he will
come,
With clear speech bidding us rejoice, or else
... [pauses]
The word opposed to this I much dislike.
Nay, may good issue good beginnings crown!
Who for our city utters other prayers, 551
May he himself his soul's great error reap!
HERALD. Hail, soil of this my Argive fatherland.
Now in the light of the tenth year I reach
thee,
Though many hopes are shattered, gaining
one. 555
For never did I think in Argive land
To die, and share the tomb that most I craved.
Now hail! thou land; and hail! thou light of
day:
Zeus our great ruler, and thou Pythian king,
No longer darting arrows from thy bow. 560
Full hostile wast thou by Scamandros' banks,
Now be thou Saviour, yea, and Healer found,
O king Apollo! and the Gods of war,
These I invoke; my patron Hermes too, 564
Dear herald, whom all heralds reverence,—
Those heroes, too, that sent us,—graciously To welcome back the host that war has spared.
Hail, O ye royal dwellings, home beloved!
Ye solemn thrones, and Gods who face the
sun!
If e'er of old, with cheerful glances now 570
After long time receive our king's array.
For he is come, in darkness bringing light
To you and all, our monarch, Agamemnon.
Salute him with all grace; for so 'tis meet,
Since he hath dug up Troia with the spade
Of Zeus the Avenger, and the plain laid waste; 576
Fallen their altars and the shrines of Gods;
The seed of all the land is rooted out,
This yoke of bondage casting over Troia,
Our chief, the elder of the Atreidæ, comes,
A man full blest, and worthiest of high honour 581
Of all that are. For neither Paris' self,
Nor his accomplice city now can boast

Their deed exceeds its punishment. For he,
Found guilty on the charge of rape and theft, Hath lost his prize and brought his father's
house, 586
With lands and all, to waste and utter wreck;
And Priam's sons have double forfeit paid.
CHOR. Joy, joy, thou herald of the Achæan host!
HER. All joy is mine: I shrink from death
no more. 590
CHOR. Did love for this thy fatherland
so try thee?
HER. So that mine eyes weep tears for very joy,
CHOR. Disease full sweet then this ye suffered from' . . .
HER. How so? When taught, I shall thy meaning master.
CHOR. Ye longed for us who yearned for you in turn. 595
HER. Say'st thou this land its yearning host yearned o'er?
CHOR. Yea, so that oft I groaned in gloom of heart.
HER. Whence came these bodings that an army hates?
CHOR. Silence I've held long since a charm for ill.
HER. How, when your lords were absent, feared ye any? 600
CHOR. To use thy words, death now would welcome be.
HER. Good is the issue; but in so long
time
Some things, one well might say, have prospered well,
And some give cause for murmurs. Save the Gods,
Who free from sorrow lives out all his life? 605
For should I tell of toils, and how we lodged
Full hardly, seldom putting in to shore,
And then with couch full hard. . . .
What gave us not Good cause for mourning? What ill had we
not
As daily portion? And what passed on land,
That brought yet greater hardship: for our beds 611
Were under our foes' walls, and meadow mists
From heaven and earth still left us wringing wet,
A constant mischief to our garments, making

Our hair as shaggy as the beasts'. And if One spoke of winter frosts that killed the birds, 616

By Ida's snow-storms made intolerable,
Or heat, when Ocean in its noontide couch Windless reclined and slept without a wave. . . .

But why lament o'er this? Our toil is past;
Past too is theirs who in the warfare fell, 621
So that no care have they to rise again.

Why should I count the number of the dead,
Or he that lives mourn o'er a past mischance?
To change and chance I bid a long Farewell:
With us, the remnant of the Argive host, 626
Good fortune wins, no ills as counterpoise.

So it is meet to this bright sun we boast,
Who travel homeward over land and sea;
"The Argive host who now have captured
Troia, 630

These spoils of battle to the Gods of Hellas
Hang on their pegs, enduring prize and joy."
Hearing these things we ought to bless our country

And our commanders; and the grace of Zeus That wrought this shall be honoured. My tale's told. 635

CHOR. Thy words o'ercome me, and I say not nay;
To learn good keeps youth's freshness with the old.

'Tis meet these things should be a special
care

To Clytæmnestra and the house, and yet
That they should make me sharer in their
joy. 640

Enter CLYTÆMNESTRA

CLYTÆM. I long ago for gladness raised my cry,

When the first fiery courier came by night,
Telling of Troia taken and laid waste:
And then one girding at me spake, "Dost think,

Trusting in beacons, Troia is laid waste? 645
This heart elate is just a woman's way."
In words like these they made me out dis-
traught;

Yet still I sacrificed, and with a strain Shrill as a woman's, they, now here, now
there, 649

Throughout the city hymns of blessing raised
In shrines of Gods, and lulled to gentle sleep
The fragrant flame that on the incense fed.

And now why need'st thou lengthen out thy
words?

I from the king himself the tale shall learn:
And that I show all zeal to welcome back 655
My honoured lord on his return (for what
Is brighter joy for wife to see than this,
When God has brought her husband back from war, 658

To open wide her gates?) tell my lord this,
"To come with all his speed, the city's idol;"
And "may he find a faithful wife at home,
Such as he left her, noble watch-dog still
For him, and hostile to his enemies;
And like in all things else, who has not broken

One seal of his in all this length of time." 665
No pleasure have I known, nor scandal ill
With any other more than . . . stains on bronze.

Such is my vaunt, and being full of truth,
Not shameful for a noble wife to speak.

Exit.

CHOR. [to HERALD.] She hath thus spoken in thy hearing now 670

A goodly word for good interpreters.
But tell me, herald, tell of Menelaos,
If, coming home again in safety he Is with you, the dear strength of this our land.

HER. I cannot make report of false good
news, 675

So that my friends should long rejoice in it.
CHOR. Ah! could'st thou good news speak, and also true!

These things asunder are not well concealed.

HER. The chief has vanished from the Achæan host, 679

He and his ship. I speak no falsehood here.

CHOR. In sight of all when he from Ilion sailed?

Or did a storm's wide evil part him from you?

HER. Like skilful archer thou hast hit the mark,

And in few words hast told of evil long. 684

CHOR. And was it of him as alive or dead
The whisper of the other sailors ran?

HER. None to that question answer clear can give,

Save the Sun-God who feeds the life of earth.

CHOR. How say'st thou? Did a storm come on our fleet, 689

And do its work through anger of the Gods?

HER. It is not meet a day of tidings good
To mar with evil news. Apart for each

Is special worship. But when courier brings With louring face the ill men pray against,
And tells a city that its host has fallen, 695
That for the State there is a general wound, That many a man from many a home is driven,

As banned by double scourge that Ares loves, Woe doubly-barbed, Death's two-horsed chariot this . . .

When with such griefs as freight a herald
comes, 700

'Tis meet to chant the Erinnyes' dolorous
song;

But for glad messenger of good deeds
wrought

That bring deliverance, coming to a town
Rejoicing in its triumph, . . . how shall I
Blend good with evil, telling of a storm 705
That smote the Achæans, not without God's wrath?

For they a compact swore who erst were foes,
Ocean and Fire, and their pledges gave,
Wrecking the ill-starred army of the Argives;
And in the night rose ill of raging storm: 710
For Thracian tempests shattered all the ships,

Each on the other. Some thus crashed and bruised,

By the storm stricken and the surging foam
Of wind-tost waves, soon vanished out of
sight,

Whirled by an evil pilot. And when rose 715
The sun's bright orb, behold, the Ægæan sea
Blossomed with wrecks of ships and dead
Achæans.

And as for us and our uninjured ship,
Surely 'twas some one stole or begged us off,
Some God, not man, presiding at the helm;
And on our ship with good will Fortune sat,
Giver of safety, so that nor in haven 722
Felt we the breakers, nor on rough rockbeach

Ran we aground. But when we had escaped
The hell of waters, then in clear, bright day,
Not trusting in our fortune, we in
thought 726

O'er new ills brooded of our host destroyed,
And eke most roughly handled. And if still Breathe any of them they report of us
As having perished. How else should they speak? 730

And we in our turn deem that they are so.
God send good ending! Look you, first and chief,

For Menelaos' coming; and indeed,
If any sunbeam know of him alive
And well, by help of Zeus who has not willed
As yet to blot out all the regal race, 736
Some hope there is that he'll come back
again.

Know, hearing this, that thou the truth hast
heard.

Exit HERALD.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Who was it named her with such wondrous truth?

(Could it be One unseen, 740
In strange prevision of her destined work, Guiding the tongue through chance?)
Who gave that war-wed, strife-upstirring one
The name of Helen, ominous of ill?

For all too plainly she 745
Hath been to men, and ships,
And towers, as doom of Hell.

From bower of gorgeous curtains forth she sailed

With breeze of Zephyr Titan-born and strong;

And hosts of many men, 750
Hunters that bore the shield, Went on the track of those who steered their boat

Unseen to leafy banks of Simois,
On her account who came,
Dire cause of strife with bloodshed in her train. 755

ANTISTROPHE I

And so the wrath which works its vengeance
out

Dear bride to Ilium brought,
(Ah, all too truly named!) exacting still After long lapse of time

The penalty of foul dishonour done 760
To friendship's board and Zeus, of host and guest

The God, from those who paid
Their loud-voiced honour then Unto that bridal strain,
That hymeneal chorus which to chant 765
Fell to the lot of all the bridegroom's kin.

But learning other song,
Priam's ancient city now
Bewailleth sore, and calls on Paris' name,
Wedded in fatal wedlock; all the time 770
Enduring tear-fraught life
For all the blood its citizens had lost.

STROPHE II

So once a lion's cub,
 A mischief in his house,
 As foster child one reared, 775
 While still it loved the teats;
 In life's preluding dawn
 Tame, by the children loved,
 And fondled by the old,
 Oft in his arms 'twas held, 780
 Like infant newly born,
 With eyes that brightened to the hand that stroked,
 And fawning at the hest of hunger keen.

ANTISTROPHE II

But when full-grown, it showed
 The nature of its sires; 785
 For it unbidden made
 A feast in recompense
 Of all their fostering care,
 By banquet of slain sheep;
 With blood the house was stained, 790
 A curse no slaves could check,
 Great mischief murderous:
 By God's decree a priest of Atë thus Was reared, and grew within the man's own house.

STROPHE III

So I would tell that thus to Ilion came 795
 Mood as of calm when all the air is still,
 The gentle pride and joy of kingly state,
 A tender glance of eye,
 The full-blown blossom of a passionate love,
 Thrilling the very soul; 800
 And yet she turned aside,
 And wrought a bitter end of marriage feast,
 Coming to Priam's race,
 Ill sojourner, ill friend, 804
 Sent by great Zeus, the God of host and guest
 Erinnys, for whom wives weep many tears.

ANTISTROPHE III

There lives an old saw, framed in ancient days,
 In memories of men, that high estate
 Full-grown brings forth its young, nor childless dies,
 But that from good success 810
 Springs to the race a woe insatiable.
 But I, apart from all,
 Hold this my creed alone:

For impious act it is that offspring breeds,
 Like to their parent stock: 815
 For still in every house
 That loves the right their fate for evermore
 Rejoiceth in an issue fair and good.

STROPHE IV

But Recklessness of old
 Is wont to breed another Recklessness, 820
 Sporting its youth in human miseries,
 Or now, or then, whene'er the fixed hour
 comes:
 That in its youth, in turn,
 Doth full-flushed Lust beget,
 And that dread demon-power unconquerable
 Daring that fears not God,— 826
 Two curses black within the homes of men,
 Like those that gendered them.

ANTISTROPHE IV

But Justice shineth bright
 In dwellings that are dark and dim with smoke, 830
 And honours life law-ruled, While gold-decked homes conjoined with hands defiled
 She with averted eyes
 Hath left, and draweth near To holier things, nor worships might of wealth, 835
 If counterfeit its praise;
 But still directeth all the course of things
 Towards its destined goal.

AGAMEMNON is seen approaching in his chariot, followed by another chariot, in which CASSANDRA is standing, carrying her prophet's wand in her hand, and wearing fillets round her temples, and by a great train of soldiers bearing trophies. As they come on the stage the Chorus sings its welcome.

Come then, king, thou son of Atreus,
 Waster of the towers of Troia, 840
 What of greeting and of homage
 Shall I give, nor overshooting,
 Nor due meed of honour missing?
 Men there are who, right transgressing,
 Honour semblance more than being. 845
 O'er the sufferer all are ready Wail of bitter grief to utter,
 Though the biting pang of sorrow
 Never to their heart approaches;
 So with counterfeit rejoicing 850

Men strain faces that are smileless;
 But when one his own sheep knoweth,
 The men's eyes cannot deceive him,
 When they deem with kindly purpose,
 And with fondness weak to flatter. 855
 Thou, when thou did'st lead thine army
 For Helen's sake—(I will not hide it)—
 Wast to me as one whose features
 Have been limned by unskilled artist,
 Guiding ill the helm of reason, 860
 Giving men to death's doom sentenced Courage which their will rejected.
 Now nor from the spirit's surface,
 Nor with touch of thought unfriendly,
 All the toil, I say, is welcome, 865
 If men bring it to good issue.
 And thou soon shalt know, enquiring,
 Him who rightly, him who wrongly
 Of thy citizens fulfilleth
 Task of office for the city. 870

AGAM. First Argos, and the Gods who guard the land,

'Tis right to greet; to them in part I owe
 This my return, and vengeance that I took On Priam's city. Not on hearsay proof Judging the cause, with one consent the Gods 875

Cast in their votes into the urn of blood
 For Ilion's ruin and her people's death;
 I' the other urn Hope touched the rim alone,
 Still far from being filled full. And even yet
 The captured city by its smoke is seen, 880
 The incense clouds of Atê live on still;
 And, in the act of dying with its prey,
 From richest store the dust sends savours
 sweet.

For these things it is meet to give the Gods
 Thank-offerings long-enduring; for our nets
 Of vengeance we set close, and for a woman
 Our Argive monster laid the city low, 887
 Foaled by the mare, a people bearing shield,
 Taking its leap when set the Pleiades;
 And, bounding o'er the tower, that ravenous lion 890

Lapped up its fill of blood of kingly race.
 This prelude to the Gods I lengthen out;
 And as concerns thy feeling (this I well Remember hearing) I with thee agree,
 And thou in me may'st find an advocate. 895
 With but few men is it their natural bent
 To honour without grudging prosperous
 friend:

For ill-souled envy that the heart besets,
 Doubles his woe who suffers that disease:

He by his own griefs first is overwhelmed, 900
 And groans at sight of others' happier lot.
 And I with good cause say, (for well I know,)
 They are but friendship's mirror, phantom shade,

Who seemed to be my most devoted friends.
 Odysseus only, who against his will 905
 Sailed with us, still was found true trace-
 fellow:

And this I say of him or dead or living.
 But as for all that touches on the State,
 Or on the Gods, in full assembly we,
 Calling our council, will deliberate: 910
 For what goes well we should with care provide

How longest it may last; and where there needs

A healing charm, there we with all good-will,
 By surgery or cautery will try
 To turn away the mischief of disease. 915
 And now will I to home and household hearth
 Move on, and first give thanks unto the Gods
 Who led me forth, and brought me back
 again.

Since Victory follows, long may she remain!

Enter CLYTÆMNESTRA, followed by female attendants carrying purple tapestry.

CLYTÆM. Ye citizens, ye Argive senators,
 I will not shrink from telling you the tale 921
 Of wife's true love. As time wears on one drops

All over-shyness. Not learning it from others,

I will narrate my own unhappy life, 924
 The whole long time my lord at Ilion stayed.
 For first, that wife should sit at home alone
 Without her husband is a monstrous grief,
 Hearing full many an ill report of him,
 Now one and now another coming still, 929
 Bringing news home, worse trouble upon bad.

Yeâ, if my lord had met as many wounds
 As rumour told of, floating to our house,
 He had been riddled more than any net;
 And had he died, as tidings still poured in, 934

Then he, a second Geryon with three lives,
 Had boasted of a threefold coverlet
 Of earth above, (I will not say below him,)
 Dying one death for each of those his forms;
 And so, because of all these ill reports,
 Full many a noose around my neck have
 others 940

Loosed by main force, when I had hung myself.

And for this cause no son is with me now,
Holding in trust the pledges of our love,
As he should be, Orestes. Wonder not;
For now a kind ally doth nurture him, 945
Strophios the Phokian, telling me of woes
Of twofold aspect, danger on thy side
At Ilion, and lest loud-voiced anarchy
Should overthrow thy council, since 'tis still
The wont of men to kick at those who fall.
No trace of guile bears this excuse of
mine; 951

As for myself, the fountains of my tears
Have flowed till they are dry, no drop remains,

And mine eyes suffer from o'er-late repose,
Watching with tears the beacons set for thee,
Left still unheeded. And in dreams full oft 956

I from my sleep was startled by the gnat
With thin wings buzzing, seeing in the night Ills that stretched far beyond the time of sleep.

Now, having borne all this, with mind at ease, 960

I hail my lord as watch-dog of the fold,
The stay that saves the ship, of lofty roof
Main column-prop, a father's only child,
Land that beyond all hope the sailor sees,
Morn of great brightness following after storm, 965

Clear-flowing fount to thirsty traveller.

Yes, it is pleasant to escape all straits:
With words of welcome such as these I greet
thee;

May jealous Heaven forgive them! for we bore

Full many an evil in the past; and now, 970
Dear husband, leave thy car, nor on the
ground,

O King, set thou the foot that Ilion trampled.
Why linger ye, [turning to her attendants] ye maids, whose task it was

To strew the pathway with your tapestries?
Let the whole road be straightway purplestrown, 975

That Justice lead to home he looked not for.
All else my care, by slumber not subdued,
Will with God's help work out what fate decrees.

The handmaids advance, and are about to lay the purple carpets on the ground.

AGAM. O child of Leda, guardian of my
home,

Thy speech hath with my absence well agreed— 980

For long indeed thou mad'st it—but fit praise
Is boon that I must seek at other hands.

I pray thee, do not in thy woman's fashion
Pamper my pride, nor in barbaric guise Prostrate on earth raise full-mouthed cries to
me; 985

Make not my path offensive to the Gods
By spreading it with carpets. They alone
May claim that honour; but for mortal men
To walk on fair embroidery, to me
Seems nowise without peril. So I bid you 990
To honour me as man, and not as God.
Apart from all foot-mats and tapestry
My fame speaks loudly; and God's greatest gift

Is not to err from wisdom. We must bless
Him only who ends life in fair estate. 995
Should I thus act throughout, good hope were mine.

CLYTÆM. Nay, say not this my purposes to thwart.

AGAM. Know I change not for the worse
my purpose.

CLYTÆM. In fear, perchance, thou vow'd'st thus to act.

AGAM. If any, I, with good ground spoke
my will. 1000

CLYTÆM. What think'st thou Priam, had he wrought such deeds . . . ?

AGAM. Full gladly he, I trow, had trod on carpets.

CLYTÆM. Then shrink not thou through fear of men's dispraise.

AGAM. And yet a people's whisper hath great might.

CLYTÆM. Who is not envied is not enviable. 1005

AGAM. 'Tis not a woman's part to crave for strife.

CLYTÆM. True, yet the prosperous e'en should sometimes yield.

AGAM. Dost thou then prize that victory in the strife?

CLYTÆM. Nay, list; with all good-will yield me this boon.

AGAM. Well, then, if thou wilt have it so,
with speed 1010

Let some one loose my buskins (servants they Doing the foot's true work), and as I tread
Upon these robes sea-purpled, may no wrath

From glance of Gods smite on me from afar!
Great shame I feel to trample with my foot
This wealth of carpets, costliest work of looms; 1016

So far for this. This stranger [pointing to CASSANDRA] lead thou in

With kindness. On him who gently wields
His power God's eye looks kindly from afar.
None of their own will choose a bondslave's
life; 1020

And she, the chosen flower of many spoils,
Has followed with me as the army's gift.
But since I turn, obeying thee in this,
I'll to my palace go, on purple treading.

CLYTEM. There is a sea,—and who shall drain it dry? 1025

Producing still new store of purple juice,
Precious as silver, staining many a robe.
And in our house, with God's help, O my
king,

'Tis ours to boast our palace knows no stint.
Frampling of many robes would I have vowed, 1030

Had that been ordered me in oracles,
When for my lord's return I then did plan
My votive gifts. For while the root lives on,
The foliage stretches even to the house,
And spreads its shade against the dog-star's
rage; 1035

So when thou comest to thy hearth and
home,

Thou show'st that warmth hath come in winter time;

And when from unripe clusters Zeus matures
The wine, then is there coolness in the house,
If the true master dwelleth in his home. 1040

Ah, Zeus! the All-worker, Zeus, work out for me

All that I pray for; let it be thy care
To look to what Thou purposest to work.

Exeunt AGAMEMNON, walking on the tapestry,
CLYTÆMNESTRA, and her attendants.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Why thus continually Do haunting phantoms hover at the gate 1045

Of my foreboding heart?
Why floats prophetic song, unsought, unbidden?

Why doth no steadfast trust
Sit on my mind's dear throne,
To fling it from me as a vision dim? 1050

Long time hath passed since stern-ropes of our ships

Were fastened on the sand, when our great host

Of those that sailed in ships
Had come to Ilion's towers:

ANTISTROPHE I

And now from these mine eyes 1055

I learn, myself reporting to myself,

Their safe return; and yet

My mind within itself, taught by itself,

Chanteth Erinny's dirge,

The lyreless melody, 1060

And hath no strength of wonted confidence.

Not vain these inner pulses, as my heart

Whirls eddying in breast oracular.

I, against hope, will pray

It prove false oracle. 1065

STROPHE II

Of high, o'erflowing health
There is no bound that stays the wish for
more,

For evermore disease, as neighbour close

Whom but a wall divides, 1069

Upon it presses; and man's prosperous state

Moves on its course, and strikes

Upon an unseen rock;

But if his fear for safety of his freight,

A part, from well-poised sling, shall sacrifice,

Then the whole house sinks not, 1075

O'erfilled with wretchedness,

Nor does he swamp his boat:

So, too, abundant gift

From Zeus in bounteous fulness, and the fruit

Of glebe at harvest tide 1080

Have caused to cease sore hunger's pestilence;

ANTISTROPHE II

But blood that once hath flowed
In purple stains of death upon the ground

At a man's feet, who then can bid it back

By any charm of song? 1085

Else him who knew to call the dead to life

Zeus had not sternly checked,

As warning unto all;

But unless Fate, firm-fixed, had barred our
fate

From any chance of succour from the Gods,

Then had my heart poured forth 1091

Its thoughts, outstripping speech.

But now in gloom it wails
Sore vexed, with little hope
At any time hereafter fitting end 1095
To find, unravelling,
My soul within me burning with hot
thoughts.

Re-enter CLYTÆMNESTRA.

CLYTÆM. [to CASSANDRA, who has remained in the chariot during the choral ode] Thou too—I mean Cassandra—go within;
Since Zeus hath made it thine, and not in
wrath,
To share the lustral waters in our house, 1100
Standing with many a slave the altar nigh
Of Zeus, who guards our goods. Now get thee down
From out this car, nor look so over proud.
They say that e'en Alcmena's son endured Being sold a slave, constrained to bear the yoke: 1105
And if the doom of this ill chance should
come,
Great boon it is to meet with lords who own
Ancestral wealth. But whoso reap full crops
They never dared to hope for, these in all,
And beyond measure, to their slaves are harsh: 1110
From us thou hast what usage doth prescribe.
CHOR. So ends she, speaking words full clear to thee:
And seeing thou art in the toils of fate,
If thou obey, thou wilt obey; and yet,
Perchance, obey thou wilt not. 1115
CLYTÆM. Nay, but unless she, like a swallow, speaks
A barbarous tongue unknown, I speaking
now
Within her apprehension, bid obey.
CHOR. [to CASSANDRA, still standing motionless] Go with her. What she bids is now the best;
Obey her: leave thy seat upon this car. 1120
CLYTÆM. I have no leisure here to stay without:
For as regards our central altar, there
The sheep stand by as victims for the fire;
For never had we hoped such thanks to give:
If thou wilt do this, make no more delay;
But if thou understandest not my
words, 1126
Then wave thy foreign hand in lieu of speech.

CASSANDRA shudders as in horror, but makes no sign.

CHOR. The stranger seems a clear interpreter
To need. Her look is like a captured deer's.
CLYTÆM. Nay, she is mad, and follows evil thoughts, 1130
Since, leaving now her city, newly-captured,
She comes, and knows not how to take the curb,
Ere she foam out her passion in her blood.
I will not bear the shame of uttering more.

Exit

CHOR. And I—I pity her, and will not
rage: 1135
Come, thou poor sufferer, empty leave thy car;
Yield to thy doom, and handsel now the
yoke.

CASSANDRA leaves the chariot, and bursts into a cry of wailing.

STROPHE I

CASS. Woe! woe, and well-a-day!
Apollo! O Apollo!

CHOR. Why criest thou so loud on Loxias? 1140
The wailing cry of mourner suits not him.

ANTISTROPHE I

CASS. Woe! woe, and well-a-day!
Apollo! O Apollo!

CHOR. Again with boding words she calls
the God,
Though all unmeet as helper to men's groans.

STROPHE II

CASS. Apollo! O Apollo! 1146
God of all paths, Apollo true to me;
For still thou dost appal me and destroy.

CHOR. She seems her own ills like to prophesy:
The God's great gift is in the slave's mind
yet. 1150

ANTISTROPHE II

CASS. Apollo! O Apollo!
God of all paths, Apollo true to me;
What path hast led me? To what roof hast
brought?

CHOR. To that of the Atreidæ. This I
tell,
If thou know'st not. Thou wilt not find it false. 1155

STROPHE III

CASS. Ah! Ah! Ah me!
Say rather to a house God hates—that knows

Murder, self-slaughter, rapes,
A human shamble, staining earth with blood.

CHOR. Keen scented seems this stranger, like a hound, 1160
And sniffs to see whose murder she may find.

ANTISTROPHE III

CASS. Ah! Ah! Ah me!
Lo! [looking wildly, and pointing to the house] there the witnesses whose word
I trust,—

Those babes who wail their death 1164
The roasted flesh that made a father's meal.

CHOR. We of a truth had heard thy seeress fame,
But prophets now are not the race we seek.

STROPHE IV

CASS. Ah me! O horror! What ill schemes she now?
What is this new great woe?
Great evil plots she in this very house, 1170
Hard for its friends to bear, immedicable;
And help stands far aloof.

CHOR. These oracles of thine surpass my
ken;
Those I know well. The whole town rings with them.

ANTISTROPHE IV

CASS. Ah me! O daring one! what work'st thou here, 1175
Who having in his bath
Tended thy spouse, thy lord, then . . .
How tell the rest?

For quick it comes, and hand is following
hand,

Stretched out to strike the blow.

CHOR. Still I discern not; after words so
dark 1180
I am perplexed with thy dim oracles.

STROPHE V

CASS. Ah, horror, horror! What is this
I see?

Is it a snare of Hell?

Nay, the true net is she who shares his bed,
Who shares in working death. 1185

Ha! let the Band insatiable in hate Howl for the race its wild exulting cry
O'er sacrifice that calls
For death by storm of stones.

STROPHE VI

CHOR. What dire Erinny's bidd'st thou o'er our house 1190
To raise shrill cry? Thy speech but little cheers;

And to my heart there rush

Blood-drops of saffron hue,

Which, when from deadly wound 1194

They fall, together with life's setting rays
End, as it fails, their own appointed course;

And mischief comes apace.

ANTISTROPHE V

CASS. See, see, I say, from that fell heifer
there

Keep thou the bull: in robes

Entangling him, she with her weapon gores

Him with the swarthy horns; 1201

Lo! in that bath with water filled he falls,

Smitten to death, and I to thee set forth

Crime of a bath of blood,

By murderous guile devised. 1205

ANTISTROPHE VI

CHOR. I may not boast that I keen insight have

In words oracular; yet bode I ill.

What tidings good are brought

By any oracles

To mortal men? These arts, 1210

In days of evil sore, with many words,

Do still but bring a vague, portentous fear

For men to learn and know.

STROPHE VII

CASS. Woe, woe! for all sore ills that fall on me! 1214

It is my grief thou speak'st of, blending it
With his. [Pausing, and then crying out]

Ah! wherefore then

Hast thou thus brought me here,

Only to die with thee?

What other doom is mine? 1220

STROPHE VIII

CHOR. Frenzied art thou, and by some God's might swayed,
And utterest for thyself

A melody which is no melody,
 Like to that tawny one,
 Insatiate in her wail, 1225
 The nightingale, who still with sorrowing
 soul,
 And "Itys, Itys," cry,
 Bemoans a life o'erflourishing in ills.

ANTISTROPHE VII

CASS. Ah, for the doom of clear-voiced nightingale!
 The Gods gave her a body bearing wings,
 And life of pleasant days 1231
 With no fresh cause to weep:
 But for me waiteth still Stroke from the two-edged sword.

ANTISTROPHE VIII

CHOR. From what source hast thou these dread agonies 1235
 Sent on thee by thy God,
 Yet vague and little meaning; and thy cries
 Dire with ill-omened shrieks
 Dost utter as a chant,
 And blindest with them strains of shrillest
 grief? 1240
 Whence treadest thou this track
 Of evil-boding path of prophecy?

STROPHE IX

CASS. Woe for the marriage-ties, the marriage-ties
 Of Paris that brought ruin on his friends!
 Woe for my native stream, 1245
 Scamandros, that I loved!
 Once on thy banks my maiden youth was reared,
 (Ah, miserable me!)
 Now by Cokyto's and by Acheron's shores
 I seem too likely soon to utter song 1250
 Of wild, prophetic speech.

STROPHE X

CHOR. What hast thou spoken now
 With utterance all too clear?
 Even a boy its gist might understand;
 I to the quick am pierced 1255
 With throe of deadly pain,
 Whilst thou thy moaning cries art uttering
 Over thy sore mischance,
 Wondrous for me to hear.

ANTISTROPHE IX

CASS. Woe for the toil and trouble, toil and trouble 1260
 Of city that is utterly destroyed!
 Woe for the victims slain
 Of herds that roamed the fields,
 My father's sacrifice to save his towers!
 No healing charm they brought 1265
 To save the city from its present doom:
 And I with hot thoughts wild myself shall cast
 Full soon upon the ground.

ANTISTROPHE X

CHOR. This that thou utterest now
 With all before agrees. 1270
 Some Power above dooms thee with purpose
 ill,
 Down-swooping heavily,
 To utter with thy voice
 Sorrows of deepest woe, and bringing death.
 And what the end shall be 1275
 Perplexes in the extreme.

CASS. Nay, now no more from out of maiden veils
 My oracle shall glance, like bride fresh wed;
 But seems as though 'twould rush with speedy gales
 In full, clear brightness to the morning dawn; 1280
 So that a greater war than this shall surge Like wave against the sunlight. Now I'll teach
 No more in parables. Bear witness ye,
 As running with me, that I scent the track
 Of evil deeds that long ago were wrought:
 For never are they absent from this house,
 That choral band which chants in full accord, 1287
 Yet no good music; good is not their theme.
 And now, as having drunk men's blood, and
 so
 Grown wilder, bolder, see, the revelling band,
 Erinnyes of the race, still haunt the halls,
 Not easy to dismiss. And so they sing, 1292
 Close cleaving to the house, its primal woe,
 And vent their loathing in alternate strains
 On marriage-bed of brother ruthless found
 To that defiler. Miss I now, or hit, 1296
 Like archer skilled? or am I seeress false,
 A babbler vain that knocks at every door?
 Yea, swear beforehand, ere I die, I know
 (And not by rumour only) all the sins 1300

Of ancient days that haunt and vex this house.

CHOR. How could an oath, how firm soe'er confirmed,

Bring aught of healing? Lo, I marvel at thee,

That thou, though born far off beyond the sea,

Should'st tell an alien city's tale as clear 1305
As though thyself had stood by all the while.

CASS. The seer Apollo set me to this task.

CHOR. Was he a God, so smitten with desire?

CASS. There was a time when shame restrained my speech.

CHOR. True; they who prosper still are shy and coy. 1310

CASS. He wrestled hard, breathing hot love on me.

CHOR. And were ye one in act whence children spring?

CASS. I promised Loxias, then I broke my vow.

CHOR. Wast thou e'en then possessed with arts divine?

CASS. E'en then my country's woes I prophesied. 1315

CHOR. How wast thou then unscathed by Loxias' wrath?

CASS. I for that fault with no man gained belief.

CHOR. To us, at least, thou seem'st to speak the truth.

CASS. [Again speaking wildly, as in an ecstasy.] Ah, woe is me! Woe's me! Oh, ills on ills!

Again the dread pang of true prophet's gift With preludes of great evil dizzies me. 1321

See ye those children sitting on the house In fashion like to phantom forms of dreams?

Infants who perished at their own kin's hands,

Their palms filled full with meat of their own flesh, 1325

Loom on my sight, the heart and entrails bearing,

(A sorry burden that!) on which of old Their father fed. And in revenge for this,

I say a lion, dwelling in his lair, With not a spark of courage, stay-at-home,

Plots 'gainst my master, now he's home returned, 1331

(Yes mine—for still I must the slave's yoke bear;)

And the ship's ruler, Ilion's conqueror, Knows not what things the tongue of that lewd bitch

Has spoken and spun out in welcome smooth, And, like a secret Atè, will work out 1336

With dire success: thus 'tis she plans: the man

Is murdered by the woman. By what name Shall I that loathèd monster rightly call?

An Amphisbæna? or a Skylla dwelling 1340
Among the rocks, the sailors' enemy?

Hades' fierce raging mother, breathing out Against her friends a curse implacable?

Ah, how she raised her cry, (oh, daring one!) As for the rout of battle, and she feigns 1345

To hail with joy her husband's safe return! And if thou dost not credit this, what then?

What will be will. Soon, present, pitying me Thou'lt own I am too true a prophetess.

CHOR. Thyestes' banquet on his children's flesh 1350

I know and shudder at, and fear o'ercomes me,

Hearing not counterfeits of fact, but truths; Yet in the rest I hear and miss my path.

CASS. I say thou'lt witness Agamemnon's death.

CHOR. Hush, wretched woman, close those lips of thine! 1355

CASS. For this my speech no healing God's at hand.

CHOR. True, if it must be; but may God avert it!

CASS. Thou utterest prayers, but others murder plot.

CHOR. And by what man is this dire evil wrought?

CASS. Sure, thou hast seen my bodings all amiss. 1360

CHOR. I see not his device who works the deed.

CASS. And yet I speak the Hellenic tongue right well.

CHOR. So does the Pythian, yet her words are hard.

CASS. [In another access of frenzy.] Ah me, this fire!

It comes upon me now! 1365
Ah me, Apollo, wolf-slayer! woe is me!

This biped lioness who takes to bed A wolf in absence of the noble lion,

Will slay me, wretched me. And, as one

Mixing a poisoned draught, she boasts that she 1370

Will put my price into her cup of wrath,
Sharpening her sword to smite her spouse
with death,

So paying him for bringing me. Oh, why
Do I still wear what all men flout and scorn, My wand and seeress wreaths around my
neck? 1375

Thee, ere myself I die I will destroy: [breaks her wand]

Perish ye thus: [casting off her wreaths] I soon shall follow you:

Make rich another Atè in my place;
Behold Apollo's self is stripping me
Of my divining garments, and that too, 1380
When he has seen me even in this garb Scorned without cause among my friends and kin,

By foes, with no diversity of mood.
Reviled as vagrant, wandering prophetess,
Poor, wretched, famished, I endured to live:
And now the Seer who me a seeress made 1386
Hath brought me to this lot of deadly doom.
Now for my father's altar there awaits me
A butcher's block, where I am smitten down
By slaughtering stroke, and with hot gush of
blood. 1390

But the Gods will not slight us when we're
dead;

Another yet shall come as champion for us,
A son who slays his mother, to avenge
His father; and the exiled wanderer
Far from his home, shall one day come again,
Upon these woes to set the coping-stone: 1396
For the high Gods have sworn a mighty oath,
His father's fall, laid low, shall bring him
back.

Why then do I thus groan in this new home,
When, to begin with, Ilion's town I saw 1400
Faring as it did fare, and they who held
That town are gone by judgment of the Gods?
I too will fare as they, and venture death:

So I these gates of Hades now address,
And pray for blow that bringeth death at
once, 1405

That so with no fierce spasm, while the
blood

Flows in calm death, I then may close mine
eyes.

Goes toward the door of the palace.

CHOR. O thou most wretched, yet again
most wise:

Long hast thou spoken, lady, but if well
Thou know'st thy doom, why to the altar
go'st thou, 1410

Like heifer driven of God, so confidently?

CASS. For me, my friends, there is no time to 'scape.

CHOR. Yea; but he gains in time who comes the last.

CASS. The day is come: small gain for me in flight.

CHOR. Know then thou sufferest with a heart full brave. 1415

CASS. Such words as these the happy never hear.

CHOR. Yet mortal man may welcome noble death.

CASS. [Shrinking back from opening the door.] Woe's me for thee and thy brave sons, my father!

CHOR. What cometh now? What fear oppresseth thee?

CASS. [Again going to the door and then shuddering in another burst of frenzy.]
Fie on't, fie! 1420

CHOR. Whence comes this "Fie?" unless from mind that loathes?

CASS. The house is tainted with the scent
of death.

CHOR. How so? This smells of victims on the hearth.

CASS. Nay, it is like the blast from out a grave.

CHOR. No Syrian ritual tell'st thou for our house. 1425

CASS. Well then I go, and e'en within will wait

My fate and Agamemnon's. And for me, Enough of life. Ah, friends! Ah! not for nought

I shrink in fear, as bird shrinks from the brake.

When I am dead do ye this witness bear, 1430
When in revenge for me, a woman, Death

A woman smites, and man shall fall for man
In evil wedlock wed. This friendly office,
As one about to die, I pray you do me.

CHOR. Thy doom foretold, poor sufferer, moves my pity. 1435

CASS. I fain would speak once more, yet not to wait

Mine own death-song; but to the Sun I pray,
To his last rays, that my avengers wreak Upon my hated murderers judgment
due 1439

For me, who die a slave's death, easy prey.
 Ah, life of man! when most it prospereth,
 It is but limned in outline; and when brought To low estate, then doth the sponge, full soaked, 1443
 Wipe out the picture with its frequent touch:
 And this I count more piteous e'en than that.

Passes through the door into the palace.

CHOR. 'Tis true of all men that they never set
 A limit to good fortune; none doth say,
 As bidding it depart,
 And warding it from palaces of pride,
 "Enter thou here no more." 1450
 To this our lord the Blest Ones gave to take Priam's city; and he comes Safe to his home and honoured by the Gods;
 But if he now shall pay
 The forfeit of blood-guiltiness of old, 1455
 And, dying, so work out for those who died,
 By his own death another penalty,

Who then of mortal men,
 Hearing such things as this,
 Can boast that he was born 1460
 With fate from evil free?

AGAM. [from within] Ah, me! I am struck down with deadly stroke.

CHOR. Hush! who cries out with deadly stroke sore smitten?

AGAM. Ah me, again! struck down a second time! Dies

CHOR. By the king's groans I judge the deed is done; 1465
 But let us now confer for counsels safe.

CHOR. a. I give you my advice to summon here,
 Here to the palace, all the citizens.

CHOR. b. I think it best to rush at once on them, 1469
 And take them in the act with sword yet wet.

CHOR. c. And I too give like counsel, and I vote
 For deed of some kind. 'Tis no time to pause.

CHOR. d. Who will see, may.—They but the prelude work
 Of tyranny usurped o'er all the State.

CHOR. e. Yes, we are slow, but they who trample down 1475

The thought of hesitation slumber not.

CHOR. f. I know not what advice to find or speak:

He who can act knows how to counsel too.

CHOR. g. I too think with thee; for I have no hope 1479
 With words to raise the dead again to life.

CHOR. h. What! Shall we drag our life on and submit

To these usurpers that defile the house?

CHOR. i. Nay, that we cannot bear: To die were better;

For death is gentler far than tyranny.

CHOR. k. Shall we upon this evidence of groans 1485

Guess, as divining that our lord is dead?

CHOR. l. When we know clearly, then should we discuss:

To guess is one thing, and to know another.

CHOR. So vote I too, and on the winning
 side,

Taking the votes all round that we should learn 1490

How he, the son of Atreus, fareth now.

Enter CLYTÆMNESTRA from the palace, in robes with stains of blood, followed by soldiers and attendants. The open doors show the corpses of AGAMEMNON and CASSANDRA, the former lying in a silvered bath.

CLYTÆM. Though many words before to suit the time

Were spoken, now I shall not be ashamed
 The contrary to utter: How could one

By open show of enmity to foes 1495
 Who seemed as friends, fence in the snares
 of death

Too high to be o'erleapt? But as for me,
 Not without forethought for this long time
 past,

This conflict comes to me from triumph old
 Of his, though slowly wrought. I stand where I 1500

Did smite him down, with all my task well
 done.

So did I it, (the deed deny I not,)

That he could nor avert his doom nor flee:
 I cast around him drag-net as for fish,

With not one outlet, evil wealth of robe: 1505
 And twice I smote him, and with two deep groans

He dropped his limbs: And when he thus fell
 down

I gave him yet a third, thank-offering true
 To Hades of the dark, who guards the dead.

So fallen, he gasps out his strugglingsoul, 1510
 And breathing forth a sharp, quick gush of
 blood,

He showers dark drops of gory rain on me,
Who no less joy felt in them than the corn,
When the blade bears, in glad shower given
of God.

Since this is so, ye Argive elders here, 1515
Ye, as ye will, may hail the deed, but I Boast of it. And were't fitting now to pour Libation o'er the dead, 'twere justly done,
Yea more than justly; such a goblet full
Of ills hath he filled up with curses dire 1520
At home, and now has come to drain it off.

CHOR. We marvel at the boldness of thy
tongue

Who o'er thy husband's corpse speak'st vaunt like this.

CLYTÆM. Ye test me as a woman weak of
mind; 1524

But I with dauntless heart to you that know Say this, and whether thou dost praise or blame,

Is all alike:—here Agamemnon lies,
My husband, now a corpse, of this right
hand,

As artist just, the handiwork: so stands it.

STROPHE

CHOR. What evil thing, O Queen, or reared on earth, 1530

Or draught from salt sea-wave

Hast thou fed on, to bring

Such incense on thyself,

A people's loud-voiced curse?

'Twas thou did'st sentence him, 1535

'Twas thou did'st strike him down;

But thou shalt exiled be,

Hated with strong hate of the citizens.

CLYTÆM. Ha! now on me thou lay'st
the exile's doom,

My subjects' hate, and people's loud-voiced
curse, 1540

Though ne'er did'st thou oppose my husband
there,

Who, with no more regard than had been due To a brute's death, although he called his
own

Full many a fleecy sheep in pastures
bred, 1544

Yet sacrificed his child, the dear-loved fruit
Of all my travail-pangs, to be a charm

Against the winds of Thrakia. Shouldst thou not

Have banished him from out this land of ours,

As meed for all his crimes? Yet hearing
now 1549

My deeds, thou art a judge full stern. But
I

Tell thee to speak thy threats, as knowing
well

I am prepared that thou on equal terms
Should'st rule, if thou dost conquer. But if God

Should otherwise decree, then thou shalt
learn, 1554

Late though it be, the lesson to be wise.

ANTISTROPHE

CHOR. Yea, thou art stout of heart, and speak'st big words;

And maddened is thy soul

As by a murderous hate;

And still upon thy brow

Is seen, not yet avenged, 1560

The stain of blood-spot foul;

And yet it needs must be,

One day thou, reft of friends,

Shalt pay the penalty of blow for blow.

CLYTÆM. Now hear thou too my oaths of solemn dread: 1565

By my accomplished vengeance for my
child,

By Atè and Erinnyes, unto whom

I slew him as a victim, I look not

That fear should come beneath this roof of mine, 1569

So long as on my hearth Ægisthos kindles

The flaming fire, as well disposed to me

As he hath been aforetime. He to us

Is no slight shield of stoutest confidence.

There lies he, [pointing to the corpse of AGAMEMNON] one who foully wronged
his wife,

The darling of the Chryseïds at Troïa; 1575

And there [pointing to CASSANDRA] this captive slave, this auguress,

His concubine, this seeress trustworthy,

Who shared his bed, and yet was as well
known

To the sailors as their benches! . . .
They have fared 1579

Not otherwise than they deserved: for he Lies as you see. And she who, like a swan,

Has chanted out her last and dying song,
Lies close to him she loved, and so has

brought

The zest of a new pleasure to my bed. 1584

STROPHE I

CHOR. Ah me, would death might come Quickly, with no sharp throes of agony,
Nor long bed-ridden pain,
Bringing the endless sleep;
Since he, the watchman most benign of all,
Hath now been smitten low, 1590
And by a woman's means hath much endured,
And at a woman's hand hath lost his life!

STROPHE II

Alas! alas! O Helen, evil-souled,
Who, though but one, hast slain
Many, yea, very many lives at Troia. 1595

STROPHE III

But now for blood that may not be washed
out
Thou hast to full bloom brought
A deed of guilt for ever memorable,
For strife was in the house,
Wrought out in fullest strength, 1600
Woe for a husband's life.

STROPHE IV

CLYTÆM. Nay, pray not thou for destiny
of death,
Oppressed with what thou see'st;
Nor turn thou against Helena thy
wrath,
As though she murderess were, 1605
And, though but one, had many Danaï's souls
Brought low in death, and wrought o'er-whelming woe.

ANTISTROPHE I

CHOR. O Power that dost attack
Our palace and the two Tantalidæ,
And dost through women wield 1610
A might that grieves my heart!
And o'er the body, like a raven foul,
Against all laws of right, 1613
Standing, she boasteth in her pride of heart
That she can chant her pæan hymn of praise.

ANTISTROPHE IV

CLYTÆM. Now thou dost guide aright thy speech and thought,
Invoking that dread Power,

'The thrice-gorged evil genius of this house;
For he it is who feeds 1619
In the heart's depth the raging lust of blood:
Ere the old wound is healed, new bloodshed
comes.

STROPHE

CHOR. Yes, of a Power thou tell'st
Mighty and very wrathful to this house;
Ah me! ah me! an evil tale enough 1625
Of baleful chance of doom,
Insatiable of ill:
Yet, ah! it is through Zeus,
The all-appointing and all-working One;
For what with mortal men
Is wrought apart from Zeus? 1630
What of all this is not by God decreed?

STROPHE VI

Ah me! ah me!
My king, my king, how shall I weep for thee?
What shall I speak from heart that truly
loves?
And now thou liest there, breathing out thy
life, 1635
In impious deed of death,
In this fell spider's web,—

STROPHE VII

(Yes, woe is me! woe, woe!
Woe for this couch of thine dishonourable!)—
Slain by a subtle death, 1640
With sword two-edged which her right hand did wield.

STROPHE VIII

CLYTÆM. Thou speak'st big words, as if the deed were mine;
Yet think thou not of me,
As Agamemnon's spouse; 1644
But in the semblance of this dead man's wife,
The old and keen Avenger of the house
Of Atreus, that cruel banqueter of old,
Hath wrought out vengeance full
On him who lieth here,
And full-grown victim slain 1650
Over the younger victims of the past.

ANTISTROPHE V

CHOR. That thou art guiltless found
Of this foul murder who will witness bear?

How can it be so, how? And yet, perchance,
 As helper to the deed, 1655
 Might come the avenging Fiend
 Of that ancestral time;
 And in this rush of murders of near kin
 Dark Ares presses on,
 Where he will vengeance work 1660
 For clotted gore of children slain as food.

ANTISTROPHE VI

Ah me! ah me!
 My king, my king, how shall I weep for thee?
 What shall I speak from heart that truly
 loves?
 And now thou liest there, breathing out thy
 life, 1665
 In impious deed of death,
 In this fell spider's web,—

ANTISTROPHE VII

(Yes, woe is me! woe, woe!
 Woe for this couch of thine dishonourable!)—
 Slain by a subtle death, 1670
 With sword two-edged which her right hand
 did wield.

ANTISTROPHE VIII

CLYTEM. Nay, not dishonourable
 His death doth seem to me:
 Did he not work a doom,
 In this our house with guile? 1675
 Mine own dear child, begotten of this man,
 Iphigeneia, wept with many a tear,
 He slew; now slain himself in recompense,
 Let him not boast in Hell,
 Since he the forfeit pays, 1680
 Pierced by the sword in death,
 For all the evil that his hand began.

STROPHE IX

CHOR. I stand perplexed in soul, deprived of power
 Of quick and ready thought,
 Where now to turn, since thus 1685
 Our home is falling low.
 I shrink in fear from the fierce pelting storm
 Of blood that shakes the basement of the
 house:
 No more it rains in drops:
 And for another deed of mischief dire, 1690
 Fate whets the righteous doom
 On other whetstones still.

ANTISTROPHE IX

O Earth! O Earth! Oh, would thou had'st received me,
 Ere I saw him on couch
 Of bath with silvered walls thus stretched in
 death! 1695
 Who now will bury him, who wail? Wilt
 thou,
 When thou hast slain thy husband, have the
 heart
 To mourn his death, and for thy monstrous
 deeds
 Do graceless grace? And who will chant the dirge
 With tears in truth of heart, 1700
 Over our godlike chief?

STROPHE X

CLYTEM. It is not thine to speak;
 'Twas at our hands he fell,
 Yea, he fell low in death,
 And we will bury him, 1705
 Not with the bitter tears of those who weep
 As inmates of the house;
 But she, his child, Iphigeneia, there Shall meet her father, and with greeting
 kind,
 E'en as is fit, by that swift-flowing ford, 1710
 Dark stream of bitter woes,
 Shall clasp him in her arms,
 And give a daughter's kiss.

ANTISTROPHE X

CHOR. Lo! still reproach upon reproach doth come;
 Hard are these things to judge: 1715
 The spoiler still is spoiled,
 The slayer pays his debt;
 Yea, while Zeus liveth through the ages, this Lives also, that the doer dree his weird;
 For this is law fast fixed. 1720
 Who now can drive from out the kingly
 house
 The brood of curses dark?
 The race to Atè cleaves.

ANTISTROPHE XI

CLYTEM. Yes, thou hast touched with truth
 That word oracular;
 But I for my part wish, 1725
 (Binding with strongest oath

The evil dæmon of the Pleisthenids,)

Though hard it be to bear, 1729
To rest content with this our present lot;
And, for the future, that he go to vex
Another race with homicidal deaths.

Lo! 'tis enough for me,
Though small my share of wealth,
At last to have freed my house 1735
From madness that sets each man's hand
'gainst each.

Enter ÆGISTHOS

ÆGIS. Hail, kindly light of day that vengeance brings!
Now I can say the Gods on high look down,
Avenging men, upon the woes of earth, 1739
Since lying in the robes the Erinnyes wove
I see this man, right welcome sight to me, Paying for deeds his father's hand had wrought.

Atræus, our country's ruler, this man's father
Drove out my sire Thyestes, his own brother,
(To tell the whole truth,) quarrelling for rule,
An exile from his country and his home. 1746
And coming back a suppliant on the hearth,
The poor Thyestes found a lot secure,
Nor did he, dying, stain the soil with blood,
There in his home. But this man's godless
sire, 1750
Atræus, more prompt than kindly in his
deeds,

On plea of keeping festal day with cheer,
To my sire banquet gave of children's flesh,
His own. The feet and finger-tips of hands
He, sitting at the top, apart concealed; 1755
And straight the other, in his blindness taking
The parts that could not be discerned, did eat
A meal which, as thou see'st, perdition works
For all his kin. And learning afterwards
The deed of dread, he groaned and backward
fell, 1760

Vomits the feast of blood, and imprecates
On Pelop's sons a doom intolerable,
And makes the o'erturning of the festive board,

With fullest justice, as a general curse, 1764
That so might fall the race of Pleisthenes.
And now thou see'st how here accordingly
This man lies fallen; I, of fullest right,
The weaver of the plot of murderous doom.
For me, a babe in swaddling-clothes, he banished

With my poor father me, his thirteenth
child; 1770

And Vengeance brought me back, of full age grown:

And e'en far off I wrought against this man,
And planned the whole scheme of this dark device.

And so e'en death were now right good for
me, 1774
Seeing him into the nets of Vengeance fallen.

CHOR. I honour not this arrogance in
guilt,

Ægisthos. Thou confessest thou hast slain
Of thy free will our chieftain here,—that thou
Alone did'st plot this murder lamentable;
Be sure, I say, thy head shall not escape 1780
The righteous curse a people hurls with stones.

ÆGISTH. Dost thou say this, though seated on the bench

Of lowest oarsmen, while the upper row Commands the ship? But thou shalt find, though old,

How hard it is at such an age to learn, 1785
When the word is, "keep temper." But a prison

And fasting pains are admirably apt,
As prophet-healers even for old age.

Dost see, and not see this? Against the pricks
Kick not, lest thou perchance should'st
smart for it. 1790

CHOR. Thou, thou, O Queen, when thy lord came from war,
While keeping house, thy husband's bed defiling,

Did'st scheme this death for this our hero-
chief.

ÆGISTH. These words of thine shall parents prove of tears: 1794
But this thy tongue is Orpheus' opposite;
He with his voice led all things on for joy,
But thou, provoking with thy childish cries, Shalt now be led; and then, being kept in
check,

Thou shalt appear in somewhat gentler mood.

CHOR. As though thou should'st o'er Argives ruler be, 1800

Who even when thou plotted'st this man's
death

Did'st lack good heart to do the deed thyself?
ÆGISTH. E'en so; to work this fraud was clearly part

Fit for a woman. I was foe, of old 1804
Suspected. But now will I with his wealth
See whether I his subjects may command,

And him who will not hearken I will yoke
In heavy harness as a full-fed colt, Nowise as trace-horse; but sharp hunger
joined With darksome dungeon shall behold him tamed. 1810

CHOR. Why did'st not thou then, coward
as thou art,

Thyself destroy him? but a woman with thee,
Pollution to our land and our land's Gods,
She slew him. Does Orestes see the light, Perchance, that he, brought back by Fortune's grace, 1815

May for both these prove slayer strong to smite?

ÆGISTH. Well, since thou think'st to act,
not merely talk,

Thou shalt know clearly. . . .

Calling his Guards from the palace

On then, my troops, the time for deeds is
come.

CHOR. On then, let each man grasp his sword in hand. 1820

ÆGISTH. With sword in hand, I too shrink not from death.

CHOR. Thou talkest of thy death; we hail the word;

And make our own the fortune it implies.

CLYTÆM. Nay, let us not do other evil
deeds,

Thou dearest of all friends. An ill-starred harvest 1825

It is to have reaped so many. Enough of woe:

Let no more blood be shed: Go thou—[to the Chorus—go ye,

Ye aged sires, to your allotted homes, 1828
Ere ye do aught amiss and dree your weird:
This that we have done ought to have sufficed;

But should it prove we've had enough of ills,
We will accept it gladly, stricken low
In evil doom by heavy hand of God.

This is a woman's counsel, if there be
That deigns to hear it. 1835

ÆGISTH. But that these should fling
The blossoms of their idle speech at me,
And utter words like these, so tempting Fate,
And fail of counsel wise, and flout their master. . . . !

CHOR. It suits not Argives on the vile to fawn. 1840

ÆGISTH. Be sure, hereafter I will hunt
thee down.

CHOR. Not so, if God should guide Orestes
back.

ÆGISTH. Right well I know how exiles feed on hopes.

CHOR. Prosper, wax fat, do foul wrong—
'tis thy day.

ÆGISTH. Know thou shalt pay full price for this thy folly. 1845

CHOR. Be bold, and boast, like cock beside his mate.

CLYTÆM. Nay, care not thou for these vain howlings; I

And thou together, ruling o'er the house,
Will settle all things rightly. Exeunt.

ARGUMENT

AFTER the death of Ædipus, Antigone and Ismene returned to Thebes, and lived in the king's house with Eteocles, their brother. But the seven great captains from Argos, whom Poly-neikes had called to help him, came against

Thebes to destroy it, and were hardly driven back. And the two brothers having died by each other's hands, the people of the city made Creon their king, as being wise and prudent, and next of kin to the dead; and he issued his decree that Eteocles should be buried with due honour, but that no man should dare to bury Polyneikes, who had come purposing to lay waste the city and all the temples of the Gods.

SCENE.—Thebes, in front of the Palace. Early morning. Hills in the distance on the left; on the right the city.

Enter ANTIGONE and ISMENE.

ANTIG. Ismene, mine own sister, darling
one!

¹Translation by Plumptre.

Is there, of ills that sprang from Œdipus,
One left that Zeus will fail to bring on us,
The two who yet remain? Nought is there
sad,

Nought full of sorrow, steeped in sin or
shame, 5

But I have seen it in thy woes and mine.
And now, what new decree is this they tell,
Our captain has enjoined on all the State?
Know'st thou? Hast heard? Or are they hid from thee, 9

The ills that come from foes upon our friends?

ISM. No tidings of our friends, Antigone, Pleasant or painful, since that hour have
come,

When we, two sisters, lost our brothers
twain,

In one day dying by a twofold blow.

And since in this last night the Argive host 15
Has left the field, I nothing further know, Nor brightening fortune, nor increasing gloom.

ANTIG. That knew I well, and therefore sent for thee

Beyond the gates, that thou may'st hear
alone.

ISM. What meanest thou? It is but all too clear 20

Thou broadest darkly o'er some tale of woe,

ANTIG. And does not Creon treat our brothers twain

One with the rites of burial, one with shame?

Eteocles, so say they, he interred

Fitly, with wonted rites, as one held meet 25

To pass with honour to the dead below.

But for the corpse of Polyneikes, slain

So piteously, they say, he has proclaimed

To all the citizens, that none should give

His body burial, or bewail his fate, 30

But leave it still unwept, unsepulchred,

A prize full rich for birds that scent afar

Their sweet repast. So Creon bids, they

say,

Creon the good, commanding thee and me,—

Yes, me, I say,—and now is coming here, 35

To make it clear to those who know it not,

And counts the matter not a trivial thing;

But whoso does the things that he forbids,

For him there waits within the city's walls

The death of stoning. Thus, then, stands thy case; 40

And quickly thou wilt show, if thou art born

Of noble nature, or degenerate liv'st,

Base child of honoured parents.

ISM.

How could I,

O daring in thy mood, in this our plight,
Or breaking law or keeping, aught avail? 45

ANTIG. Wilt thou with me share risk and toil? Look to it.

ISM. What risk is this? What purpose fills thy mind?

ANTIG. Wilt thou help this my hand to lift the dead?

ISM. Mean'st thou to bury him, when law forbids?

ANTIG. He is my brother; yes, and thine, though thou 50

Would'st fain he were not. I desert him not.

ISM. O daring one, when Creon bids thee
not?

ANTIG. He has no right to keep me from mine own.

ISM. Ah me! remember, sister, how our
sire

Perished, with hate o'erwhelmed and infamy, 55

From evils that himself did bring to light,

With his own hand himself of eyes bereaving,

And how his wife and mother, both in one,

With twisted cordage, cast away her life;

And thirdly, how our brothers in one day 60

In suicidal conflict wrought the doom,

Each of the other. And we twain are left;

And think, how much more wretchedly than
all

We twain shall perish, if, against the law,

We brave our sovereign's edict and his
power. 65

This first we need remember, we were born

Women; as such, not made to strive with men.

And next, that they who reign surpass in strength,

And we must bow to this, and, worse than
this.

I then, entreating those that dwell below, 70

To judge me leniently, as forced to yield,

Will hearken to our rulers. Over-zeal

That still will meddle, little wisdom shows.

ANTIG. I will not ask thee, nor though thou should'st wish

To do it, should'st thou join with my consent. 75

Do what thou wilt, I go to bury him;

And good it were, in doing this, to die.

Loved I shall be with him whom I have loved,

Guilty of holiest crime. More time is mine

In which to share the favour of the dead, 80
Than that of those who live; for I shall rest
For ever there. But thou, if thus thou
please,

Count as dishonoured what the Gods approve.

ISM. I do them no dishonour, but I find Myself too weak to war against the State.

ANTIG. Make what excuse thou wilt, I go to rear 86

A grave above the brother whom I love.

ISM. Ah, wretched me! how much I fear
for thee!

ANTIG. Fear not for me. Thine own fate raise to safety.

ISM. At any rate, disclose this deed to
none;

Keep it close hidden: I will hide it too.

ANTIG. Speak out! I bid thee. Silent, thou wilt be

More hateful to me, if thou fail to tell
My deed to all men.

ISM. Fiery is thy mood,

Although thy deeds the very blood might
chill. 95

ANTIG. I know I please the souls I ought to please.

ISM. Yes, if thou canst; thou seek'st the impossible.

ANTIG. When strength shall fail me, then I'll cease to strive.

ISM. We should not hunt the impossible at all.

ANTIG. If thou speak thus, my hatred wilt thou gain, 100

And rightly wilt be hated of the dead.

Leave me and my ill counsel to endure

This dreadful doom. I shall not suffer
aught

So evil as a death dishonourable.

ISM. Go then, if so thou wilt. Of this be sure, 105

Wild as thou art, thy friends must love thee still.

Exeunt.

Enter Chorus of Theban Elders.

STROPHE I

CHOR. O light of yon bright sun,
Fairest of all that ever shone on Thebes,
Thebes with her seven high gates,
Thou didst appear that day, 110
Eye of the golden dawn,

O'er Dirké's streams advancing,
Driving with quickened curb,
In haste of headlong flight,
The warrior who, in panoply of proof, 115
From Argos came, with shield of glittering
white;

Whom Polyneikes brought,
Roused by the strife of tongues
Against our fatherland,
As eagle shrieking shrill, 120
He hovered o'er our land,
With snow-white wing bedecked,
Begirt with myriad arms,
And flowing horsehair crests.

ANTISTROPHE I

He stood above our towers, 125
Encircling, with his spears all blood-bestained,
The portals of our gates;
He went, before he filled
His jaw with blood of men,
Ere the pine-fed Hephæstos 30
Had seized our crown of towers.
So loud the battle din

That Ares loves was raised around his rear,
A conflict hard e'en for his dragon foe.

For breath of haughty speech 135
Zeus hateth evermore;
And seeing them advance,
With mighty rushing stream,
And clang of golden arms,
With brandished fire he hurls 140
One who rushed eagerly
From topmost battlement
To shout out, "Victory!"

STROPHE II

Crashing to earth he fell,
Down-smitten, with his torch, 145
Who came, with madman's haste,
Drunken, with frenzied soul,
And swept o'er us with blasts,
The whirlwind blasts of hate.
Thus on one side they fare, 150
And Ares great, like war-horse in his strength,
Smiting now here, now there,
Brought each his several fate.

For seven chief warriors at the seven gates met,

Equals with equals matched, 155
To Zeus, the Lord of War,
Left tribute, arms of bronze;
All but the hateful ones,

Who, from one father and one mother sprung,
 Stood wielding, hand to hand, 160
 Their two victorious spears,
 And had their doom of death as common lot.

ANTISTROPHE II

But now, since Victory,
 Of mightiest name, hath come
 To Thebes, of chariots proud, 165
 Joying and giving joy,
 After these wars just past,
 Learn ye forgetfulness,
 And all night long, with dance and voice of hymns,
 Let us go round in state 170
 To all the shrines of Gods, While Bacchos. making Thebes resound with dance,
 Begins the strain of joy;
 But, lo! our country's king,
 Creon, Menœkeus' son, 175
 New ruler, by new change,
 And providence of God,
 Comes to us, steering on some new device;
 For, lo! he hath convened,
 By herald's loud command, 180
 This council of the elders of our land.

Enter CREON.

CREON. My friends, for what concerns
 our commonwealth,
 The Gods who vexed it with the billowing storms
 Have righted it again; and I have sent,
 By special summons, calling you to come 185
 Apart from all the others. This, in part,
 As knowing ye did all along uphold
 The might of Laios' throne, in part again,
 Because when Œdipus our country ruled,
 And, when he perished, then towards his
 sons 190
 Ye still were faithful in your steadfast mind.
 And since they fell, as by a double death,
 Both on the selfsame day with murderous
 blow,
 Smiting and being smitten, now I hold Their thrones and all their power of sov'-
 reignty 195
 By nearness of my kindred to the dead.
 And hard it is to learn what each man is,
 In heart and mind and judgment, till he gain
 Experience in princedom and in laws.
 For me, whoe'er is called to guide a State, 200

And does not catch at counsels wise and
 good,
 But holds his peace through any fear of man,
 I deem him basest of all men that are,
 And so have deemed long since; and who-soe'er
 As worthier than his country counts his
 friend, 205
 I utterly despise him. I myself,
 Zeus be my witness, who beholdeth all,
 Would not keep silence, seeing danger come,
 Instead of safety, to my subjects true. 209
 Nor could I take as friend my country's foe;
 For this I know, that there our safety lies,
 And sailing while the good ship holds her
 course,
 We gather friends around us. By these rules
 And such as these do I maintain the State.
 And now I come, with edicts, close allied 215
 To these in spirit, for my citizens,
 Concerning these two sons of Œdipus.
 Eteocles, who died in deeds of might Illustrious, fighting for our fatherland,
 To honour him with sepulture, all rites 220
 Duly performed that to the noblest dead
 Of right belong. Not so his brother; him
 I speak of, Polyneikes, who, returned
 From exile, sought with fire to desolate
 His father's city and the shrines of Gods, 225 Yes, sought to glut his rage with blood of
 men,
 And lead them captives to the bonds slave's
 doom;
 Him I decree that none shall dare entomb, 228
 That none shall utter wail or loud lament,
 But leave his corpse unburied, by the dogs
 And vultures mangled, foul to look upon.
 Such is my purpose. Ne'er, if I can help, Shall the vile have more honour than the
 just;
 But whoso shows himself my country's
 friend, 234
 Living or dead, from me shall honour gain.
 CHOR. This is thy pleasure, O Menœkeus'
 son,
 For him who hated, him who loved our State;
 And thou hast power to make what laws thou wilt,
 Both for the dead and all for us who live.
 CREON. Be ye then guardians of the things I speak. 240
 CHOR. Commit this task to one of younger years.

CREON. Nay, watchmen are appointed for the corpse.

CHOR. What other task then dost thou lay on us?

CREON. Not to consent with those that disobey.

CHOR. None are so foolish as to seek for
death. 245

CREON. Yet that shall be the doom; but love of gain

Hath oft with false hopes lured men to their
death.

Enter Guard.

GUARD. I will not say, O king, that I have come

Panting with speed, and plying nimble feet,
For I had many halting-points of thought, Backwards and forwards turning, round and
round: 251

For now my mind would give me sage advice;

"Poor wretch, why go where thou must bear
the blame?

Or wilt thou tarry, fool? Shall Creon know
These things from others? How wilt thou
'scape grief?" 255

Revolving thus, I came in haste, yet slow,
And thus a short way finds itself prolonged;
But, last of all, to come to thee prevailed.
And though I tell of nought, yet I will speak;
For this one hope I cling to, might and main,
That I shall suffer nought but destiny. 261

CREON. What is it then that causes such dismay?

GUARD. First, for mine own share in it,
this I say,

The deed I did not, do not know who did,
Nor should I rightly come to ill for it. 265

CREON. Thou feel'st thy way and fencest up thy deed

All round and round. 'Twould seem thou hast some news.

GUARD. Yea, news of fear engenders long delay.

CREON. Wilt thou not speak, and then depart in peace?

GUARD. Well, speak I will. The corpse
... Some one has been 270

But now and buried it, a little dust
O'er the skin scattering, with the wonted rites.

CREON. What say'st thou? What man dared this deed of guilt?

GUARD. I know not. Neither was there stroke of axe, 274

Nor earth cast up by mattock. All the soil
Was dry and hard, no track of chariot wheel;
But he who did it went and left no sign.

And when the first day-watchman showed it
us,

The sight caused wonder and sore grief to all;
For he had disappeared: no tomb indeed 280
Was over him, but dust all lightly strown,
As by some hand that shunned defiling guilt;
And no sign was there of wild beast or dog Having come and torn him. Evil words arose 284

Among us, guard to guard imputing blame,
Which might have come to blows, and none was there

To check its course, for each to each appeared

The man whose hand had done it. Yet not
one

Had it brought home, but each disclaimed
all knowledge;

And we were ready in our hands to take 290
Bars of hot iron, and to walk through fire,
And call the Gods to witness none of us Were privy to his schemes who planned the
deed,

Nor his who wrought it. Then at last, when nought

Was gained by all our searching, some one speaks, 295

Who made us bend our gaze upon the ground
In fear and trembling: for we neither saw
How to oppose it, nor, accepting it,
How we might prosper in it. And his speech
Was this, that all our tale should go to thee, Not hushed up anywise. This gained the
day; 301

And me, ill-starred, the lot condemns to win
This precious prize. So here I come to thee
Against my will; and surely do I trow Thou dost not wish to see me. Still 'tis
true 305

That no man loves the messenger of ill.

CHOR. For me, my prince, my mind some time has thought

If this perchance has some divine intent.

CREON. Cease then, before thou fillest me with wrath,

Lest thou be found, though full of years, a fool. 310

For what thou say'st is most intolerable,
That for this corpse the providence of Gods

Has any care. What! have they buried him,
As to their patron paying honours high,
Who came to waste their columned shrines with fire, 315

To desecrate their offerings and their lands,
And all their wonted customs? Dost thou
see

The Gods approving men of evil deeds?
It is not so; but men of rebel mood,
Lifting their head in secret long ago, 320
Still murmured thus against me. Never yet
Had they their neck beneath the yoke, content

To bear it with submission. They, I know, Have bribed these men to let the deed be
done.

No thing in use by man, for power of ill, 325
Can equal money. This lays cities low,
This drives men forth from quiet dwelling-
place,

This warps and changes minds of worthiest
stamp,

To turn to deeds of baseness, teaching men
All shifts of cunning, and to know the guilt
Of every impious deed. But they who, hired, 331

Have wrought this crime, have laboured to their cost,

Or soon or late to pay the penalty.
But if Zeus still claims any awe from me,
Know this, and with an oath I tell it thee,
Unless ye find the very man whose hand 336
Has wrought this burial, and before mine
eyes

Present him captive, death shall not suffice,
Till first, hung up still living, ye shall show
The story of this outrage, that henceforth,
Knowing what gain is lawful, ye may grasp
At that, and learn it is not meet to love 342
Gain from all quarters. By base profit won
You will see more destroyed than prosper-
ing.

GUARD. May I then speak? Or shall I turn and go? 345

CREON. See'st not e'en yet how vexing are thy words?

GUARD. Is it thine ears they trouble, or thy soul?

CREON. Why dost thou gauge my trouble where it is?

GUARD. The door grieves thy heart, but I thine ears.

CREON. Pshaw! what a babbler, born to prate art thou! 350

GUARD. May be; yet I this deed, at least, did not.

CREON. Yes, and for money; selling e'en
thy soul.

GUARD. Ah me!

How dire it is, in thinking, false to think!

CREON. Prate about thinking: but unless ye show 355

To me the doers, ye shall say ere long That scoundrel gains still work their punishment.

Exit.

GUARD. God send we find him! Should we find him not,
As well may be, (for this must chance decide,)

You will not see me coming here again; 360
For now, being safe beyond all hope of mine,
Beyond all thought, I owe the Gods much thanks.

Exit.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Many the forms of life,
Wondrous and strange to see,
But nought than man appears 365
More wondrous and more strange.

He, with the wintry gales,
O'er the white foaming sea,
'Mid wild waves surging round,
Wendeth his way across: 370

Earth, of all Gods, from ancient days the first,

Unworn and undecayed.

He, with his ploughs that travel o'er and o'er,
Furrowing with horse and mule,
Wears ever year by year. 375

ANTISTROPHE I

The thoughtless tribe of birds,
The beasts that roam the fields,
The brood in sea-depths born,
He takes them all in nets
Knotted in snaring mesh. 380
Man, wonderful in skill.

And by his subtle arts
He holds in sway the beasts

That roam the fields, or tread the mountain's height;

And brings the binding yoke 385

Upon the neck of horse with shaggy mane,
Or bull on mountain crest,
Untameable in strength.

STROPHE II

And speech, and thought as swift as wind,
 And tempered mood for higher life of states,
 These he has learnt, and how to flee 391
 Or the clear cold of frost unkind,
 Or darts of storm and shower,
 Man all-providing. Unprovided, he Meeteth no chance the coming days may
 bring; 395
 Only from Hades, still
 He fails to find escape,
 Though skill of art may teach him how to flee
 From depths of fell disease incurable.

ANTISTROPHE II

So, gifted with a wondrous might, 400
 Above all fancy's dreams, with skill to plan,
 Now unto evil, now to good,
 He turns. While holding fast the laws,
 His country's sacred rights, 404
 That rest upon the oath of Gods on high,
 High in the State: an outlaw from the State,
 When loving, in his pride,
 The thing that is not good;
 Ne'er may he share my hearth, nor yet my
 thoughts,
 Who worketh deeds of evil like to this. 410

Enter Guards, bringing in ANTIGONE.

As to this portent which the Gods have sent,
 I stand in doubt. Can I, who know her,
 say
 That this is not the maid Antigone?
 O wretched one of wretched father born,
 Thou child of Œdipus, 415
 What means this? Surely 'tis not that they bring
 Thee as a rebel 'gainst the king's decree,
 And taken in the folly of thine act?
 GUARD. Yes! She it was by whom the deed was done.
 We found her burying. Where is Creon,
 pray? 420
 CHOR. Back from his palace comes he just in time.

Enter CREON.

CREON. What chance is this, with which my coming fits?
 GUARD. Men, O my king, should pledge themselves to nought;

For cool reflection makes their purpose void.
 I surely thought I should be slow to come
 here, 425
 Cowed by thy threats, which then fell thick
 on me;
 But now persuaded by the sweet delight Which comes unlooked for, and beyond our hopes,
 I come, although I swore the contrary, 429
 Bringing this maiden, whom in act we found Decking the grave. No need for lots was
 now;
 The prize was mine, and not another man's.
 And now, O king, take her, and as thou wilt,
 Judge and convict her. I can claim a right
 To wash my hands of all this troublous coil.
 CREON. How and where was it that ye seized and brought her? 436 GUARD. She was in act of burying. Thou knowest all.
 CREON. Dost know and rightly speak the tale thou tell'st?
 GUARD. I saw her burying that self-same corpse
 Thou bad'st us not to bury. Speak I clear?
 CREON. How was she seen, and taken in the act? 441
 GUARD. The matter passed as follows:—
 When we came,
 With all those dreadful threats of thine upon
 us,
 Sweeping away the dust which, lightly
 spread,
 Covered the corpse, and laying stript and
 bare 445
 The tainted carcass, on the hill we sat
 To windward, shunning the infected air,
 Each stirring up his fellow with strong words,
 If any shirked his duty. This went on
 Some time, until the glowing orb of day 450
 Stood in mid heaven, and the scorching heat
 Fell on us. Then a sudden whirlwind rose,
 A scourge from heaven, raising squalls on
 earth,
 And filled the plain, the leafage stripping
 bare
 Of all the forest, and the air's vast space 455
 Was thick and troubled, and we closed our
 eyes,
 Until the plague the Gods had sent was past,
 And when it ceased, a weary time being gone,
 The girl is seen, and with a bitter cry,
 Shrill as a bird's, when it beholds its nest 460
 All emptied of its infant brood, she wails:

Thus she, when she beholds the corpse all stript,
Groaned loud with many moanings, and she called Fierce curses down on those who did the
deed.
And in her hand she brings some fine, dry
dust, 465
And from a vase of bronze, well wrought, up-
raised,
She pours the three libations o'er the dead.
And we, beholding, give her chase forthwith,
And run her down, nought terrified at us.
And then we charged her with the former
deed, 470
As well as this. And nothing she denied.
But this to me both bitter is and sweet,
For to escape one's-self from ill is sweet, 473
But to bring friends to trouble, this is hard
And painful. Yet my nature bids me count
Above all these things safety for myself.
CREON. [To ANTIGONE.] Thou, then—yes, thou, who bend'st thy face to
earth—
Confesses thou, or dost deny the deed?
ANTIG. I own I did it, and will not deny.
CREON. [To Guard.] Go thou thy way, where'er thy will may choose, 480
Freed from a weighty charge.

Exit Guard.

[To ANTIGONE.] And now for thee.
Say in few words, not lengthening out thy
speech,
Knew'st thou the edicts which forbade these things?
ANTIG. I knew them. Could I fail? Full clear were they.
CREON. And thou did'st dare to disobey
these laws? 485
ANTIG. Yes, for it was not Zeus who gave them forth,
Nor Justice, dwelling with the Gods below,
Who traced these laws for all the sons of
men;
Nor did I deem thy edicts strong enough,
That thou, a mortal man, should'st over-
pass 490
The unwritten laws of God that know not
change.
They are not of to-day nor yesterday,
But live for ever, nor can man assign When first they sprang to being. Not through fear
Of any man's resolve was I prepared 495

Before the Gods to bear the penalty
Of sinning against these. That I should die
I knew, (how should I not?) though thy decree
Had never spoken. And, before my time
If I shall die, I reckon this a gain; 500
For whoso lives, as I, in many woes,
How can it be but he shall gain by death?
And so for me to bear this doom of thine
Has nothing painful. But, if I had left
My mother's son unburied on his death, 505
In that I should have suffered; but in this
I suffer not. And should I seem to thee
To do a foolish deed, 'tis simply this,—
I bear the charge of folly from a fool.
CHOR. The maiden's stubborn will, of stubborn sire 510
The offspring shows itself. She knows not yet
To yield to evils.
CREON. Know then, minds too stiff
Most often stumble, and the rigid steel 513
Baked in the furnace, made exceeding hard,
Thou see'st most often split and shivered lie;
And I have known the steeds of fiery mood
With a small curb subdued. It is not meet That one who lives in bondage to his neighbours
Should think too proudly. Wanton outrage then
This girl first learnt, transgressing these my laws; 520
But this, when she has done it, is again
A second outrage, over it to boast,
And laugh as having done it. Surely, then,
She is the man, not I, if, all unscathed, Such deeds of might are hers. But be she
child 525
Of mine own sister, or of one more near
Than all the kith and kin of Household
Zeus,
She and her sister shall not 'scape a doom
Most foul and shameful; for I charge her,
too,
With having planned this deed of sepulture.
Go ye and call her. 'Twas but now within
I saw her raving, losing self-command. 532
And still the mind of those who in the dark Plan deeds of evil is the first to fail,
And so convicts itself of secret guilt. 535
But most I hate when one found out in guilt
Will seek to gloze and brave it to the end.
ANTIG. And dost thou seek aught else beyond my death?

CREON. Nought else for me. That gaining, I gain all.

ANTIG. Why then delay? Of all thy words not one 540

Pleases me now, (and may it never please!)
And so all mine must grate upon thine ears.
And yet how could I higher glory gain 543
Than placing my true brother in his tomb?
There is not one of these but would confess
It pleases them, did fear not seal their lips.
The tyrant's might in much besides excels,
And it may do and say whate'er it will.

CREON. Of all the race of Cadmos thou alone

Look'st thus upon the deed.

ANTIG. They see it too 550
As I do, but their tongue is tied for thee.

CREON. Art not ashamed against their thoughts to think?

ANTIG. There is nought base in honouring our own blood.

CREON. And was he not thy kin who fought against him?

ANTIG. Yea, brother, of one father and one mother. 555

CREON. Why then give honour which dishonours him?

ANTIG. The dead below will not repeat thy words.

CREON. Yes, if thou give like honour to the goddess.

ANTIG. It was his brother, not his slave that died.

CREON. Wasting this land, while he died fighting for it. 560

ANTIG. Yet Hades still craves equal rites for all.

CREON. The good craves not the portion of the bad.

ANTIG. Who knows if this be holy deemed below?

CREON. Not even when he dies can foe be friend.

ANTIG. My nature leads to sharing love, not hate. 565

CREON. Go then below; and if thou must have love,

Love them. While I live, women shall not rule.

Enter ISMENE, led in by Attendants.

CHOR. And, lo! Ismene at the gate
Comes shedding tears of sisterly regard,

And o'er her brow a gathering cloud 570
Mars the deep roseate blush,
Bedewing her fair cheek.

CREON. [To ISMENE.] And thou who, creeping as a viper creeps, Did'st drain my life in secret, and I knew not
That I was rearing two accursèd ones, 575
Subverters of my throne,—come, tell me, then,

Wilt thou confess thou took'st thy part in this,
Or wilt thou swear thou did'st not know of it?

ISM. I did the deed, if she did, go with her.

Yes, share the guilt, and bear an equal blame.

ANTIG. Nay, justice will not suffer this, for thou 581

Did'st not consent, nor did I let thee join.

ISM. Nay, in thy troubles, I am not ashamed

In the same boat with thee to share thy fate.

ANTIG. Who did it, Hades knows, and those below: 585

I do not love a friend who loves in words.

ISM. Do not, my sister, put me to such shame,

As not to let me join in death with thee,
And so to pay due reverence to the dead.

ANTIG. Share not my death, nor make thine own this deed 590

Thou had'st no hand in. My death shall suffice.

ISM. What life to me is sweet, bereaved of thee?

ANTIG. Ask Creon there, since thou o'er him dost watch.

ISM. Why vex me so, in nothing bettered by it?

ANTIG. 'Tis pain indeed, to laugh my laugh at thee. 595

ISM. But now, at least, how may I profit thee?

ANTIG. Save thou thyself. I grudge not thy escape.

ISM. Ah, woe is me! and must I miss thy fate?

ANTIG. Thou mad'st thy choice to live, and I to die.

ISM. 'Twas not because I failed to speak my thoughts. 600

ANTIG. To these did'st thou, to those did I seem wise.

ISM. And yet the offence is equal in us both.

ANTIG. Take courage. Thou dost live.
My soul long since
Hath died to render service to the dead.

CREON. Of these two girls, the one goes mad but now, 605
The other ever since her life began.

ISM. E'en so, O king; no mind that ever lived
Stands firm in evil days, but goes astray.

CREON. Thine did, when, with the vile, vile deeds thou choosest.

ISM. How could I live without her presence here? 610

CREON. Speak not of presence. She is here no more.

ISM. And wilt thou slay thy son's betrothèd bride?

CREON. Full many a field there is which he may plough.

ISM. None like that plighted troth 'twixt him and her.

CREON. Wives that are vile I love not for my sons. 615

ISM. Ah, dearest Hæmon, how thy father shames thee!

CREON. Thou with that marriage dost but vex my soul.

CHOR. And wilt thou rob thy son of her he loved?

CREON. 'Tis Death, not I, shall break
the marriage off.

CHOR. Her doom is fixed, it seems, then.
She must die. 620

CREON. Fixed, yes, by me and thee. No more delay,

Lead them within, ye slaves. These must be kept

Henceforth as women, suffered not to roam;
For even boldest natures shrink in fear

When they see Hades overshadowing life. 625
Exeunt Guards with ANTIGONE and ISMENE.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Blessed are those whose life no woe doth taste!

For unto those whose house
The Gods have shaken, nothing fails of curse
Or woe, that creeps to generations far.

E'en thus a wave, (when spreads, 630
With blasts from Thrakian coasts,
The darkness of the deep,)

Up from the sea's abyss
Hither and thither rolls the black sand on,
And every jutting peak, 635

Swept by the storm-wind's strength,
Lashed by the fierce wild waves,
Re-echoes with the far-resounding roar.

ANTISTROPHE I

I see the woes that smote, in ancient days,
The seed of Labdacos, 640

Who perished long ago, with grief on grief
Still falling, nor does this age rescue that;
Some God still smites it down,
Nor have they any end:

For now there rose a gleam, 645
Over the last weak shoots,

That sprang from out the race of Ædipus;
Yet this the blood-stained scythe
Of those that reign below

Cuts off relentlessly, 650
And maddened speech, and frenzied rage of
heart.

STROPHE II

Thy power, O Zeus, what haughtiness of
man,

Yea, what can hold in check?
Which neither sleep, that maketh all things
old, 654

Nor the long months of Gods that never fail,
Can for a moment seize.

But still as Lord supreme,
Waxing not old with time,
Thou dwellest in Thy sheen of radiance
On far Olympos' height. 660

Through future near or far as through the past,

One law holds ever good,
Nought comes to life of man unscathed throughout by woe.

ANTISTROPHE II

For hope to many comes in wanderings wild,
A solace and support; 665

To many as a cheat of fond desires,
And creepeth still on him who knows it not,

Until he burn his foot
Within the scorching flame.

Full well spake one of old, 670
That evil ever seems to be as good

To those whose thoughts of heart
God leadeth unto woe,

And without woe, he spends but shortest space of time.

And here comes Hæmon, last of all thy sons:
Comes he bewailing sore 676

The fate of her who should have been his bride,
The maid Antigone,
Grieving o'er vanished joys?

Enter HÆMON.

CREON. Soon we shall know much more than seers can tell 680

Surely thou dost not come, my son, to rage
Against thy father, hearing his decree, Fixing her doom who should have been thy
bride;

Or dost thou love us still, whate'er we do?

HÆMON. My father, I am thine; and thou dost guide 685

With thy wise counsels, which I gladly follow.

No marriage weighs one moment in the scales

With me, while thou dost guide my steps aright.

CREON. This thought, my son, should dwell within thy breast,

That all things stand below a father's will;
For so men pray that they may rear and keep 691

Obedient offspring by their hearths and homes,

That they may both requite their father's foes,

And pay with him like honours to his friend.

But he who reareth sons that profit not, 695

What could one say of him but this, that he Breeds his own sorrow, laughter to his foes?

Lose not thy reason, then, my son, o'ercome

By pleasure, for a woman's sake, but know, 700

A worthless wife, the partner of thy bed.

What ulcerous sore is worse than one we love

Who proves all worthless? No! with loathing scorn,

As hateful to thee, let that girl go wed

A spouse in Hades. Taken in the act 705

I found her, her alone of all the State,

Rebellious. And I will not make myself

False to the State. She dies. So let her
call

On Zeus, the lord of kindred. If I rear 709

Of mine own stock things foul and orderless,

I shall have work enough with those without,

For he who in the life of home is good

Will still be seen as just in things of state;

I should be sure that man would govern well,

And know well to be governed, and would
stand 715

In war's wild storm, on his appointed post,

A just and good defender. But the man

Who by transgressions violates the laws,

Or thinks to bid the powers that be obey, 719

He must not hope to gather praise from me.

No! we must follow whom the State appoints

In things or just and trivial, or, may be,

The opposite of these. For anarchy

Is our worst evil, brings our commonwealth

To utter ruin, lays whole houses low, 725

In battle strife hurls firm allies in flight;

But they who yield to guidance—these shall find

Obedience saves most men. Thus help should come

To what our rulers order; least of all

Ought men to bow before a woman's sway.

Far better, if it must be so, to fall 731

By a man's hand, than thus to bear reproach,

By woman conquered.

CHOR. Unto us, O king,

Unless our years have robbed us of our wit,

Thou seemest to say wisely what thou say'st.

HÆM. The Gods, my father, have bestowed on man 736

His reason, noblest of all earthly gifts;

And that thou speakest wrongly these thy
words

I cannot say, (God grant I ne'er know how Such things to utter!) yet another's thoughts

May have some reason. 'Tis my lot to watch 741

What each man says or does, or blames in
thee,

For dread thy face to one of low estate,

Who speaks what thou wilt not rejoice to hear.

But I can hear the things in darkness said,

How the whole city wails this maiden's fate,

As one "who of all women most unjustly, 747

For noblest deed must die the foulest death,

Who her own brother, fallen in the fray,

Would neither leave unburied, nor expose

To carrion dogs, or any bird of prey, 751

May she not claim the meed of golden praise?"

Such is the whisper that in secret runs

All darkling. And for me, my father, nought

Is dearer than thy welfare. What can be

A nobler prize of honour for the son 756

Than a sire's glory, or for sire than son's?

I pray thee, then, wear not one mood alone,
That what thou say'st is right, and nought
but that;

For he who thinks that he alone is wise, 760
His mind and speech above what others have,

Such men when searched are mostly empty
found.

But for a man to learn, though he be wise, Yea to learn much, and know the time to yield,

Brings no disgrace. When winter floods the streams, 765

Thou see'st the trees that bend before the
storm,

Save their last twigs, while those that will not yield

Perish with root and branch. And when one hauls

Too tight the mainsail rope, and will not slack,

He has to end his voyage with deck o'er-
turned. 770

Do thou then yield; permit thyself to change.
Young though I be, if any prudent thought
Be with me, I at least will dare assert

The higher worth of one, who, come what will, 774

Is full of knowledge. If that may not be (For nature is not wont to take that bent,)

'Tis good to learn from those who counsel
well.

CHOR. My king! 'tis fit that thou should'st
learn from him,

If he speaks words in season; and, in turn,
That thou [to HÆMON] should'st learn of him,
for both speak well. 780

CREON. Shall we at our age stoop to learn from him,

Young as he is, the lesson to be wise?

HÆM. Learn nought thou should'st not learn. And if I'm young,

Thou should'st my deeds and not my years consider.

CREON. Is that thy deed to reverence rebel souls? 785

HÆM. I would bid none waste reverence on the base.

CREON. Has not that girl been seized with that disease?

HÆM. The men of Thebes with one accord say, No.

CREON. And will my subjects tell us how to rule?

HÆM. Dost thou not see thou speakest like a boy? 790

CREON. Must I then rule for others than myself?

HÆM. That is no State which hangs on one man's will.

CREON. Is not the State deemed his who governs it?

HÆM. Brave rule! Alone, and o'er an empty land!

CREON. This boy, it seems, will be his bride's ally. 795

HÆM. If thou art she, for thou art all my
care.

CREON. Basest of base, against thy father pleading!

HÆM. Yea, for I see thee sin a grievous sin.

CREON. And do I sin revering mine own
sway?

HÆM. Thou show'st no reverence, trampling on God's laws. 800

CREON. O guilty soul, by woman's craft beguiled!

HÆM. Thou wilt not find me slave unto the base.

CREON. Thy every word is still on her behalf.

HÆM. Yea, and on thine and mine, and theirs below.

CREON. Be sure thou shalt not wed her while she lives. 805

HÆM. Then she must die, and, dying, others slay.

CREON. And dost thou dare to come to me with threats?

HÆM. Is it a threat against vain thoughts to speak?

CREON. Thou to thy cost shalt teach me wisdom's ways, 809

Thyself in wisdom wanting.

HÆM. I would say
Thou wast unwise, if thou wert not my father.

CREON. Thou woman's slave, I say, prate on no more.

HÆM. Wilt thou then speak, and, speaking, listen not?

CREON. Nay, by Olympos! Thou shalt not go free 814

To flout me with reproaches. Lead her out Whom my soul hates, that she may die forthwith

Before mine eyes, and near her bridegroom
here.

HÆM. No! Think it not! Near me she shall not die,
And thou shalt never see my face alive,
That thou may'st storm at those who like to yield. 820

Exit.

CHOR. The man has gone, O king, in hasty mood.

A mind distressed in youth is hard to bear.

CREON. Let him do what he will, and bear himself

As more than man, he shall not save those girls.

CHOR. What! Dost thou mean to slay them both alike? 825

CREON. Not her who touched it not;
there thou say'st well.

CHOR. What form of death mean'st thou to slay her with?

CREON. Leading her on to where the desert path

Is loneliest, there alive, in rocky cave
Will I immure her, just so much of food 830
Before her set as may avert pollution,
And save the city from the guilt of blood;
And there, invoking Hades, whom alone
Of all the Gods she worships, she, perchance, Shall gain escape from death, or then shall
know 835

That Hades-worship is but labour lost.

Exit.

STROPHE

CHOR. O Love, in every battle victor owned;

Love, rushing on thy prey,

Now on a maiden's soft and blooming cheek,
In secret ambush hid; 840

Now o'er the broad sea wandering at will,
And now in shepherd's folds;

Of all the Undying Ones none 'scape from
thee,

Nor yet of mortal men

Whose lives are measured as a fleeting day;
And who has thee is frenzied in his soul. 846

ANTISTROPHE

Thou makest vile the purpose of the just,
To his own fatal harm;

Thou hast stirred up this fierce and deadly
strife,

Of men of nearest kin; 850

The charm of eyes of bride beloved and fair
Is crowned with victory,

And dwells on high among the powers that
rule,

Equal with holiest laws; 854

For Aphrodite, she whom none subdues,
Sports in her might and majesty divine,

I, even I, am borne

Beyond the appointed laws;

I look on this, and cannot stay

The fountain of my tears. 860

For, lo! I see her, see Antigone

Wend her sad, lonely way

To that bride-chamber where we all must lie.

ANTIG. Behold, O men of this my father-
land,

I wend my last lone way, 865

Seeing the last sunbeam, now and never-
more;

He leads me yet alive,

Hades that welcomes all,

To Acheron's dark shore,

With neither part nor lot 870

In marriage festival,

Nor hath the marriage hymn

Been sung for me as bride,

But I shall be the bride of Acheron.

CHOR. And hast thou not all honour, worthiest praise, 875

Who goest to the home that hides the
dead,

Not smitten by the sickness that decays,

Nor by the sharp sword's need,

But of thine own free will, in fullest life,

Alone of mortals, thus 880

To Hades tak'st thy way?

ANTIG. I heard of old her pitiable end,

On Sipylus' high crag,

The Phrygian stranger from a far land come,

Whom Tantalus begat; 885

Whom growth of rugged rock,

Clinging as ivy clings,

Subdued, and made its own:

And now, so runs the tale,

There, as she melts in shower, 890

The snow abideth aye,

And still bedews yon cliffs that lie below

Those brows that ever weep.

With fate like hers God brings me to my rest.

CHOR. A Goddess she, and of the high
Gods born; 895

And we are mortals, born of mortal seed.

And lo! for one who liveth but to die.

To gain like doom with those of heavenly
 race,
 Is great and strange to hear.
 ANTIG. Ye mock me then. Alas! Why wait ye not, 900
 By all our fathers' Gods, I ask of you,
 Till I have passed away,
 But flout me while I live?
 O city that I love,
 O men that claim as yours 905
 That city stored with wealth,
 O Dirke, fairest fount,
 O grove of Thebes, that boasts her chariot
 host,
 I bid you witness all,
 How, with no friends to weep, 910
 By what stern laws condemned,
 I go to that strong dungeon of the tomb,
 For burial strange, ah me!
 Nor dwelling with the living, nor the dead.
 CHOR. Forward and forward still to farthest verge 915
 Of daring hast thou gone,
 And now, O child, thou hast rushed violently
 Where Right erects her throne;
 Surely thou payest to the uttermost
 Thy father's debt of guilt. 920 ANTIG. Ah! thou hast touched the quick of all my grief,
 The thrice-told tale of all my father's woe,
 The fate which dogs us all,
 The old Labdakid race of ancient fame.
 Woe for the curses dire 925
 Of that defiled bed,
 With foulest incest stained,
 My mother's with my sire,
 Whence I myself have sprung, most miserable.
 And now, I go to them, 930
 To sojourn in the grave,
 Accursèd, and unwed;
 Ah, brother, thou did'st find
 Thy marriage fraught with ill,
 And thou, though dead, hast smitten down my life. 935
 CHOR. Acts reverent and devout
 May claim devotion's name,
 But power, in one to whom power comes as
 trust,
 May never be defied;
 And thee, thy stubborn mood, 940
 Self-chosen, layeth low.
 ANTIG. Unwept, without a friend,
 Unwed, and whelmed in woe,

I journey on this road that open lies.
 No more shall it be mine (O misery!) 945
 To look upon yon daylight's holy eye;
 And yet, of all my friends,
 Not one bewails my fate,
 No kindly tear is shed.

Enter CREON.

CREON. And know ye not, if men have leave to speak 950
 Their songs and wailings thus to stave off
 death,
 That they will never stop? Lead, lead her
 on,
 Without delay, and, as I said, immure
 In yon cavernous tomb, and then depart.
 Leave her to choose, or drear and lonely
 death, 955
 Or, living, in the tomb to find her home.
 Our hands are clean in all that touches her;
 But she no more shall dwell on earth with us.
 ANTIG. [Turning towards the cavern.] O tomb, my bridal chamber, vaulted home.
 Guarded right well for ever, where I go 960
 To join mine own, of whom the greater part
 Among the dead doth Persephassa hold;
 And I, of all the last and saddest, wend
 My way below, life's little span unfilled.
 And yet I go, and feed myself with hopes 965
 That I shall meet them, by my father loved,
 Dear to my mother, well-beloved of thee,
 Thou darling brother: I, with these my
 hands,
 Washed each dear corpse, arrayed you,
 poured libations,
 In rites of burial; and in care for thee, 970
 Thy body, Polyneikes, honouring,
 I gain this recompense. [And yet in sight
 Of all that rightly judge the deed was good;
 I had not done it had I come to be
 A mother with her children,—had not dared, Though 'twere a husband dead that mouldered there, 976
 Against my country's will to bear this toil.
 And am I asked what law constrained me
 thus?
 I answer, had I lost a husband dear,
 I might have had another; other sons 980
 By other spouse, if one were lost to me;
 But when my father and my mother sleep
 In Hades, then no brother more can come.
 And therefore, giving thee the foremost
 place, 984
 I seemed in Creon's eyes, O brother dear,

To sin in boldest daring. Therefore now
He leads me, having taken me by force,
Cut off from marriage bed and marriage
song,

Untasting wife's true joy, or mother's bliss,
With infant at her breast, but all forlorn, 990

Bereaved of friends, in utter misery,
Alive, I tread the chambers of the dead.]
What law of Heaven have I transgressed against?

What use for me, ill-starred one, still to look
To any God for succour, or to call 995
On any friend for aid? For holiest deed
I bear this charge of rank unholiness.

If acts like these the Gods on high approve,
We, taught by pain, shall own that we have sinned;

But if these sin, [looking at CREON] I pray
they suffer not 1000

Worse evils than the wrongs they do to me.

CHOR. Still do the same wild blasts
Vex her who standeth there.

CREON. Therefore shall these her guards
Weep sore for this delay. 1005

CHOR. Ah me! this word of thine
Tells of death drawing nigh.

CREON. I cannot bid thee hope
For other end than this.

ANTIG. O citadel of Thebes, my native
land, 1010

Ye Gods of ancient days,
I go, and linger not.

Behold me, O ye senators of Thebes,
The last, lone scion of the kingly race,
What things I suffer, and from whom they
come, 1015

Revering still the laws of reverence.

Guards lead ANTIGONE away.

STROPHE I

CHOR. So did the form of Danae bear of
old,

In brazen palace hid,
To lose the light of heaven, 1019

And in her tomb-like chamber was enclosed:
Yet she, O child, was noble in her race,
And well she stored the golden shower of Zeus.

But great and dread the might of Destiny;
Nor kingly wealth, nor war,
Nor tower, nor dark-hulled ships 1025
Beaten by waves, escape.

ANTISTROPHE I

So too was shut, enclosed in dungeon cave,
Bitter and fierce in mood,
The son of Dryas, king

Of yon Edonian tribes, for vile reproach, 1030

By Dionysos' hands, and so his strength

And soul o'er mad wastes drop by drop away,

And so he learnt that he, against the God,

Spake his mad words of scorn;

For he the Mænad throng 1035

And bright fire fain had stopped,

And roused the Muses' wrath.

STROPHE II

And by the double sea of those Dark Rocks

Are shores of Bosporos, 1039

And Thracian isle, as Salmydessos known,

Where Ares, whom they serve,

God of the region round,

Saw the dire, blinding wound,

That smote the twin-born sons 1044

Of Phineus by relentless step-dame's hand,—

Dark wound, on dark-doomed eyes,

Not with the stroke of sword,

But blood-stained hands, and point of spindle sharp.

ANTISTROPHE II

And they in misery, miserable fate,

Wasting away, wept sore, 1050

Born of a mother wedded with a curse,

And she who claimed descent

From men of ancient fame,

The old Erechtheid race,

Amid her father's winds, 1055

Daughter of Boreas, in far distant caves

Was reared, a child of Gods,

Swift moving as the steed

O'er lofty crag, and yet

The ever-living Fates bore hard on her. 1060

Enter TEIRESIAS, guided by a Boy.

TEIR. Princes of Thebes, we come as travellers joined,

One travelling for both, for still the blind must use

A guide's assistance to direct his steps.

CREON. And what new thing, Teiresias, brings thee here?

TEIR. I'll tell thee, and do thou the seer obey. 1065

CREON. Of old I was not wont to slight thy thoughts.

TEIR. So did'st thou steer our city's course full well.

CREON. I bear my witness from good profit gained.

TEIR. Know, then, thou walk'st on fortune's razor-edge.

CREON. What means this? How I shudder at thy speech! 1070

TEIR. Soon shalt thou know, as thou dost hear the signs

Of my dread art. For sitting, as of old,
Upon my ancient seat of augury,
Where every bird finds haven, lo! I hear Strange cry of winged creatures, shouting shrill, 1075

With inarticulate passion, and I knew
That they were tearing each the other's flesh
With bloody talons, for their whirring wings Made that quite clear: and straightway I, in
fear,

Made trial of the sacrifice that lay 1080
On fiery altar. And Hephæstos' flame Shone not from out the offering; but there oozed

Upon the ashes, trickling from the bones,
A moisture, and it smouldered, and it spat,
And, lo! the gall was scattered to the air, 1085
And forth from out the fat that wrapped them round

The thigh-bones fell. Such omens of decay
From holy sacrifice I learnt from him,
This boy, who now stands here, for he is still
A guide to me, as I to others am. 1090

And all this evil falls upon the State,
From out thy counsels; for our altars all,
Our sacred hearths are full of food for dogs
And birds unclean, the flesh of that poor wretch

Who fell, the son of Œdipus. And so 1095
The Gods no more hear prayers of sacrifice,
Nor own the flame that burns the victim's limbs;

Nor do the birds give cry of omen good,
But feed on carrion of a slaughtered corpse.
Think thou on this, my son: to err, indeed,
Is common unto all, but having erred, 1101

He is no longer reckless or unblest,
Who, having fallen into evil, seeks
For healing, nor continues still unmoved.

Self-will must bear the charge of stubborn-
ness: 1105

Yield to the dead, and outrage not a corpse.
What prowess is it fallen foes to slay?

Good counsel give I, planning good for thee,

And of all joys the sweetest is to learn From one who speaketh well, should that bring gain. 1110

CREON. Old man, as archers aiming at their mark,

So ye shoot forth your venom'd darts at me;
I know your augur's tricks, and by your tribe

Long since am tricked and sold. Yes, gain your gains,

Get Sardis' amber metal, Indian gold; 1115
That corpse ye shall not hide in any tomb.
Not though the eagles, birds of Zeus, should
bear

Their carrion morsels to the throne of God,
Not even fearing this pollution dire,
Will I consent to burial. Well I know 1120
That man is powerless to pollute the Gods.

But many fall, Teiresias, dotard old,
A shameful fall, who gloze their shameful
words

For lucre's sake, with surface show of good.

TEIR. Ah me! Does no man know, does none consider. . . ? 1125

CREON. Consider what? What trite poor saw comes now?

TEIR. How far good counsel is of all things best?

CREON. So far, I trow, as folly is worst
ill.

TEIR. Of that disease thy soul, alas! is full.

CREON. I will not meet a seer with evil
words. 1130

TEIR. Thou dost so, saying I divine with lies.

CREON. The race of seers is ever fond of
gold.

TEIR. And that of tyrants still loves lucre foul.

CREON. Dost know thou speak'st thy words of those that rule?

TEIR. I know. Through me thou rul'st
a city saved. 1135

CREON. Wise seer art thou, yet given o'ermuch to wrong.

TEIR. Thou'lt stir me to speak out my soul's dread secrets.

CREON. Out with them; only speak them not for gain.

TEIR. So is 't, I trow, in all that touches
thee.

CREON. Know that thou shalt not bargain with my will. 1140

TEIR. Know, then, and know it well, that thou shalt see

Not many winding circuits of the sun,
Before thou giv'st as quittance for the
dead,

A corpse by thee begotten; for that thou Hast to the ground cast one that walked on
earth, 1145

And foully placed within a sepulchre
A living soul; and now thou keep'st from
them,

The Gods below, the corpse of one unblest,
Unwept, unhallowed, and in these things
thou

Can'st claim no part, nor yet the Gods
above; 1150

But they by thee are outraged; and they
wait,

The sure though slow avengers of the grave,
The dread Erinnyes of the mighty Gods,
For thee in these same evils to be snared.

Search well if I say this as one who sells 1155
His soul for money. Yet a little while,

And in thy house the wail of men and women
Shall make it plain. And every city stirs Itself in arms against thee, owning those Whose limbs the dogs have buried, or fierce wolves, 1160

Or wingèd birds have brought the accursed taint

To region consecrate. Doom like to this,
Sure darting as an arrow to its mark,

I launch at thee, (for thou dost vex me sore,)
An archer aiming at the very heart, 1165

And thou shalt not escape its fiery sting.

And now, O boy, lead thou me home again,
That he may vent his spleen on younger
men,

And learn to keep his tongue more orderly,
With better thoughts than this his present
mood. 1170

Exit.

CHOR. The man has gone, O king, predicting woe,

And well we know, since first our raven hair
Was mixed with grey, that never yet his
words

Were uttered to our State and failed of truth.

CREON. I know it too, 'tis that that troubles me. 1175

To yield is hard, but, holding out, to smite
One's soul with sorrow, this is harder still.

CHOR. We need wise counsel, O Mence-keus' son.

CREON. What shall I do? Speak thou, and I'll obey.

CHOR. Go then, and free the maiden from her tomb, 1180

And give a grave to him who lies exposed.

CREON. Is this thy counsel? Dost thou bid me yield?

CHOR. Without delay, O king, for lo!
they come,

The Gods' swift-footed ministers of ill,
And in an instant lay the self-willed
low. 1185

CREON. Ah me! 'tis hard; and yet I bend
my will

To do thy bidding. With necessity
We must not fight at such o'erwhelming odds.

CHOR. Go then and act! Commit it not to others.

CREON. E'en as I am I'll go. Come, come, my men, 1190

Present or absent, come, and in your hands
Bring axes: come to yonder eminence.

And I, since now my judgment leans that
way, 1193

Who myself bound her, now myself will loose,
Too much I fear lest it should wisest prove Maintaining ancient laws to end my life.

Exit.

STROPHE I

CHOR. O Thou of many names,

Of that Cadmeian maid

The glory and the joy,

Whom Zeus as offspring owns, 1200

Zeus, thundering deep and loud,

Who watchest over famed Italia,

And reign'st o'er all the bays that Deo claims

On fair Eleusis' coast.

Bacchos, who dwell'st in Thebes, the mother-
town 1205

Of all thy Bacchant train,

Along Ismenos' stream,

And with the dragon's brood;

ANTISTROPHE I

Thee, o'er the double peak

Of yonder height the blaze 1210

Of flashing fire beholds,

Where nymphs of Corycos

Go forth in Bacchic dance,

And by the flowery stream of Castaly,

And Thee, the ivied slopes of Nysa's hills,

And vine-clad promontory, 1215

(While words of more than mortal melody Shout out the well-known name,)
Send forth, the guardian lord
Of the wide streets of Thebes. 1220

STROPHE II

Above all cities Thou,
With her, thy mother whom the thunder
slew,
Dost look on it with love;
And now, since all the city bendeth low
Beneath the sullen plague, 1225
Come Thou with cleansing tread
O'er the Parnassian slopes,
Or o'er the moaning straits.

ANTISTROPHE II

O Thou, who lead'st the band,
The choral band of stars still breathing fire,
Lord of the hymns of night, 1231
The child of highest Zeus; appear, O king,
With Thyian maidens wild,
Who all night long in dance,
With frenzied chorus sing 1235
Thy praise, their lord, Iacchos.

Enter Messenger.

MESS. Ye men of Cadmos and Am-phion's house,
I know no life of mortal man which I Would either praise or blame. 'Tis Fortune's chance 1239
That raiseth up, and Fortune bringeth low,
The man who lives in good or evil plight;
And prophet of men's future there is none.
For Creon, so I deemed, deserved to be 1243
At once admired and envied, having saved
This land of Cadmos from the hands of foes;
And, having ruled with fullest sovereignty,
He lived and prospered, joyous in a race
Of goodly offspring. Now, all this is gone;
For when men lose the joys that sweeten life,
I cannot deem they live, but rather count
As for a breathing corpse. His heaped-up stores 1251
Of wealth are large, so be it, and he lives
With all a sovereign's state; and yet, if joy
Be absent, all the rest I count as nought,
And would not weigh them against pleasure's charm, 1255
More than a vapour's shadow.
CHOR. What is this?
What new disaster tell'st thou of our chiefs?

MESS. Dead are they, and the living cause their death.

CHOR. Who slays, and who is slaughtered?
Tell thy tale.

MESS. Hæmon is dead, slain, weltering in his blood. 1260

CHOR. By his own act, or by his father's
hand?

MESS. His own, in wrath against his father's crime.

CHOR. O prophet! true, most true, those words of thine.

MESS. Since things stand thus, we well may counsel take.

CHOR. Lo! Creon's wife comes, sad
Eurydike. 1265

She from the house approaches, hearing
speech

About her son, or else by accident.

Enter EURYDIKE.

EURYD. I on my way, my friends, as suppliant bound,
To pay my vows at Pallas' shrine, have heard

Your words, and so I chanced to draw the bolt 1270

Of the half-opened door, when lo! a sound
Falls on my ears, of evil striking home,
And terror-struck I fall in deadly swoon
Back in my handmaids' arms; yet tell it me,
Tell the tale once again, for I shall hear, 1275
By long experience disciplined to grief.

MESS. Dear lady, I will tell thee: I was
by,

And will not leave one word of truth untold.
Why should we smooth and gloze, where all too soon 1279

We should be found as liars? Truth is still
The only safety. Lo! I went with him,
Thy husband, in attendance, to the edge
Of yonder plain, where still all ruthlessly
The corpse of Polyneikes lay exposed,

Mangled by dogs. And, having prayed to her, 1285

The Goddess of all pathways, and to Pluto,
To temper wrath with pity, him they washed
With holy washing; and what yet was left
We burnt in branches freshly cut, and heaped
A high-raised grave from out his native soil,
And then we entered on the stone-paved
home, 1291

Death's marriage-chamber for the ill-starred
maid.

And some one hears, while standing yet afar,
 Shrill voice of wailing near the bridal bower,
 By funeral rites unhallowed, and he comes
 And tells my master, Creon. On his ears,
 Advancing nearer, falls a shriek confused
 Of bitter sorrow, and with groaning loud,
 He utters one sad cry, "Me miserable! 1299
 And am I then a prophet? Do I wend
 This day the dreariest way of all my life?
 My son's voice greets me. Go, my servants,
 go,

Quickly draw near, and standing by the
 tomb,

Search ye and see; and where the stone torn
 out. 1304

Shall make an opening, look ye in, and say
 If I hear Hæmon's voice, or if my soul Is cheated by the Gods." And then we searched,

As he, our master, in his frenzy bade us;
 And, in the furthest corner of the vault,
 We saw her hanging by her neck, with cord
 Of linen threads entwined, and him we
 found 1311

Clasping her form in passionate embrace,
 And mourning o'er the doom that robbed him of her,

His father's deed, and that his marriage bed,
 So full of woe. When Creon saw him there,
 Groaning aloud in bitterness of heart, 1316
 He goes to him, and calls in wailing voice,
 "Poor boy! what hast thou done? Hast thou then lost

Thy reason? In what evil sinkest thou?
 Come forth, my child, on bended knee I ask
 thee." 1320

And then the boy, with fierce, wild-gleaming
 eyes,

Glared at him, spat upon his face, and draws,
 Still answering nought, the sharp twohandled sword.

Missing his aim, (his father from the blow
 Turning aside,) in anger with himself, 1325
 The poor ill-doomed one, even as he was,
 Fell on his sword, and drove it through his
 breast,

Full half its length, and clasping, yet alive,
 The maiden's arm, still soft, he there breathes
 out 1329

In broken gasps, upon her fair white cheek,
 Swift stream of bloody shower. So they lie, Dead bridegroom with dead bride, and he has gained,

Poor boy, his marriage rites in Hades home,

And left to all men witness terrible, 1334
 That man's worst ill is want of counsel wise.
Exit EURYDIKE.

CHOR. What dost thou make of this?

She turneth back,

Before one word, or good or ill, she speaks.

MESS. I too am full of wonder. Yet with hopes

I feed myself, she will not think it meet,
 Hearing her son's woes, openly to wail 1340
 Out in the town, but to her handmaids there
 Will give command to wail her woe at home.
 Too trained a judgment has she so to err.

CHOR. I know not. To my mind, or silence hard, 1344

Or vain wild cries, are signs of bitter woe.

MESS. Soon we shall know, within the house advancing,

If, in the passion of her heart, she hides
 A secret purpose. Truly dost thou speak;
 There is a terror in that silence hard.

CHOR. [Seeing CREON approaching with the corpse of HÆMON in his arms.]

And lo! the king himself is drawing nigh, 1350
 And in his hands he bears a record clear,
 No woe (if I may speak) by others caused,
 Himself the great offender.

Enter CREON, bearing HÆMON's body.

CREON. Woe! for the sins of souls of evil
 mood,

Stern, mighty to destroy! 1355
 O ye who look on those of kindred race,

The slayers and the slain,
 Woe for mine own rash plans that prosper
 not!

Woe for thee, son; but new in life's career,
 And by a new fate dying! 1360

Woe! woe!

Thou diest, thou art gone,
 Not by thine evil counsel, but by mine.

CHOR. Ah me! Too late thou seem'st to see the right.

CREON. Ah me! 1365
 I learn the grievous lesson. On my head, God, pressing sore, hath smitten me and vexed,

In ways most rough and terrible, (Ah me!)
 Shattering my joy, as trampled under foot.
 Woe! woe! Man's labours are but labour
 lost. 1370

Enter Second Messenger.

SEC. MESS. My master! thou, as one who hast full store,

One source of sorrow bearest in thine arms,
And others in thy house, too soon, it seems,
Thou need'st must come and see.

CREON. And what remains
Worse evil than the evils that we bear? 1375

SEC. MESS. Thy wife is dead, that corpse's mother true,
Ill starred one, smitten with a blow just dealt.

CREON. O agony!
Haven of Death, that none may pacify,
Why dost thou thus destroy me? 1380

[Turning to MESSENGER.] O thou who comest, bringing in thy train

Woes horrible to tell,
Thou tramplest on a man already slain.
What say'st thou? What new tidings bring'st to me?

Ah me! ah me! 1385
Is it that now there waits in store for me
My own wife's death to crown my misery?

CHOR. Full clearly thou may'st see. No longer now

Does yon recess conceal her.

The gates open and show the dead body of EURYDIKE.

CREON. Woe is me!
This second ill I gaze on, miserable, 1390
What fate, yea, what still lies in wait for
me?

Here in my arms I bear what was my son;
And there, O misery! look upon the dead.
Ah, wretched mother! ah, my son! my son!

SEC. MESS. In frenzy wild she round the altar clung, 1395

And closed her darkening eyelids, and bewailed

The noble fate of Megareus, who died
Long since, and then again that corpse thou hast;

And last of all she cried a bitter cry
Against thy deeds, the murderer of thy sons.

CREON. Woe! woe! alas! 1401
I shudder in my fear. Will no one strike

A deadly blow with sharp two-edged sword?
Fearful my fate, alas!

And with a fearful woe full sore beset. 1405

SEC. MESS. 'She in her death charged thee with being the cause

Of all their sorrows, these and those of old.

CREON. And in what way struck she the murderous blow?

SEC. MESS. With her own hand below her heart she stabbed,

Hearing her son's most pitiable fate. 1410

CREON. Ah me! The fault is mine. On no one else,

Of all that live, the fearful guilt can come;
I, even I, did slay thee, woe is me!

I, yes, I speak the truth. Lead me, ye guards, 1414

Lead me forth quickly; lead me out of sight,
More crushed to nothing than is nothing's self.

CHOR. Thou counsellest gain, if gain
there be in ills,

For present ills when shortest then are best.

CREON. Oh, come thou then, come thou,
The last of all my dooms, that brings to me
Best boon, my life's last day. Come then, oh come, 1421

That never more I look upon the light.

CHOR. These things are in the future.
What is near,

That we must do. O'er what is yet to come They watch, to Whom that work of right belongs. 1425

CREON. I did but pray for what I most desire.

CHOR. Pray thou for nothing then: for mortal man

There is no issue from a doom decreed.

CREON. [Looking at the two corpses.]

Lead me then forth, vain shadow that I am,

Who slew thee, O my son, unwillingly, 1430
And thee too—(O my sorrow!)—and I know
not

Which way to look or turn. All near at hand
Is turned to evil; and upon my head

There falls a doom far worse than I can bear.

CHOR. Man's highest blessedness, 1435
In wisdom chiefly stands;

And in the things that touch upon the Gods,
'Tis best in word or deed

To shun unholy pride;
Great words of boasting bring great punishments, 1440

And so to grey-haired age

Teach wisdom at the last.

SCENE.—Before the palace of Theseus at Troezen, where Theseus dwelt, being self-exiled for a year from Athens, to expiate the shedding of the blood of kinsmen who had sought to dethrone him.

ARGUMENT

HIPPOLYTA, Queen of the Amazons, bore to Theseus, king of Athens and Troezen, a son whom he named from her, Hippolytus. Now this youth grew up of all men most pure in heart, reverencing chiefly Artemis the Maiden, Goddess of the Chase, and utterly contemning the worship of Aphrodite. Wherefore the wrath of the Queen of Love was kindled against him, and she made Phaedra, his father's young wife, mad with love for him; and although she wrestled with her malady, and strove to hide it in her heart, till by the fever of it she was brought nigh to death's door, yet in the end it was revealed, and was made destruction to her and to Hippolytus also.

Enter APHRODITE.

APHRO. Mighty on earth, mighty in heaven, am I
 Cypri the Goddess named, a glorious name.
 And of all dwellers 'twixt the Pontic Sea
 And Atlas' bourn, which look on the sun's light,
 I honour them which reverence my power, 5
 But bring the proud hearts that defy me low.
 For even to the Gods this appertains,

That in the homage of mankind they joy.
 And I will give swift proof of these my words:
 For Theseus' son, born of the Amazon, 10
 Hippolytus, pure-hearted Pittheus' ward,
 Sole mid the folk of this Troezenian land
 Sayeth that vilest of the Gods am I;
 Rejects the couch; of marriage will he none,
 But honours Phoebus' sister Artemis, 15
 Zeus' child, and counts her greatest of the Gods;

And through the greenwood in the Maid's train still

With swift hounds sweeps the wild beasts
 from the earth

Linked with companionship too high for
 man.

Yet this I grudge not: what is this to me? 20
 But his defiance of me will I avenge
 Upon Hippolytus this day: the path
 Well-nigh is cleared; scant pains it needeth
 yet.

For, as from halls of Pittheus once he sought
 Pandion's land, to see and to be sealed 25
 In the Great Mysteries, Phaedra, high-born
 wife

Of his own father, saw him; and her heart
 In fierce love was enthralled by my device.

She, ere she came to this Troezenian land, Hard by the Rock of Pallas, which looks
 down 30

On this land, built to me a shrine, for love
 Of one afar; and for Hippolytus' sake
 She named it "Love Fast-anchored," for all
 time.

But since from Cecrops' land forth Theseus passed, 34

Fleeing the blood-guilt of the sons of Pallas,
 And unto this shore with his wife hath sailed,
 Submitting unto exile for one year,
 Thenceforward, sighing and by stings of love Distraught, the hapless one wastes down to
 death

Silent: her malady no handmaid knows. 40
 Ah, but not so shall this love's issue fall.

Theseus shall know this thing; all bared shall be:

And him that is my foe his sire shall slay
 By curses, whose fulfilment the Sea-king
 Poseidon gave to Theseus in this boon— 45

To ask three things of him, nor pray in vain.
And she shall die—O yea, her name unstained,
Yet Phaedra dies: I will not so regard
Her pain, as not to visit on my foes
Such penalty as is mine honour's due. 50

But,—forasmuch as Theseus' son I see Yonder draw near, forsaking hunting's toil,
Hippolytus,—forth will I from this place.
Ha, a great press of henchmen following
shout, 54
Honouring with songs the Goddess Artemis!
He knows not Hades' gates wide flung for
him,
And this day's light the last his eyes shall see.

Exit.

*Enter HIPPOLYTUS and ATTENDANT HUNTS-
MEN.*

HIP. Follow on, follow on, ring out the lay 58
Unto Artemis high enthroned in the sky,
Zeus' child, in her keeping who hath us aye.

CHORUS OF HUNSMEN. O Majesty,
Daughter of Zeus, dread Queen, 61
I hail thee, Artemis, now,
O Leto's Daughter, O Zeus's child,
Loveliest far of the Undeified!
In that great Home of the Mighty Father, 65
The palace of Zeus, mid the glory-sheen
Of gold—there dwellest thou.

O Fairest, to theeward in greeting I call,
Artemis, fairest of Maidens that gather
In Olympus' hall! 70

HIP. For thee this woven garland from a mead
Unsullied have I twined, O Queen, and bring.
There never shepherd dares to feed his flock,
Nor steel of sickle came: only the bee
Roveth the springtide mead undesecrate: 75
And Reverence watereth it with river-dews.
They which have heritage of self-control
In all things, purity inborn, untaught,
These there may gather flowers, but none impure.

Now Queen, dear Queen, receive this ana-dem 80

From reverent hand to deck thy golden hair;
For to me sole of men this grace is given,
That I be with thee, converse hold with thee,
Hearing thy voice, yet seeing not thy face.
And may I end life's race as I began. 85

SER. Prince—Masters may we call the Gods alone—

Wouldst thou receive of me good counselling?
HIP. Yea surely: else were I fool manifest.

SER. Knowest thou then the stablished wont of men?—

HIP. Not I thy drift: whereof dost question me? 90

SER. To hate the proud reserve that owns few friends.

HIP. Rightly: what proud man is not odious?

SER. And in the gracious is there naught of charm?

HIP. Yea, much, and profit won with little pains.

SER. And deem'st thou not this same may hold with Gods? 95

HIP. Yea, if men live by laws derived from Gods.

SER. Why not then greet a Goddess worshipful?

HIP. Whom?—have a care thy lips in no wise err.

SER. Even Cypris, there above thy portal set.

HIP. From far I greet her, who am un-defiled. 100

SER. Worshipful is she, glorious among
men.

HIP. Of Gods, of men, each maketh still his choice.

SER. Now prosper thou;—be needful wisdom thine!

HIP. No God who hath night-homage pleaseth me.

SER. Guerdons of Gods, my son, ought men to use. 105

HIP. Depart, mine henchmen, enter ye
the halls,

And set on bread. The full board welcome is

When hunting's done. And one must groom my steeds,

That I may yoke them to the chariot-pole, Being full of meat, and breathe them in the
race. 110

But to thy Cypris wave I long farewell.

Exit.

SER. But we—who must not tread in steps of youth—
With whispered humbleness most meet for thralls

Make supplication to thine images, 114
 Queen Cypris. It beseems thee to forgive,
 If one that bears through youth a vehement
 heart
 Speak folly. Be as though thou heardest
 not;
 For wiser Gods should be than mortal men.
Exit.

Enter CHORUS of Troezenian Ladies.

STROPHE I

A rock there is, wherefrom, as they tell, the springs of the heart of the Ocean well;
 Whence the rifts of the crags overbeetling
 send 121
 For the plunging urns their founts out-streaming:
 Even there did I light on a maiden, my
 friend,
 As she drenched the mantles purple-
 gleaming
 In the riverward-glittering spray,
 And spread the dye of the Tyrian shell on the rocks where glowing the sunbeams
 fell. 126
 Hers were the lips that I first heard
 say
 How wasteth our lady away:

ANTISTROPHE I

For a tale they told of a fevered bed, of the feet that forth of her bower ne'er tread,
 Of the dainty-woven veil that is cast 130
 For a darkness over the tresses golden.
 Yea, and by this hath the third day past
 That the queen from her fair young lips hath with-holden
 The gift of the Lady of Corn,
 Keeping her body thereof unfed, as though
 'twere pollution to taste of bread, 135
 With anguish unuttered longing forlorn
 One haven to win—death's bourn.

STROPHE II

O queen, what if this be possession
 Of Pan or of Hecate?—
 Of the Mother of Dindymus'
 Hill?— 140
 Or the awful Corybant thrill?
 Or hath Artemis found transgression
 Of offerings unrendered in thee?

Hath the hand of the Huntress been
 here?—
 For she flasheth o'er mountain and mere,
 And rideth her triumph-procession 146
 Over surges and swirls of the sea.

ANTISTROPHE II

Or thy princely lord, in whose leading
 Be the hosts of Erechtheus' race,
 Hath one in his halls beguiled, 150
 That thy couch is in secret defiled?
 Or hath some sea-trafficker, speeding
 From Crete over watery ways
 To the haven where shipmen would be,
 Brought dolorous tidings to thee 155
 That hath bowed thee with anguish exceed-
 ing
 On thy bed through thy soul's prison-days

EPODE

Or shall this be the discord mournful, weirdly haunting,
 That ofttimes jarreth and jangleth the strings of woman's being?
 'Tis the shadow of travail-throes nigh, a delirium spirit-daunting: 160
 Yea, I have known it, through mine own bosom have felt it shiver:
 But I cried to the Queen of the Bow, to the Helper in travail-throe for refuge fleeing;
 And by grace of the Gods she hearkeneth ever my fervent request, she is there to deliver.

But lo, through the doors where cometh
 the grey-haired nurse Leading the stricken one forth of her bowers: 165
 On her brows aye darker the care-cloud lowers.
 My spirit is yearning to know what is this strange curse,
 Wherefore the queen's cheek ever is paling,
 And her strength is failing.

Enter PHAEDRA, NURSE, and HANDMAIDS.

NURSE. O afflictions of mortals, O bitter
 pain! 170
 What shall I do unto thee, or refrain?
 Lo here is the light of the sun, the sky:
 Brought forth of the halls is thy bed; hereby Thy cushions lie.

Hitherward wouldst thou come; it was all thy moan: 175
Yet aback to thy bowers wilt thou fret to be
gone.

Thou art soon disappointed, thou joyest in naught,
What thou hast cannot please thee; a thing far-sought
Thy fancy hath caught.

Better be sick than tend the sick: 180
Here is but one pain; grief of mind
And toil of hands be there combined.
O'er all man's life woes gather thick;

Ne'er from its travail respite is.
If better life beyond be found, 185
The darkness veils, clouds wrap it round;
Therefore infatuate-fond to this

We cling—this earth's poor sunshine-gleam:
Naught know we of the life to come,
There speak no voices from the tomb: 190
We drift on fable's shadowy stream.

PHAEDRA. Uplift ye my body, mine head upraise.

Friends, faint be my limbs, and unknit be their bands.

Hold, maidens, my rounded arms and mine hands. 194

Ah, the coil on mine head all heavily weighs:
Take it thence till mine hair o'er my shoulders strays!

NURSE. Take heart, my child, nor in such wild wise

Toss thou thy body so feveredly.

Lighter to bear shall thy sickness-be,

If thine high-born courage in calm strength
rise: 200

For the doom of sorrow on all men lies.

PHAEDRA. Oh but to quaff, where the spray-veil drifteth

O'er taintless fountains, the dear cool
stream!

Oh to lie in the mead where the soft wind liftheth

Its tresses—'neath poplars to lie and
dream! 205

NURSE. My child, my child, what is this thou hast cried?

Ah, speak not thus, with a throng at thy
side,

Wild words that on wings of madness ride!

PHAEDRA. Let me hence to the mountain afar—I will hie me

To the forest, the pines where the stag-hounds follow 210

Hard after the fleet dappled hinds as they fly
me!

Oh, I long to cheer them with hunter's hollo,—

Ah God, were I there!—

And to grasp the Thessalian shaft steel-
gleaming,

And to swing it on high by my hair out-streaming— 215

My golden hair!

NURSE. What wouldst thou, my darling, of suchlike things?

Will naught save the hunt and the hounds content?

And why art thou yearning for fountain-springs? 219

Lo, nigh to thy towers is a soft-sloped bent
With streams for thy drinking dewbesprent.

PHAEDRA. Lady of Limne, the burg
looking seaward,

Of the thunder of hoofs on the wide racecourses,

Oh for the plains where the altars to theeward Flame, there to be curbing the Henetan horses! 225

NURSE. What speech in thy frenzy out-flingest thou?

The mountain-ward path then fain hadst thou taken

On the track of the beasts: and thou yearnest
now

For the steeds on the sea-sands waveforsaken!

Of a surety the lore of a seer we lack 230
To tell what God, child, reineth thee back,
And scourgeth thy spirit from reason's track.

PHAEDRA. O hapless I—what is this I have done?

Whitherward have I wandered from wisdom's way?

I was mad, by a God's curse overthrown. 235
Oh ill-starred—well-a-day!

Dear Nurse, veil over mine head once more;
For I blush for the words from my lips that came.

Veil me: the tears from mine eyes down pour,
And mine eyelids sink for
shame. 240

For anguish wakes when re-dawneth the
mind:

Though a curse be madness, herein is it
kind,

That the soul that it ruins it striketh blind.

NURSE. I veil thee:—ah that death would veil

Me too!—with many a lesson stern 245

The years have brought, this too I learn—
Be links of mortal friendship frail!

Let heart-strings ne'er together cling,

Nor be indissolubly twined

The chords of love, but lightly joined 250
For knitting close or severing.

Ah weary burden, where one soul

Travails for twain, as mine for thee!

Ruin, not bliss, say they, shall be Care's life-absorbing heart control. 255

Yea, that way sickness, madness, lies.

Therefore "the overmuch" shall be

Less than "the naught-too-much" for me:
So say I: so shall say the wise.

CHO. Thou grey-haired dame, queen
Phaedra's loyal nurse, 260

In sooth I mark her lamentable plight,

Yet what her malady, to us is dark.

Fain would we question thee and hear there-
of.

NURSE. I know not, though I ask: she will not tell.

CHO. Nor what was the beginning of these woes? 265

NURSE. The same thy goal: naught sayeth she of all.

CHO. How strengthless and how wasted is her frame!

NURSE. No marvel, being three days
foodless now.

CHO. Madness is this, or set resolve to die?

NURSE. To die: she fasteth to make end of life. 270

CHO. Strange is thy tale, if this content her lord.

NURSE. Nay, but she hides her pain, nor owns she ails.

CHO. Should he not guess?—one glance upon her face?

NURSE. Nay, absent is he from this land of late.

CHO. But thou—dost not constrain her, strive to learn 275

Her malady and wandering of her wit?

NURSE. All have I tried, and naught the more availed.

Yet will I not even now abate my zeal:

So stand thou by and witness unto me

How true am I to mine afflicted lords. 280

Come, darling child, the words said heretofore

Forget we both; more gracious-souled be
thou:

Thy lowering brow, thy wayward mood, put
by;

And I, wherein I erred in following thee,

Refrain, and unto wiser counsels seek. 285

If thy disease be that thou mayst not name,

Lo women here to allay thy malady.

But if to men thy trouble may be told, 288

Speak, that to leeches this may be declared.

Ha, silent?—silence, child, beseems thee not.

Or thou shouldst chide me if I speak not well,

Or unto pleadings wisely uttered yield.

One word!—look hitherward! . . . ah, woe
is me!

Women, we toil and spend our strength for naught,

And still are far as ever: of my words 295

Unmelted was she then, nor hearkeneth now.

Howbeit know thou—then be waywarder

Than is the sea,—thy death shall but betray

Thy sons, who shall not share their father's halls—

No, by that chariot-queen, the Amazon, 300

Who bare to thy sons a bastard over-lord,—

Not bastard-thoughted,—well thou knowest
him,

Hippolytus—

PHAEDRA. Woe's me!

NURSE. It stings thee, this?

PHAEDRA. Thou hast undone me, nurse:
by heaven, I pray, 304

Speak thou the name of this man neyermore.

NURSE. Lo there!—thy wit is sound: yet of thy wit

Thou wilt not help thy sons nor save thy
life!

PHAEDRA. I love them: other storms of fate toss me.

NURSE. Sure, thine are hands, my child, unstained with blood?

PHAEDRA. Pure be mine hands: the stain is on my soul. 310

NURSE. Not, not of sorcery-spells by some foe cast?

PHAEDRA. A friend's blow this, unsought of him or me.

NURSE. Hath Theseus wrought against thee any sin?

PHAEDRA. May I be found as clear of wrong to him!

NURSE. What then is this strange thing that deathward drives thee? 315

PHAEDRA. Let be my sin! Not against thee I sin.

NURSE. Of my will, never! On thine head my failure!

Clings to PHAEDRA's hands.

PHAEDRA. Violence to me!—to mine hand clingest thou?

NURSE. Yea, and thy knees—nor ever will let go!

PHAEDRA. Thy doom, unhappy, shouldst thou hear in mine. 320

NURSE. What darker doom for me than losing thee?

PHAEDRA. Death! Ah, but mine own death shall be mine honour!

NURSE. Still dost thou hide it, when I pray thy good?

PHAEDRA. Yea, for I fashion out of evil
good.

NURSE. If then thou tell me, more shall be thine honour. 325

PHAEDRA. For God's sake hence away:
let go mine hand.

NURSE. No!—while thou grantest not the boon my due.

PHAEDRA. I will, in reverence of thy suppliant hand.

NURSE. I am dumb: henceforth thy part it is to speak.

PHAEDRA. O hapless mother!—what strange love was thine! 330

NURSE. Love for the bull, my child?—or what wouldst name?

PHAEDRA. And thou, sad sister,
Dionysus' bride.

NURSE. What ails thee, child?—dost thou revile thy kin?

PHAEDRA. And I the third—how am I misery-wrecked!

NURSE. I am 'wildered all—whereunto tend thy words? 335

PHAEDRA. To the rock that wrecks us all, yea, from of old.

NURSE. None the more know I that I fain would know.

PHAEDRA. Ah, couldst thou say for me what I must say!

NURSE. No seer am I to interpret hidden
things.

PHAEDRA. What mean they when they speak of this—to love? 340

NURSE. The sweetest thing, my child—the bitterest too.

PHAEDRA. For me, the second only have
I proved.

NURSE. What say'st thou?—child, thou lovest—oh, what man?

PHAEDRA. Whate'er his name—'tis he
—the Amazon's—

NURSE. Hippolytus.

PHAEDRA. Thou sayest it, not I. 345

NURSE. Woe, child! What wilt thou say? Thou hast dealt me death!

Friends, 'tis past bearing. I will not endure
To live. O hateful life, loathed light to see!

I'll cast away, yield up, my frame, be rid 349
Of life by death! Farewell, I am no more.

The virtuous love—not willingly, yet love
The evil. Sure no Goddess Cypris is.

But, if it may be, something more than God,
Who hath ruined her, and me, and all this house.

STROPHE

CHO. Hast thou heard?—the unspeak-able tale hast thou hearkened, 355

The wail of my lady's anguish-throe?

O may I die, ah me! ere I know,

Dear lady, a spirit as thine so darkened.

O misery-burdened, O whelmed in
woe! 359

O troubles that cradle the children of men!
Undone!—all's bared to the daylight's

ken.

Ah, weariful season for thee remaining!

Dark looms o'er the household the shadow of doom.

Plain now where the star of thy love is wan-
ing, 364

O hapless daughter of Crete's proud home!

PHAEDRA. Troezenian women, ye which here abide

Upon the utmost march of Pelops' land,

Oft sleepless in the weary-wearing night 368

Have I mused how the life of men is wrecked.

'Tis not, meseems, through inborn folly of soul
 They fare so ill,—discretion dwells at least
 With many,—but we thus must look hereon:
 That which is good we learn and recognise,
 Yet practise not the lesson, some from sloth,
 And some preferring pleasure in the stead 375
 Of duty. Pleasures many of life there be;
 Long gossip, idlesse,—pleasant evils they;
 And sense of shame—twofold: no ill the one,
 But one bows homes to ruin. Were men's choice clear,
 These twain had never borne the selfsame
 names. 380

Forasmuch then as I knew this before,
 No philtre-spell was like to change mine
 heart
 To make me fall away from this my faith.
 Thee will I tell the path my reason trod;—
 When love's wound smote me, straight I cast about 385
 How best to bear it: wherefore I began Thenceforth to hush my moan, to veil my pang.
 For the tongue none may trust, which knoweth well
 To lesson rebel thoughts of other men,
 Yet harboureth countless evils of its own. 390
 Then did I take thought nobly to endure
 My folly, triumphing by self-control.

Lastly, when even so I naught availed
 To o'ermaster Love's Queen, I resolved to die
 As of all counsels best—let none gain-
 say! 395
 For be it mine to do not good unseen,
 Nor ill before a cloud of witnesses.
 I knew the deed, the very pang, was shame.
 Well knew I too what 'tis to be a woman—
 None trust, none love us! Curses upon her Who showed the way the first to shame the couch 401
 With alien men! Ah, 'twas from princely homes.
 That first this curse on womankind had birth.
 For, when the noble count their shame their
 good,
 The lowly sure will hold it honourable. 405
 And O, I hate the continent-professed
 Which treasure secret recklessness of shame.

How can they, O Queen Cypris, Sea-born
 One,

Look ever in the faces of their lords.
 Nor shudder lest their dark accomplice,
 night, 410
 And their own bowers may utter forth a voice?

Me—friends, 'tis even this dooms me to die,
 That never I be found to shame my lord, Nor the sons whom I bare: but free, with tongues
 Unfettered, flourish they, their home yon
 burg 415
 Of glorious Athens, blushing ne'er for me.
 For this cows man, how stout of heart soe'er,
 To know a father's or a mother's sin.
 And this alone can breast the shocks of life,
 An honest heart and good, in whomso found:
 But in his hour Time lifts his mirror, and shows 421
 The vile his vileness there, as a girl sees
 Her face. With such may I be never found.

CHO. Lo now, how fair is virtue everywhere,
 Which yieldeth fruit of good repute mid men!
 NURSE. Queen, thine affliction, suddenly revealed 426
 But now, wrought in me terrible dismay.
 Yet I discern my folly now. 'Tis strange
 How second thoughts for men are wisest still.
 Thine is the common lot, not past cool weighing: 430
 The Goddess's passion-bolts have smitten
 thee.
 Thou lov'st—what marvel this?—thou art
 as many—
 And lo, for love's sake wouldst fling life
 away!
 Sooth, 'twere small gain for them which love their fellows, 434
 Or yet shall love, if help be none save death.
 For Cypris crusheth, swooping in her might;
 Yet gently stealeth she on whoso yield.
 But whom she findeth wayward, arrogant-souled,
 She graspeth, mocketh, past imagining. 439
 Through air she rovet, in the ocean-surge
 Is Cypris; all things have their birth of her.
 'Tis she that sows love, gives increase there-
 of,
 Whereof all we that dwell on earth are
 sprung.

Whoso have scrolls writ in the ancient days,
 And wander still themselves by paths of song,

They know how Zeus of yore desired the embrace 446

Of Semele; they know how radiant Dawn
Up to the Gods snatched Cephalus of yore,
And all for love; yet these in Heaven their
home

Dwell, neither do they flee the face of Gods,
Content, I trow, to be love's vanquished ones.

Thou—wilt not yield? Thy sire by several treaty 452

Thee should have gotten, or with other Gods
For lords, if thou wilt bow not to these laws.

How many men, think'st thou, and wise men
they, 455

Knowing their beds dishonoured, shut their
eyes?

How many a father in his son's transgression
Playeth love's go-between?—the maxim this
Of wise men, that dishonour be not seen.

Why should men toil to over-perfect
life? 460

Lo, even thine hall's roof-beams the crafts-man's rule

Can make not utter-true. How thinkest
thou,

Who art plunged in fate's deep sea, to swim
to land?

Tush—if more good than evil is in thee, 465
Who art but human, thou shalt do full well.

Nay, darling, from thy deadly thoughts refrain,

And from presumption—sheer presumption
this,

That one should wish to be more strong than
Gods.

In love, flinch not; a God hath willed this thing.

In pain, victorious wrestle with thy
pain. 470

Lo, charms there be, and words of soothing spell.

Some cure for this affliction shall appear.

Sooth, it were long ere men would light there-
on,

Except we women find devices forth.

CHO. Phaedra, she speaketh words that more avail 475

For this thine imminent plight: yet thee I praise.

But haply this my praise shall gall thee more Than those her words, and harsher sound to
thee.

PHAEDRA. This is it which doth ruin goodly towns 479

And homes of men, these speeches over-fair.
It needeth not to speak words sweet to ears,
But those whereby a good name shall be saved.

NURSE. Out on thine high-flown talk!
No fair-tricked speech

Will stead thee, but a lover!—'tis high time To strip disguise off, speak plain truth of
thee. 485

For, were thy life not in such desperate case,
Or thou a woman strong in self-control,
Never for thy lust's sake and pleasure, I

To this would bring thee: but we must fight hard

Now for thy life, and void of blame is
this. 490

PHAEDRA. Speaker of horrors!—wilt not seal thy lips?

Wilt not refrain from utter-shameful words?

NURSE. Shameful—yet better than the good for thee.

Better this deed, so it but save thy life,
Than that name, whose proud vaunt shall be thy death. 495

PHAEDRA. No, by the Gods!—foul words are thy fair words!—

No farther go: I have schooled mine heart to endure

This love: but if thou plead shame's cause so
fair,

I shall be trapped in that sin which I flee.

NURSE. If such thy mind, thine heart should not have sinned: 500

But now—obey me:—'tis the one hope
left:—

I have within some certain charms to assuage

Love: 'twas but now they came into my thought.

These, not with shame, nor hurt unto thy
mind,

Shall lull thy pang, so thou be not faint-hearted. 505

Howbeit there needs of him thou yearnest for
Some token, or a word, or fragment caught
From vesture, so to knit two loves in one.

PHAEDRA. A salve, or potion, is this charm of thine?

NURSE. I know not: be content with help, not knowledge. 510

PHAEDRA. I fear lest over-cunning thou shalt prove.

NURSE. Then know thyself all fears.
What darest thou?

PHAEDRA. Lest thou show aught of this to Theseus' son.

NURSE. Let be, my child: this will I order well. 514

Only do thou, Queen Cypris, Sea-born One,
Work with me. Whatso else I have in mind
Shall it suffice to speak to friends within.

STROPHE I

CHO. O Eros, O Eros, how melts love's yearning

From thine eyes, when thy sweet spell
witcheth the heart

Of them against whom thou hast marched in thy might! 520

Not me, not me for mine hurt do thou
smite,

My life's heart-music to discord turning.

For never so hotly the flame-spears dart,
Nor so fleet are the star-shot arrows of
light,

As the shaft from thy fingers that speed-
eth its flight, 525

As the flame of the Love-queen's bolts
fierce-burning,

O Eros, the child of Zeus who art!

ANTISTROPHE I

In vain, O in vain by Alpheus the river
And in Phoebus' Pythian shrine hath the
land

Of Hellas the blood of her oxen out-
poured. 530

But Eros, but Love, who is all men's
lord,

Unto whom Aphrodite is wont to deliver

Her keys, that the doors be unsealed by his hand

Of her holy of holies, we have not adored,
Though he marcheth through ruin victory-ward, 535

Though he raineth calamity forth of his quiver

On mortals against his on-coming that stand.

STROPHE II

For I call to remembrance Oechalia's daughter,

Who, ere Love 'neath his tyrannous car-yoke had brought her,

Had been spouseless and free—overseas
how she hasted, 540

When Cypris the dear yoke of home had disparted,

Like a bacchanal fiend out of hell that had darted,

And with blood, and with smoke of a palace
flame-wasted,

And with death-shrieks for hymns at her bridal-feast chanted,

By Love's Queen to the son of Alcmena was granted— 545

Woe, woe for the joys of espousal she tasted!

ANTISTROPHE II

And ye, O ye ramparts of hallowed Thebe,
And ye lips wave-welling of Dirce, might ye
be

Witness how dire was the Love-queen's coming,

When a slumber that knoweth not waking was given 550

Of her spells by the flame-enfolded levin

To the mother of Zeus' seed Bacchus: for dooming

Of death had she blent with the bride-chant's singing.

O, the Dread One breatheth on all life, wing-
ing

Softly her flight as a bee low-humming. 555

Voices within.

PHAEDRA. Hush ye, O hush ye, women!
. Lost am I!

CHO. What is this dread thing, Phaedra, in thine halls?

PHAEDRA. Peace!—let me hear the voice of them within.

CHO. I am dumb: an ominous prelude sure is this. 560

PHAEDRA. Ah me! ah me! alas!

O wretched, wretched!—ah, mine agonies!

CHO. What cry dost thou utter? What word dost thou shriek?

What voice through thy soul thrills terror?
—O speak!

PHAEDRA. I am undone! O stand ye by these doors, 564

And hear what clamour clasheth in the house.

CHO. Nay, thou art thereby: sped forth is the cry from the palace for thee.

O tell me what horror rushed out—tell it me!

PHAEDRA. The son of the Amazon, Hippolytus, Shouts, hurling fearful curses at mine hand-
maid.

CHO. Yea surely a noise do I hear, yet to me naught soundeth clear: 570
But to thee through the doors there came,
there came

A shout of anger, a cry of shame.

PHAEDRA. Ah clear—ah clear!—yea, pandar of foul sin,
Traitor to her lord's bed, he calleth her.

CHO. Woe! Thou art betrayed, beloved one! 575

What shall I counsel? Thy secret is bared:
thou art wholly undone.

PHAEDRA. Woe's me! ah woe!

CHO. From the hand that loved came the traitor's blow.

PHAEDRA. She hath undone me, telling mine affliction:
Her love sought by my shame to heal my
pain. 580

CHO. What wilt thou do, O thou in desperate plight?

PHAEDRA. No way save one I know—straightway to die—
The one cure for the ills that compass me.

Enter HIPPOLYTUS, followed by the NURSE.

HIP. O mother Earth, unveilings of the
sun;
What words unutterable have I heard! 585

NURSE. Hush, O my son, ere one have heard thy cry.

HIP. I have heard horrors—should I hold my peace?

NURSE. Yea, I beseech thee by thy fair right hand.

HIP. Hence with thine hand!—touch not my vesture thou.

NURSE. Oh, by thy knees, do not—ah, slay me not! 590

HIP. How, if thou hast said no wrong, as thou dost say?

NURSE. No tale is this, my son, for all men's ears.

HIP. Tush, a fair tale is fairer told to the world.

NURSE. My son, thine oath!—dishonour not thine oath.

HIP. My tongue hath sworn: no oath is on my soul. 595

NURSE. O son, what wilt thou do?—wilt slay thy friends?

HIP. Avaunt the word!—no villain is my friend.

NURSE. Forgive, son: men are men, they needs must err.

HIP. Why hast thou given a home beneath the sun, 599

Zeus, unto woman, specious curse to man?
For, were thy will to raise a mortal seed,
This ought they not of women to have gotten,
But in thy temples should they lay its price,
Or gold, or iron, or a weight of bronze,
And so buy seed of children, every man 605
After the worth of that his gift, and dwell
Free in free homes unvexed of womankind.

But now—soon as we go about to bring This bane to the home, we hurl to earth its weal. 609

Hereby is woman proved a grievous curse—
He, who begat and reared her, banishes,
Yea, adds a dower, to rid him of his bane;
While he which taketh home the noisome
weed

Rejoices, decks with goodly bravery
The loathly image, and tricks out with robes,— 615

Filching away, poor wretch! his household's
wealth.

He may not choose: who getteth noble kin
With her, content must stomach his sour
feast:

Who getteth a good wife, but worthless kin,
Must muffle up the evil 'neath the good. 620

Happiest who wins a cipher, in whose halls
A brainless thing is throned in uselessness.
But the keen-witted hate I: in mine house Ne'er dwell one subtler than is woman's
due; 624

For Cypris better brings to birth her mischief
In clever women: the resourceless 'scapes
That folly by the short-weight of her wit.

Handmaids should ne'er have had access to wives,

But brutes, with teeth, no tongue, should dwell with them,

That so they might not speak to any
one, 630

Nor win an answering word from such as these.

But now the vile ones weave vile plots within,
And out of doors their handmaids bear the web:

As thou hast come, foul quean, to tender me
Commerce in mine own father's sacred couch!—

Words that with fountain-streams I'll wash away,

Sluicing mine ears. How should I be so vile,
Who even with hearing count myself defiled?

Woman, I fear God: know, that saveth thee.
For, had I not by oaths been trapped un-

wares,

I had ne'er forborne to tell this to my sire.
Now from mine home, while Theseus yet is far,

I go, and I will keep my lips from speech.

But—with my father I return, to see

How thou wilt meet his eye, thou and thy mistress,

And so have taste of thy full shamelessness.

Curse ye! My woman-hate shall ne'er be sated,

Not though one say that this is all my theme:
For they be ever strangely steeped in sin.

Let some one now stand forth and prove them chaste,

Or leave me free to trample on them ever.

Exit.

ANTISTROPHE

CHO. O drear dark doom that on women hath lighted!

By what cunning of pleading, when feet once trip,

Shall we loose the accuser's iron grip?

PHAEDRA. O earth, O sun, I am justly required!

Through the snares of calamity how shall I slip?

How, friends, shall I cloke my woe, how hide?
What God or what man shall stand forth on my side,

Shall consent in my sin to be made partaker?

For all life's anguish, and all life's shame
Are upon me, and overwhelm like a shipwrecking breaker!

Most accurst of my fate among women I am.

CHO. Woe, woe! 'Tis done. Queen, it hath naught availed,

Thy bower-maid's device: 'tis ruin all.

PHAEDRA. Vilest of vile! destroyer of thy friends!

How hast thou ruined me! May Zeus my sire

Smite thee with flame, blast thee to nothingness!

Did I not tell thee—not divine thy purpose?—
To speak not that whereby I am now dishonoured?

But thou wouldst not forbear. I shall not now

Even die unshamed! [A pause]

Some new plea must I find.

For yonder boy with soul keen-edged with wrath

Shall to his sire accuse me of thy sin,
Shall tell to agèd Pittheus my mischance,
Shall blaze the shameful tale through every land.

Curses on thee, and whoso thrusteth in
To do base service to unwilling friends!

NURSE. Mistress, thou mayst revile mine evil work,

For rankling pain bears thy discernment down:

Yet somewhat might I answer, wouldst thou hear.

I nursed thee, loved thee, sought for thy disease

A healing balm,—and found not that I would.

Had I sped well, right wise had I been held;

For, as we speed, so is our wisdom's fame.

PHAEDRA. Ha! is this just?—should this suffice me now,

To have stabbed me, and then close in strife of words?

NURSE. We waste the time in speech. I was not wise.

Yet even from this there is escape, my child.

PHAEDRA. Peace to thy talk. Thy counsel heretofore

Was shame, and mischief thine endeavour was.

Hence from my sight: for thine own self take thought.

I with my needs will deal—and honourably.

Exit NURSE.

But ye, O Troezen's daughters nobly born,
Grant to my supplication this, but this—

With silence veil what things ye here have heard.

CHO. I swear by reverend Artemis, Zeus' child,
Never to bare to light of thine ills aught.

PHAEDRA. Thou hast well said. Now, as I muse, I find

One refuge, one, from this calamity;
So to bequeath my sons a life of honour, 700
And what I may from this day's ruin save.
For never will I shame the halls of Crete,
Nor will I meet the face of Theseus ever,
For one poor life's sake, after all this shame.

CHO. Ah, wilt thou do a deed of ill past cure? 705

PHAEDRA. Die will I. How—for this will I take thought.

CHO. Ah hush!

PHAEDRA. O yea, advise me wisely thou!
But I shall gladden Cypris my destroyer
By fleeting out of life on this same day,
And vanquished so by bitter love shall be. 710

Yet in my death will I become the bane
Of one beside, that he may triumph not Over my woes, and, taking of my pain,
His share, may learn sound wisdom's temperance.

Exit.

CHO. Under the arched cliffs O were I lying, 715
That there to a bird might a God change me,

And afar mid the flocks of the winged things flying

Over the swell of the Adrian sea
I might soar—and soar,—upon poised wings dreaming, 719

O'er the strand where Eridanus' waters be,
Where down to the sea-swell purple-gleaming

The tears of the Sun-god's daughters are streaming,

Of the thrice-sad sisters for Phaëthon sighing,

Star-flashed of strange tears amber-beaming!

ANTISTROPHE I

O to win to the strand where the apples are growing 725

Of the Hesperid chanters kept in ward,
Where the path over Ocean purple-glowing,

By the Sea's Lord is to the seafarer barred!
O to light where Atlas hath aye in his keeping

The bourn twixt earth and the heavens
bestarred, 730
Where the fountains ambrosial sunward are leaping
By the couches where Zeus in his halls lieth sleeping,
Where the bounty of Earth the life-bestowing
The bliss of the Gods ever higher is heaping!

STROPHE II

O white-winged galley from Crete's far shore, 735
Whose keel over deep-sea surges speeding,
Through their flying brine and their battle-roar,

Onward and onward my lady bore,
From a bliss-fraught palace a princess leading

To the joy of a bridal of woe exceeding!— 740

For, a bird ill-boding, thy sail flitted o'er
With the curse of the Cretan land unto Athens' glorious strand,
Till the seafarers lashed to the beach Munychian the hawser-band,

And sprang unto earth's firm floor.

ANTISTROPHE II

Wherefore, with love-pangs all unblest 745
For her gift, entered in Aphrodite, wringing

Her heart-strings asunder, a fearful guest.
Like a wrecked ship sinking, disaster-oppressed

Over her bride-bower's rafters flinging
The noose, shall she cast the coil close-clinging

Round the neck that was whitest and loveliest,

Because that with shuddering shame she shrank from a loathed name,

And she chose, in its stead, the stainless renown of a wife's fair fame,

And, for anguish of love, heart-rest.

[A cry within.]

Run to the rescue, all ye nigh the house! 755
In the strangling noose is Theseus' wife, our mistress!

CHO. Woe! Woe! 'Tis done! No more
—no more is she,

The queen—in yon noose rafter-hung up-
caught!

[Cry within.]

*O haste!—will no one bring the steel two-edged, Wherewith to loose this cincture of her
neck?* 760

SEMI-CHORUS 1. What shall we do, friends? Deem ye we should pass
The doors, and from the halter loose the queen?

SEMI-CHORUS 2. Wherefore? Are no young handmaids at her side?
The busy meddler treadeth perilous paths.

[Cry within.]

Uncramp the limbs, streak out the hapless corpse. 765
Bitter house-warding this is for my lords!

CHO. Dead is the woeful lady, by that cry:
Even now they streak her as a corpse is streaked.

Enter THESEUS.

THES. Women, know ye what means this cry within?
A dolorous shriek of handmaids reached mine ears; 770
Nor deigns the house to open doors and greet
me
Blithely, as from the oracle come home.
Hath aught untoward happed to Pitheus'
eld?
Well-stricken in years is he, yet dole were
ours 774
If haply fare his feet from these halls forth.

CHO. Not to the old pertains this thy mischance.

Theseus: the young have died, for grief to
thee.

THES. Woe!—is a child's life by the spoiler reft?

CHO. They live, their mother dead—
alas for thee!

THES. What say'st thou?—dead—my wife? By what mishap? 780

CHO. The strangling noose about her neck she coiled.

THES. By grief's touch frozen, or of what affliction?

CHO. No more I know, for to thine halls
but now,

Theseus, I came, o'er these thine ills to mourn.

THES. Woe! with these wreathed leaves
why is mine head 785
Crowned—ill-starred harbinger of oracles?
Shoot back the bolts, my servants, of the doors:

Loose bars, that I may see this bitter sight,
My wife, who hath destroyed me by her
death.

The palace is thrown open, and the corpse of PHAEDRA disclosed, with her handmaids grouped round it.

CHO. Woe for thy misery! Woe for thine ills, who hast suffered and wrought 790
Such a thing as in ruin shall whelm thine
home!

Ah for thy desperate deed, who by violence
unhallowed hast sought

Death, who with hand despairing the all-quelling wrestler hast caught!

Who shroudeth thy life, O hapless, in gloom?

STROPHE

THES. Ah me for my woes.—I have suffered calamity, great 795
O my people, beyond all other!—O foot of
fate,

How hast thou heavily trampled me and
mine,

Unlooked-for blight from some avenging
fiend—

Nay, but destruction that blasteth my life evermore!

On a sea of disaster I look, on a sea without shore, 800

So vast, that never can I swim thereout.
Nor ride the surge of this calamity.

What word can I speak unto thee?—how name, dear wife,

The doom that on thee hath descended and crushed thy life?

Like a bird hast thou fled from mine
hands; 805

And with swift leap hast rushed to Hades'
halls.

Never sorrow of sorrows was like unto mine.

On mine head have I gathered the load
Of the far-off sins of an ancient line;

And this is the vengeance of God. 810

CHO. Not to thee only, king, this grief hath come;

With many more a dear wife's loss thou sharest.

ANTISTROPHE

THES. In the darkness under the earth—
 ah me, to have died,
 That in blackness of deep gloom under the earth I might hide,
 Who am reft of thy most dear companionship! 815
 Oh, thou hast dealt worse death than thou hast suffered!
 Of whom shall I hear whence came it, the deadly stroke
 Of doom, that the heart of thee, my belovèd, broke?
 Will none speak what befell?—or all for
 naught 819
 Doth this my palace roof a menial throng?
 Woe's me, my belovèd, stricken because of
 thee!
 Ah for the grief of mine house, for the travail
 I see,
 Past utterance, past endurance!—lost am
 I:
 Mine house is desolate, motherless my babes.
 O my darling, my wife, thou art gone, thou art gone, 825
 O best upon whom the light
 Looketh down of the all-beholding sun,
 Or the splendour of star-eyed night!
 CHO. Alas for thee, and thine house's burden of ill!
 With ruth for thy fate running o'er do mine eyes the tear-drops pour: 830 [Aside] But for woe which must follow I shudder and shudder still.
 THES. Ha!
 What is this tablet, what, to her dear hand Fastened? Would'st fain speak some word unsaid?
 Now hath she writ, unhappy one, to pray 835
 Touching my marriage or my children aught?
 Fear not, lost love: the woman is not born
 Shall lie in Theseus' couch, or tread his halls.
 Lo, how the impress of the carven gold
 Of her that is no more smiles up at me! 840
 Come, let me uncoil the seal's envelopings,
 And see what would this tablet say to me.
 CHO. Woe, woe! How God bringeth evil following hard on the track
 Of evil! I count for living unmeet
 The lot of a life such as this, as on deeds that are wrought I look back: 845

For the house of my lords standeth not any more, but in ruin and wrack
 I behold it hurled from its ancient seat.
 Ah God, if this may be, wreck not the
 house.
 But hearken my beseeching, for I trace,
 Seer-like, an evil omen from his face. 850 THES. Ah me!—a new curse added to the
 old,
 Past utterance, past endurance! Woe is me!
 CHO. What is it? Speak, if I may share the tale.
 THES. It shrieketh,—ah, horrors the tablet outshrieketh!
 O how can I flee 855
 My burden of woes! I am utterly ruin-spèd!
 What incantation of curses is this I have read
 Graved on the wax—woe's me!
 CHO. Alas! thou utterest speech that heralds ill:
 THES. No more within my lips' gates will I pen 860
 The horror that chokes utterance—O my people,
 Hippolytus hath dared assail my bed
 With violence, flouting Zeus's awful eye!
 Father Poseidon, thou didst promise me Three curses once. Do thou with one of these 865
 Destroy my son: may he not 'scape this
 day,
 If soothfast curses thou hast granted me.
 CHO. Oh, for the Gods' sake, King, recall this prayer!
 Thou yet shalt know thine error: yield to me.
 THES. Never! Yea, I will drive him from the land; 870
 And, of two dooms, with one shall he be scourged:—
 Either Poseidon, reverencing my prayers,
 Shall slay and speed him unto Hades' halls,
 Or, banished from this land, a vagabond
 On strange shores shall he drain life's bitter dregs. 875
 CHO. Lo, where thy son's self comes in season meet,
 Hippolytus: refrain thy wrath, O king
 Theseus, and for thine house the best devise.

Enter HIPPOLYTUS.

HIP. Father, I heard thy crying, and I
 came

In haste: yet for what cause thou makest
moan 880

I know not, but of thee I fain would hear.

Ha! what is this? Father, thy wife I see

Dead!—matter this for marvel passing great.

But now I left her, who upon this light

Looked, it is not yet a long season since. 885

What hath befallen her? How perished she?

Father, I fain would learn it from thy mouth.

Silent! In trouble silence naught avails.

The heart that yearns to know all cares of
thine 889

Fain shall be found to prove thy troubles
too.

Sure, from thy friends—yea, and thy more than friends,

Father, it is not right to hide thy griefs.

THES. O men that oftentimes err, and err
in vain,

Why are ye teaching ever arts untold,

And search out manifold inventions still, 895

But one thing know not, no, have never sought it,

To teach them wit, in whom no wisdom
dwells?

HIP. A cunning sage were this, endued with power

To force them to be wise who are witless all!

But—so ill-timed thy speculations are— 900

Father, I fear thy tongue for grief runs wild.

THES. Out! There should dwell in men some certain test

Of friendship, a discernor of the heart,

To show who is true friend and who is false.

Yea, all men should have had two several voices, 905

One honest, one—as chance or interest
swayed;

That so the traitor voice might be convict

Before the honest, nor we be deceived.

HIP. How?—to thine ear hath some friend slandered me,

That I the innocent am in evil case? 910

Astonied am I, for thy words amaze me,

Thus wandering wide astray from reason's throne.

THES. Out on man's heart!—to what depths will it sink?

Where shall assurance end and hardihood?

For if it swell with every generation, 915

And the new age reach heights of villainy

Above the old, the Gods must needs create

A new earth unto this, that room be found

For the unrighteous and unjust in grain.

Look on this man, who, though he be my
son, 920

Hath shamed my couch, and shall be manifest proved

Most vile, by testimony of the dead.

HIPPOLYTUS covers his face in horror.

Nay, show thy face—since thou hast come to this,

This foulness,—look thy father in the face!

Dost thou with Gods—O thou no common
man!— 925

Consort? Art thou the chaste, the stainless
one?

I will not trust thy boasts, for so should I

Impute to Gods unwisdom's ignorance.

Now vaunt, ay now!—set out thy paltry
wares 929

Of lifeless food: take Orpheus for thy king:

Rave, worship vapourings of many a scroll:

For ah, thou'rt caught! I warn all men to shun

Such hypocrites as this; for they hunt souls

With canting words, the while they plot foul
sin. 934

Dead is she: thinkest thou this saveth thee?

Hereby thou art most convicted, basest
thou!

What oaths, what protestations shall bear
down

Thrusts tablet into HIPPOLYTUS' hand.

This, for thine absolution of the charge? . . .

Now, what is thy defence?—"She hated me:

Bastard and true-born still are natural foes?"

Fools' traffic this in life—to fling away 941

For hate of thee the dearest thing she owed!

Or—say'st thou?—"Frailty is not in men,

But in the blood of women." Youths, I have proved,

Are no whit more than women continent, 945

When Cypris stirs a heart in flush of youth:

Yet all the strength of manhood helpeth them.

But wherefore thus contend against thy pleas

When there the corpse lies, witness faithful and true? 949

Hence from this land, an exile, with all speed.

Never come thou to god-built Athens more,

Nor any marches where my spear hath sway:

For if 'neath thy mishandling I sit still,

Never shall Isthmian Sinis testify

That I slew him, but name it idle vaunt; 955

Nor those Scironian Rocks that skirt the sea

Shall call me terrible to evil-doers.

CHO. I dare not name of mortals any man
Happy, for lo, the first is made the last.

HIP. Father, thy rage and strong-strained fury of soul 960
Are fearful: yet, fair-seeming though the
charge,

If one unfold it, all unfair it is.

I have no skill to speak before a throng:

My tongue is loosed with equals, and those
few. 964

And reason: they that are among the wise
Of none account, to mobs are eloquent.

Yet needs I must, now this mischance hath lighted,

Unrein my tongue. And first will I begin Where thou didst first assail, as thou wouldst crush me, 969

And I find no reply. See'st thou yon sun
And earth?—within their compass is no man
Though thou deny it—chaster-souled than I.
For I have learnt, first, to revere the Gods,
Then, to have friends which seek to do no
wrong,

Friends who think shame to proffer aught of base, 975

Yea, or to render others shameful service.

No mocker am I, father, at my friends,
But to the absent even as to the present:

In one thing flawless,—where thou think'st me trapped,—

For to this day my body is clean of lust. 980

I know this commerce not, save by the ear
And sight of pictures,—little will have I
To look thereon, who keep a virgin soul.

Yet, grant my virtue wins not thy belief,
Sure 'tis for thee to show whereby I fell. 985
Wilt say this woman's form in grace out-
shone

All women?—that I hoped thy state to inherit

By winning for mine own thine heiress-
queen?

Vain fool were I—nay rather, wholly mad!
"But Power can tempt," might one say,
"even the chaste." 990

Nay verily!—save the lust of sovereignty
Poison the wit of all who covet it.

Fain would I foremost victor be in games
Hellenic, and be second in the realm,
And with pure-hearted friends be happy
still. 995

For there is true well-being, from peril far,
Which giveth sweeter joys than sovereignty.

So hast thou all my counterpleas, save one:— Could I that witness call who knows mine
heart,

And, pleasing, face thy dead wife's living
face, 1000

By deeds shouldst thou search out and know
the wicked:

But now—by Zeus Oath-warden, by Earth's
plain,

Swear I, I ne'er attempted couch of thine,
No, nor had wished it, nor had dreamed there-
of. 1004

God grant I perish nameless, fameless all,
Cityless, homeless, exile, vagabond

On earth,—may sea nor land receive my corpse

When I am dead, if I be this vile thing!
Now if through fear she flung away her life
I know not. More I cannot sinless say. 1010
Her honour by dishonour did she guard:
I, in a sore strait, cleave to honour still.

CHO. Thou hast said enough to turn this charge from thee,

Tendering the oath of Gods, the awful
pledge.

THES. Juggler with words and trickster is he not, 1015

Who thinks by his unruffled calm to outface
My mood, when his own father he hath shamed?

HIP. Nay, but I marvel, father, at this in
thee;—

For, if my son thou wert, and I thy sire,
I had slain thee: exile should not be thy mulct, 1020

If on my wife thou hadst dared to lay a
hand.

THES. Good sooth, well said: yet not so shalt thou die—

Not by the doom thou speakest for thyself!

Ay, easiest for the wretched is swift death.

But from the home-land exiled, wandering
To strange soil, shalt thou drain life's bitter
dregs; 1026

For this is meet wage for the impious man.

HIP. Woe's me!—what wilt thou do?
Wilt not receive

Time's witness in my cause, but banish now?

THES. Beyond the sea, beyond the Atlantic bourn, 1030

If this I could; so much I hate thy face.

HIP. Nor oath, nor pledge, nor prophet's utterance

Wilt test, but cast me forth the land untried?

THES. This tablet, though it bear no prophet's sign,

Accuseth thee, nor lieth: but the birds 1035
That roam o'erhead—I wave them long farewell.

HIP. [aside]. O Gods, why can I not unlock my lips,

Who am destroyed by you whom I revere?
No!—whom I need persuade, I should not so,
And all for naught should break the oaths I swore. 1040

THES. Faugh!—how it chokes me, this thy saintly mien!

Out from thy fatherland! Straightway begone!

HIP. Unhappy! whither shall I flee?—
what home

Of what friend enter, banished on such charge?

THES. Of whoso joys in welcoming for guests 1045
Defilers of men's wives, which dwell with sin.

HIP. Alas! this stabs mine heart well-nigh to weeping,

If I be published villain, thou believe it!

THES. Then shouldst thou have moaned and taken thought,

When thou dar'dst outrage thine own father's
wife! 1050

HIP. O halls, could ye but find a voice for
me,

And witness if I be a wicked man!

THES. Wisely thou fleest to speechless witnesses!

This deed, though it speak not, declares thee vile.

HIP. Ah, to stand face to face and see myself, 1055

That for the wrongs I suffer I might weep!

THES. Yea, 'tis thy wont to gaze on thy perfections

More than to render parents righteous honour.

HIP. Ah, hapless mother!—ah, my bitter birth!

Base-born be never any that I love! 1060

THES. Will ye not hale him hence, thralls?—heard ye not Long since his banishment pronounced of

me?

HIP. Who layeth hand on me of them shall rue!

Thou thrust me from the land, if such thy
mood.

THES. That will I, an thou wilt not heed mine hest. 1065

No pity for thine exile visits me.

Exit.

HIP. So then my fate is sealed. Ah, woe
is me!

I know the truth, yet know not how to tell it.
Dearest of Gods to me, O Leto's Child,

Companion, fellow-huntress, I shall flee 1070

Athens the glorious. Farewell, City and Land.

Of old Erechtheus! O Troezenian plain,
How many pleasant paths of youth hast
thou!

Farewell: I see thee, hail thee, the last time.
Come, O ye youths, mine age-mates in this land, 1075

Speak parting word: escort me from this soil:

For never shall ye see a chaster man,
Albeit this my sire believeth not. Exit.

STROPHE I

CHO. When faith overfloweth my mind,
God's providence all-embracing

Banisheth griefs: but when doubt whis-pereth "Ah but to know!" 1080

No clue through the tangle I find of fate and of life for my tracing:

There is ever a change and many a
change,

And the mutable fortune of men evermore sways to and fro

Over limitless range. 1084

ANTISTROPHE I

Ah, would the Gods hear prayer!—would they grant to me these supplications—

A lot with prosperity sweet, and a soul
unshadowed of pain,

And a faith neither fixed foursquare on the flint, nor on sandy foundations!

Quick-shifting my sail to the coming breeze

Of the morrow, so may I fleet, ever voyaging life's wide main

Over stormless seas. 1090

STROPHE II

My mind is a fountain troubled; I see things
all undreamed:

For the Star of Athens, that beamed
The brightest withal in Hellas-land,

We have seen him driven to an alien
strand,
By the wrath of a father have seen him banned. 1095
Ah, cityward sands, ye shall wait him
in vain,
And ye mountain woods, where streamed
'Twixt the oaks the pack on the wild boar's track
In dread Dictynna's hunter-train,
Till the quarry was slain. 1100

ANTISTROPHE II

Nevermore shall he harness the Henetan horses and leap on his car,
O'er the race-course of Limne afar
To speed the courser's feet of fire:
And the songs, that once 'neath the strings of the lyre Slept never, shall cease in the halls of his sire. 1105
Ungarlanded Artemis' bowers shall
be
In the greenwood depths that are.
By thine exile have perished the sweet hopes cherished
Of our maids, and their gentle rivalry
In love for thee. 1110

EPODE

For thy woeful fate shall I pass amid tears fast-flowing
A fortuneless fortune. O mother evil-starred,
This day thy birth-joy effaces!
I am wroth with the Gods:—O Graces
Aye linkèd in loving embraces, 1115
Why do ye suffer that he from his land should be going,
From his home, who hath nowise earned a doom so bitter-hard?
But lo, I see Hippolytus' henchman nigh
Hasting unto the halls with clouded brows.

Enter MESSENGER.

MESS. Where should I go and find this country's king, 1120
Theseus, ye women? If ye know, declare Straightway to me. Within these halls is he?
CHO. Lo yonder where he cometh forth
the halls.

Enter THESEUS.

MESS. Theseus, I bring a sorrow-kindling tale
To thee and all the citizens which dwell 1125
In Athens and the bounds of Troezen-land.
THES. What now? Hath some disaster unforeseen
Fallen on these two neighbour-citied states?
MESS. Hippolytus is no more!—so may one say,
Though yet a little space he seeth light. 1130 THES. Of whom slain? Hath one met him in his wrath,
Whose wife he had outraged, even as his sire's?
MESS. His proper chariot-team hath dealt him death,
And thy mouth's curses, which thou didst call
down 1134
From the Sea's Lord, thy father, on thy son.
THES. O Gods! Poseidon! how thou wast indeed
My father, who hast heard my malison!
How perished he? In what way did the gin
Of justice snap on him who wrought me
shame?
MESS. We, hard beside the beach that greeted the surf, 1140
With combs were smoothing out his horses' manes
Weeping: for word had come to us to say
That no more in this land Hippolytus
Might walk, of thee to wretched exile doomed.
Then came he, bringing the same tale of tears
To us upon the strand: a countless throng
Of friends his age-mates following with him
came. 1147
But, ceasing at the last from moan, he cried:
"Why rave I thus? I must obey my sire.
Harness the horses to the chariot-yoke, 1150
My thralls: this city is no more for me."
Then, then did every man bestir himself.
Swifter than one could say it were the steeds Harnessed, and by our lord's side set we
them.
Then the reins caught he from the chariotrail, 1155
And in the car's foot-rests set firm his feet,
But to the Gods first stretched his hands and
cried:
"Zeus, may I die if I a villain am!
May my sire know that he is wronging me,
When I am dead, if not while I see light!"

Then in his hand he took the scourge and
smote 1161
At once the steeds. We henchmen by the car
Fast by the reins attended on our lord
Towards Argos straight and Epidauria.

And, as we entered on a desert tract, 1165
Beyond this Troezen's border lies a beach
Sloping full down to yon Saronic Sea.
There from earth's womb a noise like Zeus's thunder
Made muffled roaring, a blood-curdling
sound.
Then the steeds lifted head and pricked the
ear; 1170
And thrilled through us most vehement dismay Whence might the sound be. To the sealashed shores
Then glanced we, and a surge unearthly saw
Up-columned to the sky, that from my sight
Shrouded was all the beach Scironian; 1175
Veiled was the Isthmus and Asclepius' Crag.
Then swelling higher, higher, and spurting
forth
All round a cloud of foam and sea-blown
spray,
Shoreward it rusheth, toward the four-horse
car.

Then from the breaker's midst and hugest
surge 1180
The wave belched forth a bull, a monster fierce,
With whose throat-thunder all the land was filled,
And echoed awfully, as on our gaze
He burst, a sight more dread than eyes could
bear. 1184
Straightway wild panic falleth on the steeds:
Yet their lord, wholly conversant with wont
Of horses, caught the reins in both his hands,
And tugs, as shipman tugs against the oar,
Throwing his body's weight against the reins.
But on the fire-forged bits they clenched their teeth, 1190
And whirled him on o'ermastered, recking
not
Of steering hand, or curb, or strong car's weight.
And if, yet holding to the chariot-helm, Toward the smooth ground he strove to guide their course,

Aye showed that bull in front, to turn them
back, 1195
Maddening with fright the fourfold chariot-team.
If toward the rocks they rushed with frenzied
heart,
Fast by the rail in silence followed he
On, till he fouled and overset the car, Dashing against a rock the chariot-felly. 1200
Then all was turmoil: upward leapt in air Naves of the wheels and linchpins of the axles.
And he, unhappy, tangled in the reins,
Bound in indissoluble bonds, is haled 1204
Dashing his head against the cruel rocks,
Rending his flesh, outshrieking piteous
cries—
"O stay, ye horses nurtured at my cribs, Destroy me not!—ah, father's curse ill-
starred!
Will no one save an utter-innocent man?"
Ah, many willed, but far behind were left With feet outstripped. Loosed from the toils at last 1211
Of clean-cut reins,—I know not in what wise,—
He falls, yet breathing for short space of life.
Vanished the steeds and that accursed monster,
The bull, mid rock-strewn ground, I know not where. 1215

Thrall am I verily of thine house, O king;
Howbeit so foul a charge—I never can Believe it of thy son, that he is vile,
Not though all womankind should hang
themselves,
Though one should fill with writing every pine 1220
In Ida:—he is righteous, this I know.
CHO. Woe for accomplishment of new disaster!
No refuge is there from the doom of fate.
THES. For hatred of the man who thus hath fared, 1224
Glad for this tale was I: but now, for awe
Of heaven, and for that he is yet my son, Glad for this judgment am I not, nor grieved.
MESS. How then?—must we bear yonder broken man
Hither?—or in what wise perform thy pleasure? 1229

Bethink thee: if my counsel thou wilt heed,
Harsh to thy stricken son thou wilt not be.

THES. Bear him, that I may see before mine eyes

Him who denied that he had stained my bed,
By words and heaven's requital to convict
him.

Exit MESSENGER.

CHO. Love, under thy dominion un-bending hearts bow low— 1235

Gods' hearts, and hearts of mortals; when, flashing through thy portals

On glory-gleaming pinion, flits Eros to and fro,

Love, under thy dominion unbending hearts
bow low.

Gold-glittering wings wide-soaring, they rain down witchery:

O'er maddened hearts prevailing, o'er earth
triumphant sailing, 1240

O'er music of the roaring of spray-bemantled
sea,

Gold-glittering wings wide-soaring, they rain down witchery.

He kindleth with his yearning all things of
earth-born race:

The mountain's whelps he thrilleth, the ocean's brood he filleth:

Where'er the sun's eye burning down looketh on earth's face, 1245

He kindleth with his yearning all things of
earth-born race.

They bend—all, all are bending, Love-queen,
beneath thy hand!

O crownèd brows, whom loyal vassals acclaim sole royal

By spells all-comprehending in sky and sea
and land;

They bend—all, all are bending, Love-queen,
beneath thy hand! 1250

*Enter ARTEMIS, veiled in a nectar-breathing
cloud.*

ART. Thou high-born scion of Aegeus, I call upon thee:

Theseus, give ear unto me.

It is Artemis, Leto's Daughter, that nameth thy name:

Why dost thou joy in thy shame,

Who hast murdered thy son unrighteously,
thereto moved 1255

By the lies of thy wife unproved?
Ruin and wrack in the sight of the sun hast thou found.

How wilt thou hide underground
Thy dishonour in hell, or upsoaring mid clouds, veil there

Thy life of remorse and despair? 1260
For the part that was erstwhile thine in the good man's lot,

Behold, it is not,
Theseus, hear thou the posture of thy woes:—
Yet have I no help for thee, only pain; 1264

But I have come to show the righteousness
Of thy son, that in fair fame he may die,

And thy wife's fever-flame,—yet in some sort
Her nobleness. She, stung by goads of her

Whom we, who joy in purity, abhor 1269
Most of all Gods, was lovesick for thy son.

Her reason fought her passion, and she died
Through schemes wherein she had no part:
her nurse

Told under oath-seal to thy son her pangs:
He, even as was righteous, would not heed

The tempting; no, nor when sore-wronged of
thee 1275

Broke he the oath's pledge, for he feared the Gods.

But she, adread to be of sin convict,
Wrote that false writing, and by treachery so

Destroyed thy son:—and thou believedst
her!

THES. Ah me! 1280

ART. Is it torture, Theseus?—Nay, but hear me out,

That hearing all thou mayst the more lament.
Thy sire's sure curses three—rememberest
them?

One hast thou thus misused, O villain thou, Against thy son, which might have quelled a
foe! 1285

Thy sire the Sea-king, in his love's despite, Gave as he needs must, seeing he had pledged
him:

Yet wicked in his eyes and mine art thou,
Who wouldst not wait for proof, nor prophet's voice,

Nor yet make inquisition, nor let time 1290
Slowly reveal all, but with criminal haste

Didst hurl the curse upon thy son, and slay.
THES. Queen, ruin seize me!

ART. Deep thy sin: but yet Even thou for this mayst win forgiveness
still: 1294

For Cypris willed that all this should befall

To glut her spite. And this the Gods' wont is:—

None doth presume to thwart the fixed design

Willed by his fellow: still aloof we stand.

Else be thou sure that, but for dread of Zeus,

I never would have known this depth of
shame, 1300

To suffer one, of all men best beloved

Of me, to die. But thy transgression, first,

Thine ignorance from utter sin redeems;

Then, by her death thy wife made void all test 1304

Of these her words, and won thy credence so.

Now, most on thee this storm of woe hath burst;

Yet grief is mine: for when the righteous die

The Gods joy not. The wicked, and withal

Their children and their homes, do we destroy.

CHO. Lo, lo, the stricken one borne 1310

Hitherward, with his young flesh torn

And his golden head of its glory shorn!

Ah, griefs of the house!—what doom

Twofold on thine halls hath come

By the Gods' will shrouded in sorrow's
gloom! 1315

Enter bearers with HIPPOLYTUS.

HIP. Woe, woe for a son

By the doom of his sire

All marred and undone!

Through mine head leapeth fire

Of the agony-flashes, and throbbeth my brain like a hard-stricken lyre. 1320

Let me rest—ah forbear!—

For my strength is sped.

Cursèd horses, ye were

Of mine own hands fed,

Yet me have ye wholly destroyed, yet me have ye stricken dead! 1325

For the Gods' sake, bear

Me full gently, each thrall!

Thou to right, have a care!—

Soft let your hands fall;

Tenderly bear the sore-mangled, on-stepping in time, one and all, 1330

The unhappy on-bearing,

And cursèd, I ween,

Of his father's own erring:—

Ah Zeus, hast thou seen?

Innocent I, ever fearing the Gods, who was wholly heart-clean 1335

Above all men beside,—

Lo, how am I thrust

Unto Hades, to hide

My life in the dust!

All vainly I revered God, and in vain unto man was I just. 1340

Let the stricken one be!—

Ah, mine anguish again!—

Give ye sleep unto me,

Death-salve for my pain,

The sleep of the sword for the wretched—I long, oh I long to be slain. 1345

Dire curse of my father!—

Sins, long ago wrought

Of mine ancestors, gather:

Their doom tarries not,

But the scourge overfloweth the innocent—wherefore on me is it brought? 1350

Ah for words of a spell,

That my soul might take flight

From the tortures, with fell

Unrelentings that smite!

Oh for the blackness of Hades, the sleep of Necessity's night! 1355

ART. Unhappy, bowed 'neath what disaster's yoke!

Thine own heart's nobleness hath ruined
thee.

HIP. Ah, perfume-breath celestial!—mid my pains

I feel thee, and mine anguish is assuaged.

Lo in this place the Goddess Artemis! 1360

ART. Yea, hapless one, of Gods best friend to thee

HIP. O Queen, seest thou my plight—
the stricken one?

ART. I see—but tears are to mine eyes forbid.

HIP. None now shall hark thine hounds, nor do thee service—

ART. Ah no! Yet dear to me thou perishest. 1365

HIP. Nor tend thy steeds, nor guard thine images.

ART. This all-pernicious Cypris hath contrived—

HIP. Ah me! what Goddess blasts me now I know!

ART. Jealous for honour, wroth with chastity.

HIP. Three hath one hand destroyed; I see it now. ¹³⁷⁰

ART. Thy father—thee—thy father's wife the third.

HIP. Yea, and I wail my father's misery.

ART. By plots of deity was he beguiled.

HIP. Ah father, woe is thee for this mischance!

THES. I am slain, my son: no joy have I in life! ¹³⁷⁵

HIP. More than myself I mourn thee for thine error.

THES. Would God I could but die for thee, my son!

HIP. Ah, bitter gifts of that Sea-god, thy sire!

THES. Ah that the word had never passed my lips!

HIP. Wherefore?—thou wouldst for wrath have slain me still. ³⁸⁰

THES. Yea, for the Gods had caused my wit to stumble.

HIP. Oh that men's curses could but strike the Gods!

ART. Let be: for even in the nether gloom Not unavenged shall be the stroke that fell Upon thy frame through rage of Cypris'spite, For thy pure soul's and for thy reverence'sake. ¹³⁸⁶

For upon one, her minion, with mine hand—Whoso is dearest of all men to her—

With these unerring shafts will I avenge me. And to thee, hapless one, for these thy woes High honours will I give in Troezen-town. Ere their espousals shall all maids unwed ¹³⁹²

For thee cut off their hair: through age on age Full harvests shalt thou reap of tears of grieving.

Ever of thee song-waking memory ¹³⁹⁵ Shall live in virgins; nor shall Phaedra's love

Forgotten in thy story be unhymned.

But thou, O son of ancient Aegeus, take Thy child into thine arms, and fold him close. Not of thy will thou slewest him, and well May men transgress when Gods are thrusting on. ¹⁴⁰¹

Thee too I charge, Hippolytus—hate not Thy father: 'tis by fate thou perishest.

Farewell: I may not gaze upon the dead, Nor may with dying gasps pollute my sight: And now I see that thou art near the end. Exit.

HIP. Farewell to thy departing, Maiden blest. ¹⁴⁰⁷

Light falls on thee long fellowship's severance!

Lo, I forgive my father at thy suit,

As heretofore have I obeyed thy word. ¹⁴¹⁰

Ah, o'er mine eyes even now the darkness draws!

Take, father, take my body and upraise.

THES. Ah me! what dost thou, child, to hapless me?

HIP. I am gone—yea, I behold the gates of death!

THES. Wilt leave me—and my conscience murder-stained? ¹⁴¹⁵

HIP. No, no! I do absolve thee of my death.

THES. How say'st thou?—dost assoil me of thy blood?

HIP. I call to witness Bow-queen Artemis.

THES. Dearest, how noble show'st thou to thy sire!

HIP. Pray to have such sons—sons in wedlock born. ¹⁴²⁰

THES. Woe for thy reverent soul, thy righteous heart!

HIP. Father, farewell thou too—untold farewells!

THES. Forsake me not, my son!—be strong to bear!

HIP. My strength is overborne—I am gone, my father. ¹⁴²⁴

Cover my face with mantles with all speed. Dies.

THES. O bounds of Athens, Pallas' glorious realm,

What hero will be lost to you! Woe's me!

Cypris, how oft shall I recall thy wrong!

CHO. On the city hath lighted a stroke without warning,

On all hearts desolation. ¹⁴³⁰

Rain down, O ye fast-dropping tears of our mourning!

When the mighty are fallen, their burial-oblation

Is the wail of a nation.

Exeunt OMNES.

EVERYMAN	STRENGTH
GOD: ADONAI	DISCRETION
DEATH	FIVE-WITS
MESSINGER	BEAUTY
FELLOWSHIP	KNOWLEDGE

GOOD-DEEDS

HERE beginneth a treatise how the High Father of Heaven sendeth death to summon every creature to come and give account of their lives in this world and is in manner of a moral play.

MESSINGER. I pray you all give your audience,

And hear this matter with reverence,

By figure a moral play—

The Summoning of Everyman called it is,

That of our lives and ending shows 5

How transitory we be all day.

This matter is wondrous precious,

But the intent of it is more gracious,

And sweet to bear away.

The story saith,—Man, in the beginning, 10

Look well, and take good heed to the ending,

Be you never so gay!

Ye think sin in the beginning full sweet,

Which in the end causeth thy soul to weep,

When the body lieth in clay. 15

Here shall you see how Fellowship and Jollity,

Both Strength, Pleasure, and Beauty,

Will fade from thee as flower in May.

For ye shall hear, how our Heaven King

Calleth Everyman to a general reckoning: 20

Give audience, and hear what he doth say.

GOD. I perceive here in my majesty,

How that all creatures be to me unkind,

Living without dread in worldly prosperity:

Of ghostly sight the people be so blind, 25

Drowned in sin, they know me not for their

God;

In worldly riches is all their mind,

They fear not my rightwiseness, the sharp rod;

My law that I showed, when I for them died,

They forget clean, and shedding of my blood red: 30

I hanged between two, it cannot be denied;
To get them life I suffered to be dead;
I healed their feet, with thorns hurt was my head:

I could do no more than I did truly, 34
And now I see the people do clean forsake me.
They use the seven deadly sins damnable;
As pride, covetise, wrath, and lechery,
Now in the world be made commendable;
And thus they leave of angels the heavenly company;

Everyman liveth so after his own pleasure, 40
And yet of their life they be nothing sure:

I see the more that I them forbear

The worse they be from year to year;

All that liveth appaireth fast,

Therefore I will in all the haste 45

Have a reckoning of Everyman's person;

For and I leave the people thus alone

In their life and wicked tempests,

Verily they will become much worse than 49

beasts;

For now one would by envy another up eat;

Charity they all do clean forget.

I hoped well that Everyman

In my glory should make his mansion,

And thereto I had them all elect;

But now I see, like traitors deject, 55

They thank me not for the pleasure that I

to them meant,

Nor yet for their being that I them have lent.

I proffered the people great multitude of mercy,

And few there be that asketh it heartily;

They be so cumbered with worldly riches, 60

That needs on them I must do justice,

On Everyman living without fear.

Where art thou, Death, thou mighty messenger?

DEATH. Almighty God, I am here at your will,

Your commandment to fulfil. 65

GOD. Go thou to Everyman,

And show him in my name

A pilgrimage he must on him take,

Which he in no wise may escape; 69

And that he bring with him a sure reckoning

Without delay or any tarrying.

DEATH. Lord, I will in the world go run over all,

And cruelly outsearch both great and small;
 Every man will I beset that liveth beastly
 Out of God's laws, and dreadeth not folly: 75
 He that loveth riches I will strike with my
 dart,
 His sight to blind, and from heaven to de-
 part,
 Except that alms be his good friend,
 In hell for to dwell, world without end.
 Lo, yonder I see Everyman walking; 80
 Full little he thinketh on my coming;
 His mind is on fleshly lusts and his treasure,
 And great pain it shall cause him to endure
 Before the Lord Heaven King. 84
Everyman, stand still; whither art thou going
 Thus gaily? Hast thou thy Maker forget?
 EVERYMAN. Why askst thou?
 Wouldst thou wete?
 DEATH. Yea, sir, I will show you;
 In great haste I am sent to thee 90
 From God out of his majesty.
 EVERYMAN. What, sent to me?
 DEATH. Yea, certainly.
 Though thou have forgot him here, 94
 He thinketh on thee in the heavenly sphere,
 As, or we depart, thou shalt know.
 EVERYMAN. What desireth God of me?
 DEATH. That shall I show thee;
 A reckoning he will needs have Without any longer respite. 100
 EVERYMAN. To give a reckoning longer leisure I crave;
 This blind matter troubleth my wit.
 DEATH. On thee thou must take a long journey:
 Therefore thy book of count with thee thou
 bring;
 For turn again thou cannot by no way, 105
 And look thou be sure of thy reckoning:
 For before God thou shalt answer, and
 show
 Thy many bad deeds and good but a few;
 How thou hast spent thy life, and in what
 wise,
 Before the chief lord of paradise. 110
 Have ado that we were in that way,
 For, wete thou well, thou shalt make none
 attourney.
 EVERYMAN. Full unready I am such reckoning to give.
 I know thee not: what messenger art thou?
 DEATH. I am Death, that no man
 dreadeth. 115
 For every man I rest and no man spareth;

For it is God's commandment
 That all to me should be obedient.
 EVERYMAN. O Death, thou comest when I had thee least in mind;
 In thy power it lieth me to save, 120
 Yet of my good will I give thee, if ye will be
 kind,
 Yea, a thousand pound shalt thou have,
 And defer this matter till another day.
 DEATH. Everyman, it may not be by no
 way;
 I set not by gold, silver, nor riches, 125
 Nor by pope, emperor, king, duke, nor princes.
 For and I would receive gifts great,
 All the world I might get;
 But my custom is clean contrary.
 I give thee no respite: come hence, and not tarry. 130
 EVERYMAN. Alas, shall I have no longer respite?
 I may say Death giveth no warning:
 To think on thee, it maketh my heart sick,
 For all unready is my book of reckoning. 134
 But twelve year and I might have abiding,
 My counting book I would make so clear,
 That my reckoning I should not need to
 fear.
 Wherefore, Death, I pray thee, for God's mercy,
 Spare me till I be provided of remedy.
 DEATH. Thee availeth not to cry, weep, and pray: 140
 But haste thee lightly that you were gone
 the journey,
 And prove thy friends if thou can.
 For, wete thou well, the tide abideth no man,
 And in the world each living creature
 For Adam's sin must die of nature. 145
 EVERYMAN. Death, if I should this pilgrimage take,
 And my reckoning surely make,
 Show me, for saint charity,
 Should I not come again shortly?
 DEATH. No, Everyman; and thou be once there, 150
 Thou mayst never more come here,
 Trust me verily.
 EVERYMAN. O gracious God, in the high seat celestial,
 Have mercy on me in this most need;
 Shall I have no company from this vale terrestrial 155
 Of mine acquaintance that way me to lead!

DEATH. Yea, if any be so hardy,
That would go with thee and bear thee company.

Hie thee that you were gone to God's magnificence,

Thy reckoning to give before his presence. 160

What, weenest thou thy life is given thee,
And thy worldly goods also?

EVERYMAN. I had wend so, verily.

DEATH. Nay, nay; it was but lent thee;
For as soon as thou art go, 165

Another awhile shall have it, and then go therefro

Even as thou hast done.

Everyman, thou art mad; thou hast thy wits five,

And here on earth will not amend thy life,
For suddenly I do come. 170

EVERYMAN. O wretched caitiff, whither shall I flee,

That I might scape this endless sorrow!

Now, gentle Death, spare me till to-morrow,

That I may amend me

With good advisement. 175

DEATH. Nay, thereto I will not consent,
Nor no man will I respite,

But to the heart suddenly I shall smite

Without any advisement.

And now out of thy sight I will me hie; 180

See thou make thee ready shortly,

For thou mayst say this is the day

That no man living may scape away.

EVERYMAN. Alas, I may well weep with sighs deep;

Now have I no manner of company¹ 185

To help me in my journey, and me to keep;

And also my writing is full unready.

How shall I do now for to excuse me?

I would to God I had never be gete!¹

To my soul a full great profit it had be; 190

For now I fear pains huge and great.

The time passeth; Lord, help that all
wrought;

For though I mourn it availeth nought.

The day passeth, and is almost a-go;

I wot not w^hat for to do. 195

To whom were I best my complaint to make?

What, and I to Fellowship thereof spake,

And showed him of this sudden chance?

For in him is all mine affiance;

We have in the world so many a day 200

Be on good friends in sport and play.

I see him yonder, certainly;

I trust that he will bear me company;

Therefore to him will I speak to ease my sorrow.

Well met, good Fellowship, and good morrow! 205

FELLOWSHIP SPEAKETH. Everyman, good morrow by this day.

Sir, why lookest thou so piteously?

If any thing be amiss, I pray thee, me
say,

That I may help to remedy.

EVERYMAN. Yea, good Fellowship, yea,
I am in great jeopardy. 210

FELLOWSHIP. My true friend, show to me your mind;

I will not forsake thee, unto my life's end,

In the way of good company.

EVERYMAN. That was well spoken, and lovingly.

FELLOWSHIP. Sir, I must needs know your heaviness; 215

I have pity to see you in any distress;

If any have you wronged ye shall revenged
be,

Though I on the ground be slain for thee,—

Though that I know before that I should die.

EVERYMAN. Verily, Fellowship, gramercy. 220

FELLOWSHIP. Tush! by thy thanks I set not a straw.

Show me your grief, and say no more.

EVERYMAN. If I my heart should to you
break,

And then you to turn your mind from me,

And would not me comfort, when you hear me speak, 225

Then should I ten times sorrier be.

FELLOWSHIP. Sir, I say as I will do in deed.

EVERYMAN. Then be you a good friend
at need:

I have found you true here before. 229

FELLOWSHIP. And so ye shall evermore;

For, in faith, and thou go to Hell,

I will not forsake thee by the way!

EVERYMAN. Ye speak like a good friend;
I believe you well;

I shall deserve it, and I may.

FELLOWSHIP. I speak of no deserving, by this day. 235

For he that will say and nothing do

Is not worthy with good company to go;

¹Been born.

Therefore show me the grief of your mind,
As to your friend most loving and kind.

EVERYMAN. I shall show you how it is; 240
Commanded I am to go a journey,
A long way, hard and dangerous,
And give a strait count without delay
Before the high judge Adonai.
Wherefore I pray you, bear me company, 245
As ye have promised, in this journey.

FELLOWSHIP. That is matter indeed!
Promise is duty,
But, and I should take such a voyage on
me,
I know it well, it should be to my pain:
Also it make me afraid, certain. 250
But let us take counsel here as well as we
can,

For your words would fear a strong man.

EVERYMAN. Why, ye said, If I had need,
Ye would me never forsake, quick nor dead,
Though it were to hell truly. 255

FELLOWSHIP. So I said, certainly,
But such pleasures be set aside, thee sooth to
say:

And also, if we took such a journey,
When should we come again?

EVERYMAN. Nay, never again till the day
of doom. 260

FELLOWSHIP. In faith, then will not I come there!

Who hath you these tidings brought?

EVERYMAN. Indeed, Death was with me
here.

FELLOWSHIP. Now, by God that all hath bought,

If Death were the messenger, 265
For no man that is living to-day
I will not go that loath journey—
Not for the father that begat me!

EVERYMAN. Ye promised other wise, pardie.

FELLOWSHIP. I wot well I say so truly; 270
And yet if thou wilt eat, and drink, and make good cheer,
Or haunt to women, the lusty company,
I would not forsake you, while the day is clear,

Trust me verily!

EVERYMAN. Yea, thereto ye would be ready; 275

To go to mirth, solace, and play,
Your mind will sooner apply
Than to bear me company in my long journey.

FELLOWSHIP. Now, in good faith, I will not that way. 279

But and thou wilt murder, or any man kill,
In that I will help thee with a good will!

EVERYMAN. O that is a simple advice
indeed!

Gentle fellow, help me in my necessity;
We have loved long, and now I need, 284
And now, gentle Fellowship, remember me.

FELLOWSHIP. Whether ye have loved me or no,

By Saint John, I will not with thee go.

EVERYMAN. Yet I pray thee, take the labor, and do so much for me

To bring me forward, for saint charity,
And comfort me till I come without the
town. 290

FELLOWSHIP. Nay, and thou would give me a new gown,

I will not a foot with thee go;

But and you had tarried I would not have left thee so.

And as now, God speed thee in thy journey,
For from thee I will depart as fast as I may.

EVERYMAN. Whither away, Fellowship? will you forsake me? 296

FELLOWSHIP. Yea, by my fay, to God I betake thee.

EVERYMAN. Farewell, good Fellowship;
for this my heart is sore;

Adieu for ever, I shall see thee no more.

FELLOWSHIP. In faith, Everyman, farewell now at the end; 300

For you I will remember that parting is mourning.

EVERYMAN. Alack! shall we thus depart
indeed?

Our Lady, help, without any more comfort, Lo, Fellowship forsaketh me in my most
need; 304

For help in this world whither shall I resort?
Fellowship herebefore with me would merry make;

And now little sorrow for me doth he take.
It is said, in prosperity men friends may find,
Which in adversity be full unkind.

Now whither for succor shall I flee, 310
Since that Fellowship hath forsaken me?

To my kinsmen I will truly,
Praying them to help me in my necessity;

I believe that they will do so,
For kind will creep where it may not go. 315

I will go say, for yonder I see them go.
Where be ye now, my friends and kinsmen?

KINDRED. Here be we now at your commandment.

Cousin, I pray you show us your intent
In any wise, and not spare. 320

COUSIN. Yea, Everyman, and to us declare

If ye be disposed to go any whither,
For wete you well, we will live and die together.

KINDRED. In wealth and woe we will with you hold,

For over his kin a man may be bold. 325

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, my friends and kinsmen kind.

Now shall I show you the grief of my mind:

I was commanded by a messenger,
That is an high king's chief officer;

He bade me go a pilgrimage to my pain, 330

And I know well I shall never come again;

Also I must give a reckoning straight,

For I have a great enemy, that hath me in
wait,

Which intendeth me for to hinder.

KINDRED. What account is that which ye must render? 335

That would I know.

EVERYMAN. Of all my works I must show

How I have lived and my days spent;

Also of ill deeds, that I have used

In my time, since life was me lent; 340

And of all virtues that I have refused.

Therefore I pray you go thither with me,

To help to make mine account, for saint charity.

COUSIN. What, to go thither? Is that the matter?

Nay, Everyman, I had liefer fast bread and water 345

All this five year and more.

EVERYMAN. Alas, that ever I was bore!

For now shall I never be merry

If that you forsake me.

KINDRED. Ah, sir; what, ye be a merry
man! 350

Take good heart to you, and make no moan.

But one thing I warn you, by Saint Anne,

As for me, ye shall go alone.

EVERYMAN. My Cousin, will you not with me go?

COUSIN. No, by our Lady; I have the cramp in my toe. 355

Trust not to me, for, so God me speed,

I will deceive you in your most need.

KINDRED. It availeth not us to tice.

Ye shall have my maid with all my heart; 359

She loveth to go to feasts, there to be nice,

And to dance, and abroad to start:

I will give her leave to help you in that journey,

If that you and she may agree.

EVERYMAN. Now show me the very effect of your mind.

Will you go with me, or abide behind? 362

KINDRED. Abide behind? yea, that I will and I may!

Therefore farewell until another day.

EVERYMAN. How should I be merry or glad?

For fair promises to me make, 365

But when I have most need, they me forsake.

I am deceived; that maketh me sad.

COUSIN. Cousin Everyman, farewell now,

For verily I will not go with you;

Also of mine own an unready reckoning 374

I have to account; therefore I make tarrying.

Now, God keep thee, for now I go.

EVERYMAN. Ah, Jesus, is all come hereto?

Lo, fair words maketh fools feign;

They promise and nothing will do certain.

My kinsmen promised me faithfully 380

For to abide with me steadfastly,

And now fast away do they flee:

Even so Fellowship promised me.

What friend were best me of to provide?

I lose my time here longer to abide. 385

Yet in my mind a thing there is;—

All my life I have loved riches;

If that my good now help me might,

He would make my heart full light.

I will speak to him in this distress.— 390

Where art thou, my Goods and riches?

Goods. Who calleth me? Everyman?
what haste thou hast.

I lie here in corners, trussed and piled so high,

And in chests I am locked so fast,

Also sacked in bags, thou mayst see with thine eye, 395

I cannot stir; in packs low I lie.

What would ye have, lightly me say.

EVERYMAN. Come hither, Goods, in all the haste thou may,

For of counsel I must desire thee.

Goods. Sir, and ye in the world have trouble or adversity, 400

That can I help you to remedy shortly.

EVERYMAN. It is another disease that grieveth me;

In this world it is not, I tell thee so.
I am sent for another way to go,
To give a straight account general 405
Before the highest Jupiter of all;
And all my life I have had joy and pleasure in thee.

Therefore I pray thee go with me,
For, peradventure, thou mayst before God
Almighty

My reckoning help to clean and purify; 410
For it is said ever among,

That money maketh all right that is wrong.
GOODS. Nay, Everyman, I sing another
song,

I follow no man in such voyages;
For and I went with thee 415
Thou shouldst fare much the worse for me;
For because on me thou did set thy mind,
Thy reckoning I have made blotted and blind,

That thine account thou cannot make truly;
And that hast thou for the love of me. 420

EVERYMAN. That would grieve me full sore,
When I should come to that fearful answer.
Up, let us go thither together.

GOODS. Nay, not so, I am too brittle, I may not endure;

I will follow no man one foot, be ye sure. 425

EVERYMAN. Alas, I have thee loved, and had great pleasure

All my life-days on good and treasure.

GOODS. That is to thy damnation without lesing,

For my love is contrary to the love everlast-
ing. 429

But if thou had me loved moderately during,
As, to the poor give part of me,

Then shouldst thou not in this dolor be,
Nor in this great sorrow and care.

EVERYMAN. Lo, now was I deceived or I was ware, 434

And all I may wyte¹ my spending of time.

GOODS. What, weenest thou that I am
thine?

EVERYMAN. I had wend so.

GOODS. Nay, Everyman, I say no;

As for a while I was lent thee,

A season thou hast had me in prosperity; 440

My condition is man's soul to kill;

If I save one, a thousand I do spill;

Weenest thou that I will follow thee?

Nay, from this world, not verily.

EVERYMAN. I had wend otherwise. 445

GOODS. Therefore to thy soul Good is a thief;

For when thou art dead, this is my guise

Another to deceive in the same wise

As I have done thee, and all to his soul's reprief. 449

EVERYMAN. O false Good, cursed thou
be!

Thou traitor to God, that hast deceived me,
And caught me in thy snare.

GOODS. Marry, thou brought thyself in
care,

Whereof I am glad,

I must needs laugh, I cannot be sad. 455

EVERYMAN. Ah, Good, thou hast had long my hearty love;

I gave thee that which should be the Lord's above.

But wilt thou not go with me in deed?

I pray thee truth to say.

GOODS. No, so God me speed, 460

Therefore farewell, and have good day.

EVERYMAN. O to whom shall I make my
moan

For to go with me in that heavy journey?

First Fellowship said he would with me gone;

His words were very pleasant and gay, 465

But afterward he left me alone.

Then spake I to my kinsmen all in despair,

And also they gave me words fair,

They lacked no fair speaking,

But all forsake me in the ending. 470

Then went I to my Goods that I loved best,

In hope to have comfort, but there had I least;

For my Goods sharply did me tell

That he bringeth many into hell.

Then of myself I was ashamed, 475

And so I am worthy to be blamed;

Thus may I well myself hate.

Of whom shall I now counsel take?

I think that I shall never speed

Till that I go to my Good-Deeds, 480

But alas, she is so weak,

That she can neither go nor speak;

Yet will I venture on her now.—

My Good-Deeds, where be you?

GOOD-DEEDS. Here I lie cold in the
ground; 485

Thy sins hath me sore bound,

That I cannot stir.

EVERYMAN. O, Good-Deeds, I stand in fear;

¹Blame.

I must you pray of counsel,
For help now should come right well. 490

GOOD-DEEDS. Everyman, I have understanding

That ye be summoned account to make
Before Messias, of Jerusalem King;
And you do by me! that journey with you will I take.

EVERYMAN. Therefore I come to you, my moan to make; 495

I pray you, that ye will go with me.

GOOD-DEEDS. I would full fain, but I cannot stand verily.

EVERYMAN. Why, is there anything on you fall?

GOOD-DEEDS. Yea, sir, I may thank you
of all;

If ye had perfectly cheered me, 500

Your book of account now full ready had be.

Look, the books of your works and deeds eke;

Oh, see how they lie under the feet,

To your soul's heaviness.

EVERYMAN. Our Lord Jesus, help me! 505

For one letter here I cannot see.

GOOD-DEEDS. There is a blind-reckoning in time of distress!

EVERYMAN. Good-Deeds, I pray you, help me in this need,

Or else I am for ever damned indeed;

Therefore help me to make reckoning 510

Before the redeemer of all things,

That king is, and was, and ever shall.

GOOD-DEEDS. Everyman, I am sorry of your fall,

And fain would I help you, and I were able.

EVERYMAN. Good-Deeds, your counsel I pray you give me. 515

GOOD-DEEDS. That shall I do verily;

Though that on my feet I may not go.

I have a sister, that shall with you also,

Called Knowledge, which shall with you abide, 519

To help you to make that dreadful reckoning.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, I will go with thee, and be thy guide,

In thy most need to go by thy side.

EVERYMAN. In good condition I am now in every thing,

And am wholly content with this good thing;
Thanked be God my Creator. 525

GOOD-DEEDS. And when he hath brought thee there,

Where thou shalt heal thee of thy smart,
Then go you with your reckoning and your Good-Deeds together

For to make you joyful at heart

Before the blessed Trinity. 530

EVERYMAN. My Good-Deeds, gramercy;

I am well content, certainly,

With your words sweet.

KNOWLEDGE. Now go we together lovingly,

To Confession, that cleansing river. 535

EVERYMAN. For joy I weep; I would we were there;

But, I pray you, give me cognition

Where dwelleth that holy man, Confession.

KNOWLEDGE. In the house of salvation:

We shall find him in that place, 540

That shall us comfort by God's grace.

Lo, this is Confession; kneel down and ask
mercy,

For he is in good conceit with God Almighty.

EVERYMAN. O glorious fountain that all uncleanness doth clarify,

Wash from me the spots of vices unclean, 545

That on me no sin may be seen;

I come with Knowledge for my redemption,

Repent with hearty and full contrition;

For I am commanded a pilgrimage to take,

And great accounts before God to make. 550

Now, I pray you, Shrift, mother of salvation,

Help my good deeds for my piteous exclamation.

CONFESSION. I know your sorrow well,
Everyman;

Because with Knowledge ye come to me,

I will you comfort as well as I can, 555

And a precious jewel I will give thee,

Called penance, wise voider of adversity;

Therewith shall your body chastised be,

With abstinence and perseverance in God's service:

Here shall you receive that scourge of me 560

Which is penance strong, that ye must endure,

To remember thy Savior was scourged for
thee

With sharp scourges, and suffered it patiently;

So must thou, or thou scape that painful pilgrimage;

Knowledge, keep him in this voyage, 565

And by that time Good-Deeds will be with
thee.

But in any wise, be sure of mercy,

¹If you take my counsel.

For your time draweth fast, and ye will saved be;

Ask God mercy, and He will grant truly,
When with the scourge of penance man doth him bind, 570

The oil of forgiveness then shall he find.

EVERYMAN. Thanked be God for his gracious work!

For now I will my penance begin;
This hath rejoiced and lighted my heart, 574
Though the knots be painful and hard within.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, look your penance that ye fulfil,

What pain that ever it to you be,
And Knowledge shall give you counsel at will,
How your accounts ye shall make clearly.

EVERYMAN. O eternal God, O heavenly figure, 580

O way of rightwiseness, O goodly vision,
Which descended down in a virgin pure
Because he would Everyman redeem,
Which Adam forfeited by his disobedience;
O blessed Godhead, elect and high-divine,
Forgive my grievous offence; 586

Here I cry thee mercy in this presence.
O ghostly treasure, O ransom and redeemer
Of all the world, hope and conductor, 590
Mirror of joy, and founder of mercy.
Which illumineth heaven and earth thereby,
Hear my clamorous complaint, though it late be;

Receive my prayers; unworthy in this heavy
life,

Though I be, a sinner most abominable, 594
Yet let my name be written in Moses' table;
O Mary, pray to the Maker of all thing,
Me for to help at my ending,
And save me from the power of my enemy,
For Death assaileth me strongly;
And, Lady, that I may by means of thy prayer 600

Of your Son's glory to be partaker,
By the means of his passion I it crave,
I beseech you, help my soul to save.—

Knowledge, give me the scourge of penance;
My flesh therewith shall give a quittance:
I will now begin, if God give me grace. 606

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, God give you time and space:

Thus I bequeath you in the hands of our Savior,

Thus may you make your reckoning sure.
EVERYMAN. In the name of the Holy Trinity, 610

My body sore punished shall be:

Take this body for the sin of the flesh;
Also thou delightest to go gay and fresh,
And in the way of damnation thou did me
bring; 614

Therefore suffer now strokes and punishing.
Now of penance I will wade the water clear
To save me from purgatory, that sharp fire.

GOOD-DEEDS. I thank God, now I can walk and go;

And am delivered of my sickness and woe.
Therefore with Everyman I will go, and not spare; 620

His good works I will help him to declare.

KNOWLEDGE. Now, Everyman, be merry and glad;

Your Good-Deeds cometh now; ye may not be sad;

Now is your Good-Deeds whole and sound,
Going upright upon the ground. 625

EVERYMAN. My heart is light, and shall be evermore;

Now will I smite faster than I did before.

GOOD-DEEDS. Everyman, pilgrim, my special friend,

Blessed be thou without end;
For thee is prepared the eternal glory. 630
Ye have me made whole and sound,
Therefore I will bide by thee in every sound.¹

EVERYMAN. Welcome, my Good-Deeds;
now I hear thy voice,

I weep for very sweetness of love.

KNOWLEDGE. Be no more sad, but ever rejoice, 635

God seeth thy living in his throne above;
Put on this garment to thy behove,
Which is wet with your tears,
Or else before God you may it miss, 639
When you to your journey's end come shall.

EVERYMAN. Gentle Knowledge, what do you it call?

KNOWLEDGE. It is a garment of sorrow:
From pain it will you borrow;
Contrition it is,

That getteth forgiveness; 645
It pleaseth God passing well.

GOOD-DEEDS. Everyman, will you wear
it for your heal?

EVERYMAN. Now blessed be Jesu, Mary's
Son!

For now have I on true contrition.
And let us go now without tarrying; 650

¹Season.

Good-Deeds, have we clear our reckoning?

GOOD-DEEDS. Yea, indeed I have it here.

EVERYMAN. Then I trust we need not fear;

Now, friends, let us not part in twain.

KNOWLEDGE. Nay, Everyman, that will we not, certain. 655

GOOD-DEEDS. Yet must thou lead with thee

Three persons of great might.

EVERYMAN. Who should they be?

GOOD-DEEDS. Discretion and Strength they hight,¹

And thy Beauty may not abide behind. 660

KNOWLEDGE. Also ye must call to mind Your Five-Wits as for your counselors.

GOOD-DEEDS. You must have them ready at all hours.

EVERYMAN. How shall I get them hither?

KNOWLEDGE. You must call them all together, 665

And they will hear you incontinent.

EVERYMAN. My friends, come hither and be present

Discretion, Strength, my Five-Wits, and Beauty.

BEAUTY. Here at your will we be all ready.

What will ye that we should do? 670

GOOD-DEEDS. That ye would with Everyman go,

And help him in his pilgrimage,

Advise you, will ye with him or not in that voyage?

STRENGTH. We will bring him all thither, To his help and comfort, ye may believe me.

DISCRETION. So will we go with him all together. 676

EVERYMAN. Almighty God, loved thou be,

I give thee laud that I have hither brought Strength, Discretion, Beauty, and Five-Wits; lack I nought;

And my Good-Deeds, with Knowledge clear, All be in my company at my will here; 681 I desire no more to my business.

STRENGTH. And I, Strength, will by you stand in distress,

Though thou would in battle fight on the ground.

FIVE-WITS. And though it were through the world round, 685

We will not depart for sweet nor sour.

BEAUTY. No more will I unto death's hour,

Whatsoever thereof befall.

DISCRETION. Everyman, advise you first of all;

Go with a good advisement and deliberation;

We all give you virtuous monition 691

That all shail be well.

EVERYMAN. My friends, hearken what I will tell:

I pray God reward you in his heavenly sphere.

Now hearken, all that be here, 695

For I will make my testament

Here before you all present.

In alms half my good I will give with my hands twain

In the way of charity, with good intent, And the other half still shall remain 700

In quiet to be returned there it ought to be.

This I do in despite of the fiend of hell

To go quite out of his peril

Ever after and this day.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, hearken what I say; 705

Go to priesthood, I you advise,

And receive of him in any wise

The holy sacrament and ointment together;

Then shortly see ye turn again hither;

We will all abide you here. 710

FIVE-WITS. Yea, Everyman, hie you that ye ready were,

There is no emperor, king, duke, nor baron,

That of God hath commission,

As hath the least priest in the world being;

For of the blessed sacraments 'pure and benign, 715

He beareth the keys and thereof hath the cure

For man's redemption, it is ever sure;

Which God for our soul's medicine

Gave us out of his heart with great pine; 719

Here in this transitory life, for thee and me

The blessed sacraments seven there be,

Baptism, confirmation, with priesthood good,

And the sacrament of God's precious flesh and blood,

Marriage, the holy extreme unction, and penance; 724

These seven be good to have in remembrance, Gracious sacraments of high divinity.

¹Are called.

EVERYMAN. Fain would I receive that holy body

And meekly to my gnostly father I will go.

FIVE-WITS. Everyman, that is the best that ye can do:

God will you to salvation bring, 730

For priesthood exceedeth all other thing;

To us Holy Scripture they do teach,

And converteth man from sin heaven to reach;

God hath to them more power given,

Than to any angel that is in heaven; 735

With five words he may consecrate

God's body in flesh and blood to make,

And handleth his maker between his hands;

The priest bindeth and unbindeth all bands,

Both in earth and in heaven; 740

Thou ministers all the sacraments seven;

Though we kissed thy feet thou were worthy;

Thou art surgeon that cureth sin deadly:

No remedy we find under God

But all only priesthood. 745

Everyman, God gave priests that dignity,

And setteth them in his stead among us to be;

Thus be they above angels in degree.

KNOWLEDGE. If priests be good it is so surely;

But when Jesus hanged on the cross with great smart 750

There he gave, out of his blessed heart,

The same sacrament in great torment:

He sold them not to us, that Lord Omnipotent.

Therefore Saint Peter the apostle doth say

That Jesu's curse hath all they 755

Which God their Savior do buy or sell,

Or they for any money do take or tell.

Sinful priests giveth the sinners example bad;

Their children sitteth by other men's fires,

I have heard;

And some haunteth women's company, 760

With unclean life, as lusts of lechery:

These be with sin made blind.

FIVE-WITS. I trust to God no such may we find;

Therefore let us priesthood honor,

And follow their doctrine for our souls'
succor; 765

We be their sheep, and they shepherds be

By whom we all be kept in surety.

Peace, for yonder I see Everyman come,

Which hath made true satisfaction.

GOOD-DEEDS. Methinketh it is he indeed. 770

EVERYMAN. Now Jesu be our alder speed.¹
I have received the sacrament for my redemption,

And then mine extreme unction:

Blessed be all they that counseled me to take
it!

And now, friends, let us go without longer
respite; 775

I thank God that ye have tarried so long.

Now set each of you on this rod your hand,

And shortly follow me:

I go before, there I would be; God be our
guide.

STRENGTH. Everyman, we will not from
you go; 780

Till ye have gone this voyage long.

DISCRETION. I, Discretion, will bide by you also.

KNOWLEDGE. And though this pilgrimage be never so strong,

I will never part you fro:

Everyman, I will be as sure by thee 785

As ever I did by Judas Maccabee.

EVERYMAN. Alas, I am so faint I may not
stand,

My limbs under me do fold;

Friends, let us not turn again to this land,

Not for all the world's gold. 790

For into this cave must I creep

And turn to the earth and there to sleep.

BEAUTY. What, into this grave? alas!

EVERYMAN. Yea, there shall you consume more and less.

BEAUTY. And what should I smother
here? 795

EVERYMAN. Yea, by my faith, and never more appear.

In this world live no more we shall,

But in heaven before the highest Lord of all.

BEAUTY. I cross out all this; adieu by Saint John;

I take my tap in my lap and am gone.² 800

EVERYMAN. What, Beauty, whither will ye?

BEAUTY. Peace, I am deaf; I look not behind me,

Not and thou would give me all the gold in thy chest.

¹Help in all things.

²A proverbial expression used to describe a hasty departure. In the beginning it was used literally of a woman taking her tap—a quantity of flax for spinning—and distaff in her lap or apron, in going to or from a friend's house.

EVERYMAN. Alas, whereto may I trust?
Beauty goeth fast away hie; 805
 She promised with me to live and die.

STRENGTH. Everyman, I will thee also forsake and deny;

Thy game liketh me not at all.

EVERYMAN. Why, then ye will forsake me all.

Sweet Strength, tarry a little space. 810

STRENGTH. Nay, sir, by the rood of grace
 I will hie me from thee fast,

Though thou weep till thy heart brast.¹

EVERYMAN. Ye would ever bide by me, ye said.

STRENGTH. Yea, I have you far enough conveyed; 815

Ye be old enough, I understand,

Your pilgrimage to take on hand;

I repent me that I hither came.

EVERYMAN. Strength, you to displease I am to blame;

Will you break promise that is debt? 820

STRENGTH. In faith, I care not;

Thou art but a fool to complain,

You spend your speech and waste your brain;
 Go thrust thee into the ground.

EVERYMAN. I had wend surer I should you have found. 825

He that trusteth in his Strength

She him deceiveth at the length.

Both Strength and Beauty forsaketh me,

Yet they promised me fair and lovingly.

DISCRETION. Everyman, I will after Strength be gone, 830

As for me I will leave you alone.

EVERYMAN. Why, Discretion, will ye forsake me?

DISCRETION. Yea, in faith, I will go from
 thee,

For when Strength goeth before

I follow after evermore. 835

EVERYMAN. Yet, I pray thee, for the love of the Trinity,

Look in my grave once piteously.

DISCRETION. Nay, so nigh will I not
 come.

Farewell, every one!

EVERYMAN. O all thing faileth, save God
 alone; 840

Beauty, Strength, and Discretion;

For when Death bloweth his blast,

They all run from me full fast.

FIVE-WITS. Everyman, my leave now of thee I take; 844

I will follow the other, for here I thee forsake.

EVERYMAN. Alas! then may I wail and weep,

For I took you for my best friend.

FIVE-WITS. I will no longer thee keep;
 Now farewell, and there an end.

EVERYMAN. O Jesu, help, all hath forsaken me! 850

GOOD-DEEDS. Nay, Everyman, I will
 bide with thee,

I will not forsake thee indeed;

Thou shalt find me a good friend at need.

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, Good-Deeds; now
 may I true friends see;

They have forsaken me every one; 855

I loved them better than my Good-Deeds
 alone.

Knowledge, will ye forsake me also?

KNOWLEDGE. Yea, Everyman, when ye to death do go:

But not yet for no manner of danger.

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, Knowledge, with all my heart. 860

KNOWLEDGE. Nay, yet I will not from hence depart,

Till I see where ye shall be come.

EVERYMAN. Methinketh, alas, that I must be gone,

To make my reckoning and my debts pay,

For I see my time is nigh spent away. 865

Take example, all ye that this do hear or see,

How they that I loved best do forsake me,

Except my Good-Deeds that bideth truly.

GOOD-DEEDS. All earthly things is but vanity:

Beauty, Strength, and Discretion, do man
 forsake, 870

Foolish friends and kinsmen, that fair spake,

All fleeth save Good-Deeds, and that am I.

EVERYMAN. Have mercy on me, God
 most mighty;

And stand by me, thou Mother and Maid, holy Mary.

GOOD-DEEDS. Fear not, I will speak for
 thee. 875

EVERYMAN. Here I cry God mercy.

GOOD-DEEDS. Short our end, and minish
 our pain;

Let us go and never come again.

EVERYMAN. Into thy hands, Lord, my soul I commend;

Receive it, Lord, that it be not lost; 880

¹Burst.

As thou me boughtest, so me defend,
 And save me from the fiend's boast,
 That I may appear with that blessed host
 That shall be saved at the day of doom.
In manus tuas—of might's most 885
 For ever—commendo spiritum meum.

KNOWLEDGE. Now hath he suffered that we all shall endure;
 The Good-Deeds shall make all sure.
 Now hath he made ending;
 Methinketh that I hear angels sing 890
 And make great joy and melody,
 Where Everyman's soul received shall be.

ANGEL. Come, excellent elect spouse to Jesu:

Hereabove thou shalt go
 Because of thy singular virtue: 895
 Now the soul is taken the body fro;
 Thy reckoning is crystal-clear.
 Now shalt thou into the heavenly sphere,
 Unto the which all ye shall come
 That liveth well before the day of doom. 900

DOCTOR. This moral men may have in
 mind;

Ye hearers, take it of worth, old and young,
 And forsake pride, for he deceiveth you in the end,

And remember Beauty, Five-Wits, Strength,
 and Discretion,

They all at the last do Everyman forsake, 905
 Save his Good-Deeds, there doth he take.

But beware, and they be small
 Before God, he hath no help at all.

None excuse may be there for Everyman:

Alas, how shall he do then? 910

For after death amends may no man make,
 For then mercy and pity do him forsake.

If his reckoning be not clear when he do
 come,

God will say—ite maledicti in ignem æter- num.

And he that hath his account whole and
 sound, 915

High in heaven he shall be crowned;
 Unto which place God bring us all thither
 That we may live body and soul together.

Thereto help the Trinity,

Amen, say ye, for saint charity. 920

ACT I

SCENE I

A Room of State in KING LEAR's Palace

Enter KENT, GLOUCESTER, and EDMUND.

KENT. I thought the king had more affected the Duke of Albany than Cornwall.

GLOU. It did always seem so to us; but now, in the division of the kingdom, it appears not which of the dukes he values most;
 for qualities are so weighed that curiosity in neither can make choice of either's moiety.

KENT. Is not this your son, my lord?

GLOU. His breeding, sir, hath been at my charge: I have so often blushed to acknowledge him, that now I am brazed to it. 11

KENT. I cannot conceive you.

GLOU. Sir, this young fellow's mother could; whereupon she grew round-wombed, and had, indeed, sir, a son for her cradle ere she had a husband for her bed. Do you smell a fault?

KENT. I cannot wish the fault undone, the issue of it being so proper. 19

GLOU. But I have a son, sir, by order of law, some year elder than this, who yet is no dearer in my account: though this knave came something saucily into the world before he was sent for, yet was his mother fair; there was good sport at his making, and the whoreson must be acknowledged. Do you know this noble gentleman, Edmund? 28

EDM. No, my lord.

GLOU. My lord of Kent: remember him hereafter as my honourable friend.

EDM. My services to your lordship.

KENT. I must love you, and sue to know you better.

EDM. Sir, I shall study deserving. 35

GLOU. He hath been out nine years, and away he shall again. The king is coming.

Sennet. Enter LEAR, CORNWALL, ALBANY, GONERIL, REGAN, CORDELIA, and Attendants.

LEAR. Attend the lords of France and Burgundy, Gloucester.

GLOU. I shall, my liege. 40

Exeunt GLOUCESTER and EDMUND.

LEAR. Meantime we shall express our darker purpose.

Give me the map there. Know that we have divided

In three our kingdom; and 't is our fast intent

To shake all cares and business from our age, Conferring them on younger strengths, while we 45

Unburden'd crawl toward death. Our son of Cornwall,

And you, our no less loving son of Albany,

We have this hour a constant will to publish

Our daughters' several dowers, that future strife

May be prevented now. The princes,

France and Burgundy, 50

Great rivals in our youngest daughter's love,

Long in our court have made their amorous sojourn,

And here are to be answer'd. Tell me, my daughters,

Since now we will divest us both of rule,

Interest of territory, cares of state, 55

Which of you shall we say doth love us most?

That we our largest bounty may extend

Where nature doth with merit challenge.

Goneril,

Our eldest-born, speak first.

GON. Sir, I love you more than words can wield the matter; 60

Dearer than eye-sight, space, and liberty;

Beyond what can be valued, rich or rare;

No less than life, with grace, health, beauty, honour;

As much as child e'er lov'd, or father found;

A love that makes breath poor and speech 65

unable;

Beyond all manner of so much I love you.

COR. [Aside.] What shall Cordelia speak?

Love, and be silent.

LEAR. Of all these bounds, even from this line to this,

With shadowy forests and with champains rich'd,

With plenteous rivers and wide-skirted meads, 70

We make thee lady: to thine and Albany's issue

Be this perpetual. What says our second daughter,

Our dearest Regan, wife to Cornwall?

Speak.

REG. I am made of that self metal as my sister,

And prize me at her worth. In my true heart

I find she names my very deed of love; 75

Only she comes too short: that I profess

Myself an enemy to all other joys

Which the most precious square of sense possesses,

And find I am alone felicitate

In your dear highness' love. 80

COR. [Aside.] Then poor Cordelia!

And yet not so; since I am sure my love's

More ponderous than my tongue. 85

LEAR. To thee and thine, hereditary ever,

Remain this ample third of our fair kingdom,

No less in space, validity, and pleasure, 90

Than that conferr'd on Goneril. Now, our joy,

Although our last, not least; to whose young love

The vines of France and milk of Burgundy

Strive to be interest'd; what can you say to draw

A third more opulent than your sisters?

Speak. 90

COR. Nothing, my lord.

LEAR. Nothing?

COR. Nothing.

LEAR. Nothing will come of nothing:
speak again.

COR. Unhappy that I am, I cannot heave
My heart into my mouth: I love your majesty 96

According to my bond; no more nor less.

LEAR. How, how, Cordelia! mend your speech a little,

Lest you may mar your fortunes.

COR. Good my lord, 99

You have begot me, bred me, lov'd me: I

Return those duties back as are right fit,

Obeys you, love you, and most honour you.

Why have my sisters husbands, if they say

They love you all? Haply, when I shall wed,

That lord whose hand must take my plight

shall carry 105

Half my love with him, half my care and

duty.

Sure I shall never marry like my sisters,

To love my father all.

LEAR. But goes thy heart with this?

COR. Ay, my good lord.

LEAR. So young, and so untender? 110

COR. So young, my lord, and true.

LEAR. Let it be so; thy truth then be thy dower:

For, by the sacred radiance of the sun,

The mysteries of Hecate and the night,

By all the operation of the orbs 115

From whom we do exist and cease to be,

Here I disclaim all my paternal care,

Propinquity and property of blood,

And as a stranger to my heart and me

Hold thee from this for ever. The barbarous

Scythian, 120

Or he that makes his generation messes

To gorge his appetite, shall to my bosom

Be as well neighbour'd, pitied, and reliev'd,

As thou my sometime daughter.

KENT. Good my liege,—

LEAR. Peace, Kent! 125

Come not between the dragon and his wrath.

I lov'd her most, and thought to set my rest

On her kind nursery. Hence, and avoid my

sight

So be my grave my peace, as here I give

Her father's heart from her! Call France.

Who stirs? 130

Call Burgundy. Cornwall and Albany,

With my two daughters' dowers digest the third;

Let pride, which she calls plainness, marry

her.

I do invest you jointly with my power,
Pre-eminence, and all the large effects 135
That troop with majesty. Ourself, by monthly course,

With reservation of an hundred knights,

By you to be sustain'd, shall our abode

Make with you by due turn. Only we shall retain

The name and all the addition to a king; 140

The sway, revenue, execution of the rest,

Beloved sons, be yours: which to confirm,

This coronet part between you.

KENT. Royal Lear,

Whom I have ever honour'd as my king,

Lov'd as my father, as my master follow'd,

As my great patron thought on in my prayers,— 146

LEAR. The bow is bent and drawn; make from the shaft.

KENT. Let it fall rather, though the fork invade

The region of my heart: be Kent unmanner-
ly,

When Lear is mad. What would'st thou do, old man? 150

Think'st thou that duty shall have dread to
speak

When power to flattery bows? To plain-ness honour's bound

When majesty falls to folly. Reserve thy
state;

And, in thy best consideration, check

This hideous rashness: answer my life my judgment, 155

Thy youngest daughter does not love thee
least;

Nor are those empty-hearted whose low
sound

Reverbs no hollowness.

LEAR. Kent, on thy life, no more.

KENT. My life I never held but as a pawn

To wage against thine enemies; nor fear to lose it, 160

Thy safety being the motive.

LEAR. Out of my sight!

KENT. See better, Lear; and let me still remain

The true blank of thine eye.

LEAR. Now, by Apollo,—

KENT. Now, by Apollo, king,

Thou swear'st thy gods in vain.

LEAR. O, vassal! miscreant!

Laying his hand upon his sword.

ALB., CORN. Dear sir, forbear. 166

KENT. Do;
Kill thy physician, and the fee bestow
Upon the foul disease. Revoke thy gift;
Or, whilst I can vent clamour from my throat, 170
I'll tell thee thou dost evil.

LEAR. Hear me, recreant!
On thine allegiance, hear me!
Since thou hast sought to make us break our vow,

Which we durst never yet, and with strain'd
pride 174

To come betwixt our sentence and our
power,

Which nor our nature nor our place can
bear,

Our potency made good, take thy reward.

Five days we do allot thee for provision

To shield thee from diseases of the world;

And on the sixth to turn thy hated back 180

Upon our kingdom: if on the tenth day following

Thy banish'd trunk be found in our dominions,

The moment is thy death. Away! By Jupiter,

This shall not be revok'd.

KENT. Fare thee well, king; sith thus thou wilt appear, 185

Freedom lives hence, and banishment is
here.

[To CORDELIA.] The gods to their dear shelter take thee, maid,

That justly think'st, and hast most rightly
said!

[To REGAN and GONERIL.] And your large speeches may your deeds approve,

That good effects may spring from words of
love. 190

Thus Kent, O princes! bids you all adieu;
He'll shape his old course in a country new.

Exit.

Flourish. Re-enter GLOUCESTER, with FRANCE, BURGUNDY, and Attendants.

GLOU. Here's France and Burgundy, my noble lord.

LEAR. My Lord of Burgundy,
We first address toward you, who with this
king 195

Hath rivall'd for our daughter. What, in the least,

Will you require in present dower with her,
Or cease your quest of love?

BUR. Most royal majesty,
I crave no more than hath your highness
offer'd, 199

Nor will you tender less.

LEAR. Right noble Burgundy,
When she was dear to us we did hold her so,
But now her price is fall'n. Sir, there she stands:

If aught within that little-seeming substance,
Or all of it, with our displeasure piec'd, 204
And nothing more, may fitly like your grace,
She's there, and she is yours.

BUR. I know no answer.

LEAR. Will you, with those infirmities
she owes,

Unfriended, new-adopted to our hate, Dower'd with our curse, and stranger'd with our oath, 209

Take her, or leave her?

BUR. Pardon me, royal sir;
Election makes not up on such conditions.

LEAR. Then leave her, sir; for, by the power that made me,

I tell you all her wealth. [To FRANCE.] For you, great king,

I would not from your love make such a stray

To match you where I hate; therefore beseech you 215

To avert your liking a more worthier way
Than on a wretch whom nature is asham'd
Almost to acknowledge hers.

FRANCE. This is most strange,
That she, that even but now was your best object,

The argument of your praise, balm of your age, 220

The best, the dearest, should in this trice of
time

Commit a thing so monstrous, to dismantle
So many folds of favour. Sure, her offence
Must be of such unnatural degree

That monsters it, or your fore-vouch'd affection 225

Fall'n into taint; which to believe of her,
Must be a faith that reason without miracle
Should never plant in me.

COR. I yet beseech your majesty,
If for I want that glib and oily art

To speak and purpose not; since what I well intend, 230

I'll do't before I speak, that you make known

It is no vicious blot nor other foulness,
No unchaste action, or dishonour'd step,

That hath depriv'd me of your grace and favour,
But even for want of that for which I am richer, 235
A still-soliciting eye, and such a tongue
That I am glad I have not, though not to have it
Hath lost me in your liking.

LEAR. Better thou Hadst not been born than not to have pleas'd me better.

FRANCE. Is it but this? a tardiness in nature 240

Which often leaves the history unspoke
That it intends to do! My lord of Burgundy,

What say you to the lady? Love's not love
When it is mingled with regards that stand Aloof from the entire point. Will you have her? 245

She is herself a dowry.

BUR. Royal Lear,
Give but that portion which yourself propos'd,

And here I take Cordelia by the hand,
Duchess of Burgundy.

LEAR. Nothing: I have sworn; I am firm.

BUR. I am sorry, then, you have so lost a
father 251

That you must lose a husband.

COR. Peace be with Burgundy!
Since that respects of fortune are his love,
I shall not be his wife.

FRANCE. Fairest Cordelia, that art most rich, being poor; 255
Most choice, forsaken; and most lov'd,
despis'd!

Thee and thy virtues here I seize upon:
Be it lawful I take up what's cast away.
Gods, gods! 't is strange that from their cold'st neglect

My love should kindle to inflam'd respect.
Thy dowerless daughter, king, thrown to my chance, 261

Is queen of us, of ours, and our fair France:
Not all the dukes of waterish Burgundy
Can buy this unpriz'd precious maid of me.
Bid them farewell, Cordelia, though un-
kind:

Thou lovest here, a better where to find. 266

LEAR. Thou hast her, France; let her be thine, for we

Have no such daughter, nor shall ever see
That face of hers again; therefore be gone

Without our grace, our love, our benison.

Come, noble Burgundy. 271

Flourish. Exeunt LEAR, BURGUNDY, CORNWALL, ALBANY, GLOUCESTER, and Attendants.

FRANCE. Bid farewell to your sisters,

COR. The jewels of our father, with wash'd eyes

Cordelia leaves you: I know you what you
are;

And like a sister am most loath to call 275
Your faults as they are nam'd. Use well our father:

To your professed bosoms I commit him:

But yet alas! stood I within his grace,

I would prefer him to a better place.

So farewell to you both. 280

REG. Prescribe not us our duties.

GON. Let your study

Be to content your lord, who hath receiv'd
you

At fortune's alms; you have obedience
scanted,

And well are worth the want that you have wanted.

COR. Time shall unfold what plighted cunning hides; 285

Who cover faults, at last shame them derides.

Well may you prosper!

FRANCE. Come, my fair Cordelia.

Exeunt FRANCE and CORDELIA.

GON. Sister, it is not little I have to say of what most nearly appertains to us both.
I think our father will hence to-night. 290

REG. That's most certain, and with you;
next month with us.

GON. You see how full of changes his age is; the observation we have made of it hath not been little: he always loved our sister most; and with what poor judgment he hath now cast her off appears too grossly. 297

REG. 'T is the infirmity of his age; yet
he hath ever but slenderly known himself.

GON. The best and soundest of his time hath been but rash; then must we look to receive from his age, not alone the imperfec-tions of long-engrafted condition, but therewithal the unruly waywardness that infirm and choleric years bring with them. 305

REG. Such unconstant starts are we like to have from him as this of Kent's banishment.

GON. There is further compliment of leavetaking between France and him. Pray you, let's hit together: if our father carry authority with such disposition as he bears, this last surrender of his will but offend us.

REG. We shall further think on 't. 314

GON. We must do something, and i' the heat. Exeunt.

SCENE II

A Hall in the EARL of GLOUCESTER's Castle.

Enter EDMUND, with a letter.

EDM. Thou, Nature, art my goddess; to thy law

My services are bound. Wherefore should I Stand in the plague of custom, and permit The curiosity of nations to deprive me, For that I am some twelve or fourteen moon-shines Lag of a brother? Why bastard? wherefore base?

When my dimensions are as well compact, My mind as generous, and my shape as true, As honest madam's issue? Why brand they us

With base? with baseness? bastardy? base, base? 10

Who in the lusty stealth of nature take More composition and fierce quality Than doth, within a dull, stale, tired bed, Go to the creating a whole tribe of fops, 14 Got 'tween asleep and wake? Well then, Legitimate Edgar, I must have your land: Our father's love is to the bastard Edmund As to the legitimate. Fine word, 'legitimate'!

Well, my legitimate, if this letter speed, 19 And my invention thrive, Edmund the base Shall top the legitimate. I grow, I prosper; Now, gods, stand up for bastards!

Enter GLOUCESTER.

GLOU. Kent banish'd thus! And France in choler parted!

And the king gone to-night! subscrib'd his power!

Confin'd to exhibition! All this done 25 Upon the gad! Edmund, how now! what news?

EDM. So please your lordship, none.

Putting up the letter.

GLOU. Why so earnestly seek you to put up that letter?

EDM. I know no news, my lord.

GLOU. What paper were you reading? 30

EDM. Nothing, my lord.

GLOU. No? What needed then that terrible dispatch of it into your pocket? the quality of nothing hath not such need to hide itself. Let's see: come; if it be nothing, I shall not need spectacles. 36

EDM. I beseech you sir, pardon me; it is a letter from my brother that I have not all o'erread, and for so much as I have perused, I find it not fit for your o'erlooking. 40

GLOU. Give me the letter, sir.

EDM. I shall offend, either to detain or give it. The contents, as in part I understand them, are to blame.

GLOU. Let's see, let's see. 45

EDM. I hope, for my brother's justification, he wrote this but as an essay or taste of my virtue. 48

GLOU. [Reads.]

This policy and reverence of age makes the world bitter to the best of our times; keeps our fortunes from us till our oldness cannot relish them. I begin to find an idle and fond bondage in the oppression of aged tyranny, who sways, not as it hath power, but as it is suffered. Come to me, that of this I may speak more. If our father would sleep till I wake him, you should enjoy half his revenue for ever, and live the beloved of your brother, EDGAR. 58

Hum! Conspiracy! 'Sleep till I wake him, —you should enjoy half his revenue.' My son Edgar! Had he a hand to write this? a heart and brain to breed it in? When came this to you? Who brought it? 63

EDM. It was not brought me, my lord; there's the cunning of it; I found it thrown in at the casement of my closet.

GLOU. You know the character to be your brother's?

EDM. If the matter were good, my lord, I durst swear it were his; but, in respect of that, I would fain think it were not. 71

GLOU. It is his.

EDM. It is his hand, my lord; but I hope his heart is not in the contents.

GLOU. Has he never before sounded you in this business? 75

EDM. Never my lord: but I have often heard him maintain it to be fit that, sons at perfect age, and fathers declined, the father should be as ward to the son, and the son manage his revenue. 80

GLOU. O villain, villain! His very opinion in the letter! Abhorred villain! Unnatural, detested, brutish villain! worse than brutish! Go, sirrah, seek him; I'll apprehend him. Abominable villain! Where is he? 86

EDM. I do not well know, my lord. If it shall please you to suspend your indignation against my brother till you can derive from him better testimony of his intent, you should run a certain course; where, if you violently proceed against him, mistaking his purpose, it would make a great gap in your own honour, and shake in pieces the heart of his obedience. I dare pawn down my life for him, that he hath writ this to feel my affection to your honour, and to no other pretence of danger. 98

GLOU. Think you so?

EDM. If your honour judge it meet, I will place you where you shall hear us confer of this, and by an auricular assurance have your satisfaction; and that without any further delay than this very evening. 104

GLOU. He cannot be such a monster—

EDM. Nor is not, sure.

GLOU. —to his father, that so tenderly and entirely loves him. Heaven and earth! Edmund, seek him out; wind me into him, I pray you: frame the business after your own wisdom. I would unstate myself to be in a due resolution. 111

EDM. I will seek him, sir, presently; convey the business as I shall find means, and acquaint you withal. 114

GLOU. These late eclipses in the sun and moon portend no good to us; though the wisdom of nature can reason it thus and thus, yet nature finds itself scourged by the sequent effects. Love cools, friendship falls off, brothers divide: in cities, mutinies; in countries, discord; in palaces, treason; and the bond cracked 'twixt son and father. This villain of mine comes under the prediction; there's son against father: the king falls from bias of nature; there's father against child. We have seen the best of our time: machinations, hollowness, treachery, and all ruinous disorders, follow us disquietly to our graves. Find out this villain, Edmund; it shall lose thee nothing: do it carefully. And the noble and true-hearted

Kent banished! his offence, honesty! 'T is strange. Exit. 133

EDM. This is the excellent foppery of the world, that, when we are sick in fortune, often the surfeit of our own behaviour, we make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and the stars; as if we were villains on necessity, fools by heavenly compulsion, knaves, thieves and treachers by spherical predominance, drunkards, liars and adulterers by an enforced obedience of planetary influence; and all that we are evil in, by a divine thrusting on: an admirable evasion of whoremaster man, to lay his goatish disposition to the charge of a star! My father compounded with my mother under the dragon's tail, and my nativity was under ursa major; so that it follows I am rough and lecherous. Tut! I should have been that I am had the maidenliest star in the firmament twinkled on my bastardizing. 153

Enter EDGAR.

and pat he comes, like the catastrophe of the old comedy: my clue is villanous melancholy, with a sigh like Tom o' Bedlam. O! these eclipses do portend these divisions. Fa, sol, la, mi. 158

EDG. How now, brother Edmund! What serious contemplation are you in?

EDM. I am thinking, brother, of a prediction I read this other day, what should follow these eclipses. 163

EDG. Do you busy yourself with that?

EDM. I promise you the effects he writes of succeed unhappily; as of unnaturalness between the child and the parent; death, dearth, dissolutions of ancient amities; divisions in state; menaces and maledictions against king and nobles; needless diffidences, banishment of friends, dissipation of cohorts, nuptial breaches, and I know not what. 172

EDG. How long have you been a sectary astronomical?

EDM. Come, come; when saw you my father last?

EDG. The night gone by. 177

EDM. Spake you with him?

EDG. Ay, two hours together.

EDM. Parted you in good terms? Found you no displeasure in him by word nor countenance? 182

EDG. None at all.

EDM. Bethink yourself wherein you may have offended him; and at my entreaty forbear his presence until some little time hath qualified the heat of his displeasure, which at this instant so rageth in him that with the mischief of your person it would scarcely allay. 190

EDG. Some villain hath done me wrong.

EDM. That's my fear. I pray you have a continent forbearance till the speed of his rage goes slower, and as I say, retire with me to my lodging, from whence I will fitly bring you to hear my lord speak. Pray you, go; there's my key. If you do stir abroad, go armed. 198

EDG. Armed, brother!

EDM. Brother, I advise you to the best, go armed; I am no honest man if there be any good meaning towards you; I have told you what I have seen and heard; but faintly, nothing like the image and horror of it; pray you, away. 205

EDG. Shall I hear from you anon?

EDM. I do serve you in this business.

Exit EDGAR.

A credulous father, and a brother noble,
Whose nature is so far from doing harms
That he suspects none; on whose foolish honesty 210

My practices ride easy! I see the business.
Let me, if not by birth, have lands by wit:
All with me's meet that I can fashion fit.

Exit.

SCENE III

A Room in the DUKE OF ALBANY'S Palace.

Enter GONERIL and OSWALD, her Steward.

GON. Did my father strike my gentleman for chiding of his fool?

OSW. Ay, madam.

GON. By day and night he wrongs me; every hour

He flashes into one gross crime or other,
That sets us all at odds: I'll not endure it: 5
His knights grow riotous, and himself up-braids us

On every trifle. When he returns from hunting

I will not speak with him; say I am sick:

If you come slack of former services,

You shall do well; the fault of it I'll answer. 10

OSW. He's coming, madam; I hear him.

Horns within.

GON. Put on what weary negligence you please.

You and your fellows; I'd have it come to question:

If he distaste it, let him to my sister,
Whose mind and mine, I know, in that are
one, 15

Not to be over-rul'd. Idle old man,
That still would manage those authorities
That he hath given away! Now, by my life,
Old fools are babes again, and must be us'd
With checks as flatteries, when they are seen abus'd. 20

Remember what I have said.

OSW. Well, madam.

GON. And let his knights have colder looks among you;

What grows of it, no matter; advise your fellows so:

I would breed from hence occasions, and I shall,

That I may speak: I'll write straight to my sister 25

To hold my very course. Prepare for dinner.

Exeunt.

SCENE IV

A Hall in the Same.

Enter KENT, disguised.

KENT. If but as well I other accents borrow,

That can my speech diffuse, my good intent
May carry through itself to that full issue
For which I raz'd my likeness. Now, banish'd Kent,

If thou canst serve where thou dost stand condemn'd, 5

So may it come, thy master, whom thou
lov'st,

Shall find thee full of labours.

Horns within. Enter LEAR, Knights, and Attendants.

LEAR. Let me not stay a jot for dinner:
go, get it ready. Exit an Attendant.
How now! what art thou? 10

KENT. A man, sir.

LEAR. What dost thou profess? What would'st thou with us?

KENT. I do profess to be no less than I seem; to serve him truly that will put me in trust; to love him that is honest; to converse with him that is wise, and says little; to fear judgment; to fight when I cannot choose;

and to eat no fish. 19

LEAR. What art thou?

KENT. A very honest-hearted fellow, and as poor as the king.

LEAR. If thou be as poor for a subject as he is for a king, thou art poor enough.
What would'st thou? 25

KENT. Service.

LEAR. Whom would'st thou serve?

KENT. You.

LEAR. Dost thou know me, fellow? 29

KENT. No sir; but you have that in your countenance which I would fain call master.

LEAR. What's that?

KENT. Authority.

LEAR. What services canst thou do? 34

KENT. I can keep honest counsel, ride, run, mar a curious tale in telling it, and deliver a plain message bluntly; that which ordinary men are fit for, I am qualified in, and the best of me is diligence. 39

LEAR. How old art thou?

KENT. Not so young, sir, to love a woman for singing, nor so old to dote on her for any thing; I have years on my back forty-eight. 44

LEAR. Follow me; thou shalt serve me:
if I like thee no worse after dinner I will not part from thee yet. Dinner, ho! Where's my knave? my fool? Go you and call my fool hither. Exit an Attendant.

Enter OSWALD.

You, you, sirrah, where's my daughter? 50

OSW. So please you,— Exit.

LEAR. What says the fellow there? Call the clotpoll back. Exit a Knight.

Where's my fool, ho? I think the world's asleep. 55

Re-enter Knight.

How now! where's that mongrel?

KNIGHT. He says, my lord, your daughter is not well.

LEAR. Why came not the slave back to me when I called him? 60

KNIGHT. Sir, he answered me in the roundest manner, he would not.

LEAR. He would not!

KNIGHT. My lord, I know not what the matter is; but, to my judgment, your highness is not entertained with that ceremonious affection as you were wont; there's a great abatement of kindness appears as well in the general dependants as in the duke himself also and your daughter. 70

LEAR. Ha! sayest thou so?

KNIGHT. I beseech you, pardon me, my lord, if I be mistaken; for my duty cannot be silent when I think your highness
wronged. 75

LEAR. Thou but rememberest me of mine own conception: I have perceived a most faint neglect of late; which I have rather blamed as mine own jealous curiosity than as a very pretence and purpose of unkindness: I will look further into 't. But where's my fool? I have not seen him this two days. 83

KNIGHT. Since my young lady's going into France, sir, the fool hath much pined
away.

LEAR. No more of that; I have noted it well. Go you and tell my daughter I would speak with her. Exit an Attendant.

Go you, call hither my fool. 90

Exit an Attendant.

Re-enter OSWALD.

O! you sir, you, come you hither, sir. Who am I, sir?

OSW. My lady's father.

LEAR. 'My lady's father!' my lord's knave: you whoreson 'dog! you slave! you cur! 96

OSW. I am none of these, my lord; I beseech your pardon.

LEAR. Do you bandy looks with me, you rascal? Striking him.

OSW. I'll not be struck, my lord. 101

KENT. Nor tripped neither, you base football player. Tripping up his heels.

LEAR. I thank thee, fellow; thou servest me, and I'll love thee. 105

KENT. Come, sir, arise, away! I'll teach you differences: away, away! If you will measure your lubber's length again, tarry;
but away! Go to; have you wisdom? so.

Pushes OSWALD out.

LEAR. Now, my friendly knave, I thank thee; there's earnest of thy service. 111

Gives KENT money.

Enter FOOL.

FOOL. Let me hire him too: here's my coxcomb. Offers KENT his cap

LEAR. How now, my pretty knave! how dost thou? 115

FOOL. Sirrah, you were best take my coxcomb.

KENT. Why, fool?

FOOL. Why? for taking one's part that's out of favour. Nay, an thou canst not smile as the wind sits, thou'lt catch cold shortly: there, take my coxcomb. Why, this fellow has banished two on's daughters, and did the third a blessing against his will: if thou follow him thou must needs wear my coxcomb. How now, nuncle! Would I had two coxcombs and two daughters! 127

LEAR. Why, my boy?

FOOL. If I gave them all my living, I'd keep my coxcombs myself. There's mine; beg another of thy daughters.

LEAR. Take heed, sirrah; the whip. 132

FOOL. Truth's a dog must to kennel; he must be whipped out when Lady the brach may stand by the fire and stink.

LEAR. A pestilent gall to me! 136

FOOL. Sirrah, I'll teach thee a speech.

LEAR. Do.

FOOL. Mark it, nuncle:

Have more than thou showest, 140
Speak less than thou knowest,
Lend less than thou owest,
Ride more than thou goest,
Learn more than thou trowest,
Set less than thou throwest; 145
Leave thy drink and thy whore,
And keep in-a-door,
And thou shalt have more
Than two tens to a score.

KENT. This is nothing, fool. 150

FOOL. Then 't is like the breath of an unfee'd lawyer; you gave me nothing for 't. Can you make no use of nothing, nuncle?

LEAR. Why, no, boy; nothing can be made out of nothing. 155

FOOL. [To KENT.] Prithee, tell him, so much the rent of his land comes to: he will not believe a fool.

LEAR. A bitter fool! 159

FOOL. Dost thou know the difference, my boy, between a bitter fool and a sweet fool?

LEAR. No, lad; teach me.

FOOL.

That lord that counsel'd thee
To give away thy land,
Come place him here by me, 165
Do thou for him stand:

The sweet and bitter fool
Will presently appear;
The one in motley here
The other found out there 170

LEAR. Dost thou call me fool, boy?

FOOL. All thy other titles thou hast given away; that thou wast born with.

KENT. This is not altogether fool, my lord. 175

FOOL. No, faith, lords and great men will not let me; if I had a monopoly out, they would have part on't: and ladies too, they will not let me have all fool to myself; they'll be snatching. Nuncle, give me an egg, and I'll give thee two crowns. 181

LEAR. What two crowns shall they be?

FOOL. Why, after I have cut the egg i' the middle and eat up the meat, the two crowns of the egg. When thou clovest thy crown i' the middle, and gavest away both parts, thou borest thine ass on thy back o'er the dirt: thou hadst little wit in thy bald crown when thou gavest thy golden one away. If I speak like myself in this, let him be whipped that first finds it so. 191

Fools had ne'er less grace in a year;

For wise men are grown foppish,

And know not how their wits to wear,

Their manners are so apish. 195

LEAR. When were you wont to be so full of songs, sirrah?

FOOL. I have used it, nuncle, ever since thou madest thy daughters thy mothers; for when thou gavest them the rod and puttest down thine own breeches, 201

Then they for sudden joy did weep,

And I for sorrow sung,

That such a king should play bo-peep,

And go the fools among. 205

Prithee, nuncle, keep a schoolmaster that can teach thy fool to lie: I would fain learn to lie.

LEAR. An you lie, sirrah, we'll have you whipped. 210

FOOL. I marvel what kin thou and thy daughters are: they'll have me whipped for speaking true, thou'll have me whipped for lying; and sometimes I am whipped for holding my peace. I had rather be any kind o' thing than a fool; and yet I would not be thee, nuncle; thou hast pared thy wit o' both sides, and left nothing i' the middle: here comes one o' the parings. 219

Enter GONERIL.

LEAR. How now, daughter! what makes that frontlet on? Methinks you are too much of late i' the frown.

FOOL. Thou wast a pretty fellow when thou hadst no need to care for her frowning; now thou art an O without a figure. I am better than thou art; I am a fool, thou art nothing. [To GONERIL.] Yes, forsooth, I will hold my tongue; so your face bids me, though you say nothing. 229

Mum, mum:
He that keeps nor crust nor crum,
Weary of all, shall want some.

That's a shealed peascod. [Pointing to LEAR.]

GON. Not only, sir, this your all-licens'd fool,

But other of your insolent retinue 235
Do hourly carp and quarrel, breaking forth
In rank and not-to-be-endured riots. Sir,
I had thought, by making this well known unto you,

To have found a safe redress; but now grow fearful,

By what yourself too late have spoke and done, 240

That you protect this course, and put it on
By your allowance; which if you should, the fault

Would not 'scape censure, nor the redresses sleep, 243

Which, in the tender of a wholesome weal,
Might in their working do you that offence,
Which else were shame, that then necessity
Will call discreet proceeding.

FOOL. For you know, nuncle,
The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo so long,
That it had it head bit off by it young. 250
So out went the candle, and we were left darkling.

LEAR. Are you our daughter?

GON. Come, sir,

I would you would make use of your good wisdom,

Whereof I know you are fraught; and put away 255

These dispositions which of late transport you

From what you rightly are.

FOOL. May not an ass know when the cart draws the horse? Whoop, Jug! I love thee. 260

LEAR. Doth any here know me? This is not Lear:

Does Lear walk thus? speak thus? Where are his eyes?

Either his notion weakens, his discernings
Are lethargied. Ha! waking? 't is not so.

Who is it that can tell me who I am? 265

FOOL. Lear's shadow.

LEAR. I would learn that; for by the marks of sovereignty, knowledge, and reason, I should be false persuaded I had daughters. 270

FOOL. Which they will make an obedient father.

LEAR. Your name, fair gentlewoman?

GON. This admiration, sir, is much o' the savour

Of other your new pranks. I do beseech you 275

To understand my purposes aright:

As you are old and reverend, you should be wise.

Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires;

Men so disorder'd, so debosh'd, and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners, 280

Shows like a riotous inn: epicurism and lust
Make it more like a tavern or a brothel

Than a grac'd palace. The shame itself doth speak

For instant remedy; be then desir'd 284

By her, that else will take the thing she begs,
A little to disquantity your train;
And the remainder, that shall still depend,
To be such men as may besort your age,
Which know themselves and you.

LEAR. Darkness and devils!
Saddle my horses; call my train together. 290
Degenerate bastard! I'll not trouble thee:
Yet have I left a daughter.

GON. You strike my people, and your disorder'd rabble

Make servants of their betters.

Enter ALBANY.

LEAR. Woe, that too late repents; O! sir, are you come? 295

Is it your will? Speak, sir. Prepare my horses.

Ingratitude, thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st thee in a child,

Than the sea-monster.

ALB. Pray, sir, be patient.
 LEAR. [To GONERIL.] Detested kite!
 thou liest: 300
 My train are men of choice and rarest parts,
 That all particulars of duty know,
 And in the most exact regard support
 The worship of their name. O most small fault,
 How ugly didst thou in Cordelia show! 305
 Which, like an engine, wrench'd my frame of nature
 From the fix'd place, drew from my heart all
 love,
 And added to the gall. O Lear, Lear, Lear!
 Beat at this gate, that let thy folly in,
 Striking his head.
 And thy dear judgment out! Go, go, my people. 310
 ALB. My lord, I am guiltless, as I am ignorant
 Of what hath mov'd you.
 LEAR. It may be so, my lord.
 Hear, Nature, hear! dear goddess, hear!
 Suspend thy purpose, if thou didst intend
 To make this creature fruitful! 315
 Into her womb convey sterility!
 Dry up in her the organs of increase,
 And from her derogate body never spring
 A babe to honour her! If she must teem,
 Create her child of spleen, that it may live
 And be a thwart disnatur'd torment to her!
 Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth,
 With cadent tears fret channels in her
 cheeks, 323
 Turn all her mother's pains and benefits
 To laughter and contempt, that she may feel How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child! Away, away!

Exit.

ALB. Now, gods that we adore, whereof comes this?
 GON. Never afflict yourself to know the
 cause;
 But let his disposition have that scope 330
 That dotage gives it.

Re-enter LEAR.

LEAR. What! fifty of my followers at a clap;
 Within a fortnight!
 ALB. What's the matter, sir?
 LEAR. I'll tell thee. [To GONERIL.] Life and death! I am asham'd

That thou hast power to shake my manhood
 thus, 335
 That these hot tears, which break from me
 perforce,
 Should make thee worth them. Blasts and fogs upon thee!
 The untented woundings of a father's curse Pierce every sense about thee! Old fond
 eyes, 339
 Beweep this cause again, I'll pluck ye out,
 And cast you, with the waters that you lose,
 To temper clay. Ha! is it come to this?
 Let it be so: I have another daughter,
 Who, I am sure, is kind and comfortable:
 When she shall hear this of thee, with her nails 345
 She'll flay thy wolvisk visage. Thou shalt
 find
 That I'll resume the shape which thou dost think
 I have cast off for ever; thou shalt, I warrant
 thee.

Exeunt LEAR, KENT, and Attendants.

GON. Do you mark that, my lord?

ALB. I cannot be so partial, Goneril, 350
 To the great love I bear you,—

GON. Pray you, content. What, Oswald, ho!

[To the FOOL.] You sir, more knave than fool, after your master.

FOOL. Nuncle Lear, nuncle Lear! tarry, and take the fool with thee. 355

A fox, when one has caught her,
 And such a daughter,
 Should sure to the slaughter,
 If my cap would buy a halter;
 So the fool follows after. 360

Exit.

GON. This man hath had good counsel.

A hundred knights!

'T is politic and safe to let him keep
 At point a hundred knights; yes, that on every dream,
 Each buzz, each fancy, each complaint, dislike, 365
 He may enguard his dotage with their
 powers,

And hold our lives in mercy. Oswald, I say!

ALB. Well, you may fear too far.

GON. Safer than trust too far.

Let me still take away the harms I fear, 369
 Not fear still to be taken: I know his heart.
 What he hath utter'd I have writ my sister;

If she sustain him and his hundred knights,
When I have show'd the unfitness,—

Re-enter OSWALD.

How now, Oswald!

What! have you writ that letter to my sister?

OSW. Ay, madam. 376

GON. Take you some company, and away to horse:

Inform her full of my particular fear;
And thereto add such reasons of your own
As may compact it more. Get you gone, 380
And hasten your return. Exit OSWALD.

No, no, my lord,

This milky gentleness and course of yours
Though I condemn not, yet, under pardon,
You are much more attask'd for want of wisdom

Than prais'd for harmful mildness. 385

ALB. How far your eyes may pierce I cannot tell:

Striving to better, oft we mar what's well.

GON. Nay, then—

ALB. Well, well; the event: Exeunt.

SCENE V

Court before the Same.

Enter LEAR, KENT, and Fool.

LEAR. Go you before to Gloucester with these letters. Acquaint my daughter no further with any thing you know than comes from her demand out of the letter. If your diligence be not speedy I shall be there before you. 6

KENT. I will not sleep my lord, till I have delivered your letter. Exit.

FOOL. If a man's brains were in's heels, were't not in danger of kibes? 10

LEAR. Ay, boy.

FOOL. Then, I prithee, be merry; thy wit shall ne'er go slip-shod.

LEAR. Ha, ha, ha! 14

FOOL. Shalt see thy other daughter will use thee kindly; for though she's as like this as a crab's like an apple, yet I can tell what I can tell.

LEAR. What canst tell, boy? 19

FOOL. She will taste as like this as a crab does to a crab. Thou canst tell why one's nose stands i' the middle on's face?

LEAR. No.

FOOL. Why, to keep one's eyes of either side's nose, that what a man cannot smell out, he may spy into. 26

LEAR. I did her wrong,—

FOOL. Canst tell how an oyster makes his shell?

LEAR. No. 30

FOOL. Nor I neither? but I can tell why a snail has a house.

LEAR. Why?

FOOL. Why, to put's head in; not to give it away to his daughters, and leave his horns without a case. 36

LEAR. I will forget my nature. So kind a father! Be my horses ready?

FOOL. Thy asses are gone about 'em.
The reason why the seven stars are no more than seven is a pretty reason. 41

LEAR. Because they are not eight?

FOOL. Yes, indeed: thou would'st make a good fool.

LEAR. To take 't again perforce! Monster ingratitude! 46

FOOL. If thou wert my fool, nuncle, I'd have thee beaten for being old before thy
time.

LEAR. How's that? 50

FOOL. Thou should'st not have been old till thou hadst been wise.

LEAR. O! let me not be mad, not mad,
sweet heaven;

Keep me in temper; I would not be mad!

Enter Gentleman.

How, now! Are the horses ready? 55

GENT. Ready, my lord.

LEAR. Come, boy.

FOOL. She that's a maid now, and laughs
at my departure,
Shall not be a maid long, unless things be cut shorter. Exeunt.

ACT II

SCENE I

A Court within the Castle of the EARL OF GLOUCESTER.

Enter EDMUND and CURAN, meeting.

EDM. Save thee, Curan.

CUR. And you, sir. I have been with your father, and given him notice that the Duke of Cornwall and Regan his duchess will be here with him this night. 5

EDM. How comes that?

CUR. Nay, I know not. You have heard of the news abroad? I mean the whispered ones, for they are yet but ear-kissing arguments. 10

EDM. Not I: pray you, what are they?

CUR. Have you heard of no likely wars toward, 'twixt the Dukes of Cornwall and Albany?

EDM. Not a word. 15

CUR. You may do then, in time. Fare you well, sir. Exit.

EDM. The duke be here to-night! The better! best!

This weaves itself perforce into my business. My father hath set guard to take my brother; And I have one thing, of a queasy question, Which I must act. Briefness and fortune, work! 22

Brother, a word; descend: brother, I say!

Enter EDGAR.

My father watches: O sir! fly this place; Intelligence is given where you are hid; You have now the good advantage of the night. 26

Have you not spoken 'gainst the Duke of Cornwall?

He's coming hither, now, i' the night, i' the haste,

And Regan with him; have you nothing said Upon his party 'gainst the Duke of Albany? Advise yourself.

EDG. I am sure on 't, not a word. 31

EDM. I hear my father coming; pardon me;

In cunning I must draw my sword upon you; Draw; seem to defend yourself; now quit you well.

Yield; come before my father. Light, ho! here! 35

Fly, brother. Torches! torches! So, farewell. Exit EDGAR.

Some blood drawn on me would beget opinion Wounds his arm.

Of my more fierce endeavour: I have seen drunkards

Do more than this in sport. Father! father! Stop, stop! No help?

Enter GLOUCESTER, and Servants with torches.

GLOU. Now, Edmund, where 's the villain? 40

EDM. Here stood he in the dark, his sharp sword out, Mumbling of wicked charms, conjuring the moon

To stand auspicious mistress.

GLOU. But where is he?

EDM. Look, sir, I bleed.

GLOU. Where is the villain, Edmund?

EDM. Fled this way, sir. When by no means he could— 45

GLOU. Pursue him, ho! Go after. Exit Servant.

By no means what?

EDM. Persuade me to the murder of your lordship;

But that I told him, the revenging gods 'Gainst parricides did all the thunder bend; Spoke with how manifold and strong a bond The child was bound to the father; sir, in fine, 51

Seeing how loathly opposite I stood To his unnatural purpose, in fell motion, With his prepared sword he charges home My unprovided body, lanc'd mine arm: 55 But when he saw my best alarm'd spirits Bold in the quarrel's right, rous'd to the encounter,

Or whether gasted by the noise I made, Full suddenly he fled.

GLOU. Let him fly far:

Not in this land shall he remain uncaught; And found—dispatch. The noble duke my master, 61

My worthy arch and patron, comes to-night:

By his authority I will proclaim it, That he which finds him shall deserve our thanks,

Bringing the murderous coward to the stake; He that conceals him, death. 66

EDM. When I dissuaded him from his intent,

And found him pight to do it, with cursèd speech

I threaten'd to discover him: he replied, 'Thou unpossessing bastard! dost thou think, If I would stand against thee, would the re-posal 71

Of any trust, virtue, or worth in thee Make thy words faith'd? No: what I should deny,

As this I would, ay, though thou didst produce

My very character. I'd turn it all 75

To thy suggestion, plot, and damned practice:

And thou must make a dullard of the world,
If they not thought the profits of my death
Were very pregnant and potential spurs 79
To make thee seek it.'

GLOU. Strong and fasten'd villain!
Would he deny his letter? I never got him.

Tucket within.

Hark! the duke's trumpets. I know not why he comes.

All ports I'll bar; the villain shall not 'scape;
The duke must grant me that: besides, his picture 84

I will send far and near, that all the kingdom
May have due note of him; and of my land,
Loyal and natural boy, I'll work the means
To make thee capable.

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, and Attendants.

CORN. How now, my noble friend! since
I came hither,
Which I can call but now, I have heard strange news. 90

REG. If it be true, all vengeance comes too short

Which can pursue the offender. How dost, my lord?

GLOU. O! madam, my old heart is crack'd,
—is crack'd.

REG. What! did my father's godson seek your life!

He whom my father nam'd? your Edgar? 95

GLOU. O! lady, lady, shame would have it hid.

REG. Was he not companion with the riotous knights

That tend upon my father?

GLOU. I know not, madam; 't is too bad, too bad.

EDM. Yes, madam, he was of that consort. 100

REG. No marvel then though he were ill affected;

'T is they have put him on the old man's
death,

To have the expense and waste of his revenues.

I have this present evening from my sister Been well inform'd of them, and with such cautions 105

That if they come to sojourn at my house,
I'll not be there.

CORN.

Nor I, assure thee, Regan.
Edmund, I hear that you have shown your
father

A child-like office.

EDM.

'T was my duty, sir.

GLOU. He did bewray his practice; and receiv'd 110

This hurt you see, striving to apprehend him.

CORN. Is he pursued?

GLOU.

Ay, my good lord.

CORN. If he be taken he shall never more
Be fear'd of doing harm; make your own purpose,

How in my strength you please. For you,
Edmund, 115

Whose virtue and obedience doth this instant

So much commend itself, you shall be ours:
Natures of such deep trust we shall much
need;

You we first seize on.

EDM.

I shall serve you, sir,

Truly, however else.

GLOU.

For him I thank your grace.

CORN. You know not why we came to visit you,— 121

REG. Thus out of season, threading dark-eyed night:

Occasions, noble Gloucester, of some poise,
Wherein we must have use of your advice.
Our father he hath writ, so hath our sister.

Of differences, which I best thought it fit
To answer from our home; the several messengers 127

From hence attend dispatch. Our good old friend,

Lay comforts to your bosom, and bestow

Your needful counsel to our businesses, 130
Which crave the instant use.

GLOU.

I serve you, madam.

Your graces are right welcome. Exeunt.

SCENE II

Before GLOUCESTER'S Castle.

Enter KENT and OSWALD, severally.

Osw. Good dawning to thee, friend: art of this house?

KENT. Ay.

Osw. Where may we set our horses?

KENT. I' the mire. 5

Osw. Prithee, if thou lovest me, tell me.

KENT. I love thee not.

OSW. Why, then I care not for thee.

KENT. If I had thee in Lipsbury pinfold,
I would make thee care for me. 10

OSW. Why dost thou use me thus? I know thee not.

KENT. Fellow, I know thee.

OSW. What dost thou know me for? 14

KENT. A knave, a rascal, an eater of broken meats; a base, proud, shallow, beg-garly, three-suited, hundred-pound, filthy, worsted-stocking knave; a lily-livered, action-taking knave; a whoreson, glass-gazing, super-serviceable, finical rogue; one-trunk-inheriting slave; one that would'st be a bawd, in way of good service, and art nothing but the composition of a knave, beggar, coward, pandar, and the son and heir of a mongrel bitch: one whom I will beat into clamorous whining if thou deniest
the least syllable of thy addition. 27

OSW. Why, what a monstrous fellow art thou, thus to rail on one that is neither known of thee nor knows thee!

KENT. What a brazen-faced varlet art thou, to deny thou knowest me! Is it two days since I tripped up thy heels and beat thee before the king? Draw, you rogue;
for though it be night, yet the moon shines;
I'll make a sop l' the moonshine of you. 36

Drawing his sword.

Draw, you whoreson cullionly barber-monger, draw.

OSW. Away! I have nothing to do with
thee. 40

KENT. Draw, you rascal; you come with letters against the king, and take Vanity the puppet's part against the royalty of her father. Draw, you rogue, or I'll so carbonado your shanks: draw, you rascal; come your ways. 45

OSW. Help, ho! murder! help!

KENT. Strike, you slave; stand, rogue, stand, you neat slave, strike. Beats him.

OSW. Help, ho! murder! murder!

Enter EDMUND, with his rapier drawn.

EDM. How now! What's the matter? 50
Parting them.

KENT. With you, goodman boy, an you please: come, I'll flesh ye; come on, young master.

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GLOUCESTER, and Servants.

GLOU. Weapons! arms! What's the matter here? 55

CORN. Keep peace, upon your lives:
He dies that strikes again. What is the matter?

REG. The messengers from our sister and the king. 60

CORN. What is your difference? speak.

OSW. I am scarce in breath, my lord.

KENT. No marvel, you have so bestirred your valour. You cowardly rascal, nature disclaims in thee: a tailor made thee. 65

CORN. Thou art a strange fellow; a tailor make a man?

KENT. Ay, a tailor, sir: a stone-cutter or a painter could not have made him so ill, though they had been but two hours o' the trade. 71

CORN. Speak yet, how grew your quarrel?

OSW. This ancient ruffian, sir, whose life
I have spared at suit of his grey beard,— 75

KENT. Thou whoreson zed! thou unnecessary letter! My lord, if you will give me leave, I will tread this unbolted villain into mortar, and daub the wall of a jakes with him. Spare my grey beard, you wagtail? 80

CORN. Peace, sirrah!
You beastly knave, know you no reverence?

KENT. Yes, sir; but anger hath a privilege.

CORN. Why art thou angry?

KENT. That such a slave as this should wear a sword,

Who wears no honesty. Such smiling rogues as these, 85

Like rats, oft bite the holy cords a-twain
Which are too intrinse t' unloose; smooth every passion

That in the natures of their lords rebel; 88
Being oil to fire, snow to their colder moods;

Renege, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks
With every gale and vary of their masters,
Knowing nought, like dogs, but following.

A plague upon your epileptic visage!
Smile you my speeches, as I were a fool?
Goose, if I had you upon Sarum plain, 95
I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot.

CORN. What! art thou mad, old fellow?

GLOU. How fell you out? say that.

KENT. No contraries hold more antipathy

Than I and such a knave. 100

CORN. Why dost thou call him knave?
What is his fault?

KENT. His countenance likes me not.

CORN. No more, perchance, does mine nor his, nor hers.

KENT. Sir, 't is my occupation to be
plain: 105

I have seen better faces in my time
Than stands on any shoulder that I see
Before me at this instant.

CORN. This is some fellow,
Who, having been prais'd for bluntness, doth affect 109

A saucy roughness, and constrains the garb
Quite from his nature: he cannot flatter,
he,
An honest mind and plain, he must speak
truth:
An they will take it, so; if not, he's plain.
These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness 114

Harbour more craft and more corrupter ends
Than twenty silly-ducking observants,
That stretch their duties nicely.

KENT. Sir, in good sooth, in sincere verity,
Under the allowance of your great aspect,
Whose influence, like the wreath of radiant
fire 120

On flickering Phœbus' front,—

CORN. What mean'st by this?

KENT. To go out of my dialect, which you' discommend so much. I know, sir, I am no flatterer: he that beguiled you in a plain accent was a plain knave; which for my part I will not be, though I should win your displeasure to entréat me to 't. 127

CORN. What was the offence you gave
him?

Osw. I never gave him any:
It pleas'd the king his master very late
To strike at me, upon his misconstruction;
When he, conjunct, and flattering his displeasure, 132

Tripp'd me behind; being down, insulted,
rail'd,
And put upon him such a deal of man,
That worthied him, got praises of the king
For him attempting who was self-subdu'd;
And, in the fleshment of this dread exploit,
Drew on me here again. 137

KENT. None of these rogues and cowards
But Ajax is their fool.

CORN. Fetch forth the stocks!

You stubborn ancient knave, you reverend braggart, 140

We'll teach you.

KENT. Sir, I am too old to learn.
Call not your stocks for me; I serve the king,
On whose employment I was sent to you:
You shall do small respect, show too bold malice 144

Against the grace and person of my master,
Stocking his messenger.

CORN. Fetch forth the stocks!
As I have life and honour, there shall he sit till noon.

REG. Till noon! till night, my lord; and all night too.

KENT. Why, madam, if I were your father's dog, 149

You should not use me so.

REG. Sir, being his knave, I will.

CORN. This is a fellow of the self-same colour
Our sister speaks of. Come, bring away the stocks. Stocks brought out.

GLOU. Let me beseech your grace not to do so.

His fault is much, and the good king his master
Will check him for 't: your purpos'd low correction 155

Is such as basest and contemn'd'st wretches
For pilferings and most common trespasses
Are punish'd with: the king must take it
ill,
That he, so slightly valued in his messenger,
Should have him thus restrain'd.

CORN. I'll answer that.

REG. My sister may receive it much more
worse 161

To have her gentleman abus'd, assaulted,
For following her affairs. Put in his legs.
KENT is put in the stocks.

Come, my good lord, away.
Exeunt all but GLOUCESTER and KENT.

GLOU. I am sorry for thee, friend; 'tis the duke's pleasure, 165

Whose disposition, all the world well knows,
Will not be rubb'd nor stopp'd: I'll entreat
for thee.

KENT. Pray, do not, sir. I have watch'd and travell'd hard;
Some time I shall sleep out, the rest I'll whistle.

A good man's fortune may grow out at heels:
Give you good morrow! 170

To take the indispos'd and sickly fit
 For the sound man. Death on my state!
 Wherefore [looking on KENT] 115
 Should he sit here? This act persuades me
 That this remotion of the duke and her
 Is practice only. Give me my servant forth.
 Go tell the duke and 's wife I'd speak with
 them,

Now, presently: bid them come forth and hear me, 120
 Or at their chamber-door I'll beat the drum
 Till it cry sleep to death.

GLOU. I would have all well betwixt you.
Exit.

LEAR. O me! my heart, my rising heart!
 but, down! 124

FOOL. Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney did to the eels when she put 'em i' the paste alive; she knapped 'em o' the coxcombs with a stick and cried 'Down, wantons, down!'
 'T was her brother that, in pure kindness to his horse, buttered his hay. 129

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GLOUCESTER, and Servants.

LEAR. Good morrow to you both.

CORN. Hail to your grace!
KENT is set at liberty.

REG. I am glad to see your highness.

LEAR. Regan, I think you are; I know what reason

I have to think so: if thou should'st not be glad,

I would divorce me from thy mother's tomb,
 Sepulchring an adult'ress. [To KENT.] O!
 are you free? 135

Some other time for that. Beloved Regan,
 Thy sister's naught: O Regan! she hath tied Sharp-tooth'd unkindness, like a vulture, here. Points to his heart.

I can scarce speak to thee; thou 'lt not believe

With how deprav'd a quality—O Regan! 140

REG. I pray you sir, take patience. I have hope

You less know how to value her desert
 Than she to scant her duty.

LEAR. Say, how is that?

REG. I cannot think my sister in the least 144

Would fail her obligation: if, sir, perchance
 She have restrain'd the riots of your followers,

'T is on such ground, and to such wholesome
 end,

As clears her from all blame.

LEAR. My curses on her!

REG. O, sir! you are old;
 Nature in you stands on the very verge 150
 Of her confine: you should be rul'd and led

By some discretion that discerns your state Better than you yourself. Therefore I pray
 you

That to our sister you do make return;

Say you have wrong'd her, sir.

LEAR. Ask her forgiveness?

Do you but mark how this becomes the
 house! 156

'Dear daughter, I confess that I am old;

Age is unnecessary: on my knees I beg

Kneeling.

That you'll vouchsafe me raiment, bed and
 food.'

REG. Good sir, no more; these are unsightly tricks. 160

Return you to my sister.

LEAR. [Rising.] Never, Regan.

She hath abated me of half my train;

Look'd black upon me; struck me with her
 tongue,

Most serpent-like, upon the very heart.

All the stor'd vengeance of heaven fall 165

On her ingrateful top! Strike her young
 bones,

You taking airs, with lameness!

CORN. Fie, sir, fie!

LEAR. You nimble lightnings, dart your blinding flames

Into her scornful eyes! Infect her beauty,

You fen-suck'd fogs, drawn by the powerful
 sun, 170

To fall and blast her pride!

REG. O the blest gods! so will you wish
 on me,

When the rash mood is on.

LEAR. No, Regan, thou shalt never have my curse:

Thy tender-hefted nature shall not give 175

Thee o'er to harshness: her eyes are fierce,
 but thine

Do comfort and not burn. 'T is not in thee

To grudge my pleasures, to cut off my train,

To bandy hasty words, to scant my sizes,

And, in conclusion, to oppose the bolt 180

Against my coming in: thou better know'st
 The offices of nature, bond of childhood,

Effects of courtesy, dues of gratitude;
Thy half o' the kingdom hast thou not forgot,
Wherein I thee endow'd.

REG. Good sir, to the purpose.

LEAR. Who put my man i' the stocks? 186
Tucket within.

CORN. What trumpet's that?

REG. I know 't, my sister's: this approves her letter,

That she would soon be here.

Enter OSWALD.

Is your lady come?

LEAR. This is a slave, whose easy-borrow'd pride 190
Dwells in the fickle grace of her he follows.
Out, varlet, from my sight!

CORN. What means your grace?

LEAR. Who stock'd my servant? Regan,
I have good hope Thou didst not know on 't. Who comes
here?

Enter GONERIL.

O heavens,

If you do love old men, if your sweet sway
Allow obedience, if yourselves are old, 196 Make it your cause; send down and take my part!

[To GONERIL.] Art not ashamed to look upon this beard?

O Regan! wilt thou take her by the hand?

GON. Why not by the hand, sir? How have I offended? 200

All's not offence that indiscretion finds

And dotage terms so.

LEAR. O sides! you are too tough;
Will you yet hold? How came my man i'
the stocks?

CORN. I set him there, sir; but his own disorders

Deserv'd much less advancement.

LEAR. You! did you?

REG. I pray you, father, being weak, seem so. 206

If, till the expiration of your month,
You will return and sojourn with my sister,
Dismissing half your train, come then to me:
I am now from home, and out of that provision 210

Which shall be needful for your entertainment.

LEAR. Return to her? and fifty men dismiss'd?

No, rather I abjure all roofs, and choose
To wage against the enmity o' the air;
To be a comrade with the wolf and owl, 215
Necessity's sharp pinch! Return with her!
Why, the hot-blooded France, that dowerless
took

Our youngest born, I could as well be
brought

To knee his throne, and, squire-like, pension beg 219

To keep base life afoot. Return with her!
Persuade me rather to be slave and sumpter
To this detested groom.

Pointing at OSWALD.

GON. At your choice, sir.

LEAR. I prithee, daughter, do not make me mad:

I will not trouble thee, my child; farewell.
We'll no more meet, no more see one another;
But yet thou art my flesh, my blood, my daughter; 226

Or rather a disease that's in my flesh,
Which I must needs call mine: thou art a boil,

A plague-sore, an embossed carbuncle,
In my corrupted blood. But I'll not chide thee; 230

Let shame come when it will, I do not call
it:

I do not bid the thunder-bearer shoot,
Nor tell tales of thee to high-judging Jove.
Mend when thou canst; be better at thy leisure:

I can be patient; I can stay with Regan, 235
I and my hundred knights.

REG. Not altogether so:
I look'd not for you yet, nor am provided For your fit welcome. Give ear, sir, to my sister;

For those that mingle reason with your passion 240

Must be content to think you old, and so—
But she knows what she does.

LEAR. Is this well spoken?

REG. I dare avouch it, sir: what! fifty followers!

Is it not well? What should you need of
more?

Yea, or so many, sith that both charge and danger 245

Speak 'gainst so great a number? How, in one house,

Should many people, under two commands,
Hold amity? 'T is hard; almost impossible.

To take the indispos'd and sickly fit
 For the sound man. Death on my state!
 Wherefore [looking on KENT] 115
 Should he sit here? This act persuades me
 That this remotion of the duke and her

GON. Why might not you, my lord, receive attendance
From those that she calls servants, or from mine? 250

REG. Why not, my lord? If then they chanc'd to slack you
We could control them. If you will come to me,

For now I spy a danger, I entreat you
To bring but five-and-twenty; to no more
Will I give place or notice. 255

LEAR. I gave you all—

REG. And in good time you gave it.

LEAR. Made you my guardians, my depositaries,

But kept a reservation to be follow'd
With such a number. What! must I come to you 259

With five-and-twenty? Regan, said you so?

REG. And speak't again, my lord; no more with me.

LEAR. Those wicked creatures yet do look well-favour'd

When others are more wicked; not being the worst

Stands in some rank of praise. [To GON-ERIL.] I'll go with thee: 264

Thy fifty yet doth double five-and-twenty,
And thou art twice her love.

GON. Hear me, my lord.

What need you five-and-twenty, ten, or five,
To follow in a house where twice so many
Have a command to tend you?

REG. What need one?

LEAR. O! reason not the need; our basest beggars 270

Are in the poorest thing superfluous:
Allow not nature more than nature needs,
Man's life is cheap as beast's. Thou art a lady;

If only to go warm were gorgeous,
Why nature needs not what thou gorgeous wear'st, 275

Which scarcely keeps thee warm. But, for true need,—

You heavens, give me that patience, patience I need!

You see me here, you gods, a poor old man,
As full of grief as age; wretched in both! 279

If it be you that stirs these daughters' hearts
Against their father, fool me not so much
To bear it tamely; touch me with noble anger,

And let not women's weapons, water-drops,

Stain my man's cheeks! No, you unnatural hags,

I will have such revenges on you both 285
That all the world shall—I will do such things,
What they are yet I know not, but they shall be

The terrors of the earth. You think I'll weep;

No, I'll not weep: 289

I have full cause of weeping, but this heart
Shall break into a hundred thousand flaws
Or ere I'll weep. O fool! I shall go mad.

Exeunt LEAR, GLOUCESTER, KENT, and Fool.

CORN. Let us withdraw, 't will be a storm.

Storm heard at a distance.

REG. This house is little: the old man and his people Cannot be well bestow'd. 295

GON. 'T is his own blame; hath put himself from rest,

And must needs taste his folly.

REG. For his particular, I'll receive him gladly,

But not one follower.

GON. So am I purpos'd
Where is my Lord of Gloucester? 300

CORN. Follow'd the old man forth. He is return'd.

Re-enter GLOUCESTER.

GLOU. The king is in high rage.

CORN. Whither is he going?

GLOU. He calls to horse; but will I know not whither.

CORN. 'T is best to give him way; he leads himself.

GON. My lord, entreat him by no means to stay. 305

GLOU. Alack! the night comes on, and the high winds

Do sorely ruffle; for many miles about
There's scarce a bush.

REG. O! sir, to wilful men,
The injuries that they themselves procure Must be their schoolmasters. Shut up your doors; 310

He is attended with a desperate train,
And what they may incense him to, being apt
To have his ear abus'd, wisdom bids fear.

CORN. Shut up your doors, my lord; 't is a wild night:

My Regan counsels well: come out o' the storm.

Exeunt. 315

ACT III

SCENE I

A Heath.

A storm, with thunder and lightning. Enter KENT and a Gentleman, meeting.

KENT. Who's there, beside foul weather?

GENT. One minded like the weather, most unquietly.

KENT. I know you. Where's the king?

GENT. Contending with the fretful elements;

Bids the wind blow the earth into the sea, 5

Or swell the curled waters 'bove the main,

That things might change or cease; tears his white hair,

Which the impetuous blasts, with eyeless rage,

Catch in their fury, and make nothing of;

Strives in his little world of man to out-scorn

The to-and-fro conflicting wind and rain. 11

This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,

The lion and the belly-pinched wolf

Keep their fur dry, unbonneted he runs,

And bids what will take all.

KENT. But who is with him? 15

GENT. None but the fool, who labours to out-jest

His heart-struck injuries.

KENT. Sir, I do know you;

And dare, upon the warrant of my note,

Commend a dear thing to you. There is division,

Although as yet the face of it be cover'd 20

With mutual cunning, 'twixt Albany and Cornwall;

Who have—as who have not, that their great stars

Thron'd and set high?—servants, who seem no less,

Which are to France the spies and speculations

Intelligent of our state; what hath been seen, 25

Either in snuffs and packings of the dukes,

Or the hard rein which both of them have borne

Against the old kind king; or something deeper,

Whereof perchance these are but furnishings;

But, true it is, from France there comes a power 30

Into this scatter'd kingdom; who already,

Wise in our negligence, have secret feet

In some of our best ports, and are at point

To show their open banner. Now to you:

If on my credit you dare build so far 35

To make your speed to Dover, you shall find

Some that will thank you, making just report

Of how unnatural and bemoaning sorrow

The king hath cause to plain.

I am a gentleman of blood and breeding, 40

And from some knowledge and assurance offer

This office to you.

GENT. I will talk further with you.

KENT. No, do not.

For confirmation that I am much more 44

Than my out-wall, open this purse, and take

What it contains. If you shall see Cordelia,

As fear not but you shall, show her this ring,

And she will tell you who your fellow is

That yet you do not know. Fie on this storm!

I will go seek the king. 50

GENT. Give me your hand. Have you no more to say?

KENT. Few words, but, to effect, more than all yet;

That, when we have found the king, in which your pain

That way, I'll this, he that first lights on him

Holla the other. Exeunt severally. 55

SCENE II

Another Part of the Heath.

Storm still.

Enter LEAR and Fool.

LEAR. Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!

You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout

Till you have drench'd our steeples, drown'd the cocks!

You sulphurous and thought-executing fires, Vaunt-couriers of oak-cleaving thunderbolts, 5

Singe my white head! And thou, all-shaking thunder,

Strike flat the thick rotundity o' the world!

Cracks nature's moulds, all germens spill at once.

That make ingrateful man! 9

FOOL. O nuncle, court holy-water in a dry house is better than this rain-water out o' door. Good nuncle, in, and ask thy daughters' blessing; here's a night pities neither wise men nor fools.

LEAR. Rumble thy bellyful! Spit, fire! spout, rain! 15

Nor rain, wind, thunder, fire, are my daughters:

I tax not you, you elements, with unkindness; I never gave you kingdom, call'd you children, You owe me no subscription: then let fall Your horrible pleasure; here I stand, your slave, 20

A poor, infirm, weak, and despis'd old man.

But yet I call you servile ministers,

That have with two pernicious daughters join'd

Your high-engender'd battles 'gainst a head So old and white as this. O! O! 't is foul. 25

FOOL. He that has a house to put 's head in has a good head-piece.

The cod-piece that will house

Before the head has any,

The head and he shall house; 30

So beggars marry many.

The man that makes his toe

What he his heart should make,

Shall of a corn cry woe,

And turn his sleep to wake 35

For there was never yet fair woman but she made mouths in a glass.

LEAR. No, I will be the pattern of all patience; I will say nothing.

Enter KENT.

KENT. Who's there? 40

FOOL. Marry, here 's grace and a cod-piece; that's a wise man and a fool.

KENT. Alas! sir, are you here? things that love night

Love not such nights as these; the wrathful skies

Gallow the very wanderers of the dark, 45 And make them keep their caves. Since I was man

Such sheets of fire, such bursts of horrid thunder,

Such groans of roaring wind and rain, I never Remember to have heard; man's nature cannot carry 49

The affliction nor the fear.

LEAR. Let the great gods, That keep this dreadful pother o'er our heads,

Find out their enemies now. Tremble, thou wretch,

That hast within thee undivulged crimes, Unwhipp'd of justice; hide thee, thou bloody hand, 54

Thou perjur'd, and thou simular of virtue That art incestuous; caitiff, to pieces shake,

That under covert and convenient seeming Hast practis'd on man's life; close pent-up guilts,

Rive your concealing continents, and cry These dreadful summoners grace. I am a man 60

More sinn'd against than sinning.

KENT. Alack! bare-headed!

Gracious my lord, hard by here is a hovel;

Some friendship will it lend you 'gainst the tempest;

Repose you there while I to this hard house More harder than the stones whereof 't is rais'd, 65

Which even but now, demanding after you, Denied me to come in, return and force

Their scantred courtesy.

LEAR. My wits begin to turn.

Come on, my boy. How dost, my boy? Art cold?

I am cold myself. Where is this straw, my fellow? 70

The art of our necessities is strange,

That can make vile things precious. Come, your hovel.

Poor fool and knave, I have one part in my heart

That's sorry yet for thee.

FOOL.

He that has and a little tiny wit,— 75

With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,—

Must make content with his fortunes fit,

For the rain it raineth every day.

LEAR. True, my good boy. Come, bring us to this hovel.

Exeunt LEAR and KENT.

FOOL. This is a brave night to cool a courtesan. 80

I'll speak a prophecy ere I go:

When priests are more in word than matter;

When brewers mar their malt with water;

When nobles are their tailors' tutors;

No heretics burn'd, but wenches' suitors; 85

When every case in law is right;

No squire in debt, nor no poor knight;

When slanders do not live in tongues;

Nor cut-purses come not to throngs;

When usurers tell their gold i' the field; 90
 And bawds and whores do churches build;
 Then shall the realm of Albion
 Come to great confusion:
 Then comes the time, who lives to see 't,
 That going shall be us'd with feet. 95

This prophecy Merlin shall make; for I live before his time. Exit.

SCENE III

A Room in GLOUCESTER's Castle.

Enter GLOUCESTER and EDMUND.

GLOU. Alack, alack! Edmund, I like not this unnatural dealing. When I desired their leave that I might pity him, they took from me the use of mine own house; charged me, on pain of perpetual displeasure, neither to speak of him, entreat for him, nor any way sustain him. 7

EDM. Most savage and unnatural!

GLOU. Go to; say you nothing. There is division between the dukes, and a worse matter than that. I have received a letter this night; 't is dangerous to be spoken; I have locked the letter in my closet. These injuries the king now bears will be revenged home; there's part of a power already footed; we must incline to the king. I will seek him and privily relieve him; go you and maintain talk with the duke, that my charity be not of him perceived. If he ask for me, I am ill and gone to bed. If I die for it, as no less is threatened me, the king, my old master, must be relieved. There is some strange thing toward, Edmund; pray
 you, be careful. Exit. 24

EDM. This courtesies, forbid thee, shall the duke

Instantly know; and of that letter too:
 This seems a fair deserving, and must draw
 me

That which my father loses; no less than all:
 The younger rises when the old doth fall. 29

Exit.

SCENE IV

The Heath. Before a Hovel.

Enter LEAR, KENT, and Fool.

KENT. Here is the place, my lord; good
 my lord, enter:

The tyranny of the open night's too rough
 For nature to endure.

Storm still.

LEAR. Let me alone.

KENT. Good my lord, enter here.

LEAR. Wilt break my heart?

KENT. I'd rather break mine own. Good
 my lord, enter.

LEAR. Thou think'st 't is much that this contentious storm

Invades us to the skin: so 't is to thee;

But where the greater malady is fix'd,

The lesser is scarce felt. Thou 'dst shun a
 bear;

But if thy flight lay toward the roaring sea,

Thou'dst meet the bear i' the mouth.

When the mind 's free 11

The body 's delicate; the tempest in my
 mind

Doth from my senses take all feeling else

Save what beats there. Filial ingratitude!

Is it not as this mouth should tear this
 hand

For lifting food to 't? But I will punish
 home:

No, I will weep no more. In such a night

To shut me out! Pour on; I will endure.

In such a night as this! O Regan, Goneril!

Your old kind father, whose frank heart gave all,— 20

O! that way madness lies; let me shun that;

No more of that.

KENT. Good my lord, enter here.

LEAR. Prithee, go in thyself; seek thine own ease:

This tempest will not give me leave to ponder

On things would hurt me more. But I'll go in.

[To the Fool.] In, boy; go first. You houseless poverty,—

Nay, get thee in. I'll pray, and then I'll sleep.

Fool goes in.

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,

That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,

How shall your houseless heads and unfed
 sides, 30

Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you

From seasons such as these? O! I have ta'en

Too little care of this. Take physic, pomp;

Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,

That thou may'st shake the superflux to
 them,

And show the heavens more just.

EDG. [Within.] Fathom and half, fathom and half! Poor Tom!

The Fool runs out from the hovel.

FOOL. Come not in here, nuncle; here's a spirit.

Help me! help me! 40

KENT. Give me thy hand. Who's there?

FOOL. A spirit, a spirit: he says his name's poor Tom.

KENT. What art thou that dost grumble there i' the straw?
Come forth.

Enter EDGAR disguised as a madman.

EDG. Away! the foul fiend follows me!
Through the sharp hawthorn blow the winds.
Hum! go to thy bed and warm thee.

LEAR. Didst thou give all to thy two daughters?

And art thou come to this? 50

EDG. Who gives any thing to poor Tom? whom the foul fiend hath led through fire and through flame, through ford and whirlpool, o'er bog and quagmire; that hath laid knives under his pillow, and halters in his pew; set ratsbane by his porridge; made him proud of heart, to ride on a bay trotting-horse over four-inched bridges, to course his own shadow for a traitor. Bless thy five wits! Tom's a-cold. O! do de, do de, do de. Bless thee from whirlwinds, star-blasting, and taking! Do poor Tom some charity, whom the foul fiend vexes. There could I have him now, and there, and there, and there again, and there.

Storm still.

LEAR. What! have his daughters brought him to this pass?

Could'st thou save nothing? Didst thou give them all?

FOOL. Nay, he reserved a blanket, else we had been all shamed.

LEAR. Now all the plagues that in the pendulous air

Hang fated o'er men's faults light on thy daughters! 70

KENT. He hath no daughters, sir.

LEAR. Death, traitor! nothing could have subdued nature

To such a lowness but his unkind daughters. Is it the fashion that discarded fathers Should have thus little mercy on their flesh? Judicious punishment! 't was this flesh begot Those pelican daughters.

EDG. Pillicock sat on Pillicock-hill:

Halloo, halloo, loo, loo!

FOOL. This cold night will turn us all to fools and madmen. 81

EDG. Take heed o' the foul fiend. Obey thy parents; keep thy word justly; swear not; commit not with man's sworn spouse; set not thy sweet heart on proud array. Tom's a-cold!

LEAR. What hast thou been?

EDG. A servingman, proud in heart and mind; that curled my hair, wore gloves in my cap, served the lust of my mistress' heart, and did the act of darkness with her; swore as many oaths as I spake words, and broke them in the sweet face of heaven; one that slept in the contriving of lust, and waked to do it. Wine loved I deeply, dice dearly, and in woman out-paramoured the Turk: false of heart, light of ear, bloody of hand; hog in sloth, fox in stealth, wolf in greediness, dog in madness, lion in prey. Let not the creaking of shoes nor the rustling of silks betray thy poor heart to woman: keep thy foot out of brothels, thy hand out of plackets, thy pen from lenders' books, and defy the foul fiend. Still through the hawthorn blows the cold wind; says suum, mun, ha no nonny. Dolphin my boy, my boy; sessa! let him trot by. 104

Storm still.

LEAR. Why, thou wert better in thy grave than to answer with thy uncovered body this extremity of the skies. Is man no more than this? Consider him well. Thou owest the worm no silk, the beast no hide, the sheep no wool, the cat no perfume. Ha! here's three on 's are sophisticated; thou art the thing itself; unaccommodated man is no more but such a poor, bare, forked animal as thou art. Off, off, you lendings! Come; unbutton here. [Tearing off his clothes.] 114

FOOL. Prithee, nuncle, be contented; 't is a naughty night to swim in. Now a little fire in a wild field were like an old lecher's heart; a small spark, all the rest on 's body cold. Look! here comes a walking fire. 119

Enter GLOUCESTER, with a torch.

EDG. This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet: he begins at curfew, and walks till the first cock; he gives the web and the pin, squints the eye, and makes the harelip;

mildews the white wheat, and hurts the poor creature of earth.

Swithold footed thrice the wold;
He met the night-mare, and her nine-fold;
Bid her alight,
And her troth plight,
And aroint thee, witch, aroint thee!

KENT. How fares your grace? 130

LEAR. What's he?

KENT. Who's there? What is 't you seek?

GLOU. What are you there? — Your names?

EDG. Poor Tom; that eats the swimming frog, the toad, the tadpole, the wall-newt, and the water; that in the fury of his heart, when the foul fiend rages, eats cow-dung for sallets; swallows the old rat and the ditch-dog; drinks the green mantle of the standing pool; who is whipped from tithing to tithing, and stocked, punished, and imprisoned; who hath had three suits to his back, six shirts to his body, 141

Horse to ride, and weapon to wear,
But mice and rats and such small deer,
Have been Tom's food for seven long year.

Beware my follower. Peace, Smulkin! peace, thou fiend!

GLOU. What! hath your grace no better company?

EDG. The prince of darkness is a gentleman;

Modo he's call'd, and Mahu.

GLOU. Our flesh and blood, my lord, is grown so vile, 150

That it doth hate what gets it.

EDG. Poor Tom's a-cold.

GLOU. Go in with me. My duty cannot suffer

To obey in all your daughters' hard commands:

Though their injunction be to bar my doors,
And let this tyrannous night take hold upon you,

Yet have I ventur'd to come seek you out
And bring you where both fire and food is ready.

LEAR. First let me talk with this philosopher.

What is the cause of thunder? 160

KENT. Good my lord, take his offer; go into the house.

LEAR. I'll talk a word with this same learned Theban.

What is your study?

EDG. How to prevent the fiend, and to kill vermin.

LEAR. Let me ask you one word in private.

KENT. Importune him once more to go, my lord;

His wits begin to unsettle.

GLOU. Canst thou blame him? Storm still.

His daughters seek his death. Ah! that good Kent;

He said it would be thus, poor banish'd man!

Thou say'st the king grows mad; I'll tell thee, friend, 170

I am almost mad myself. I had a son,
Now outlaw'd from my blood; he sought my life,

But lately, very late; I lov'd him, friend,
No father his son dearer; true to tell thee,
The grief hath craz'd my wits. What a night's this!

I do beseech your grace,—

LEAR. O! cry you mercy, sir.
Noble philosopher, your company.

EDG. Tom's a-cold.

GLOU. In, fellow, there, into the hovel: keep thee warm.

LEAR. Come, let's in all.

KENT. This way, my lord.
LEAR. With him:

I will keep still with my philosopher. 181

KENT. Good my lord, soothe him; let him take the fellow.

GLOU. Take him you on.

KENT. Sirrah, come on; go along with us.

LEAR. Come, good Athenian.

GLOU. No words, no words: hush.

EDG.

Child Rowland to the dark tower came,
His word was still, Fie, foh, and fum,
I smell the blood of a British man.

Exeunt.

SCENE V

A Room in GLOUCESTER's Castle.

Enter CORNWALL and EDMUND.

CORN. I will have my revenge ere I depart his house.

EDM. How, my lord, I may be censured, that nature thus gives way to loyalty, something fears me to think of.

CORN. I now perceive it was not altogether your brother's evil disposition made him seek his death; but a provoking merit, set-a-work by a reproveable badness in himself.

EDM. How malicious is my fortune, that I must repent to be just! This is the letter which he spoke of, which approves him an intelligent party to the advantages of France. O heavens! that this treason were not, or not I the detector! 14

CORN. Go with me to the duchess.

EDM. If the matter of this paper be certain, you have mighty business in hand.

CORN. True or false, it hath made thee Earl of Gloucester. Seek out where thy father is, that he may be ready for our apprehension. 20

EDM. [Aside.] If I find him comforting the king, it will stuff his suspicion more fully. I will persevere in my course of loyalty, though the conflict be sore between that and my blood.

CORN. I will lay trust upon thee; and thou shalt find a dearer father in my love.

Exeunt.

SCENE VI

A Chamber in a Farmhouse adjoining the Castle.

Enter GLOUCESTER, LEAR, KENT, Fool, and EDGAR.

GLOU. Here is better than the open air; take it thankfully. I will piece out the comfort with what addition I can: I will not be long from you.

KENT. All the power of his wits have given way to his impatience. The gods reward your kindness!

Exit GLOUCESTER.

EDG. Frateretto calls me, and tells me Nero is an angler in the lake of darkness. Pray, innocent, and beware the foul fiend.

FOOL. Prithee, nuncle, tell me whether a madman be a gentleman or a yeoman? 11

LEAR. A king, a king!

FOOL. No; he 's a yeoman that has a gentleman to his son; for he 's a mad yeoman that sees his son a gentleman before him.

LEAR. To have a thousand with red burning spits
Come hissing in upon 'em,—

EDG. The foul fiend bites my back.

FOOL. He 's mad that trusts in the tameness of a wolf, a horse's health, a boy's love, or a whore's oath. 21

LEAR. It shall be done; I will arraign them straight.

[To EDGAR.] Come, sit thou here, most learned justicer;

[To the Fool.] Thou, sapient sir, sit here.
Now, you she foxes!

EDG. Look where he stands and glares!
Wantest thou eyes at trial, madam?

Come o'er the bourn, Bessy, to me,—

FOOL.

Her boat hath a leak,
And she must not speak

Why she dares not come over to thee. 30

EDG. The foul fiend haunts poor Tom in the voice of a nightingale. Hopdance cries in Tom's belly for two white herring. Croak not, black angel; I have no food for thee.

KENT. How do you, sir? Stand you not so amaz'd:

Will you lie down and rest upon the cushions?

LEAR. I'll see their trial first. Bring in their evidence.

[To EDGAR] Thou robed man of justice, take thy place;

[To the Fool.] And thou, his yoke-fellow of equity,

Bench by his side. [To KENT.] You are o' the commission, 40

Sit you too.

EDG. Let us deal justly.

Sleepest or wakest thou, jolly shepherd?

Thy sheep be in the corn;

And for one blast of thy minikin mouth,

Thy sheep shall take no harm.

Purr! the cat is grey.

LEAR. Arraign her first; 't is Goneril. I here take my oath before this honourable assembly, she kicked the poor king her father. 50

FOOL. Come hither, mistress. Is your name Goneril?

LEAR. She cannot deny it.

FOOL. Cry you mercy, I took you for a joint-stool.

LEAR. And here's another, whose warp'd looks proclaim

What store her heart is made on. Stop her there!

Arms, arms, sword, fire! Corruption in the place!

False justicer, why hast thou let her 'scape?

EDG. Bless thy five wits! 60

KENT. O pity! Sir, where is the patience now

That you so oft have boasted to retain?

EDG. [Aside.] My tears begin to take his part so much,

They'll mar my counterfeiting.

LEAR. The little dogs and all,

Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, see, they bark at me.

EDG. Tom will throw his head at them. Avaunt, you curs!

Be thy mouth or black or white,
Tooth that poisons if it bite; 70
Mastiff, greyhound, mongrel grim,
Hound or spaniel, brach or lym;
Or bobtail tike or trundle-tail;
Tom will make them weep and wail:
For, with throwing thus my head,
Dogs leap the hatch, and all are fled.

Do de, de, de. Sessa! Come, march to wakes and fairs and market-towns. Poor Tom, thy horn is dry. 79

LEAR. Then let them anatomize Regan, see what breeds about her heart. Is there any cause in nature that makes these hard hearts? [To EDGAR.] You, sir, I entertain for one of my hundred; only I do not like the fashion of your garments; you will say they are Persian; but let them be changed.

KENT. Now, good my lord, lie here and rest awhile.

LEAR. Make no noise, make no noise; draw the curtains: so, so, so. We'll go to supper i' the morning: so, so, so. 91

FOOL. And I'll go to bed at noon.

Re-enter GLOUCESTER.

GLOU. Come hither, friend: where is the king, my master?

KENT. Here, sir; but trouble him not, his wits are gone.

GLOU. Good friend, I prithee, take him in thy arms;

I have o'erheard a plot of death upon him.

There is a litter ready; lay him in 't,

And drive toward Dover, friend, where thou shalt meet

Both welcome and protection. Take up thy master: 99

If thou should'st dally half an hour, his life, With thine, and all that offer to defend him, Stand in assured loss. Take up, take up; And follow me, that will to some provision Give thee quick conduct.

KENT. Oppress'd nature sleeps: This rest might yet have balm'd thy broken sinews,

Which, if convenience will not allow, Stand in hard cure. [To the Fool.] Come, help to bear thy master;

Thou must not stay behind.

GLOU. Come, come, away.

Exeunt KENT, GLOUCESTER, and the Fool, bearing off the King.

EDG. When we our betters see bearing our woes,

We scarcely think our miseries our foes. 110 Who alone suffers suffers most i' the mind, Leaving free things and happy shows behind;

But then the mind much sufferance doth o'erskip,

When grief hath mates, and bearing fellowship.

How light and portable my pain seems now, When that which makes me bend makes the king bow;

He childed as I father'd! Tom, away! Mark the high noises, and thyself bewray When false opinion, whose wrong thought defiles thee, 119

In thy just proof repeals and reconciles thee. What will hap more to-night, safe 'scape the king!

Lurk, lurk.

Exit.

SCENE VII

A Room in GLOUCESTER's Castle.

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GONERIL, EDMUND, and Servants.

CORN. [To GONERIL.] Post speedily to my lord your husband; show him this letter: the army of France is landed. Seek out the villain Gloucester.

Exeunt some of the servants.

REG. Hang him instantly.

GON. Pluck out his eyes. 5

CORN. Leave him to my displeasure. Edmund, keep you our sister company: the revenges we are bound to take upon your traitorous father are not fit for your beholding. Advise the duke, where you are going, to a most festinate preparation: we are bound to the like. Our posts shall be swift and intelligent betwixt us. Farewell, dear sister; farewell, my Lord of Gloucester. 13

Enter OSWALD.

How now! where's the king?

OSW. My Lord of Gloucester hath convey'd him hence:

Some five or six and thirty of his knights,
Hot questrists after him, met him at gate;
Who, with some other of the lord's dependants,

Are gone with him towards Dover, where they boast

To have well-armed friends.

CORN. Get horses for your mistress.

GON. Farewell, sweet lord, and sister. 21

CORN. Edmund, farewell.

Exeunt GONERIL, EDMUND, and OSWALD.

Go seek the traitor Gloucester,
Pinion him like a thief, bring him before us,
Exeunt other Servants.

Though well we may not pass upon his life
Without the form of justice, yet our power
Shall do a courtesy to our wrath, which men
May blame but not control. Who's there?
The traitor?

Re-enter Servants, with GLOUCESTER.

REG. Ingrateful fox! 't is he.

CORN. Bind fast his corky arms.

GLOU. What mean your graces? Good my friends, consider 30
You are my guests: do me no foul play, friends.

CORN. Bind him, I say.

Servants bind him.

REG. Hard, hard. O filthy traitor!

GLOU. Unmerciful lady as you are, I'm none.

CORN. To this chair bind him. Villain, thou shalt find—

REGAN plucks his beard.

GLOU. By the kind gods, 't is most ignobly done

To pluck me by the beard.

REG. So white, and such a traitor!

GLOU. Naughty lady,
These hairs, which thou dost ravish from my chin,

Will quicken, and accuse thee: I am your host: 39

With robbers' hands my hospitable favours
You should not ruffle thus. What will you do?

CORN. Come, sir, what letters had you late from France?

REG. Be simple-answer'd, for we know the truth.

CORN. And what confederacy have you with the traitors

Late footed in the kingdom?

REG. To whose hands have you sent the lunatic king?

Speak.

GLOU. I have a letter guessingly set down,

Which came from one that 's of a neutral heart,

And not from one oppos'd.

CORN. Cunning.

REG. And false.

CORN. Where hast thou sent the king?

GLOU. To Dover.

REG. Wherefore to Dover? Wast thou not charg'd at peril— 52

CORN. Wherefore to Dover? Let him answer that.

GLOU. I am tied to the stake, and I must stand the course.

REG. Wherefore to Dover?

GLOU. Because I would not see thy cruel nails

Pluck out his poor old eyes; nor thy fierce sister

In his anointed flesh stick boarish fangs.

The sea, with such a storm as his bare head

In hell-black night, endur'd, would have buoy'd up, 60

And quench'd the stelled fires;

Yet, poor old heart, he help the heavens to rain.

If wolves had at thy gate how'd that stern time,

Thou should'st have said 'Good porter, turn the key,

All cruels else subscribe': but I shall see

The winged vengeance overtake such children.

CORN. See't shalt thou never. Fellows, hold the chair.

Upon these eyes of thine I'll set my foot.

GLOU. He that will think to live till he be old,

Give me some help! O cruel! O ye gods!

REG. One side will mock another; the other too. 71

CORN. If you see vengeance,—

FIRST SERV. Hold your hand, my lord. I have serv'd you ever since I was a child, But better service I have never done you Than now to bid you hold.

REG. How now, you dog!

FIRST SERV. If you did wear a beard upon your chin

I'd shake it on this quarrel. What do you mean?

CORN. My villain!

They draw and fight.

FIRST SERV. Nay then, come on, and take the chance of anger.

REG. Give me thy sword. A peasant stand up thus! 80

Takes a sword and runs at him behind.

FIRST SERV. O! I am slain. My lord, you have one eye left

To see some mischief on him. O! [Dies.]

CORN. Lest it see more, prevent it. Out, vile jelly!

Where is thy lustre now?

GLOU. All dark and comfortless.

Where's my son Edmund?

Edmund, enkindle all the sparks of nature To quit this horrid act.

REG. Out, treacherous villain!

Thou call'st on him that hates thee; it was he

That made the overture of thy treasons to us,

Who is too good to pity thee. 90

GLOU. O my follies! Then Edgar was abus'd.

Kind gods, forgive me that, and prosper him!

REG. Go thrust him out at gates, and let him smell

His way to Dover.

Exit one with GLOUCESTER.

How is 't, my lord? How look you?

CORN. I have receiv'd a hurt. Follow me, lady.

Turn out that eyeless villain; throw this slave

Upon the dunghill. Regan; I bleed apace: Untimely comes this hurt. Give me your arm.

Exit CORNWALL, led by REGAN.

SECOND SERV. I'll never care what wickedness I do

If this man come to good.

THIRD SERV. If she live long,

And in the end meet the old course of death, Women will all turn monsters.

SECOND SERV. Let's follow the old earl, and get the Bedlam

To lead him where he would: his roguish madness

Allows itself to any thing.

THIRD SERV. Go thou; I'll fetch some flax and whites of eggs

To apply to his bleeding face. Now, heaven help him. Exeunt severally.

ACT IV

SCENE I

The Heath.

Enter EDGAR.

EDG. Yet better thus, and known to be condemn'd,

Than still condemn'd and flatter'd. To be worst,

The lowest and most dejected thing of fortune,

Stands still in esperance, lives not in fear: The lamentable change is from the best; The worst returns to laughter. Welcome, then,

Thou unsubstantial air that I embrace:

The wretch that thou hast blown unto the worst

Owes nothing to thy blasts. But who comes here?

Enter GLOUCESTER, led by an old Man.

My father, poorly led? World, world, O world!

But that thy strange mutations make us hate thee,

Life would not yield to age.

OLD MAN. O my good lord!

I have been your tenant, and your father's tenant,

These fourscore years.

GLOU. Away, get thee away; good friend, be gone;

Thy comforts can do me no good at all;

Thee they may hurt.

OLD MAN. You cannot see your way.

GLOU. I have no way, and therefore want no eyes; 20
I stumbled when I saw. Full oft 't is seen,
Our means secure us, and our mere defects
Prove our commodities. Ah! dear son
Edgar,
The food of thy abused father's wrath;
Might I but live to see thee in my touch,
I'd say I had eyes again.

OLD MAN. How now! Who's there?

EDG. [Aside.] O gods! Who is 't can say 'I am at the worst'?

I am worse than e'er I was.

OLD MAN. 'T is poor mad Tom.

EDG. [Aside.] And worse I may be yet;
the worst is not

So long as we can say 'This is the worst.' 30

OLD MAN. Fellow, where goest?

GLOU. Is it a beggar-man?

OLD MAN. Madman and beggar too.

GLOU. He has some reason, else he could not beg.

I' the last night's storm I such a fellow saw,
Which made me think a man a worm: my son
Came then into my mind; and yet my mind Was then scarce friends with him: I have heard more since.

As flies to wanton boys, are we to the gods;
They kill us for their sport.

EDG. [Aside.] How should this be?
Bad is the trade that must play fool to sorrow,

Angering itself and others. Bless thee,
master!

GLOU. Is that the naked fellow?

OLD MAN. Ay, my lord.

GLOU. Then, prithee, get thee gone. If for my sake

Thou wilt o'ertake us hence a mile or twain
I' the way toward Dover, do it for ancient
love;

And bring some covering for this naked soul,
Who I'll entreat to lead me.

OLD MAN. Alack, sir! he is mad.

GLOU. 'T is the times' plague, when madmen lead the blind.

Do as I bid thee, or rather do thy pleasure;
Above the rest, be gone. 50

OLD MAN. I'll bring him the best 'parel that I have,

Come on 't what will. Exit.

GLOU. Sirrah, naked fellow,—

EDG. Poor Tom's a-cold. [Aside.] I can not daub it further.

GLOU. Come hither, fellow.

EDG. [Aside.] And yet I must. Bless thy sweet eyes, they bleed.

GLOU. Know'st thou the way to Dover?

EDG. Both stile and gate, horse-way and foot-path. Poor Tom hath been scared out of his wits: bless thee, good man's son, from the foul fiend! Five fiends have been in poor Tom at once; of lust, as Obidicut; Hobbididance, prince of dumbness; Mahu, of stealing; Modo, of murder; Flibbertigibbet, of mopping and mowing; who since possesses chambermaids and waiting-women. So, bless thee, master! 66

GLOU. Here, take this purse, thou whom the heavens' plagues

Have humbled to all strokes: that I am wretched

Makes thee the happier: heavens, deal so still!

Let the superfluous and lust-dieted man, 70
That slaves your ordinance, that will not see Because he doth not feel, feel your power quickly;

So distribution should undo excess,
And each man have enough. Dost thou know Dover?

EDG. Ay, master.

GLOU. There is a cliff, whose high and bending head

Looks fearfully in the confined deep;
Bring me but to the very brim of it,
And I'll repair the misery thou dost bear
With something rich about me; from that
place 80

I shall no leading need.

EDG. Give me thy arm:

Poor Tom shall lead thee. Exeunt.

SCENE II

Before the DUKE OF ALBANY's Palace.

Enter GONERIL and EDMUND.

GON. Welcome, my lord: I marvel our mild husband

Not met us on the way.

Enter OSWALD.

Now, where's your master?

Osw. Madam, within; but never man so chang'd.

I told him of the army that was landed;
He smil'd at it: I told him you were coming;

His answer was 'The worse': of Gloucester's treachery,
And of the loyal service of his son,
When I inform'd him, then he call'd me sot,
And told me I had turn'd the wrong side out:
What most he should dislike seems pleasant
to him; 10
What like, offensive.

GON. [To EDMUND.] Then shall you go
no further.

It is the cowish terror of his spirit
That dares not undertake, he'll not feel wrongs

Which tie him to an answer. Our wishes on the way

May prove effects. Back, Edmund, to my brother;

Hasten his musters and conduct his powers:
I must change arms at home, and give the distaff

Into my husband's hands. This trusty servant

Shall pass between us; ere long you are like to hear,

If you dare venture in your own behalf, 20
A mistress's command. Wear this; spare speech; [Giving a favour.]

Decline your head: this kiss, if it durst
speak,

Would stretch thy spirits up into the air.

Conceive, and fare thee well.

EDM. Yours in the ranks of death.

GON. My most dear Gloucester!

Exit EDMUND.

O! the difference of man and man.

To thee a woman's services are due:

My fool usurps my body.

Osw. Madam, here comes my lord.
Exit.

Enter ALBANY.

GON. I have been worth the whistle.

ALB. O Goneril!

You are not worth the dust which the rude
wind 30

Blows in your face. I fear your disposition:
That nature, which contemns it origin,

Cannot be border'd certain in itself;

She that herself will sliver and disbranch

From her material sap, perforce must wither
And come to deadly use.

GON. No more; the text is foolish.

ALB. Wisdom and goodness to the vile seem vile;

Filths savour but themselves. What have you done?

Tigers, not daughters, what have you perform'd?

A father, and a gracious aged man, 40
Whose reverence the head-lugg'd bear would lick,

Most barbarous, most degenerate! have you madded.

Could my good brother suffer you to do it?

A man, a prince, by him so benefited!

If that the heavens do not their visible spirits
Send quickly down to tame these vile offences,

It will come,

Humanity must perforce prey on itself,

Like monsters of the deep.

GON. Milk-liver'd man!

That bear'st a cheek for blows, a head for
wrongs; 51

Who hast not in thy brows an eye discerning Thine honour from thy suffering; that not know'st

Fools do those villains pity who are punish'd
Ere they have done their mischief. Where's thy drum?

France spreads his banners in our noiseless
land,

With plumed helm thy state begins to threat, Whiles thou, a moral fool, sitt'st still, and criest

'Alack! why does he so?'

ALB. See thyself, devil!

Proper deformity seems not in the fiend 60
So horrid as in woman.

GON. O vain fool!

ALB. Thou changed and self-cover'd thing, for shame,

Be-monster not thy feature. Were't my fitness

To let these hands obey my blood,

They are apt enough to dislocate and tear
Thy flesh and bones; howe'er thou art a
fiend,

A woman's shape doth shield thee.

GON. Marry, your manhood—Mew!

Enter a Messenger.

ALB. What news?

MESS. O! my good lord, the Duke of Cornwall's dead;

Slain by his servant, going to put out

The other eye of Gloucester.

ALB. Gloucester's eyes!

MESS. A servant that he bred, thrill'd with remorse,
Oppos'd against the act, bending his sword
To his great master; who, thereat enrag'd, Flew on him, and amongst them fell'd him
dead;
But not without that harmful stroke, which since
Hath pluck'd him after.

ALB. This shows you are above,
You justicers, that these our nether crimes
So speedily can venge! But, O poor Gloucester!

Lost he his other eye?

MES^s. Both, both, my lord.
This letter, madam, craves a speedy answer;
'T is from your sister.

GON. [Aside.] One way I like this well;
But being widow, and my Gloucester with
her,

May all the building in my fancy pluck
Upon my hateful life: another way,
The news is not so tart. I'll read, and answer. Exit.

ALB. Where was his son when they did take his eyes?

MESS. Come with my lady hither.

ALB. He is not here.

MESS. No, my good lord; I met him back
again.

ALB. Knows he the wickedness?

MESS. Ay, my good lord; 't was he inform'd against him,
And quit the house on purpose that their punishment

Might have the freer course.

ALB. Gloucester, I live
To thank thee for the love thou show'dst the
king,

And to revenge thine eyes. Come hither,
friend:

Tell me what more thou knowest.

Exeunt.

SCENE III

The French Camp near Dover.

Enter KENT and a Gentleman.

KENT. Why the King of France is so suddenly gone back know you the reason?

GENT. Something he left imperfect in the state, which since his coming forth is thought of; which imports to the kingdom so much fear and danger that his personal return was most required and necessary.

KENT. Who hath he left behind him
general?

GENT. The Marshal of France, Monsieur la Far.

KENT. Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief? 12

GENT. Ay, sir; she took them, read them in my presence;

And now and then an ample tear trill'd
down

Her delicate cheek; it seem'd she was a queen

Over her passion; who, most rebel-like,
Sought to be king o'er her.

KENT. O! then it mov'd her.

GENT. Not to a rage; patience and sorrow
strove

Who should express her goodliest. You have seen

Sunshine and rain at once; her smiles and
tears 20

Were like a better way; those happy smilets
That play'd on her ripe lip seem'd not to know

What guests were in her eyes; which parted
thence,

As pearls from diamonds dropp'd. In brief,
Sorrow would be a rarity most belov'd,
If all could so become it.

KENT. Made she no verbal question?

GENT. Faith, once or twice she heav'd the name of 'father'

Pantingly forth, as if it press'd her heart;
Cried 'sisters! sisters! Shame of ladies!
sisters!

Kent! father! sisters! What! i' the storm?
i' the night? 30

Let pity not be believed! There she shook
The holy water from her heavenly eyes,
And clamour-moisten'd, then away she started

To deal with grief alone.

KENT. It is the stars,
The stars above us, govern our conditions;
Else one self mate and mate could not beget Such different issues. You spok'e not with her since?

GENT. No.

KENT. Was this before the king return'd?

GENT. No, since.

KENT. Well, sir, the poor distressed
Lear's i' the town; 40

Who sometime, in his better tune, remembers

What we are come about, and by no means
Will yield to see his daughter.

GENT. Why, good sir?

KENT. A sovereign shame so elbows him: his own unkindness,

That stripp'd her from his benediction, turn'd her

To foreign casualties, gave her dear rights
To his dog-hearted daughters, these things sting

His mind so venomously that burning shame
Detains him from Cordelia.

GENT. Alack! poor gentleman.

KENT. Of Albany's and Cornwall's powers
you heard not? 50

GENT. 'Tis so, they are afoot.

KENT. Well, sir, I'll bring you to our master Lear,

And leave you to attend him. Some dear
cause

Will in concealment wrap me up awhile;
When I am known aright, you shall not grieve

Lending me this acquaintance. I pray
you, go

Along with me. Exeunt.

SCENE IV

The Same. A Tent.

Enter, with drum and colours, CORDELIA, Doctor, and Soldiers.

COR. Alack! 't is he: why, he was met even now

As mad as the vex'd sea; singing aloud;

Crown'd with rank fumiter and furrowweeds,

With burdocks, hemlock nettles, cuckoo-
flowers,

Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow

In our sustaining corn. A century send forth;

Search every acre in the high-grown field,
And bring him to our eye.

Exit an Officer.

What can man's wisdom

In the restoring his bereaved sense?

He that helps him take all my outward
worth. 10

DOCT. There is means, madam;
Our foster-nurse of nature is repose,

The which he lacks; that to provoke in him,
Are many simples operative, whose power
Will close the eye of anguish.

COR. All bless'd secrets,

All you unpublish'd virtues of the earth,
Spring with my tears! be aidant and remediate

In the good man's distress! Seek, seek for
him,

Lest his ungovern'd rage dissolve the life
That wants the means to lead it.

Enter a Messenger.

MESS. News, madam;

The British powers are marching hitherward. 21

COR. 'T is known before; our preparation
stands

In expectation of them. O dear father!

It is thy business that I go about;

Therefore great France

My mourning and important tears hath pitied.

No blown ambition doth our arms incite,
But love, dear love, and our aged father's
right.

Soon may I hear and see him! Exeunt.

SCENE V

A Room in GLOUCESTER's Castle.

Enter REGAN and OSWALD.

REG. But are my brother's powers set forth?

OSW. Ay, madam.

REG. Himself in person there?

OSW. Madam, with much ado:

Your sister is the better soldier.

REG. Lord Edmund spake not with your lord at home?

OSW. No, madam.

REG. What might import my sister's letter to him?

OSW. I know not, lady.

REG. Faith, he is posted hence on serious matter.

It was great ignorance, Gloucester's eyes
being out,

To let him live; where he arrives he moves 10
All hearts against us. Edmund, I think, is
gone,

In pity of his misery, to dispatch

His nighted life; moreover, to descry
The strength o' the enemy.

OSW. I must needs after him, madam, with my letter.

REG. Our troops set forth to-morrow;
stay with us,

The ways are dangerous.

OSW. I may not, madam:
My lady charg'd my duty in this business.

REG. Why should she write to Edmund?
Might not you

Transport her purposes by word? Belike, 20 Something—I know not what. I'll love thee
much,

Let me unseal the letter.

OSW. Madam, I had rather—

REG. I know your lady does not love her husband;

I am sure of that: and at her late being here
She gave strange œilliades and most speaking looks

To noble Edmund. I know you are of her bosom.

OSW. I, madam!

REG. I speak in understanding; you are,
I know't:

Therefore I do advise you, take this note:
My lord is dead; Edmund and I have talk'd,
And more convenient is he for my hand
Than for your lady's. You may gather
more.

If you do find him, pray you give him this,
And when your mistress hears thus much
from you,

I pray desire her call her wisdom to her:
So, fare you well.

If you do chance to hear of that blind traitor,
Preferment falls on him that cuts him off.

OSW. Would I could meet him, madam; I would show

What party I do follow.

REG. Fare thee well. 40
Exeunt.

SCENE VI

The Country near Dover.

Enter GLOUCESTER, and EDGAR dressed like a peasant.

GLOU. When shall we come to the top of that same hill?

EDG. You do climb up it now; look how we labour.

GLOU. Methinks the ground is even.

EDG. Horrible steep:

Hark! do you hear the sea?

GLOU. No, truly.

EDG. Why, then your other senses grow imperfect

By your eyes' anguish.

GLOU. So may it be, indeed.

Methinks thy voice is alter'd, and thou speak'st

In better phrase and matter than thou didst.

EDG. You're much deceiv'd; in nothing am I chang'd

But in my garments.

GLOU. Methinks you're better spoken.

EDG. Come on, sir; here's the place:
stand still. How fearful

And dizzy 't is to cast one's eyes so low!

The crows and coughts that wing the midway air

Show scarce so gross as beetles; half way
down

Hangs one that gathers samphire, dreadful
trade!

Methinks he seems no bigger than his head.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach

Appear like mice, and yond tall anchoring bark

Diminish'd to her cock, her cock a buoy

Almost too small for sight. The murmuring surge,

That on the unnumber'd idle pebbles chafes,

Cannot be heard so high. I'll look no more,

Lest my brain turn, and the deficient sight

Topple down headlong.

GLOU. Set me where you stand.

EDG. Give me your hand; you are now within a foot

Of the extreme verge: for all beneath the moon

Would I not leap upright.

GLOU. Let go my hand.

Here, friend, 's another purse; in it a jewel
Well worth a poor man's taking; fairies and
gods 29

Prosper it with thee! Go thou further off;

Bid me farewell, and let me hear thee going.

EDG. Now fare you well, good sir.

GLOU. With all my heart.

EDG. Why I do trifle thus with his despair is done to cure it.

GLOU. O you mighty gods!

This world I do renounce, and in your sights
Shake patiently my great affliction off:

If I could bear it longer, and not fall
To quarrel with your great opposeless wills,
My snuff and loathed part of nature should Burn itself out. If Edgar live, O bless him!
Now, fellow, fare thee well.

He falls forward.

EDG. Gone, sir: farewell.
And yet I know not how conceit may rob 42
The treasury of life when life itself Yields to the theft; had he been where he thought
By this had thought been past. Alive or dead?

Ho, you sir! friend! Hear you, sir! speak!
Thus might he pass indeed; yet he revives.
What are you, sir?

GLOU. Away and let me die.

EDG. Hadst thou been aught but gossa-mer, feathers, air,
So many fathom down precipitating, 50
Thou 'dst shiver'd like an egg; but thou
dost breathe,
Hast heavy substance, bleed'st not, speak'st,
art sound.

Ten masts at each make not the altitude
Which thou has perpendicularly fell:
Thy life's a miracle. Speak yet again.

GLOU. But have I fallen or no?

EDG. From the dread summit of this chalky bourn.

Look up a-height; the shrill-gorg'd lark so far

Cannot be seen or heard; do but look up.

GLOU. Alack! I have no eyes.
Is wretchedness depriv'd that benefit 60
To end itself by death? 'T was yet some comfort,

When misery could beguile the tyrant's rage,
And frustrate his proud will.

EDG. Give me your arm:
Up: so; how is 't? Feel you your legs? You
stand.

GLOU. Too well, too well.

EDG. This is above all strangeness.
Upon the crown o' the cliff what thing was that

Which parted from you?

GLOU. A poor unfortunate beggar.

EDG. As I stood here below methought his eyes

Were two full moons; he had a thousand noses,

Horns whelk'd and waw'd like the enridged
sea:

It was some fiend; therefore, thou happy
father,

Think that the clearest gods, who make them
honours

Of men's impossibilities, have preserv'd thee.

GLOU. I do remember now; henceforth I'll bear

Affliction till it do cry out itself

'Enough, enough,' and die. That thing you speak of

I took it for a man; often 't would say

'The fiend, the fiend': he led me to that
place.

EDG. Bear free and patient thoughts.
But who comes here? 80

Enter LEAR, fantastically dressed with wild flowers.

The safer sense will ne'er accommodate His master thus.

LEAR. No, they cannot touch me for coining; I am the king himself.

EDG. O thou side-piercing sight!

LEAR. Nature's above art in that respect.
There's your press-money. That fellow handles his bow like a crow-keeper; draw me a clothier's yard. Look, look! a mouse.
Peace, peace! this piece of toasted cheese will do 't. There's my gauntlet; I'll prove it on a giant. Bring up the brown bills. O!
well flown, bird; i' the clout, i' the clout:
hewgh! Give the word. 93

EDG. Sweet marjoram.

LEAR. Pass.

GLOU. I know that voice.

LEAR. Ha! Goneril, with a white beard!
They flattered me like a dog, and told me I had white hairs in my beard ere the black ones were there. To say 'ay' and 'no' to every thing I said! 'Ay' and 'no' too was no good divinity. When the rain came to wet me once and the wind to make me chatter, when the thunder would not peace at my bidding, there I found 'em, there I smelt 'em out. Go to, they are not men o' their words: they told me I was every thing; 't is a lie, I am not ague-proof. 107

GLOU. The trick of that voice I do well
remember:

Is 't not the king?

LEAR. Ay, every inch a king:
When I do stare, see how the subject quakes.
I pardon that man's life. What was thy cause?

Adultery? 112

Thou shalt not die: die for adultery! No:
The wren goes to 't, and the small gilded fly
Does lecher in my sight.

Let copulation thrive; for Gloucester's basttard son

Was kinder to his father than my daughters
Got 'tween the lawful sheets.

To 't, luxury, pell-mell! for I lack soldiers.
Behold yond simpering dame, 120

Whose face between her forks presageth
snow;

That minces virtue, and does shake the head
To hear of pleasure's name;

The fitchew nor the soiled horse goes to 't
With a more riotous appetite.

Down from the waist they are Centaurs,

Though women all above:

But to the girdle do the gods inherit,

Beneath is all the fiend's:

There's hell, there's darkness, there's the sulphurous pit, 130

Burning, scalding, stench, consumption;
fie, fie, fie! pah, pah! Give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination; there's money for thee.

GLOU. O! let me kiss that hand.

LEAR. Let me wipe it first; it smells of mortality.

GLOU. O ruin'd piece of nature! This great world

Shall so wear out to nought. Dost thou know me?

LEAR. I remember thine eyes well enough.
Dost thou squiny at me? No, do thy worst, blind Cupid; I'll not love. Read thou this challenge; mark but the penning of it. 142

GLOU. Were all thy letters suns, I could not see.

EDG. [Aside.] I would not take this from report; it is,

And my heart breaks at it.

LEAR. Read.

GLOU. What! with the case of eyes?

LEAR. O, ho! are you there with me?
No eyes in your head, nor no money in your purse? Your eyes are in a heavy case, your purse in a light: yet you see how this world goes.

GLOU. I see it feelingly. 152

LEAR. What! art mad? A man may see how this world goes with no eyes. Look with thine ears; see how yond justice rails upon yond simple thief. Hark, in thine ear:

change places; and, handy-dandy, which is the justice, which is the thief? Thou hast seen a farmer's dog bark at a beggar? 159

GLOU. Ay, sir.

LEAR. And the creature run from the cur? There thou might'st behold the great image of authority; a dog's obeyed in office.
Thou rascal beadle, hold thy bloody hand!
Why dost thou lash that whore? Strip thine own back;

Thou hotly lusts to use her in that kind

For which thou whipp'st her. The usurer hangs the cozeners.

Through tatter'd clothes small vices do appear;

Robes and furr'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,

And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks; 170

Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw does pierce
it.

None does offend, none, I say, none; I'll able 'em:

Take that of me, my friend, who have the power

To seal the accuser's lips. Get thee glass
eyes;

And, like a scurvy politician, seem

To see the things thou dost not. Now, now, now, now;

Pull off my boots; harder, harder; so.

EDG. [Aside.] O! matter and impertinency mix'd;

Reason in madness.

LEAR. If thou wilt weep my fortunes, take my eyes; 180

I know thee well enough; thy name is Gloucester;

Thou must be patient; we came crying
hither;

Thou know'st the first time that we smell the
air

We waul and cry. I will preach to thee: mark.

GLOU. Alack, alack the day!

LEAR. When we are born, we cry that we are come

To this great stage of fools. This' a good block!

It were a delicate stratagem to shoe

A troop of horse with felt; I'll put 't in proof,

And when I have stol'n upon these sons-in-
law, 190

Then, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!

Enter a Gentleman, with Attendants.

GENT. O! here he is; lay hand upon him.
Sir,

Your most dear daughter—

LEAR. No rescue? What! a prisoner? I am even

The natural fool of fortune. Use me well;
You shall have ransom. Let me have a surgeon;

I am cut to the brains.

GENT. You shall have any thing.

LEAR. No seconds? all myself?

Why this would make a man a man of salt,
To use his eyes for garden water-pots, 200
Ay, and laying autumn's dust.

GENT. Good sir,—

LEAR. I will die bravely, like a smug bridegroom. What!

I will be jovial: come, come; I am a king,
My masters, know you that?

GENT. You are a royal one, and we obey
you,

LEAR. Then there's life in 't. Nay, an you get it, you shall get it by running. Sa, sa, sa, sa.

Exit; Attendants follow.

GENT. A sight most pitiful in the meanest
wretch,

Past speaking of in a king! Thou hast one daughter, 209

Who redeems nature from the general curse
Which twain have brought her to.

EDG. Hail, gentle sir!

GENT. Sir, speed you: what's your will?

EDG. Do you hear aught, sir, of a battle toward?

GENT. Most sure and vulgar; every one hears that,
Which can distinguish sound.

EDG. But, by your favour,
How near's the other army?

GENT. Near, and on speedy foot; the main descry

Stands on the hourly thought.

EDG. I thank you, sir: that's all.

GENT. Though that the queen on special cause is here, 219

Her army is mov'd on.

EDG. I thank you, sir.

Exit Gentleman.

GLOU. You ever-gentle gods, take my breath from me:

Let not my worse spirit tempt me again

To die before you please!

EDG. Well pray you, father.

GLOU. Now, good sir, what are you?

EDG. A most poor man, made tame to fortune's blows;

Who, by the art of known and feeling sorrows,

Am pregnant to good pity. Give me your
hand,

I'll lead you to some biding.

GLOU. Hearty thanks:

The bounty and the benison of heaven

To boot, and boot! 229

Enter OSWALD.

Osw. A proclaim'd prize! Most happy!
That eyeless head of thine was first fram'd flesh

To raise my fortunes. Thou old unhappy traitor,

Briefly thyself remember: the sword is out
That must destroy thee.

GLOU. Now let thy friendly hand
Put strength enough to 't.

EDGAR interposes.

Osw. Wherefore, bold peasant,
Dar'st thou support a publish'd traitor?
Hence;

Lest that the infection of his fortune take
Like hold on thee. Let go his arm.

EDG. Chill not let go, zir, without vur-ther 'casion.

Osw. Let go, slave, or thou diest. 241

EDG. Good gentleman, go your gait, and let poor volk pass. An chud ha' bin zwag-gered out of my life, 't would not ha' bin zo long as 't is by a vortnight. Nay, come not near th' old man; keep out, che vor ye, or ise try whether your costard or my ballow be the harder. Chill be plain with you.

Osw. Out, dunghill!

EDG. Chill pick your teeth, zur. Come;
no matter vor your foins. 251

They fight, and EDGAR knocks him down.

Osw. Slave, thou hast slain me. Villain, take my purse.

If ever thou wilt thrive, bury my body;
And give the letters which thou fin'st about
me

To Edmund Earl of Gloucester; seek him
out

Upon the English party: O! untimely death.
Death! [Dies.]

EDG. I know thee well: a serviceable villain;

As duteous to the vices of thy mistress
As badness would desire.

GLOU. What! is he dead?

EDG. Sit you down, father; rest you. 260
Let's see these pockets: the letters that he speaks of

May be my friends. He's dead; I am only sorry

He had no other death's-man. Let us
see:

Leave, gentle wax; and, manners, blame us
not:

To know our enemies' minds, we'd rip their
hearts;

Their papers is more lawful. 266

Let our reciprocal vows be remembered. You have many opportunities to cut him off; if your will want not, time and place will be fruitfully offered. There is nothing done if he return the conqueror; then am I the prisoner, and his bed my goal; from the loathed warmth whereof deliver me, and supply the place for your labour.

Your—wife, so I would say—

Affectionate servant,

GONERIL.

O undistinguish'd space of woman's will!
A plot upon her virtuous husband's life,
And the exchange my brother! Here, in the sands, 280

Thee I'll rake up, the post unsanctified
Of murderous lechers; and in the mature
time

With this ungracious paper strike the sight Of the death-practis'd duke. For him 't is well

That of thy death and business I can tell.

GLOU. The king is mad: how stiff is my vile sense,

That I stand up, and have ingenious feeling
Of my huge sorrows! Better I were distract:

So should my thoughts be sever'd from my griefs,

And woes by wrong imaginations lose 290
The knowledge of themselves.

Drum afar off.

EDG. Give me your hand:

Far off, methinks, I hear the beaten drum.

Come, father, I'll bestow you with a friend.

Exeunt.

SCENE VII

A Tent in the French Camp.

LEAR on a bed asleep, soft music playing;
Gentleman, and others attending. Enter
CORDELIA, KENT, and Doctor.

COR. O, thou good Kent! how shall I live and work

To match thy goodness? My life will be too short,

And every measure fail me.

KENT. To be acknowledg'd, madam, is o'erpaid.

All my reports go with the modest truth,
Nor more nor clipp'd, but so.

COR. Be better suited:
These weeds are memories of those worser hours:

I prithee, put them off.

KENT. Pardon me, dear madam;

Yet to be known shortens my made intent:
My boon I make it that you know me not 10
Till time and I think meet.

COR. Then be 't so, my good lord. How does the king?

DOCT. Madam, sleeps still.

COR. O you kind gods,
Cure this great breach in his abused nature!
The untun'd and jarring senses, O! wind up
Of this child-changed father.

DOCT. So please your majesty
That we may wake the king? he hath slept
long.

COR. Be govern'd by your knowledge, and proceed 19

I' the sway of your own will. Is he array'd?

DOCT. Ay, madam; in the heaviness of
sleep

We put fresh garments on him.

KENT. Be by, good madam, when we do awake him;

I doubt not of his temperance.

COR. Very well.
Music.

DOCT. Please you, draw near. Louder
the music there!

COR. O my dear father! Restoration hang

Thy medicine on my lips, and let this kiss Repair those violent harms that my two sisters

Have in thy reverence made!

KENT. Kind and dear princess!

COR. Had you not been their father, these white flakes 31
Did challenge pity of them. Was this a face

To be oppos'd against the warring winds?
To stand against the deep dread-bolted
thunder?

In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick cross lightning? to watch, poor perdu!

With this thin helm? Mine enemy's dog,
Though he had bit me, should have stood that night

Against my fire. And wast thou fain, poor
father,

To hovel thee with swine and rogues for-
lorn,

In short and musty straw? Alack, alack! 40
'Tis wonder that thy life and wits at once
Had not concluded all. He wakes; speak
to him.

DOCT. Madam, do you; 't is fittest.

COR. How does my royal lord? How fares your majesty?

LEAR. You do me wrong to take me out
o' the grave;

Thou art a soul in bliss; but I am bound
Upon a wheel of fire, that mine own tears
Do scald like molten lead.

COR. Sir, do you know me?

LEAR. You are a spirit, I know; when did you die?

COR. Still, still, far wide. 50

DOCT. He's scarce awake; let him alone awhile.

LEAR. Where have I been? Where am
I? Fair daylight?

I am mightily abus'd. I should e'en die with pity

To see another thus. I know not what to say.

I will not swear these are my hands: let's
see;

I feel this pin prick. Would I were assur'd
Of my condition!

COR. O! look upon me, sir,
And hold your hands in benediction o'er me.
No, sir, you must not kneel.

LEAR. Pray, do not mock me:
I am a very foolish fond old man, 60
Fourscore and upward, not an hour more nor less;

And, to deal plainly,
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

Methinks I should know you and know this
man;

Yet I am doubtful; for I am mainly ignorant

What place this is, and all the skill I have Remembers not these garments; nor I know
not

Where I did lodge last night. Do not laugh at me;

For, as I am a man, I think this lady
To be my child Cordelia.

COR. And so I am, I am.

LEAR. Be your tears wet? Yes, faith. I pray, weep not: 71

If you have poison for me, I will drink
it.

I know you do not love me; for your sisters

Have, as I do remember, done me wrong:
You have some cause, they have not.

COR. No cause, no cause.

LEAR. Am I in France?

KENT. In your own kingdom, sir.

LEAR. Do not abuse me.

DOCT. Be comforted, good madam; the great rage,
You see, is kill'd in him; and yet it is danger
To make him even o'er the time he has lost.

Desire him to go in; trouble him no more
Till further settling.

COR. Will 't please your highness walk?

LEAR. You must bear with me.

Pray you now, forget and forgive: I am old and foolish.

Exeunt LEAR, CORDELIA, Doctor, and Attendants.

GENT. Holds it true, sir, that the Duke of Cornwall was so slain?

KENT. Most certain, sir.

GENT. Who is conductor of his people?

KENT. As 't is said, the bastard son of Gloucester.

GENT. They say Edgar, his banished son, is with the Earl of Kent in Germany. 91

KENT. Report is changeable. 'T is time to look about; the powers of the kingdom approach apace.

GENT. The arbitrement is like to be bloody. Fare you well, sir. Exit.

KENT. My point and period will be thoroughly wrought,

Or well or ill, as this day's battle 's fought.
Exit.

ACT V

SCENE I

The British Camp near Dover.

Enter, with drum and colours, EDMUND, REGAN, Officers, Soldiers, and Others.

EDM. Know of the duke if his last purpose hold,
Or whether since he is advis'd by aught
To change the course; he's full of alteration
And self-reproving; bring his constant pleasure. [To an Officer, who goes out.]

REG. Our sister's man is certainly mis-carried.

EDM. 'T is to be doubted, madam.

REG. Now, sweet lord,
You know the goodness I intend upon you:
Tell me, but truly, but then speak the truth,
Do you not love my sister?

EDM. In honour'd love.

REG. But have you never found my brother's way 10
To the forfended place?

EDM. That thought abuses you.

REG. I am doubtful that you have been conjunct
And bosom'd with her, as far as we call hers.

EDM. No, by mine honour, madam.

REG. I never shall endure her: dear my
lord,
Be not familiar with her.

EDM. Fear me not.
She and the duke her husband!

Enter, with drum and colours, ALBANY, GONERIL, and Soldiers.

GON. [Aside.] I had rather lose the battle than that sister
Should loosen him and me.

ALB. Our very loving sister, well be-met.
Sir, this I heard; the king is come to his daughter,

With others whom the rigour of our state Forc'd to cry out. Where I could not be honest,

I never yet was valiant: for this business,
It toucheth us, as France invades our land,
Not bolds the king, with others, whom I fear,
Most just and heavy causes make oppose.

EDM. Sir, you speak nobly.

REG. Why is this reason'd?

GON. Combine together 'gainst the enemy;

For these domestic and particular broils 30
Are not the question here.

ALB. Let's then determine
With the ancient of war on our proceeding.

EDM. I shall attend you presently at your tent.

REG. Sister, you'll go with us?

GON. No.

REG. 'T is most convenient; pray you,
go with us.

GON. [Aside.] O, ho! I know the riddle.
I will go.

Enter EDGAR, disguised.

EDG. If e'er your grace had speech with man so poor,
Hear me one word.

ALB. I'll overtake you. Speak.

Exeunt EDMUND, REGAN, GONERIL, Officers, Soldiers, and Attendants.

EDG. Before you fight the battle, ope this letter. 40

If you have victory, let the trumpet sound
For him that brought it: wretched though I seem,

I can produce a champion that will prove
What is avouched there. If you miscarry,
Your business of the world hath so an end,
And machination ceases. Fortune love
you!

ALB. Stay till I have read the letter.

EDG. I was forbid it.
When time shall serve, let but the herald cry,
And I'll appear again.

ALB. Why, fare thee well: I will o'erlook thy paper. Exit EDGAR. 50

Re-enter EDMUND.

EDM. The enemy's in view; draw up your powers.
Here is the guess of their true strength and forces

By diligent discovery; but your haste
Is now urg'd on you.

ALB. We will greet the time. Exit.

EDM. To both these sisters have I sworn my love;

Each jealous of the other, as the sfung
Are of the adder. Which of them shall I take?

Both? one? or neither? Neither can be enjoy'd

If both remain alive: to take the widow
Exasperates, makes mad her sister Goneril;

And hardly shall I carry out my side, 61
Her husband being alive. Now then, we'll use

His countenance for the battle; which being
done,

Let her who would be rid of him devise
His speedy taking off. As for the mercy
Which he intends to Lear and to Cordelia,
The battle done, and they within our power,
Shall never see his pardon; for my state
Stands on me to defend, not to debate.

Exit.

SCENE II

A Field between the two Camps.

Alarum within. Enter, with drum and colours, LEAR, CORDELIA, and their Forces; and exeunt.

Enter EDGAR and GLOUCESTER.

EDG. Here, father, take the shadow of this tree
For your good host; pray that the right may thrive.

If ever I return to you again,
I'll bring you comfort.

GLOU. Grace go with you, sir!

Exit EDGAR.

Alarum; afterwards a retreat. Re-enter EDGAR.

EDG. Away, old man! give me thy hand:
away!

King Lear hath lost, he and his daughter
ta'en.

Give me thy hand; come on.

GLOU. No further, sir; a man may rot even here.

EDG. What! in ill thoughts again? Men must endure

Their going hence, even as their coming hither: 10

Ripeness is all. Come on.

GLOU. And that's true too.

Exeunt.

SCENE III

The British Camp near Dover.

Enter, in conquest, with drum and colours, EDMUND; LEAR and CORDELIA, prisoners; Officers, Soldiers, etc.

EDM. Some officers take them away:
good guard,

Until their greater pleasures first be known.
That are to censure them.

COR. We are not the first

Who, with best meaning, have incurr'd the worst.

For thee, oppressed king, am I cast down;
Myself could else out-frown false fortune's
frown.

Shall we not see these daughters and these sisters?

LEAR. No, no, no, no! Come, let's away to prison;

We two alone will sing like birds i' the cage:
When thou dost ask me blessing, I'll kneel
down, 10

And ask of thee forgiveness: so we'll live,
And pray, and sing, and tell old tales, and laugh

At gilded butterflies, and hear poor rogues Talk of court news; and we'll talk with them
too,

Who loses and who wins; who's in, who's
out;

And take upon 's the mystery of things,
As if we were God's spies: and we'll wear out,
In a wall'd prison, packs and sects of great ones

That ebb and flow by the moon.

EDM. Take them away.

LEAR. Upon such sacrifices, my Cordelia, 20

The gods themselves throw incense. Have
I caught thee?

He that parts us shall bring a brand from
heaven,

And fire us hence like foxes. Wipe thine
eyes;

The good-years shall devour them, flesh and
fell,

Ere they shall make us weep; we'll see 'em
starv'd first.

Come.

Exeunt LEAR and CORDELIA, guarded.

EDM. Come hither, captain; hark.

Take thou this note; [Giving a paper.]

Go follow them to prison.

One step I have advanc'd thee; if thou dost
As this instructs thee, thou dost make thy
way

To noble fortunes; know thou this, that
men

Are as the time is; to be tender-minded
Does not become a sword; thy great employment

Will not bear question; either say thou 't do 't,

Or thrive by other means.

OFF. I'll do 't, my lord.

EDM. About it; and write happy when thou hast done.

Mark,—I say, instantly, and carry it so
As I have set it down.

OFF. I cannot draw a cart nor eat dried oats;

If it be man's work I'll do it. Exit.

Flourish. Enter ALBANY, GONERIL, REGAN, Officers, and Attendants.

ALB. Sir, you have show'd to-day your valiant strain,
And fortune led you well; you have the captives

Who were the opposites of this day's strife;
We do require them of you, so to use them
As we shall find their merits and our safety
May equally determine.

EDM. Sir, I thought it fit
To send the old and miserable king
To some retention and appointed guard;
Whose age has charms in it, whose title
more,

To pluck the common bosom on his side,
And turn our impress'd lances in our eyes 50
Which do command them. With him I sent the queen;

My reason all the same; and they are ready
To-morrow, or at further space, to appear Where you shall hold your session. At this time

We sweat and bleed; the friend hath lost his
friend,

And the best quarrels, in the heat, are curs'd

By those that feel their sharpness:
The question of Cordelia and her father
Requires a fitter place.

ALB. Sir, by your patience,
I hold you but a subject of this war, 60
Not as a brother.

REG. That's as we list to grace him:
Methinks our pleasure might have been demanded,

Ere you had spoke so far. He led our
powers,

Bore the commission of my place and person;
The which immediacy may well stand up,
And call itself your brother.

GON. Not so hot;
In his own grace he doth exalt himself
More than in your addition.

REG. In my rights,
By me invested, he compeers the best.

ALB. That were the most, if he should husband you. 70

REG. Jesters do oft prove prophets.

GON. Holla, holla!
That eye that told you so look'd but asquint.

REG. Lady, I am not well; else I should answer

From a full-flowing stomach. General,
Take thou my soldiers, prisoners, patrimony;
Dispose of them, of me; the walls are thine;
Witness the world, that I create thee here
My lord and master.

GON. Mean you to enjoy him?

ALB. The let-alone lies not in your good will.

EDM. Nor in thine, lord.

ALB. Half-blooded fellow, yes.

REG. [To EDMUND.] Let the drum strike, and prove my title thine. 81

ALB. Stay yet; hear reason. Edmund, I arrest thee

On capital treason; and, in thy arrest,
This gilded serpent. [Pointing to GONERIL.]

For your claim, fair sister,

I bar it in the interest of my wife;

'T is she is sub-contracted to this lord,

And I, her husband, contradict your bans.

If you will marry, make your loves to me,

My lady is bespoken.

GON. An interlude!

ALB. Thou art arm'd, Gloucester; let the trumpet sound;

If none appear to prove upon thy person
Thy heinous, manifest, and many treasons,
There is my pledge; [Throws down a glove.]

I'll prove it on thy heart,

Ere I taste bread, thou art in nothing less
Than I have here proclaim'd thee.

REG. Sick! O, sick!

GON. [Aside.] If not, I'll ne'er trust medicine.

EDM. There's my exchange: [Throws down a glove.] what in the world he is

That names me traitor, villain-like he lies.
Call by thy trumpet: he that dares approach
On him, on you, who not? I will maintain
My truth and honour firmly.

ALB. A herald, ho!

EDM. A herald, ho! a herald!

ALB. Trust to thy single virtue; for thy soldiers,
All levied in my name, have in my name
Took their discharge.

REG. My sickness grows upon me.

ALB. She is not well; convey her to my tent
Exit REGAN, led.

Enter a Herald.

Come hither, herald,—Let the trumpet
sound,—

And read out this. 108

OFF. Sound trumpet!
A trumpet sounds.

HER. If any man of quality or degree within the lists of the army will maintain upon Edmund, supposed Earl of Gloucester, that he is a manifold traitor, let him appear by the third sound of the trumpet. He is bold in his defence. 114

EDM. Sound!
First trumpet.

HER. Again!
Second trumpet.

HER. Again!
Third trumpet.
Trumpet answers within.

Enter EDGAR, armed, with a trumpet before him.

ALB. Ask him his purposes, why he appears
Upon this call o' the trumpet.

HER. What are you?
Your name? your quality? and why you answer 120

This present summons?

EDG. Know, my name is lost;
By treason's tooth bare-gnawn and canker-bit:

Yet am I noble as the adversary
I come to cope.

ALB. Which is that adversary?

EDG. What's he that speaks for Edmund
Earl of Gloucester?

EDM. Himself: what say'st thou to him?

EDG. Draw thy sword,
That, if my speech offend a noble heart,
Thy arm may do thee justice; here is mine:
Behold, it is the privilege of mine honours,
My oath, and my profession: I protest, 130

Maugre thy strength, youth, place, and eminence,

Despise thy victor sword and fire-new fortune,

Thy valour and thy heart, thou art a traitor,
False to thy gods, thy brother, and thy
father,

Conspirant 'gainst this high illustrious
prince,

And, from the extremest upward of thy head
To the descent and dust below thy foot,
A most toad-spotted traitor. Say thou 'No,'
This sword, this arm, and my best spirits are bent

To prove upon thy heart, whereto I speak,
Thou liest.

EDM. In wisdom I should ask thy name;
But since thy outside looks so fair and war-
like,

And that thy tongue some say of breeding
breathes,

What safe and nicely I might well delay
By rule of knighthood, I disdain and spurn;
Back do I toss these treasons to thy head,
With the hell-hated lie o'erwhelm thy heart,
Which, for they yet glance by and scarcely bruise,

This sword of mine shall give them instant
way,

Where they shall rest for ever. Trumpets,
speak. 150

Alarums. They fight. EDMUND falls.

ALB. Save him! save him!

GON. This is practice, Gloucester:
By the law of arms thou wast not bound to answer

An unknown opposite; thou art not vanquish'd,

But cozen'd and beguil'd.

ALB. Shut your mouth, dame,
Or with this paper shall I stop it. Hold, sir;
Thou worse than any name, read thine own evil;

No tearing, lady; I perceive you know it.

Gives the letter to EDMUND.

GON. Say, if I do, the laws are mine, not
thine:

Who can arraign me for 't? Exit.

ALB. Most monstrous! O!
Know'st thou this paper?

EDM. Ask me not what I know.

ALB. Go after her: she's desperate; govern her. Exit an Officer.

EDM. What you have charg'd me with,
that have I done,
And more, much more; the time will bring it out:
'T is past, and so am I. But what art thou That hast this fortune on me? If thou 'rt noble,
I do forgive thee.

EDG. Let's exchange charity.
I am no less in blood than thou art, Edmund;
If more, the more thou hast wrong'd me.
My name is Edgar, and thy father's son.
The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices
Make instruments to plague us: 171
The dark and vicious place where thee he got

Cost him his eyes.

EDM. Thou hast spoken right, 't is true.
The wheel is come full circle; I am here,

ALB. Methought thy very gait did
prophesy

A royal nobleness: I must embrace thee:

Let sorrow split my heart, if ever I

Did hate thee or thy father.

EDG. Worthy prince, I know 't.

ALB. Where have you hid yourself?

How have you known the miseries of your
father? 180

EDG. By nursing them, my lord. List a brief tale;

And when 't is told, O! that my heart would burst!

The bloody proclamation to escape

That follow'd me so near,—O! our lives'
sweetness,

That we the pain of death would hourly die
Rather than die at once!—taught me to shift

Into a madman's rags, to assume a semblance

That very dogs disdain'd: and in this habit
Met I my father with his bleeding rings, Their precious stones new lost; became his
guide, 190

Led him, begg'd for him, sav'd him from despair;

Never, O fault! reveal'd myself unto him,
Until some half-hour past, when I was arm'd;
Not sure, though hoping, of this good success,

I ask'd his blessing, and from first to last Told him my pilgrimage: but his flaw'd
heart,—

Alack, too weak the conflict to support!—

'Twixt two extremes of passion, joy and grief,

Burst smilingly.

EDM. This speech of yours hath mov'd
me,

And shall perchance do good; but speak
you on; 200

You look as you had something more to say.

ALB. If there be more, more woeful, hold it in;

For I am almost ready to dissolve,

Hearing of this.

EDG. This would have seem'd a period

To such as love not sorrow; but another,
To amplify too much, would make much
more,

And top extremity.

Whilst I was big in clamour came there a
man,

Who, having seen me in my worst estate,
Shunn'd my abhorr'd society; but then,
finding 210

Who 't was that so endur'd, with his strong
arms

He fasten'd on my neck, and bellow'd out
As he'd burst heaven; threw him on my
father;

Told the most piteous tale of Lear and him
That ever ear receiv'd; which in recounting His grief grew puissant, and the strings of
life

Began to crack: twice then the trumpets sounded,

And there I left him tranç'd.

ALB. But who was this?

EDG. Kent, sir, the banish'd Kent; who in disguise

Follow'd his enemy king, and did him service 223

Improve for a slave.

Enter a Gentleman, with a bloody knife.

GENT. Help, help! O, help!

EDG. What kind of help?

ALB. Speak, man.

EDG. What means that bloody knife?

GENT. 'T is hot, it smokes;
It came even from the heart of—O! she's
dead.

ALB. Who dead? speak, man.

GENT. Your lady, sir, your lady: and her sister

By her is poison'd; she confesses it.

EDM. I was contracted to them both: all three

Now marry in an instant.

EDG. Here comes Kent.

ALB. Produce the bodies, be they alive or dead; 230

This judgment of the heavens, that makes us tremble,

Touches us not with pity.

Exit Gentleman.

Enter KENT.

O! is this he?

The time will not allow the compliment
Which very manners urges.

KENT. I am come

To bid my king and master aye good night;
Is he not here?

ALB. Great thing of us forgot!
Speak, Edmund, where's the king? and where's Cordelia?

Seest thou this object, Kent?

The bodies of GONERIL and REGAN are brought in.

KENT. Alack! why thus?

EDM. Yet Edmund was belov'd:
The one the other poison'd for my sake, 240
And after slew herself.

ALB. Even so. Cover their faces.

EDM. I pant for life: some good I mean to do

Despite of mine own nature. Quickly send,
Be brief in it, to the castle; for my writ
Is on the life of Lear and on Cordelia.

Nay, send in time.

ALB. Run, run! O, run!

EDG. To who, my lord? Who has the office? send

Thy token of reprieve.

EDM. Well thought on: take my sword,
Give it the captain.

ALB. Haste thee, for thy life.

Exit EDGAR.

EDM. He hath commission from thy wife
and me

To hang Cordelia in the prison, and
To lay the blame upon her own despair,
That she fordid herself.

ALB. The gods defend her! Bear him
hence awhile.

EDMUND is borne off.

Re-enter LEAR, with CORDELIA dead in his arms; EDGAR, Officer, and Others.

LEAR. Howl, howl, howl, howl! O! you are men of stones:

Had I your tongues and eyes, I'd use them
so

That heaven's vault should crack. She's gone for ever.

I know when one is dead, and when one lives; 260

She's dead as earth. Lend me a lookingglass;

If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,
Why, then she lives.

KENT. Is this the promis'd end?

EDG. Or image of that horror?

ALB. Fall and cease!

LEAR. This feather stirs; she lives! if it be so,

It is a chance which does redeem all sorrows

That ever I have felt.

KENT. [Kneeling.] O, my good master!

LEAR. Prithee, away.

EDG. 'T is noble Kent, your friend.

LEAR. A plague upon you, murderers, traitors all!

I might have sav'd her; now, she's gone for ever! 270

Cordelia, Cordelia! stay a little. Ha!

What is 't thou say'st? Her voice was ever soft,

Gentle and low, an excellent thing in woman.
I kill'd the slave that was a-hanging thee.

OFF. 'T is true, my lords, he did.

LEAR. Did I not, fellow?

I have seen the day, with my good biting falchion

I would have made them skip: I am old
now,

And these same crosses spoil me. Who are
you?

Mine eyes are not o' the best: I'll tell you straight.

KENT. If fortune brag of two she lov'd and hated, 280

One of them we behold.

LEAR. This is a dull sight. Are you not Kent?

KENT. The same;

Your servant Kent. Where is your servant
Caius?

LEAR. He's a good fellow, I can tell you
that;

He'll strike, and quickly too. He's dead and rotten.

KENT. No, my good lord; I am the very man,—
 LEAR. I'll see that straight.
 KENT. That from your first of difference and decay,
 Have follow'd your sad steps,—
 LEAR. You are welcome hither.
 KENT. Nor no man else; all 's cheerless, dark and deadly: 290
 Your eldest daughters have fordone themselves,
 And desperately are dead.
 LEAR. Ay, so I think.
 ALB. He knows not what he says, and vain is it
 That we present us to him.
 EDG. Very bootless.

Enter an Officer.

OFF. Edmund is dead, my lord.
 ALB. That's but a trifle here.
 You lords and noble friends, know our intent;
 What comfort to this great decay may come
 Shall be applied: for us, we will resign,
 During the life of this old majesty,
 To him our absolute power: [To EDGAR and KENT.] You, to your rights, 300
 With boot and such addition as your honours Have more than merited. All friends shall taste
 The wages of their virtue, and all foes
 The cup of their deservings. O! see, see!
 LEAR. And my poor fool is hang'd! No, no, no life!
 Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life,

And thou no breath at all? Thou 'lt come no more,
 Never, never, never, never, never!
 Pray you, undo this button: thank you, sir. 305
 Do you see this? Look on her, look, her lips,
 Look there, look there! [Dies.]
 EDG. He faints! My lord, my lord!
 KENT. Break, heart; I prithee, break!
 EDG. Look up, my lord.
 KENT. Vex not his ghost: O! let him pass; he hates him
 That would upon the rack of this tough world
 Stretch him out longer.
 EDG. He is gone, indeed.
 KENT. The wonder is he hath endur'd so long:
 He but usurp'd his life.
 ALB. Bear them from hence. Our present business Is general woe. [To KENT and EDGAR.]
 Friends of my soul, you twain
 Rule in this realm, and the god's state sustain. 320
 KENT. I have a journey, sir, shortly to go;
 My master calls me, I must not say no.
 ALB. The weight of this sad time we must obey;
 Speak what we feel, not what we ought to say.
 The oldest hath borne most: we that are young
 Shall never see so much, nor live so long.
Exeunt, with a dead march.

JEAN RACINE (1639-1699)

ATHALIAH

A TRAGEDY FOUNDED UPON HOLY SCRIPTURE

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

JOASH, King of Judah and Son of Ahaziah.
 ATHALIAH, Widow of Joram, and Grandmother of Joash.
 JEHOIADA, the High Priest.
 JEHOSEBA, Aunt of Joash, and Wife of the High Priest.
 ZACHARIAH, Son of Jehoiada and Jehosheba.
 SALOME, Sister of Zachariah.

ABNER, one of the Chief Officers of the King: of Judah.
 AZARIAH, ISHMAEL, and the three other Chiefs of the Priests and Levites.
 MATTAN, an Apostate priest; Chief Priest of Baal.
 NABAL, confidential Friend of Mattan.
 HAGAR, an Attendant of Athaliah.
 Band of Priests and Levites.
 Attendants of Athaliah.
 Nurse of Joash.
 Chorus of young Maidens of the Tribe of Levi.

The scene is laid in the Temple at Jerusalem, in an ante-chamber of the High Priest's dwelling.

ACT I

SCENE I

JEHOIADA and ABNER

ABNER. Yea, to the Temple of the Lord
I come,
To worship with the solemn rites of old,
To celebrate with thee the famous day When from the holy mount our Law was giv'n.
How times are changed! Soon as the sacred trump 5
With joyous blast announced this day's return,
The Temple porticoes, with garlands gay,
Could not contain the crowds of the devout;
Before the altar they in order due,
Bringing the earliest harvest of their fields, 10
Offered those firstfruits to the Lord of all;
Nor were there priests enough for sacrifice.
A woman's will has dared to check these throngs,
And turn'd the day's bright glory into gloom.
Scarce dare a few most zealous worshippers
Recall for us some shadow of the past; 16
The rest are all forgetful of their God,
Or, e'en to Baal's altars flocking now,
In shameful orgies learn to bear their part,
And curse the Name on which their fathers
call'd. 20
My soul is troubled,—naught will I conceal—
Lest Athaliah visit upon thee
Her vengeance, spurn all remnant of respect,
And tear thee from the altar of the Lord.
JEHOI. Whence comes to thee this pre-sage dark to-day? 25
ABNER. Holy and righteous, how canst thou escape?
Long has she hated that rare constancy
Which adds new brilliance to thy mitred
brow;
Long has she treated thy religious zeal
As obstinate sedition and revolt. 30
The shining virtues of thy faithful spouse
Have earned the special hatred of the Queen.
If Aaron's priesthood has devolved on thee,
Thy wife is sister to our latest king.
Mattan moreover, that apostate priest, 35
His foul desertion from our altars crowns
With eager persecution of all good,
And, worse than Athaliah, spurs her on.
'Tis not enough that in a foreign garb
The Levite serves at Baal's altar now, 40
This Temple is to him a sore offence,

And he would fain destroy the God he left.
No means he leaves untried to ruin thee,
And undermines with praise no less than
blame.
He feigns for thee a treacherous kindliness, 45
Masking the blackness of his venom thus.
Sometimes he prompts the Queen to dread thy power,
And sometimes, looking to her lust for gold,
Pretends that somewhere known to thee
alone,
Thou hidest treasures David had amass'd. 50
For two days past the proud imperious
Queen
Has seem'd as though consumed by baffled spite.
I saw her yesterday with furious eyes
Glare at this sacred place, and mark'd her
well,
As if within the Temple's deep recess 55
Lurk'd God's avenger arm'd to punish her.
The more I think thereon, the less I doubt
On thee her wrath is ready now to burst,
And that, with all her mother's thirst for
blood,
E'en in His shrine she will defy our God. 60 JEHOI. He who enchains the fury of the waves
Knows how to curb the plots of wicked men.
Submitting humbly to His holy will,
I fear my God, and know no other fear.
And yet, I thank thee, Abner, for thy zeal 65
That o'er my peril keeps a watchful eye.
I see injustice chafes thine inmost heart,
Thou art a faithful son of Israel still.
For that may Heaven be bless'd! But secret wrath
And passive worth, art thou content with these? 70
Is faith sincere, if it declines to act?
An impious foreigner for eight long years Has David's throne usurp'd, with all its rights,
Unpunish'd waded in our princes' blood,
Foul murderess of the children of her son, 75
And e'en against our God has raised her arm.
And thou, a pillar of this trembling state,
Bred in the camp of good Jehoshaphat,
Under his son Hehoram in command,
On whom alone our towns in terror lean'd 80
When Ahaziah's unexpected death
Scatter'd his armies before Jehu's face, Say'st thou—"I fear the Lord and own His truth!"

Lo, by my mouth to thee the Lord replies,—
 “What boots it that thou boast zeal for My
 Law? 85

Thinkest to honour Me by barren vows?
 What fruit have I of all thy sacrifice?
 Need I the blood of heifers and of goats?
 Thy princes' blood cries out, and is not
 heard.

Break, break all compact with impiety, 90
 Root up the crimes amidst My people rife,
 And come and sacrifice thy victims then.”

ABNER. What can I do? The people have lost heart,

Judah is cow'd, and Benjamin is weak;
 The day that saw their royal line extinct 95
 Extinguish'd all their ancient valour too.

The Lord Himself, they say, withdraws from
 us,

Tho' once so jealous of His people's praise;
 He sees unmoved their majesty abased,
 And His compassion is at last worn out. 100
 No more for us His mighty arm outstretch'd
 With countless marvels terrifies our foes;
 His Ark is dumb,—utters no oracle.

JEHOL. Yet when did miracles abound as
 now?

When by more signs has God display'd His
 power? 105

Will ye have always eyes that cannot see, Ungrateful people? Shall His mightiest
 deeds

Strike on your ears, nor ever move your hearts?

Say, my dear Abner, must I needs repeat
 The wonders brought to pass in these our days; 110

The signal fall of Israel's tyrant kings,
 And God found faithful to perform His threats;

Ahab destroy'd, and with his blood defiled
 The plot of land which murder had usurp'd;
 Hard by that fatal field Jezebel slain, 115
 A Queen down trampled under horse's hoofs,
 The dogs that lick'd up her inhuman blood,
 The mangled limbs of her dishonour'd corpse;
 The troop of lying prophets brought to
 shame,

The fire from heav'n that on the altar fell;
 Elijah's voice ruling the elements, 121

The skies thereby shut up, the earth like
 brass,

For three whole years left without rain or dew;

The dead arising at Elisha's word?

Recall, O Abner, these portentous signs, 125
 God is to-day as He has always been.
 He can unfold His glory when He will,
 And ever in His mind His people dwell.

ABNER. But where the promises so often
 made

To David and to Solomon his son? 130
 Alas! We hoped that from their fruitful stock

Kings were to issue in a numerous train;
 That over every nation, tribe, and tongue
 One of their lineage should extend his sway, Should everywhere make war and strife to cease, 135

And at his footstool see earth's proudest kings.

JEHOL. And why distrust the promises of
 Heaven?

ABNER. That son of David, where shall he be found?

Can Heav'n itself restore the living sap
 Of that dry tree, now wither'd at the root?
 E'en in his cradle Athaliah slew 141
 The babe, and eight years after can he live?
 Ah! might it be her fury miss'd its aim,
 That of our royal blood some drop escaped—

JEHOL. What would'st thou do?

ABNER. O happy day for me! 145
 How gladly would I go to meet my king!
 Doubt not that to his feet our eager tribes,—
 But wherefore mock me with these idle
 dreams?

Ill-fated heir of our victorious kings,
 We had but Ahaziah, with his sons; 150
 By Jehu's darts I saw the father slain,
 And thou his sons by his own mother murder'd.

JEHOL. I cannot now explain; but when the sun

Shall the third portion of his course complete,

Bringing the morning hour that bids to prayer, 155

Hither return and with the self-same zeal.
 Then God may prove to thee by gracious
 deeds

His word is faithful still, and never fails.
 So, for this solemn day I must prepare
 And dawn already gilds the temple roof. 160

ABNER. What gracious deed is this, to me unknown?

Tow'rd thee Jehosheba directs her steps,
 I leave thee, and will join the faithful band
 Brought hither by this solemn festival.

SCENE II

JEHOIADA and JEHOSHEBA

JEHOI. Princess, the time is come for us to speak.

Thy happy theft can be no longer hid.
The insults of the enemies of God,
Abusing this our silence, have too long
Charged with unfaithfulness His promises. 5
Nay more; success has animated rage,
And Athaliah would to Baal burn,
E'en in God's courts, incense idolatrous.
Rear'd in His Temple 'neath th' Almighty's wing,

'Tis ours to show the King thine hands have saved. 10

He'll prove himself courageous as his sires,
Already in his wit beyond his age.

Ere I unfold his wondrous destiny,
I offer him to God by Whom kings reign;
Then, gathering straight our Levites and our priests, 15

I will proclaim their masters' long lost heir.

JEHOSH. Knows he his name and noble fortune yet?

JEHOI. He owns no other than Eliakim,
And thinks himself some foundling left to
die,

Whom I in pity treated as my son. 20

JEHOSH. Ah! from what perils I deliver'd
him!

What danger is he now to meet once more!

JEHOI. What! Fails thy faith already in alarm?

JEHOSH. My lord, I yield me to thy counsels wise.

Since first I snatch'd this precious babe from
death, 25

I placed his welfare in thy careful hands;
Yea, dreading e'en the fervour of my love,
I shun his presence where and when I can,
For fear lest my unguarded heart betray
My secret with the tears I cannot check. 30
Three days and nights I thought that duty bade

Devote to weeping and impassion'd prayer.

Yet may it be allow'd me now to ask,
What friends thou hast ready to take thy
side?

Abner, brave Abner, will he lend his aid? 35
Say, has he sworn to stand beside his King?

JEHOI. Abner, though on his faith we may rely,

Knows not as yet that any King is ours.

JEHOSH. Who is to guard young Joash?
Wilt thou trust

Obed or Amnon with so high a charge? 40
My father's kindness they have often proved,—

JEHOI. And sold themselves to Athaliah's will.

JEHOSH. Whom to her hirelings wilt thou then oppose?

JEHOI. Have I not said? Our Levites and our priests.

JEHOSH. I know that, secretly assembled
near, 45

Their numbers have been doubled by thy
care;

That full of love for thee, horror for her,
A great oath binds them, ere the trial come,
To David's heir when he shall be reveal'd.

But though with loyal ardour they may burn, 50

Can they unaided vindicate their king?

Is zeal enough to cope with such a task?

Doubt not the Queen, when the first rumour spreads

Of Ahaziah's son in hiding here,

Will gather all her savage troops around, 55 Besiege the Temple, and break down its gates.

Against such foes will sanctity avail,
And holy hands raised to the Lord in prayer?

Their province is to intercede for guilt,
No blood but that of victims have they shed;

Joash, perchance, sore wounded in their
arms,— 61

JEHOI. Countest as naught the God who fights for us?

God, who protects the orphan's innocence,
And e'en in weakness manifests His might;

God, who hates tyrants, and in Jezreel swore
He would root out Ahab and Jezebel; 66

Who, striking Joram, husband of their child,
And Joram's son, their family pursued;

Whose threatening arm, though for a time withheld,

Over that impious race is ever stretch'd? 70

JEHOSH. Yea, 'tis His righteous sentence on them all

That makes me tremble for my brother's
son.

Who knows if he, inheriting their guilt,
Was not at birth condemn'd to share their
fate? 74

Or whether God exempts him from the curse,
And will for David's sake his pardon seal!

Ah! his sad state when Heaven gave him me
Returns each moment to alarm my soul.
With slaughter'd princes was the chamber
full;

Dagger in hand, th' inexorable Queen 80
To bloodshed urged her barbarous soldiery,
And eagerly her murderous course pursued!
Young Joash, left for dead, there met my
eyes;

I seem to see his terror-stricken nurse 84
Still vainly crouching at the assassin's feet,
His drooping form clasp'd to her feeble
breast.

I took him stain'd with blood. Bathing his face

My copious tears restored his vanish'd sense;
And, whether yet with fear or fond caress,
I felt the pressure of his tender arms. 90

Great God, forbid my love should be his bane,

Last relic of the faithful David now.

Bred in Thine House, and taught to love
Thy Law.

He knows no other Father than Thyself.
If, ready to attack a murderous Queen, 95
Faith falters trembling at the danger nigh;
If flesh and blood, disquieted this day,

Have shed too many tears, alarm'd for him;
Heir of Thy holy promise, guard him well,
And for such weakness punish only me! 100

JEHOL. Thy tears, Jehosheba, no blame deserve,

But God would have us trust Him as a
Father.

He visits not with blind resentment sins
Of impious ancestors on pious sons.

All that remains of faithful Israel still 105

Will come to-day here to renew their vows;

Deep as their reverence for David's race,

They hold abhor'd the child of Jezebel;

Joash will move them with his modest grace,

Seeming to light anew the glorious past; 110

And the Lord's Voice, making our cause His
own,

Will in His Temple to their hearts appeal.

Two fearless kings in turn have Him defied,

Now must a monarch to the throne be raised

Whose grateful memory shall bless the day

When God by His own priests his rights restored. 116

Who pluck'd him from th' oblivion of the tomb,

And David's lamp rekindled when put out.

Great God, if Thy foreknowledge sees him
base,

Bent to forsake the paths that David trod,
Then let him be like fruit ere ripeness
pluck'd 121

Or flower wither'd by a noisome blast!

But if this child, obedient to Thy will,

Is destined to advance Thy wise designs,

Now let the rightful heir the sceptre sway, 125

Give to my feeble hands his pow'rful foes,

And baffle in her plots a cruel Queen.

Vouchsafe, my God, on Nathan and on her

That spirit of blind foolishness to pour

Which leads deluded monarchs to their fall!

No more; fare well. Our children with them

bring 131

Maidens, of holiest stock the hallow'd seed.

SCENE III

JEHOSHEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, Chorus

JEHOSH. Dear Zachariah, go, nor stay thy steps,

Accompany thy venerable sire.

Daughters of Levi, young and faithful
band,

Whom with His zeal the Lord already fires,

Who come so often here to share my sighs, 5

Children, my only joy in griefs profound;

These gay festoons and coronets of flow'rs

Once well accorded with our stately feasts,

But now, alas, when shame and sorrow reign,

What offering is more fit than one of tears! 10

Already do I hear the solemn trump,

Soon will the Temple doors be opened wide,

While thither I myself prepare to go,

Sing, praise the God whose presence here ye seek.

SCENE IV

The Chorus

ALL THE CHORUS [sings].

His glory fills the universe sublime,

Lift to this God for aye the voice of prayer!

He reign'd supreme before the birth of Time;

Sing of His loving care.

ONE VOICE [alone].

Vainly unrighteous force 5

Would still His people's praise that must have course;

His Name shall perish ne'er.
 Day tells to day His pow'r, from time to
 time;
 His glory fills the universe sublime;
 Sing of His loving care. 10

ALL THE CHORUS [repeats.]

His glory fills the universe sublime;
 Sing of His loving care.

ONE VOICE [alone.]

He paints the flow'rs with all their lovely hues;
 The fruit to ripeness grows,
 For daily He bestows 15
 The day's warm sunshine, and the night's cool dews,
 Nor does the grateful earth t' o'erpay the debt refuse.

ANOTHER VOICE.

The sun at His command spreads joy around,
 'Tis from His bounteous hand its light
 proceeds;
 But in His Law, so pure, so holy found, 20
 We hail His richest gift to meet our needs.

ANOTHER.

Oh! mount of Sinai, let the memory stay
 Of that for ever great and famous day.
 When on thy flaming head,
 In clouds conceal'd, the Lord reveal'd 25
 To mortal eyes a ray from His own glory shed.
 Tell us, why glow'd those lightning fires up
 there,
 Why roll'd the smoke, why peal'd in troubled
 air
 Thunder and trumpet's blare? 29
 Came He that, back to primal Chaos hurl'd,
 On its foundations of past ages whirl'd,
 Came He to shake the world?

ANOTHER.

He came that He to Israel might reveal
 Th' immortal lustre of His holy Law;
 He came that to their hearts He might appear, 35
 To claim their lasting love, based upon reverent awe.

ALL THE CHORUS.

O Law divine and full of grace!
 Justice and goodness all supreme!

What reason and what joy extreme,
 Our love and trust in such a God to place! 40

ONE VOICE [alone.]

From slavery's yoke He did our fathers save,
 And for their desert-food sweet manna gave;
 To us He gives His Laws, all gifts above
 Save of Himself; for all He only claims our
 love.

THE CHORUS.

Justice and goodness all supreme! 45

THE SAME VOICE.

For them divided He the waters of the sea,
 From the dry rock He made the torrent
 stream;
 To us He gives His Laws, all gifts above
 Save of Himself, for all He only claims our
 love.

THE CHORUS.

O Law divine and full of grace! 50
 What reason, and what joy extreme,
 Our love and trust in such a God to place!

ANOTHER VOICE [alone.]

You who can only know a servile fear, Whose thankless souls God's goodness fails
 to move;
 Does it to you so hard a task appear, 55
 So difficult to love?
 Slaves dread the tyrant's lash that makes them smart,
 But children feel a love that binds the heart;
 To share God's lavish bounty you are fain,
 But not to love again! 60

ALL THE CHORUS.

O Law divine and full of grace!
 Justice and goodness all supreme!
 What reason and what joy extreme,
 Our love and trust in such a God to place!

ACT II

SCENE I

JEHOSHEBA, SALOME, Chorus

JEHOSH. Maidens, it is enough; your songs must cease;
 'Tis time for us to join the public prayers.
 The hour is come to celebrate the feast,
 And in our turn before the Lord appear.

SCENE II

JEHOSHEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, and Chorus

JEHOSH. What do I see? My son, what brings thee back?

So pale and breathless, whither dost thou run?

ZACH. Mother!

JEHOSH. Speak, then!

ZACH. The Temple is profaned!

JEHOSH. What?

ZACH. And the altar of the Lord forsaken!

JEHOSH. I tremble. Quickly tell thy mother all. 5

ZACH. My father, the High Priest, with all due rites

Presented to the Lord, Who feeds mankind,
The first loaves of the harvest we have reaped,

And then, while offering with blood-stain'd hands

The smoking inwards of the victims slain; 10

And, standing by his side, Eliakim

Help'd me to serve him, clad in linen stole;

While with the blood of sacrifice the priests

Sprinkled the altar and the worshippers;

There rose a tumult, and the people turn'd,

Sudden astonishment in every eye. 16

A woman—is to name her blasphemy?—

A woman—it was Athaliah's self.

JEHOSH. Great Heav'n!

ZACH. Within the court reserved for men

This woman enters with uplifted brow, 20

Yea, and attempts to pass the limit set,

Where none but Levites have a right to come.

The people fly, all scatter'd in dismay;

My father—ah, what wrath blazed from his eyes!

Moses to Pharaoh seem'd less terrible,— 25

"Go, Queen," my father said, "and leave this place,

Bann'd to thy sex and thine impiety!

Comest to brave the majesty of God?"

And then the Queen fiercely confronting him,

Seem'd as in act to utter blasphemies; 30

I know not if the Angel of the Lord

Appear'd before her with a glittering sword,

But straight her tongue seem'd frozen in her mouth,

And all her boldness utterly abash'd; 34

She could not move her eyes, in terror fix'd

And strange surprise on young Eliakim.

JEHOSH. What! Did he stand there in her very sight?

ZACH. We both stood gazing on that cruel Queen, 38

Stricken with equal horror at our hearts;

But soon the priests encompass'd us around,

And forced us to withdraw. I came to thee,

To tell the outrage done; I know no more.

JEHOSH. Ah! she would doubtless tear him from our arms,

E'en at God's altar hunting for her prey. 44

Perchance, ere now, this child of many tears—

Oh God, remember David, see and save!

SAL. Who is he, thus to cause your tears to flow?

ZACH. Why should his life be threaten'd? Can it be?

SAL. What can the boy have done to enrage the Queen?

ZACH. What fear they from a helpless orphan child? 50

JEHOSH. She comes! She must not see us, let us go.

SCENE III

ATHALIAH, ABNER, HAGAR, Attendants of Athaliah

HAG. Madam, why stay in such a place as this,

Where every sight offends and wounds thine eye?

Leave to the priests this temple where they dwell;

Fly from this scene of tumult; and within Thy palace, lull each troubled sense to rest.

ATH. I cannot. Thou dost see me vex'd and weak. 6

Go thou, send word to Mattan that he come With haste: oh! happy still, if by his aid

I find that peace I seek, and seek in vain!

She seats herself.

SCENE IV

ATHALIAH, ABNER, Attendants of Athaliah

ABNER. Madam, forgive me if I dare defend him,

His zeal should not surprise you. For the God,

Whom we adore, Himself ordain'd it so,

And gave us charge to guard his altar well;

The work of sacrifice to Aaron's sons, 5

And to the Levites place and task assign'd;
To their descendants strictly He forbade
All fellowship with other deities.

Art thou the wife and mother of our kings,
A stranger to our customs on this point? 10
Dost thou not know our laws? And must to-day—

But Mattan comes: with him I leave thee
now.

ATH. We need thy presence, Abner. Let it pass,

Jehoiada's presumptuous insolence,
With all that heap of superstitions vain 15
Which bid you keep your Temple to yourselves:

A subject far more urgent wakes alarm.
I know that from a child, rear'd in the camp,
Abner is generous, knowing how to pay
Alike to God and King the debt he owes. 20 Remain.

SCENE V

ATHALIAH, ABNER, MATTAN, Attendants of Athaliah

MAT. Great Queen, is this a place for
thee?

What trouble stirs, what terror chills thine
heart?

What dost thou in the midst of enemies?
Darest thou this unhallowed fane approach?
Hast thou that bitter hatred cast away— 25

ATH. Both of you lend me an attentive
ear.

I do not wish now to recall the past,
Nor give account to you for blood I shed.
A sense of duty prompted all my acts.
Nor will I take for judge a hasty crowd; 30
Whate'er they may presume to spread
abroad,

My vindication Heav'n has made its care.
My pow'r, establish'd on renown'd success,
Has magnified my name from sea to sea;
Jerusalem enjoys profoundest peace; 35
The wandering Arab Jordan sees no more
Ravage his borders with continual raids;
Nor boasts Philistia over Judah now,
And Syria owns me for a sister Queen.

Lastly the traitor, who destroy'd my
House, 40

And e'en to me thought to extend his rage,
Jehu, fierce Jehu, in Samaria quails
Before a mighty rival's rapid strokes,
Whom I incited to attack my foe; 44
And thus th' assassin leaves me mistress here,

To reap the fruits of policy in peace.

But for some days a gnawing care has
come,

To check the flood of my prosperity.
A dream (why should a dream disquiet me?)
Preys on my heart, and keeps it ill at ease; 50
I try to banish it; it haunts me still.

'Twas deepest night, when horror falls on
man,

My mother Jezebel before me stood,
Richly attired as on the day she died, 54
Her pride undaunted by misfortune's touch.
That borrow'd brightness still her features
wore,

Which she would paint upon her wither'd
face,

To hide the ravages of ruthless age:
"Tremble," she said, "child worthy of
myself;

O'er these too triumphs Judah's cruel god, 60
And thou must fall into his dreadful hands, Whereat I grieve." With these alarming
words,

Her spectre o'er my bed appear'd to bend;
I stretch'd my hands to clasp her; but I
found

Only a hideous mass of flesh and bones, 64
Horribly bruised and mangled, dragg'd thro' mire,

Bleeding and torn, whose limbs the dogs of
prey

Were growling over with devouring greed.

ABNER. Great God!

ATH. While thus disturb'd, before me
rose

The vision of a boy in shining robe, 70
Such as the Hebrew priests are wont to wear.
My drooping spirits at his sight revived:

But while my troubled eyes, to peace restored,

Admired his noble air and modest grace,
I felt the sudden stroke of murderous steel 75
Plunged deeply by the traitor in my breast.
Perhaps to you this dream, so strangely
mix'd,

May seem a work of chance, and I myself,
For long ashamed to let my fears prevail,
Referr'd it to a melancholy mood; 80

But while its memory linger'd in my soul,
Twice in my sleep I saw that form again,
Twice the same child before my eyes appear'd
Always about to stab me to the heart. 84

Worn out at last by horror's close pursuit,
I went to claim Baal's protecting care,

And, kneeling at his altars, find repose.
How strangely fear may sway our mortal minds!

And instinct seem'd to drive me to these courts,

To pacify the god whom Jews adore; 90
I thought that offerings might appease his
wrath,

That this their god might grow more merciful.

Baal's High Priest, my feebleness forgive!
I enter'd; and the sacrifice was stay'd,

The people fled, Jehoiada in wrath 95

Advanced to meet me. As he spake, I saw
With terror and surprise that self-same boy Who haunts me in my dreams. I saw him
there;

His mien the same, the same his linen stole,
His gait, his eyes, each feature of his face; 100
It was himself; beside th' High Priest he walk'd,

Till quickly they removed him from my sight.

That is the trouble which detains me here,
And thereon would I fain consult you both.
Mattan, what means this omen marvellous?

MAT. Coincidence so strange fills me with dread. 106

ATH. But, Abner, hast thou seen this fatal child?

Who is he? What his family, his tribe?

ABNER. Two children at the altar lend
their aid,

One is the High Priest's son, the other is 110
To me unknown.

MAT. Why hesitate to act?

Your Majesty must needs secure them both.

'Tis known how I regard Jehoiada,

Seeking no vengeance for my private wrongs,

In all my warnings studying to be fair; 115

But, after all, were this indeed his son,

Would he one moment let the guilty live?

ABNER. Of what crime can a child be capable?

MAT. Heav'n show'd him with a dagger
in his hand;

And Heav'n is just and wise, nor works in vain. 120

What more dost want?

ABNER. But, trusting to a dream Say, would'st thou have us bathe in infant
blood?

Ye know not yet his father nor his name.

MAT. Enough for fear! I have considered all.

If from illustrious parentage he springs, 125
His ruin should be hasten'd by his rank;
If fate has placed him in a lot obscure,
What matters it if worthless blood be spilt?
Must kings keep pace when justice lags behind?

On promptitude their safety oft depends; 130
No irksome scruples need their freedom
check;

To be suspected is all one with guilt.

ABNER. Mattan! Is this the language of a priest?

Nursed in the lap of war, in carnage reared,
Stern agent of the vengeful wrath of Kings,

'Tis I who now must urge misfortune's plea!

And thou, who owest him a father's love, 137

A minister of peace in times of wrath,

Cloaking resentment with pretended zeal

Dost chafe that blood should flow so tardily!

Thou badest me, Madam, speak my honest
thought: 141

What, then, is this that moves thy fear so
much?

A dream, a feeble child, whom, it may be Too readily thy fancy recognised. 144

ATH. Abner, I will admit I may be wrong,

Heeding too much, perchance, an idle dream.

More closely then must I behold that child,

And at my leisure scan his features well.

Let both the boys be brought before me now.

ABNER. I fear—

ATH. What! Can they fail to grant me
this? 150

What reason could they have to say me no?

'Twould rouse suspicion. Bid Jehosheba,

Or else her husband bring the children here;

I can at pleasure use a monarch's tone.

Abner, I tell thee candidly, your priests 155

Have cause to bless my kindness hitherto;

I know how far they freely have discuss'd

My conduct, and abused my sovereign
power;

And yet they live, and yet their temple
stands.

But soon, I feel, the limit may be pass'd; 160

Jehoiada must curb his savage zeal,

And not provoke my wrath a second time.

Go.

SCENE VI

ATHALIAH, MATTAN, Attendants of Athaliah

MAT. I may now at last in freedom speak,
And clearly set the truth before thine eyes.

A growing monster in this temple lurks;
A tempest threatens, wait not till it breaks.
Ere daylight Abner with th' High Priest con-
fer'd;

Thou knowest well his love for David's line.
What if Jehoiada should in their ranks
Foist this young child with whom Heav'n threatens thee,

His son or not—

ATH. Thou hast unseal'd mine eyes, 9
And Heaven's warning vision grows distinct.
But I would fain be free from every doubt:
Children will readily betray their thoughts,
One word will oft disclose some deep design.
Let me, dear Mattan, see him, question him,
Go thou, meanwhile, and secret orders give; 15
That all my Tyrians quickly arm themselves.

SCENE VII

JOASH, ATHALIAH, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, ABNER, SALOME, two Levites, Chorus,
Attendants of Athaliah

JEHOSH. [to the two Levites]. Keep constant watch, ye servants of the Lord,
Over these children, precious and beloved.

ABNER [to JEHOSEBA]. Take courage,
Princess; they shall be my charge.

ATH. Heav'n's! the more closely I examine
him,—

'Tis he! And horror seizes me again. 5
[Pointing to JOASH.]

Wife of Jehoiada, is this thy son?

JEHOSH. He, Madam?

ATH. He.

JEHOSH. His mother? No, not I.
[Pointing to ZACHARIAH.]

There is my son.

ATH. [to JOASH]. Who is thy father,
child?

Answer, thyself.

JEHOSH. Heav'n till this very day—

ATH. Why in such haste to answer for the boy? 10

It is for him to speak.

JEHOSH. From one so young
What revelation canst thou hope to gain?

ATH. The young are innocent; and simple truth

Their honest frankness knows not to disguise:
Let him explain all that concerns himself. 15

JEHOSH. [aside]. Great God, put now Thy wisdom in his mouth!

ATH. What is thy name?

JOASH. My name's Eliakim.

ATH. Thy father?

JOASH. Fatherless, they say, I am,
Cast since my birth upon the arms of God;
I never knew my parents, who they were. 20

ATH. Hast thou no parents?

JOASH. They abandon'd me.

ATH. How? and how long ago?

JOASH. When I was born.

ATH. Where is thy home? This can at least be told.

JOASH. This Temple is my home; none else I know.

ATH. Where wast thou found? Hast thou been told of that? 25

JOASH. 'Midst cruel wolves, ready to eat me up.

ATH. Who placed thee in this temple?

JOASH. One unknown,
She gave no name, nor was she seen again.

ATH. Whose guardian hands preserved thine infant years?

JOASH. When did God e'er neglect His children's needs? 30

The feather'd nestlings He provides with
food,

And o'er all nature spreads His bounty wide.
Daily I pray; and with a Father's care
He feeds me from the sacred offerings.

ATH. New wonder comes to trouble and perplex! 35

The sweetness of his voice, his infant grace
Unconsciously make enmity give way
To—can it be compassion that I feel!

ABNER. Madam, is this thy dreaded
enemy?

'Tis evident thy dreams have played thee
false; 40

Unless thy pity, which now seems to vex,
Should be the fatal blow that terrified.

ATH. [to JOASH and JEHOSEBA]. Why are ye leaving?

JEHOSH. Thou hast heard his tale:
His presence longer might be troublesome.

ATH. [to JOASH]. Nay, child, come back.
What dost thou all the day? 45

JOASH. I worship God, and hear His Law
explain'd;

His holy volume I am taught to read,
And now to write it has my hand begun.

ATH. What says that Law?

JOASH. That God requires our love.
Avenges, soon or late, His Name blas-phemed,

Is the protector of the fatherless, 51
Resists the proud, the murderer punishes.

ATH. I understand. But all within these walls,

How are they occupied?

JOASH. In praising God.

ATH. Does God claim constant service here and prayer? 55

JOASH. All else is banish'd from His holy courts.

ATH. What pleasures hast thou?

JOASH. Where God's altar stands,
I sometimes help th' High Priest to offer salt
Or incense, hear His lofty praises sung,

And see His stately ritual perform'd. 60

ATH. What! Hast thou pastime none more sweet than that?

Sad lot for one so young; but come with me,
And see my palace and my splendour there.

JOASH. 'God's goodness then would from my memory fade.

ATH. I would not force thee to forget Him, child. 65

JOASH. Thou dost not pray to Him.

ATH. But thou shalt pray.

JOASH. There I should hear another's name invoked.

ATH. I serve my god: and thou shalt worship thine.

There are two powerful gods.

JOASH. Thou must fear mine;
He only is the Lord, and thine is naught. 70

ATH. Pleasures untold will I provide for thee.

JOASH. The happiness of sinners melts away.

ATH. Of sinners, who are they?

JEHOSH. Madam, excuse
A child—

ATH. I like to see how ye have taught him;

And thou hast pleased me well, Eliakim, 75
Being, and that past doubt, no common child.

See thou, I am a queen, and have no heir;
Forsake this humble service, doff this garb,
And I will let thee share in all my wealth;
Make trial of my promise from this day; 80
Beside me at my table, everywhere,
Thou shalt receive the treatment of a son.

JOASH. A son!

ATH. Yes, speak.

JOASH. And such a Father leave
For—

ATH. Well, what?

JOASH. Such a mother as thyself!

ATH. [to JEHOSEBA]. His memory is good; in all he says 85

I recognise the lessons ye have given.

Yes, this is how, corrupting guileless youth,

Ye both improve the freedom ye enjoy,

Inciting them to hatred and wild rage,

Until they shudder but to hear my name. 90

JEHOSH. Can our misfortunes be conceal'd from them?

All the world knows them; are they not thy boast?

ATH. Yea; with just wrath, that I am proud to own,

My parents on my offspring I avenged.

Could I see sire and brother massacred, 95

My mother from the palace roof cast down,

And the same day beheaded all at once

(Oh, horror!) fourscore princes of the blood;

And all to avenge a pack of prophets slain,

Whose dangerous frenzies Jezebel had curb'd.

Have queens no heart, daughters no filial love, 101

That I should act the coward and the slave,

Too pitiful to cope with savages,

By rendering death for death, and blow for blow?

David's posterity from me received 105

Treatment no worse than had my father's sons!

Where should I be to-day, had I not quell'd

All weakness and a mother's tenderness,

Had not this hand of mine like water shed

My own heart's blood, and boldly check'd your plots? 110

Your god has vow'd implacable revenge;

Snapt is the link between thine house and mine,

David and all his offspring I abhor,

Tho' born of mine own blood I own them not.

JEHOSH. Thy plans have prospered. Let God see, and judge! 115

ATH. Your god, forsooth, your only refuge left,

What will become of his predictions now?

Let him present you with that promised King,

That Son of David, waited for so long,—

We meet again. Farewell. I go content:
I wished to see, and I have seen. 121

ABNER [to JEHOSEBA]. The trust
I undertook to keep, I thus resign.

SCENE VIII

JOASH, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, JEHOIADA, ABNER, Levites, the Chorus

JEHOSH. [to JEHOIADA]. My lord, did'st hear the Queen's presumptuous words?

JEHOI. I heard them all, and felt for thee the while.

These Levites were with me ready to aid
Or perish with you, such was our resolve.

[To JOASH, embracing him.]

May God watch o'er thee, child, whose courage bore, 5

Just now, such noble witness to His Name.
Thy service, Abner, has been well discharged:
I shall expect thee at th' appointed hour.

I must return, this impious murderess Has stain'd my vision, and disturb'd my prayers; 10

The very pavement that her feet have trod
My hands shall sprinkle o'er with cleansing
blood.

SCENE IX

Chorus

ONE OF THE MAIDENS FORMING THE
CHORUS.

What star has burst upon our eyes?
What shall this wondrous child become one
day?

Vain pomp and show he dares despise,
Nor lets those charms, where danger lies,
Lead his young feet from God astray. 5

ANOTHER VOICE.

While all to Baal's altar flock,
And for the Queen their faith disown,
A child proclaims that Israel's Rock
Is the eternal God alone,
And though this Jezebel may mock, 10
Elijah's spirit he has shown.

ANOTHER VOICE.

Who will the secret of thy birth explain?
Dear child, some holy prophet lives in thee
again!

ANOTHER VOICE.

Thus grew the gentle Samuel of yore,
Beneath the shadow of God's dwelling-
place; 15
And he became the hope of Israel's race,
To guide and comfort; this be thou and more!

ANOTHER VOICE.

Oh! blest beyond compare,
The child who knows His love,
Who early hears His voice, and keeps with
care 20

The teaching he receives from God above!
Far severed from the world, from birth en-
dued

With all the gifts of Heaven,
No evil influence has imbued
His innocence with sin's infectious leaven. 25

ALL THE CHORUS.

A happy youth he spends,
Whom the Lord teaches, whom the Lord defends!

THE SAME VOICE [alone].

As in sequester'd vale,
Where a clear streamlet flows,
Shelter'd from every stormy gale 30
Darling of Nature, some young lily grows.
Far severed from the world, from birth endued

With all the gifts of Heaven,
No evil influence has imbued
His innocence with sin's infectious leaven. 35

ALL THE CHORUS.

Blest more than tongue can tell.
The child whom God inclines to keep His statutes well!

ONE VOICE [alone].

With faltering steps doth dawning Virtue tread
'Mid countless perils that beset the way;
What hindrances and snares for him are
spread 40

Who seeks Thee, Lord, and fears from innocence to stray!

Where can Thy saints a shelter find,
With foes in front and foes behind?
Sinners fill all the earth, my God, look where we may.

ANOTHER VOICE.

Palace and City, David loved so well, 45
O Mount, where God Himself long deigned to dwell.

What has thy crime that draws down vengeance been?

What sayest thou, dear Zion, to behold,
Seated where sat thy kings from days of old,
An impious foreign Queen? 50

ALL THE CHORUS.

What sayest thou, dear Zion, to behold
An impious foreign Queen,
Seated where sat thy kings from days of old?

THE SAME VOICE.

Where once the Lord was bless'd,
Father and God confess'd, 55
Where David's holy strains so sweet had
been,
What sayest thou, dear Zion, to behold
Cursing the Name thy kings adored of old, Praising her own false gods, an impious foreign Queen?

ONE VOICE [alone].

How often, Lord, how often yet shall we 60
Against Thee rising up the wicked see?
They with unhallow'd feet Thy courts defile,
And all who worship Thee as fools revile.
How often, Lord, how often yet shall we
Against Thee rising up the wicked see? 65

ANOTHER VOICE.

Ah, what avails, say they, this virtue stern,
That from sweet Pleasures voice
Morosely bids you turn?
Your God does naught for you to justify your choice.

ANOTHER VOICE.

Where Pleasure leads, laughter and song be ours 70

Thus speak those impious throngs:
Care for the future to dull fools belongs,
To passion give the reins, cull the sweet
flow'rs;
Too quickly at the best years take their flight,
Who knows if he shall see to-morrow's light?
Let us to-day enjoy life's fragrant bowers! 76

ALL THE CHORUS.

Let tears and terrors, Lord, their portion
be,
These outcast wretches, who shall never
see

Thy holy city with eternal glory crown'd;
Be ours, on whom Thy beams immortal
shine, 80
To hymn Thy gifts divine,
Be ours with voice of praise Thy majesty to
sound!

ONE VOICE [alone].

Of all their false delights what will remain
To souls absorb'd therein? As visions vain,
That vanish with the dawning day, 85
When they awaken with dismay!
While for the poor Thy table shall be spread,
Deep shall they drain the cup of judgment
dread
That Thou shalt offer to all such as they,
When Mercy's hour has fled. 90

ALL THE CHORUS.

Oh, wakening of dismay
From dream too quickly sped,
From error's dangerous sway!

ACT III

SCENE I

MATTAN, NABAL, the Chorus

MAT. Go damsels: let Jehosheba be told That Mattan would in private speak with
her.

ONE OF THE MAIDENS OF THE CHORUS.

Mattan! May God in Heav'n confound his plots!

NAB. They all disperse in flight without reply!

MAT. Let us draw near.

SCENE II

ZACHARIAH, MATTAN, NABAL

ZACH. Rash man, where would'st thou
go?

Beware thou do not step beyond this spot;
This is a dwelling sacred to the priests;
Our laws forbid all common entrance here.
Whom seekest thou? This solemn day, my
sire 5

Shuns contact with impure idolatry,
And prostrate now before Jehovah's shrine,
My mother will not have her pray'r disturb'd.

MAT. My son, be not distress'd, we will wait here.

To your illustrious mother I would speak; 10
I come charged with a message from the Queen.

SCENE III

MATTAN, NABAL

NAB. Their very children ape their insolence!

But what means Athaliah now to do?
Whence springs this indecision in her plans?
This morn, rebuff'd by that presumptuous
priest,

When dreams had warn'd of danger from a
child, 5

Her mind was to destroy Jehoiada,
And in this temple Baal's altar place,
With thee to serve him; in thy joy I shared,
Hoping to gain my part in the rich spoil.
What made her change her fickle purpose
thus? 10

MAT. She has not been herself these two days past.

No more is she the bold, clear sighted Queen,
With spirit raised above her timid sex,
Whose rapid action overwhelm'd her foes,
Who knew the value of an instant lost: 15
Fear and remorse disturb that lofty soul;
She wavers, falters, all the woman now.
Not long ago I fill'd with bitter wrath
Her heart already moved by threats from Heav'n,

And she, intrusting vengeance to my care, 20
Bade me assemble all her guard in haste;
But whether that young child, before her
brought,

(A poor, unhappy foundling, as they say.) Assuaged the terror that her dream had caused,

Or seeing in the boy some secret charm, 25
I find her shaken in her dire resolve,
Postponing vengeance to some future day;
And fatal strife in all her counsels reigns.
"I have inquired," said I, "about that child,
And hear strange boasts of royal ancestry, 30
How to the malcontents, from time to time,
The High Priest shows him, bids the Jews expect

In him a second Moses, and supports
His speech with lying oracles." These words Made her brow flush. Swiftly the falsehood work'd. 35

"Is it for me," she said, "to pine in doubt?
Let us be rid of this perplexity.

Convey my sentence to Jehosheba:
Soon shall the fire be kindled, and the sword Deal slaughter, soon their Temple shall be razed, 40

Unless, as hostage for their loyalty,
They yield this child to me."

NAB. For one unknown, Whom chance, may be, has thrown into their
arms,

Will they behold their Temple buried low—

MAT. Ah! but no mortals have such pride as they. 45

Rather than to my hands resign a child,
Whom to his God Jehoiada has vow'd,
He will endure to die the worst of deaths,
Besides, they manifestly love this child,
And, if I construe right the Queen's account,
Jehoiada knows more than he will say 51
Touching his birth. Refusal I foresee,
In any case, with fatal consequence,
The rest be my concern; with fire and sword
To wipe this odious Temple from my eyes 55
Is my last hope.

NAB. What prompts so fierce a hate!
Is it consuming zeal for Baal's cause?
Myself a child of Ishmael, as thou knowest,
I worship neither thine, nor Israel's god.

MAT. Dost think, my friend, that any senseless zeal 60
For a dumb idol could my judgment blind,—
A perishable log, that worms destroy
In spite of all my efforts, day by day?
From birth devoted to the God, who here Is worshipp'd, Mattan still might be his priest, 65

If but the love of grandeur, thirst for pow'r,
Could be consistent with his stringent yoke.
Nabal, I hardly need to thee recall
The quarrel 'tween Jehoiada and me,
When against him I dared the censer claim;
They made some stir, my struggle, tears,
despair. 71

Vanquish'd, I enter'd on a new career,
And bound me, soul and body, to the Court,
By slow degrees I gain'd the ear of kings,
And soon my voice was deem'd oracular. 75
Their hearts I studied, flatter'd each caprice,
And sprinkled flow'rs for them on danger's
brink.

Nothing to me was sacred that they craved,
Measure and weight I alter'd as they will'd.
As often as Jehoiada's blunt speech 80
Boldly offended their fastidious ears,
So often I had pow'r and skill to charm:

Concealing from their eyes unpleasant truths,
Gilding their savage passion with fair tints.
And lavish more than all of human blood. 85

At length was raised by Athaliah's hands
A temple to the god she introduced.

Jerusalem with tears the outrage saw;
The sons of Levi, stricken with alarm,
Appeal'd to Heaven with indignant cries. 90
I only, leading cowards in my train,
Deserter from their Law, that act approved,
And Baal's priesthood thereby merited.

Thus made my rival's formidable foe, 94
I donn'd the mitre; march'd along, his peer.
Still, I confess, e'en at my glory's height,
Harass'd by memories of the God I left,
Some fear remain'd to discompose my soul,
And this it is that fans and feeds my rage:
Happy if, wreaking vengeance on His shrine, 100

I may reduce His wrath to impotence,
And amidst ruin, desolation, death,
Lose my remorse in plenitude of crime!
Here comes Jehosheba.

SCENE IV

JEHOSHEBA, MATTAN, NABAL

MAT. Sent by the Queen
To bring back peace, and hatred drive away,
Be not surprised that I should thee accost,
Princess, whose gentle spirit comes from Heav'n,

A rumour, which of falsehood I suspect, 5
Supports the warning that a dream had giv'n,
Accusing the High Priest of dangerous plots,
And raising in the Queen a storm of ire.

I wish not here to vaunt my services,
Knowing Jehoiada to me unjust; 10
But good for evil is a due return.

In short, I come commission'd to speak
peace.

Live, keep your feasts without a shade of fear.
For your obedience she but asks a pledge,—
(My efforts to dissuade her have been vain),
This orphan, whom she says that she has seen. 16

JEHOSH. Eliakim?

MAT. Whereat I feel some shame
On her account, making an idle dream
Of too much moment. But unless ye give
This child to me forthwith, her mortal foes 20 Ye prove yourselves. Your answer she awaits, Impatient.

JEHOSH. These, then, are her words of peace!

MAT. And can ye for one moment hesitate

By slight concession such a boon to gain?

JEHOSH. Strange would it be, if Mattan, free of guile, 25

Could trample down th' injustice of his heart,
And, after being of all ill contriver,

Could be the author of some shade of good!

MAT. What is your grievance? Has the Queen, in rage,

Sent to tear Zachariah from your arms? 30

He is your son; the other why so dear?

This fondness, in my turn, surprises me.

What treasure find ye there of priceless worth?

Has Heav'n in him sent a deliverer?

Bethink you, your refusal may confirm 35

A secret rumour that begins to grow.

JEHOSH. What rumour?

MAT. That illustrious is his birth,
And that thy husband hatches some grand part

For him to play.

JEHOSH. And Mattan, by this tale
That soothes his rage—

MAT. Princess, it is for thee 40

To disabuse my mind. I know thou would'st

As falsehood's ruthless foe, resign thy life

Sooner than sully thy sincerity

By the least word that is opposed to truth.

Hast thou no clue then to this mystery? 45

Is his birth buried in the deepest night?

Knowest thou not thyself from whom he sprang?

Whose hands they were that gave him to thy spouse?

I pause for answer; ready to believe thee.

Give glory, Princess, to the God thou servest.

JEHOSH. Base man, it suits thee well to dare to name 51

A God whom thou hast taught men to blaspheme!

Can such a wretch as thou invoke His truth,
Thou on the seat of foul corruption throned,
Where falsehood reigns and spreads its poison round, 55

Whose lip with treachery and imposture teems!

SCENE V

JEHOIADA, JEHOSHEBA, MATTAN, NABAL

JEHOI. Where am I? Is this Baal's priest I see?

Does David's daughter with a traitor talk,
And turn a listening ear? Dost thou not fear
That 'neath his feet should gape a gulf profound,

And flames forth issuing straight scorch and consume thee, 5

Or these walls crush thee falling upon him?
What would he? Why this bold effrontery?
Why comes God's foe to taint this holy air?

MAT. To rail is but to be Jehoiada!
Yet might he well, in reverence for the Queen, 10

Show greater prudence, and forbear to insult
The chosen envoy of her high command.

JEHOI. With what ill-omened tidings art thou charged?

What dreadful mission brings such messenger? 14

MAT. Jehosheba has heard the royal will.
JEHOI. Then get thee from my presence,
impious wretch;

Go, and fill up the measure of thy crimes,
Soon will God make thee join the perjured
crew

Of Dathan, Doeg, and Ahithophel;
The dogs He fed with fallen Jezebel, 20
Waiting to glut their fury upon thee,
Besiege thy door, all howling for their prey.

MAT. [in confusion]. Ere the day close—which of us is to be—

'Twill soon be seen—but, Nabal, let us go.

NAB. Where dost thou stray? Is then thy sense distraught? 25
There lies thy way.

SCENE VI

JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA

JEHOSH. The storm's about to burst:
The angry Queen demands Eliakim.

Already they begin to penetrate
The mystery of his birth and thy designs,
Mattan could all but tell his father's name. 5

JEHOI. Who to the traitor can have giv'n a clue?

Thine agitation may have told too much.

JEHOSH. I have done all I could to master
it:

And yet, believe me, danger presses close.
Let us reserve this child for happier times. 10
While still our wicked foes deliberate, Ere they come round to tear him from our
arms,

Let me, my lord, hide him a second time:

The gates stand open, and the way is free.
To wildest deserts must I carry him? 15

Ready am I. I know a secret path,
By which, without a chance of being seen,
Crossing the Kedron's torrent with the lad,
The wilderness I'll gain, where wept of old
David, in flight from his rebellious son, 20

And seeking safety from pursuit like us.
I shall fear less for him lions and bears—
But why reject Jehu's good offices?
Is not the counsel sound that I unfold?

Let us in Jehu's charge this treasure place, 25
And one may reach his realm this very day;
The way that leads to him is short. Nor starts
The heart of Jehu from compassion's touch;
The name of David he in honour holds.

Ah! lives there king so cruel and so hard, 30
Unless his mother were a Jezebel,

Who would not pity such a suppliant's cry?
Must not all monarchs make his cause their
own?

JEHOI. What timid counsels, and how boldly urged!

Canst thou then place thy hopes in Jehu's
aid? 35

JEHOSH. Does God forbid all forethought and all care?

Condemns He not too blind a confidence?
Making mankind fulfil His holy ends.

Is it not God Himself arms Jehu's hands?

JEHOI. Jehu, whom God in His deep wisdom chose, 40

Jehu, on whom I see thy hopes are based,
Ungratefully forgets His benefits;

Ahab's fierce daughter he has left in peace,
And follows the vile steps of Israel's kings,
Keeps up the shrines of Egypt's bestial god,
And on high places rashly dares to burn 46
An incense that the Lord our God abhors.

Jehu too surely lacks the upright heart,
And clean hands, needed to promote His
cause.

No, we must cling to God, and Him alone. 50
We must not hide but plainly show the boy,
With royal diadem around his brow;
I e'en intend to advance the appointed hour.
Ere Mattan can mature his counterplot.

SCENE VII

JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, AZARIAH, followed by the Chorus, and a number of Levites.

JEHOI. Well, Azariah, is the Temple closed?

AZA. I have seen all the gates securely barr'd.

JEHOI. Remain there none but thou and thine allies?

AZA. Twice have I gone all round the sacred courts, 4

All have fled hence, nor think they of return,
Scatter'd by panic like a flock of sheep;
The holy tribe are left sole worshippers.

Never, since they escaped from Pharaoh's pow'r,

Has such dismay as this the people seized.

JEHOI. Faint-hearted people, born for slavery, 10

Bold only against God! Let us pursue

The work we have in hand. But who still keeps

These children in our midst?

ONE OF THE MAIDENS FORMING THE CHORUS. Could we, my lord,

Sever ourselves from you? No strangers we Here, in God's House, where ranged beside thee stand 15

Our fathers and our brothers.

ANOTHER MAIDEN. If to avenge

The shame of Israel we lack Jael's pow'r,
Who pierced the temples of God's impious
foe,

We may at least for Him our lives lay down;
When for His threaten'd shrine your arms shall fight, 20

At least our tears may to His throne appeal.

JEHOI. Lo, what avengers of Thy holy
cause,

O Wisdom infinite,—these priests and babes!
But, Thou supporting, who can make them
fall? 24

Thou canst, at will, recall us from our graves,

Canst wound and heal, canst kill and make alive.

They put no trust in merits of their own,
But in Thy Name, for them so oft invoked,
Thy promise to the holiest of their kings,
This Temple where Thou dost vouchsafe to
dwell, 30

Destined to last long as the sun in heaven.

Why throbs my heart with holy ecstasy?

Is it God's Spirit thus takes hold of me, Glow's in my breast, speaks, and unseals
mine eyes?

Before me spread dim distant ages rise. 35

Ye Levites, let your melodies conspire

To fan the flame of inspiration's fire.

THE CHORUS [singing to the accompaniment of musical instruments]. Lord, be Thy voice to our dull ears conveyed,

Thy holy message to our hearts be borne,
As to the tender blade 40

Comes, in the spring, the freshness of the morn!

JEHOI. Ye heavens hear my voice; thou earth give ear:

That the Lord sleeps, no more let Israel fear:
The Lord awakes! Ye sinners, disappear!

The music begins again, and JEHOIADA immediately resumes.

How has pure gold changed into worthless lead? 45

What Pontiff's blood is at the altar shed?

Weep, Salem; faithless city, weep in vain!

Thy murderous hands have God's own prophets slain:

Therefore His love for thee hath banish'd
been,

Thine incense is to Him a smoke unclean. 50

Oh, whither are these tender captives led?

The Lord the queen of cities hath dis-
crown'd,

Cast off her kings, her priests in fetters
bound;

Within her streets no festal throngs are
found:

The Temple falls! high leap the flames with cedar fed! 55

Jerusalem, sad spectacle of woe,

How in one day thy beauty disappears!

Would that mine eyes might be a fount of
tears,

To weep thine overthrow!

AZA. Oh, holy shrine!

JEHOSH. Oh, David!

THE CHORUS. Lord, restore. 60

Favour to Thine own Zion, as of yore!

The music begins again, and JEHOIADA, a moment afterwards, breaks in upon it.

JEHOI. What new Jerusalem is this draws
nigh,

With beams of light that from the desert
shine?

She bears upon her brow a mark divine:

Ye peoples, raise your joyous song on high!

Zion is born anew, far fairer to the eye, 66

From every side a gathering crowd I view,

Children that thine own bosom never knew;

Jerusalem arise, lift up thine head!

Thy glory fills with wonder all these kings, 70

Each monarch of the earth his homage brings,

Her mightiest kiss the dust where thou
dost tread;
All press to hail the light around thee shed.
Bless'd be he whose soul with ardour glows
To see fair Zion rise! 75
Drop down your dews, ye skies,
And let the earth her Saviour now disclose!
JEHOSH. Ah, whence may we expect a gift so rare,
If those, from whom that Saviour is to spring,— JEHOI. Prepare, Jehosheba, the royal crown, 80
Which David wore upon his sacred brow:
[To the Levites.]
And ye, to arm yourselves, come, follow me
Where are kept hidden, far from eyes profane,
That dread array of lances, and of swords,
Which once were drench'd with proud
Philistia's blood, 85
And conquering David, full of years and
fame,
Devoted to the Lord who shelter'd him.
Can we employ them for a nobler use?
Come; and I will myself distribute them.

SCENE VIII

SALOME, the Chorus

SAL. What fearful scenes, my sisters, must we see!
These arms, great God, strange sacrifice
portend:
What incense, what firstfruits do they intend
To offer on Thine altar unto Thee?
ONE OF THE MAIDENS OF THE CHORUS.
What sight is this to meet our timid
eyes! 5
Who would have thought that we should e'er behold
Forests of spears arise.
And swords flash forth, where Peace has dwelt from days of old?
ANOTHER. How comes it that, when danger is at hand,
Our city shows such dull indifference? 10
How comes it, sisters, that for our defence
E'en valiant Abner leads no succouring
band?
SAL. Ah! In a Court that owns no other
laws
Than force and violence,

Who would embrace the inauspicious cause
Of youthful innocence? 16
Baseness and blind submission there provide High honours that to virtue are denied.
ANOTHER MAIDEN. When danger and disorder grimly frown,
For whom thus bring they forth the consecrated crown? 20
SAL. The Lord hath deign'd to speak
But vainly do we seek
His prophet's utterance to comprehend.
Arms He destructions upon us to wreak?
Or arms He to defend? 25
ALL THE CHORUS [sings]. Promise and threat! What may this mystery be?
What evil and what good in turn foretold!
How with such anger can such love agree?
Who shall the clue unfold?
ONE VOICE [alone]. Zion shall perish in devouring flame 30
And all her beauty shall be overthrown.
ANOTHER VOICE. Zion's defence is in Jehovah's Name,
His deathless word her sure foundation
stone.
THE FIRST VOICE. I see her glory sink before mine eyes!
THE SECOND VOICE. The spreading radiance of her light I see! 35
THE FIRST VOICE. Plunged in the deepest gulf of misery!
THE SECOND VOICE. Zion uplifts her forehead to the skies!
THE FIRST VOICE. What ruin!
THE SECOND VOICE. Endless life to her belongs!
THE FIRST VOICE. What cries of pain!
THE SECOND VOICE. Hark to victorious
song!
A THIRD VOICE. Cease these perplexing thoughts to trace, 40
God will the mystery solve, we know not how.
ALL THREE VOICES. Before His wrath in reverence let us bow,
And let our hopes His love embrace.
ANOTHER VOICE. The heart whose love is
Thine,
My God, who can disturb its peace? 45
Thy will supreme its guiding star doth shine,
With beams that never cease:
What happiness in earth or heav'n can be Like peace that keeps in sweet tranquillity,
The heart that loveth Thee? 50

ACT IV

SCENE I

JOASH, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, a Levite, the Chorus

SAL. With step majestic, by my mother's
side,

Comes with my brother young Eliakim.
Sisters, what bear they wrapp'd within those veils?

What means that sword carried in front of
them?

JEHOSH. [to ZACHARIAH]. My son, with reverence on this table place 5
The awful volume of our holy Law.

And thou, my sweet Eliakim, lay here,
Close to the book of God, this diadem.
Levite, it is Jehoiada's command, 9

Let David's sword be placed beside his crown.

JOASH. Dear Princess, tell me, what new sight is this?

The sacred scroll, the sword, the diadem?
Since God within His Temple shelter'd me,
No preparation have I seen like this.

JEHOSH. Soon will thy wondering doubts be clear'd, my son. 15

JOASH. Try not that diadem upon my brow!

'Tis profanation of the glorious dead!

The King who wore it claims more reverence.
A poor unhappy child, left for the bears—

JEHOSH. [trying the crown upon him]. Let be, my son: thus has it been enjoin'd. 20

JOASH. But do I hear thee sob? Princess, thy cheeks

Are wet with tears! What pity touches
thee?

Am I, as Jephthah's daughter was of old,
To be presented for a sacrifice,

And, by my death, appease the wrath of God? 25

A son has naught his Father may not claim.
Ah me!

JEHOSH. Lo, here is one who will declare God's will

To thee, alone: fear not.

Come, let us go.

SCENE II

JOASH, JEHOIADA

JOASH [running into the High Priest's arms]. Father!

JEHOI. My son!

JOASH. What preparation's here?

JEHOI. 'Tis right, my son, that thou should'st know the truth,

And, sooner than all others, learn God's will,
His purpose for His people and for thee. 4

Arm thee with courage, and renew thy faith.

The time is come to prove that fervent zeal

Which I have cherish'd in thy heart with
care,

And to discharge the debt due to thy God.

Art thou resolv'd to show a generous mind?

JOASH. Yea, ready if He will to give my
life. 10

JEHOI. Oft hast thou heard the story of our kings;

Dost bear in mind, my son, how strict the
laws

A king must follow, worthy of the crown?

JOASH. Wise kings, for thus hath God Himself declared,

Will not rely on riches and on gold, 15

But fear the Lord their God, regarding still

His precepts, and His judgments, and His
laws,

Nor yoke oppressive on their brethren lay.

JEHOI. But wert thou bound to copy one such king,

Which would'st thou choose to imitate, my
son? 20

JOASH. There seems to me none worthy to compare

With faithful David, full of love divine.

JEHOI. Thou would'st not follow then the erring steps

Of faithless Joram and his impious son?

JOASH. Father!

JEHOI. Proceed, and tell me all thy
mind. 25

JOASH. Whoso resembles them perish as
they!

JEHOIADA prostrates himself at his feet.

Father, why dost thou kneel before my face?

JEHOI. I pay thee the respect I owe my
King.

JOASH, prove worthy of thine ancestor,
Of David.

JOASH. Am I Joash?

JEHOI. Thou shalt know 30

How graciously God foil'd the savage plot

Of Athaliah, saving thee from death,

Already with the dagger in thy breast.

Nor from her fury art thou yet escaped:

With the same eagerness that would ere-
while 35
Have slain in thee her son's posterity,
Her cruelty is bent on thy destruction,
Nor does a change of name elude pursuit.
But 'neath thy standard I have gather'd
here,
Prompt to avenge thee, an obedient band. 40
Enter, brave captains of the holy seed,
Honour'd by sacred service in your turns.

SCENE III

JEHOIADA, JOASH, AZARIAH, ISHMAEL, and the three other chiefs of the Levites

JEHOI. [continues]. Lo there, the King's avengers 'gainst his foes!
And there, ye priests, behold your promised
King!

AZA. Why, 'tis Eliakim!

ISH. Is that sweet child—

JEHOI. The rightful heir of Judah's kings, the last

Of hapless Ahaziah's lineage, 5
Call'd by the name of Joash, as ye know.

All Judah, like yourselves, bewail'd the fate
Of that fair tender flow'r, so soon cut down,
Believing him with all his brethren slain.

With them he met the traitor's cruel knife: 10
But Heaven turn'd aside the mortal stroke, Kept in his heart the smouldering spark of
life.

And let my wife, eluding watchful eyes, 14
Convey him in her bosom, bathed in blood,
And hide him in the Temple with his nurse,
I being sole accomplice of her theft.

JOASH. Ah, how, my father, can I e'er repay

The kindness and the love so freely giv'n?

JEHOI. The time will come to prove that gratitude. 19

Look then upon your King, your only hope!
My care has been to keep him for this hour;
Servants of God, 'tis yours that care to crown.

The child of Jezebel, the murderess queen,
Inform'd that Joash lives, will soon be here,
Opening for him the tomb a second time, 25
His death determined, though himself unknown.

Priests, 'tis for you her fury to forestall,
And Judah's shameful slavery to end,
Avenge your princess slain, your Law restore,
Make Benjamin and Judah own their King.

The enterprise, no doubt, is dangerous, 31
Attacking a proud queen upon her throne,
Who rallies to her standard a vast host
Of hardy strangers and of faithless Jews:
But He who guides and strengthens me is
God. 35

Think, on this child all Israel's hope depends.
The wrath of God already marks the Queen;
Here have I muster'd you, in her despite,
Nor lack ye warlike arms as she believes.
Haste, crown we Joash, and proclaim him
King, 40

Then, our new Prince's valiant soldiers,
march,

Calling on Him with Whom all victory lies,
And, waking loyalty in slumbering hearts,
E'en to her palace track our enemy.

What hearts, so sunk in sloth's inglorious
sleep, 45

Will not be roused to follow in our steps,
When in our sacred ranks they see advance
A King whom God has at His altar fed,
Aaron's successor, and a train of priests
Leading to battle Levi's progeny. 50

And in those self-same hands, by all revered.
The arms that David hallow'd to the Lord?
Our God shall spread His terror o'er His foes.

Shrink not from bathing you in heathen
blood;

Hew down the Tyrians, yea, and Jacob's
seed. 55

Are ye not from those famous Levites sprung
Who, when inconstant Israel wickedly
At Sinai worshipp'd the Egyptian god,
Their dearest kinsmen slew with righteous zeal,

And sanctified their hands in traitors' blood,
Gaining the honour, by this noble deed, 61
Of serving at the altars of the Lord?

But I perceive your zeal already fired;
Swear then upon this holy volume, first,
Before this King whom Heav'n restores to-
day, 65

To live, to fight, yea, or to die for him!

AZA. Here swear we, for ourselves and brethren all,

To establish Joash on his father's throne,
Nor, having taken in our hands the sword,
To lay it down till we have slain his foes. 70
If anyone of us should break this vow,
Let him, great God, and let his children feel Thy vengeance, from Thine heritage shut
out,

And number'd with the dead disown'd by Thee!

JEHOI. And thou, my King, wilt thou not swear to be 75

Faithful to this eternal Law of God?

JOASH. How could I ever wish to disobey?

JEHOI. My son,—once more to call thee by that name,—

Suffer this fondness, and forgive the tears Prompted by too well founded fears for thee. 80

Far from the throne, in ignorance brought up Of all the poisonous charms of royalty, Thou knowest not th' intoxicating fumes Of pow'r uncurb'd, and flattery's magic spells;

Soon will she whisper that the holiest laws, 85 Tho' governing the herd, must kings obey; A monarch owns no bridle but his will; All else must bow before his majesty; Subjects are rightly doom'd to toil and tears. And with a rod of iron should be ruled, 90 For they will crush him if they be not crush'd. Thus will fresh pitfalls for your feet be dug, New snares be spread to spoil your innocence, Till they have made you hate the truth at last,

By painting virtue in repulsive guise. 95 Alas! our wisest king was led astray.

Swear on this book, before these witnesses, That God shall be thy first and constant care; Scourge of the evil, refuge of the good, That you will judge the poor as God directs; Rememb'ring how, in simple linen clad, 101 Thou wast thyself a helpless orphan child.

JOASH. I promise to observe the Law's commands.

If I forsake Thee, punish me, my God!

JEHOI. I must anoint thee with the holy oil. 105

Jehosheba, thou mayest show thyself.

SCENE IV

JOASH, JEHOIADA, JEHOSHEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, AZARIAH, ISHMAEL, the three other chiefs of the Levites, the Chorus

JEHOSH. [embracing JOASH]. My King, and son of David!

JOASH. Mother dear,

My only mother! Zachariah, come, Embrace thy brother.

JEHOSH. [to ZACHARIAH]. Kneel before thy king.

ZACHARIAH casts himself at the feet of JOASH.

JEHOI. [while they embrace one another]. My children be united ever thus!

JEHOSH. [to JOASH]. Thou knowest then whose blood has giv'n thee life? 5

JOASH. And who had robb'd me of it, but for thee.

JEHOSH. I then may call thee Joash, thy true name.

JOASH. And thee shall Joash never cease to love.

CHORUS. Why, there is—

JEHOSH. Joash.

JEHOI. Hear this messenger.

SCENE V

JOASH, JEHOIADA, JEHOSHEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, AZARIAH, ISHMAEL, the three other chiefs of the Levites, a Levite, the Chorus

A LEVITE. I know not what their impious plan may be, But everywhere resounds the threatening trump,

And amid standards fires are seen to shine; The Queen is doubtless mustering her troops; Already, every way of succour closed, 5 The sacred mount on which the Temple stands

Insolent Tyrians on all sides invest; And one of these blasphemers now brings word

That Abner is in chains, so cannot help.

JEHOSH. [to JOASH]. Ah! dearest child, by Heav'n in vain restored, 10

Alas! for safety I can do no more.

God has forgotten David and his seed!

JEHOI. [to JEHOSHEBA]. Dost thou not fear to draw the wrath divine

Down on thyself, and on the King thou lovest?

And e'en tho' God should snatch him from thine arms, 15

And will that David's house perish with him, Art thou not here upon the holy hill,

Where Abraham our father raised his hand Obediently to slay his blameless son,

Nor murmur'd as he to the altar bound 20 The fruit of his old age; leaving to God

Fulfilment of His promise, though this son Held in himself the hope of all his race?

Friends, let us take our several posts: the side

That looks towards the east let Ishmael guard;
Guard thou the north; thou, west; and thou
the south.

Take heed that no one, with imprudent zeal,
Levite or priest, unmasking my designs, Burst forth in headlong haste before the
time;

Let each, as with one common will inspired,
Wherever placed, till death his post maintain.

Our foes regard you, in their blinded rage,
As timid flocks for slaughter set aside,
And think that ye will scatter in dismay.
Let Azariah on the King attend.

[To JOASH.]

Come, precious scion of a vigorous stock,
And with fresh courage thy defenders fill;
Come, don the diadem before their eyes,
And die, if it must be so, like a King.

[To JEHOSH.]

Follow him, Princess.

[To a LEVITE.]

Give me thou those arms.

[To the CHORUS.]

Offer to God the tears of innocence.

SCENE VI

SALOME, the Chorus

ALL THE CHORUS [sings].

Go forth, ye sons of Aaron, go:
Never did cause of greater fame
The spirit of your sires inflame.

Go forth, ye sons of Aaron, go:
'Tis for your God and King this day ye strike
the blow.

ONE VOICE [alone].

Hast Thou no shafts in store,
That Justice may let fly?
Art Thou the jealous God no more,
No longer God of Vengeance throned on
high?

ANOTHER VOICE.

Where, God of Jacob, is Thy goodness fled?
With horrors all around us pressing near,
Have but our sins a voice which Thou canst hear?
Wilt Thou on us no more Thy pardon shed?

ALL THE CHORUS.

Where is Thine ancient lovingkindness fled?

ONE VOICE [alone].

'Tis against Thee that in this fray,
The wicked set the arrow to the bow;

"Let us destroy His feasts," say they,
"No longer let the earth His worship
show;

Nor his vexatious yoke let mortals longer
know.

His altars overturn, His votaries slay,
Till of His name and glory

Remains not e'en the story;
Of Him and His Anointed break the sway."

ALL THE CHORUS.

Hast Thou no shafts in store,
That Justice may let fly?

Art Thou the jealous God no more,
No longer God of Vengeance throned on
high?

ONE VOICE [alone].

Sad relic of our kings,
Last precious blossom of a stem so fair,
Ah! will the knife this time refuse to spare,
Which to his breast a cruel parent brings?
Tell us, sweet Prince, if o'er thy cradle hovered

Some Angel that protected thee from death?
Or did thy lifeless form in darkness covered,
At God's awakening voice resume its breath?

ANOTHER VOICE.

Great God, dost Thou the guilt upon him lay,
That his rebellious sires forsook Thy way?
Is Thy compassion then clean gone for aye?

THE CHORUS.

Where, God of Jacob, is Thy goodness fled?
Wilt Thou no more Thy gracious pardon
shed?

ONE OF THE MAIDENS OF THE CHORUS
[speaking, not singing].

Dear sisters, cruel Tyrians hem us round,
Do ye not hear their trumpets' dreadful sound?

SALOME.

Yea, and I hear them raise their savage cry;
 I tremble with alarm;
 Haste, let us to our place of refuge fly, 45
 Where God's Almighty Arm
 Shall in His Temple shelter us from harm.

ACT V

SCENE I

ZACHARIAH, SALOME, the Chorus

SAL. What news, dear Zachariah, dost thou bring?

ZACH. Double the fervour of your prayers to Heav'n!

Sister, our latest hour perhaps draws nigh.
 For the dread conflict orders have been giv'n.

SAL. And what does Joash?

ZACH. He has just been crown'd, 5
 And by the High Priest with the holy oil
 Anointed. Oh, what joy in every eye Welcomed a sovereign ransom'd from the tomb,

A scar still showing where the dagger fell!
 There too might have been seen his faithful nurse, 10

Who, almost hidden in a far recess,
 Was watching her loved charge, tho' none
 but God

And our dear mother witness'd her concern.
 Our Levites wept in tenderness and joy,
 Mingling with sobs their cries of glad de-
 light:

He 'mid these transports, all untouch'd by pride, 16

Gave gracious smiles, words, pressure of the
 hand;

And, swearing to conform with their advice,
 This one his father, that his brother call'd.

SAL. And has our secret reach'd the world
 without? 20

ZACH. 'Tis known to none beyond the Temple walls.

The sons of Levi, in divided bands,
 Are ranged in solemn silence at the doors,
 All in an instant ready to rush forth
 And raise the signal shout, "Long live the King!" 25

But Azariah has been strictly charged
 To guard the Prince's life from any risk.
 Meanwhile the scornful Queen, dagger in
 hand,

Laughs at our frail defence of brazen doors,

Awaits the engines that shall break them
 down, 30
 And threatens blood and ruin with each
 breath,

Some priests, my sister, ventured to advise
 That in a crypt, dug in the days of old,
 We should at least the precious Ark conceal;
 "Such fears insult our God," my father
 said, 35

"Shall then the Ark that caused proud
 tow'rs to fall,

That drove the waters of the Jordan back,
 And shatter'd to the earth Philistia's gods, Flee from before a shameless woman's
 face!" 39

Our mother, standing near in mortal dread,
 Now to the Prince, now to the altar turns
 Her wavering glance, yielding to mute alarm,

A sight to make a very savage weep.
 From time to time the King, with fond embrace, 44

Soothes her—Dear sisters, follow in my steps,
 And, if this day our King is doom'd to die,
 Let the same fate with him unite us all.

SAL. What rude hand knocks with quick repeated strokes?

What makes these Levites in confusion run?
 Why with such caution do they hide their
 arms? 50

Say, is the Temple forced?

ZACH. Your fears dispel,
 God sends us Abner.

SCENE II

JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, ABNER, ISHMAEL, two Levites, the Chorus

JEHOI. Can I trust mine eyes?
 How did dear Abner find his way to us,
 Right through the enemy's blockading camp?
 'Twas said that Athaliah, to insure

The execution of her cruel plots, 5
 Had bound in iron chains thy generous
 hands.

ABNER. My lord, she fear'd my courage and my zeal,

And worse than fetters gave me for reward,
 Confining me within a loathsome den, 9
 To wait until the Temple should be burn'd,
 And she, unsated still with streams of blood,
 Should come to free me from an irksome life,
 And cut short days, which sorrows to survive
 My princes should have ended long ago.

JEHOI. What miracle procured thee thy release? 15

ABNER. God only knows how works her cruel heart.

She sent for me; and said with anxious air,—
"Thou seest this temple by my troops beset:
Soon will the vengeful flames but ashes leave,
In spite of all thy god can do to save. 20

Yet upon two conditions may his priests
Redeem their lives, but no time must be lost,
That in my pow'r they place Eliakim,
With treasure known to them, and them
alone, 24

Amass'd by David when he reign'd of yore,
And left a secret in the High Priest's charge,
Go, tell them on these terms I let them live."

JEHOI. What course, dear Abner, thinkest thou the best?

ABNER. Give her the gold, if it indeed be
true,

That in thy keeping David's treasure lies, 30
And all besides, that from her greedy hands
Thou hitherto hast saved, precious and rare.
Give all; or thou wilt have vile murderers
come,

To break the altar, burn the cherubim,
And, on our sacred Ark laying rude hands, 35 Stain with thy priestly blood the inner shrine.

JEHOI. But, Abner, how can I in honour
yield

To punishment a poor unhappy child,
Whom God Himself intrusted to my care,
And save our lives by sacrificing his? 40

ABNER. Would to Almighty God, Who sees my heart,

That Athaliah might forget the boy,
And be content her cruelty to slake With Abner's blood, thinking thereby to soothe 44

Her angry gods! but what avails your care?
If ye all perish, will he die the less?

Does God command what is impossible?
When, in obedience to a tyrant's law,
His mother trusted Moses to the Nile,
Almost as soon as born, condemn'd to die; 50
Yet God, against all hope, his life preserved,
And made the King himself his childhood rear.

Who knows His purpose tow'rd Eliakim?
E'en such a lot may be for him in store,
And the fell murderess of the royal seed 55
Be render'd sensitive to pity's touch.
Not long ago I saw steal o'er her face

A tender look, that by Jehosheba
Was mark'd as well, calming her wrathful
mood. 59

Princess, the hour of danger claims thy voice!
What! Shall Jehoiada, with thy consent,
For a mere stranger, let his son and thee,
Yea all this people, fruitlessly be slain,
And flames devour the only spot on earth
Where God is worshipp'd? What could ye do more, 65

Were he the sole survivor of our Kings,
Your ancestors?

JEHOSH. [aside to JEHOIADA]. Thou seest his loyal heart;

Tell him the truth.

JEHOI. The time is not yet come.

ABNER. Time is more precious than thou thinkest, Sir. 69

While thou art doubting what reply to give,
Mattan, at Athaliah's ear, demands,
Burning with rage, a speedy massacre.
Must I fall prostrate at thy hallow'd knees?
Now in the name of that Most Holy Place, Unseen by mortal eye save thine, where dwells 75

God's glory; howsoever hard the task,
Let us think how to meet the sudden blow.
I only beg a moment's breathing space:
To-morrow, yea to-night, I will secure
The Temple, and make outrage dangerous 80
But I perceive my words are lost on thee,
Tears and entreaties pow'rless to persuade,
Too strict thy sense of duty to give way.

Well, find me then some weapon, spear or
sword, 84

And, where the foe await me, at these
gates,

Abner at least can die a soldier's death.

JEHOI. I yield. Your proffer'd counsel I
embrace:

Abner, we will avert these threaten'd ills.
'Tis true that David left a treasure here, 89
That to my charge was trusted, the last hope
Left to the Jews in their calamities;
My watchful care bestowed it secretly,
But, since we cannot hide it from your
Queen,

She shall be satisfied, and through these doors
Enter, attended by her officers; 95

But from these altars let her keep afar
The savage fury of her foreign troops,
And spare the House of God from pillage
dire.

Arrange with her the number of her train,

Children and priests can small suspicion
rouse. 100

Touching this child she dreads so much, to
thee,

Knowing thine upright heart, I will unfold
The secret of his birth, when she can hear;
And thou shalt judge between us, if I must Place this young boy in Athaliah's pow'r. 105

ABNER. I take him under my protection
now;

Fear naught, my lord. Back to the Queen
I haste.

SCENE III

JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, ISHMAEL, two Levites, the Chorus

JEHOI. Great God! The hour is come that brings Thy prey!

Hark, Ishmael.

[He whispers in his ear.]

JEHOSH. Almighty King of Heav'n.
Place a thick veil before her eyes once more,
As when, making her crime of none effect,
Thou in my bosom didst her victim hide. 5

JEHOI. Great Ishmael, go, there is no time to lose;

Fulfil precisely this important task;
And, above all, take heed, when she arrives
And passes, that no threatening signs be seen,
Children, for Joash be a throne prepared; 10
Let our arm'd Levites on his steps attend.
Princess, bring hither too his trusty nurse,
And dry the copious fountain of thy tears.

[To a LEVITE.]

Soon as the Queen, madly presumptuous,
Has cross'd the threshold of the Temple
gates, 15

Let all retreat be made impossible;
That very moment let the martial trump
Wake sudden terror in the hostile camp:
Call all the people to support their King,
And make her ears ring with the wondrous
tale 20

Of Joash by God's providence preserved.
He comes.

SCENE IV

JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, ZACHARIAH, SALOME, JOASH, AZARIAH, a band of Priests and Levites, the Chorus

JEHOI. [continues]. Ye Levites, and ye priests of God,

Range yourselves round, but do not show yourselves;

Leave it to me to keep your zeal in check,
And tarry till my voice bids you appear.

They all hide themselves.

My King, methinks this hope rewards thy vows; 5

Come, see thy foes fall prostrate at thy feet.
She who in fury sought thine infant life
Comes hither in hot haste to slay thee now;
But fear her not: think that upon our side
Stands the destroying angel as thy guard. 10
Ascend thy throne—The gates are opening
wide;

One moment let this curtain cover thee.

He draws a curtain.

Princess, thy colour changes.

JEHOSH. Can I see
Assassins fill God's house, and not grow pale?

Why, look how numerous the retinue. 15

JEHOI. I see them shut the Temple doors
again.

All is secure.

SCENE V

JOASH, JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, ABNER, ATHALIAH, and her Attendants (JOASH is hidden behind the curtain.)

ATH. [to JEHOIADA]. Deceiver, there thou art!

Author of mischief, plots, conspiracies,
Whose hopes are all upon disturbance based,
Inveterate foe of sovereign majesty!
Dost thou still lean upon thy god's support, 5
Or has that flimsy trust forsaken thee?
He leaves thee and thy temple in my pow'r.
Well might I on the altar thou dost serve—
But no, thine offer'd ransom shall suffice; Fulfil what thou hast promised. That young boy, 10

That treasure which thou must to me resign,
Where are they?

JEHOI. Straight shalt thou be satisfied:
I am about to show them both at once.

The curtain is drawn up. JOASH is discovered on his throne; his nurse is kneeling on his right; AZARIAH, sword in hand, is standing on his left; and near him ZACHARIAH and SALOME are kneeling on the steps of the throne; a number of Levites, with swords in their hands, are ranged on either side.

Appear, dear child, worthy of royal sires.
Queen, dost thou recognize King David's heir? 15

Observe at least these marks thy dagger left:
Behold thine offspring, Ahaziah's son!
Welcome King Joash, Abner, people all!

ABNER. Heav'ns!

ATH. Traitor!

JEHOI. See this faithful Jewess here, Whose bosom, as thou knowest, nursed him
then. 20

Saved from thy fury by Jehosheba,
Within this temple God has guarded him.
Lo, here is all of David's treasure left!

ATH. Traitor, thy fraud will but destroy the child:

Rid me, my soldiers, of this vile pretence! 25

JEHOI. Soldiers of God, draw near, defend your King:

The back of the stage opens: the interior of the temple is shown; and armed Levites enter from all around upon the stage.

ATH. Treason! Oh, where am I, unhappy Queen!

Weapons and enemies on every side!

JEHOI. Thy search is vain, thou canst not 'scape the toils

Cast round thee by the God whom thou hast
scorn'd. 30

Into our hands has He deliver'd thee;
Drunken with blood He calls thee to His bar.

ATH. My warriors are turn'd craven, numb with fear!

Abner, is this thy coward's snare?

ABNER. My Queen,

As God is witness—

ATH. Never mind thy god, 35

Avenge me.

ABNER [throwing himself at the feet of JOASH].

Upon whom? Joash? My prince?

ATH. He Joash! He thy King! Be-
think you, knaves,

That ye are still beleagu'ed by my arms;
I hear my soldiers call me with loud shouts.
Tremble, ye rebels! Succour is at hand. 40

SCENE VI

JOASH, ATHALIAH, JEHOIADA, ISHMAEL, and all the actors in the preceding scene

ISH. [to JEHOIADA]. My lord, our foes have left the Temple free:

The foreigners are fled, the Jews submit.
As smoke is driv'n away before the wind,
Th' Almighty's voice this army has dispersed.

Our Levites, high above the courts around, 5

Have Ahaziah's son to all proclaim'd,
Told of his infant life saved from the sword,
And Athaliah's fall into the snare.
The trumpets sounded from all sides at
once,

And, mingled with their cries, such terror
spread 10

Throughout the camp as struck with wild dismay

Proud Midian at the flash of Gideon's sword,
The Tyrians, casting arms and shields away,
The first, in all directions disappear'd.

Some Jews, in dazed confusion, shared their flight; 15

The rest for Joash loudly have declared,
Owning herein the guiding hand of God.

Yea, all the people, with one heart inspired,
Women, old men, and babes embrace with
joy,

Blessing Jehovah and the King He sends, 20
And hymn the son of David raised to life.

All in the holy city execrate
The name of Baal, and destroy his shrine.
Mattan is slain.

ATH. Jehovah, thou hast won!

Yes, it is Joash. Vain denial now! 25
'Twas here I gave command to have him
slain;

He has the mien and features of his sire;
I trace his kinship with the line I hate.
Thus David triumphs, Ahab is destroy'd.

Relentless god, this is thy work alone, 30
With hopes of easy vengeance luring me.

And twenty times a day setting my thoughts
In conflict, now remorseful for this child,

Now dazzled with the prospect of rich spoil,
And loath to give it to devouring flames. 35

Well, let him reign, thy care and handiwork!
And, to inaugurate his sovereignty,

Bid him direct this dagger to my heart!
This for my grandson is my dying wish,—

My wish, nay more than wish, my trust and hope; 40

That weary of thy law, thy yoke contemn'd,
True to the blood of Ahab, drawn from me,

Following his grandsire's and his father's steps,

He, David's heir, shall make himself abhorr'd,
Profane thine altar, rob thee of thy rites, 45

So avenge Ahab, Jezebel, and me!

ATHALIAH goes out, the Levites follow her.

JEHOI. Out of the Temple precincts have her forth

At once, nor be its holy courts profaned.

Go, and avenge your princes massacred,
Whose blood cries out till pacified by hers. 50
If any venture to defend her cause,
Him let the sword along with her, devour.

SCENE VII

JOASH, JEHOIADA, JEHOSEBA, ABNER, and all the actors in the preceding scene

JOASH [after descending from his throne].
Thou seest, O Lord, the anguish of my
soul,

Oh, turn her malediction from me far,
And never suffer it to be fulfill'd!
Let Joash die ere he forgets his God!

JEHOI. [to the Levites]. Call all the people, they shall see their King 5
Let them approach, and fresh allegiance swear.

King, priests, and people, let us all confirm
The covenant that Jacob made with God
Grateful for mercy, for our sins ashamed,

And with new vows binding ourselves to
Him. 10
Abner, resume thy post beside the King.

SCENE VIII

JOASH, JEHOIADA, a Levite, and all the actors in the preceding scene

JEHOI. [to the Levite]. Well, has that monster met with punishment?

THE LEVITE. Her guilt has been atoned for with the sword.

Jerusalem, so long her fury's prey,
Relieved at last from her detested yoke. 4
With joy beholds her weltering in her blood.

JEHOI. By this, the dreadful end her crimes deserved,

Learn, King of Judah, nor this truth forget:—
Kings have in Heav'n their Judge severe,
Who to the fatherless

Is Father, and will punish those who innocence oppress!

The action takes place in Helmer's house

ACT I

SCENE.—A room furnished comfortably 15 and tastefully but not extravagantly. At the back, a door to the right leads to the entrance-hall, another to the left leads to Helmer's study.
Between the doors stands a piano. In the middle of the left-hand wall is a door, and be- 20 yond it a window. Near the window are a round table, arm-chairs and a small sofa. In the right-hand wall, at the farther end, another door; and on the same side, nearer the footlights, a stove, two easy chairs and a rocking-chair; 25 between the stove and the door, a small table.

Engravings on the walls; a cabinet with china and other small objects; a small book-case with well-bound books. The floors are carpeted, and a fire burns in the stove. It is winter.

5 A bell rings in the hall; shortly afterwards the door is heard to open. Enter NORA, humming a tune and in high spirits. She is in outdoor dress and carries a number of parcels; these she lays on the table to the right. She 10 leaves the outer door open after her, and through it is seen a PORTER who is carrying a Christmas Tree and a basket, which he gives to the MAID who has opened the door.

NORA. Hide the Christmas Tree carefully, Helen. Be sure the children do not see it till this evening, when it is dressed.
[To the PORTER, taking out her purse.] How much?

PORTER. Sixpence.

NORA. There is a shilling. No, keep the change. [The PORTER thanks her, and goes out. NORA shuts the door. She is laughing to herself, as she takes off her hat and coat.
She takes a packet of macaroons from her pocket and eats one or two; then goes cautiously to her husband's door and listens.] Yes, he is in. [Still humming, she goes to the table on the right.]

HELMER [calls out from his room]. Is that my little lark twittering out there?

NORA [busy opening some of the parcels]. 5 Yes, it is!

HELMER. Is it my little squirrel bustling about?

NORA. Yes!

HELMER. When did my squirrel come 10 home?

NORA. Just now. [Puts the bag of macarons into her pocket and wipes her mouth.] Come in here, Torvald, and see what I have bought.

HELMER. Don't disturb me. [A little later, he opens the door and looks into the room, pen in hand.] Bought, did you say? All these things? Has my little spendthrift been wasting money again?

NORA. Yes, but, Torvald, this year we really can let ourselves go a little. This is the first Christmas that we have not needed to economise.

HELMER. Still, you know, we can't spend 25 money recklessly.

NORA. Yes, Torvald, we may be a wee bit more reckless now, mayn't we? Just a tiny wee bit! You are going to have a big salary and earn lots and lots of money. 30

HELMER. Yes, after the New Year; but then it will be a whole quarter before the salary is due.

NORA. Pooh! we can borrow till then.

HELMER. Nora! [Goes up to her and 35 takes her playfully by the ear.] The same little featherhead! Suppose, now, that I borrowed fifty pounds to-day, and you spent it all in the Christmas week, and then on New Year's Eve a slate fell on my head and killed me, and—

NORA [putting her hands over his mouth]. Oh! don't say such horrid things.

HELMER. Still, suppose that happened,—what then?

NORA. If that were to happen, I don't suppose I should care whether I owed money or not.

HELMER. Yes, but what about the people who had lent it?

NORA. They? Who would bother about them? I should not know who they were.

HELMER. That is like a woman! But seriously, Nora, you know what I think about that. No debt, no borrowing. There can be no freedom or beauty about a home life that depends on borrowing and debt. We two have kept bravely on the straight road so far, and we will go on the same way for the short time longer that there need be any struggle.

NORA [moving towards the stove]. As you please, Torvald.

HELMER [following her]. Come, come, my little skylark must not droop her wings. What is this! Is my little squirrel out of temper? [Taking out his purse.] Nora, what do you think I have got here—

15 NORA [turning round quickly]. Money!

HELMER. There you are. [Gives her some money.] Do you think I don't know what a lot is wanted for housekeeping at Christmas-time?

20 NORA [counting]. Ten shillings—a pound—two pounds! Thank you, thank you, Torvald; that will keep me going for a long time.

HELMER. Indeed it must.

NORA. Yes, yes, it will. But come here and let me show you what I have bought. And all so cheap! Look, here is a new suit for Ivar, and a sword; and a horse and a trumpet for Bob; and a doll and dolly's bedstead for Emmy,—they are very plain, but anyway she will soon break them in pieces. And here are dress-lengths and handkerchiefs for the maids; old Anne ought really to have something better.

HELMER. And what is in this parcel?

NORA [crying out]. No, no! you mustn't see that till this evening.

HELMER. Very well. But now tell me, you extravagant little person, what would 40 you like for yourself?

NORA. For myself? Oh, I am sure I don't want anything.

HELMER. Yes, but you must. Tell me something reasonable that you would particularly like to have. 45

NORA. No, I really can't think of anything—unless, Torvald—

HELMER. Well?

NORA [playing with his coat buttons, and 50 without raising her eyes to his]. If you really want to give me something, you might—you might—

HELMER. Well, out with it!

NORA [speaking quickly]. You might give me money, Torvald. Only just as much as you can afford; and then one of these days I will buy something with it.

HELMER. But, Nora—

NORA. Oh, do! dear Torvald; please, please do! Then I will wrap it up in beautiful gilt paper and hang it on the Christmas Tree. Wouldn't that be fun?

HELMER. What are little people called that are always wasting money?

NORA. Spendthrifts—I know. Let us do as you suggest, Torvald, and then I shall have time to think what I am most in want of. That is a very sensible plan, isn't it?

HELMER [smiling]. Indeed it is—that is to say, if you were really to save out of the money I give you, and then really buy something for yourself. But if you spend it all on the housekeeping and any number of unnecessary things, then I merely have to pay up again.

NORA. Oh but, Torvald—

HELMER. You can't deny it, my dear little Nora. [Puts his arm round her waist.] It's a sweet little spendthrift, but she uses up a deal of money. One would hardly believe how expensive such little persons are!

NORA. It's a shame to say that. I do really save all I can.

HELMER [laughing]. That's very true,—all you can. But you can't save anything!

NORA [smiling quietly and happily]. You haven't any idea how many expenses we skylarks and squirrels have, Torvald.

HELMER. You are an odd little soul. Very like your father. You always find some new way of wheedling money out of me, and, as soon as you have got it, it seems to melt in your hands. You never know where it has gone. Still, one must take you as you are. It is in the blood; for indeed it is true that you can inherit these things, Nora.

NORA. Ah, I wish I had inherited many of papa's qualities.

HELMER. And I would not wish you to be anything but just what you are, my sweet little skylark. But, do you know, it strikes me that you are looking rather—what shall I say—rather uneasy to-day?

NORA. Do I?

HELMER. You do, really. Look straight at me.

NORA [looks at him]. Well?

HELMER [wagging his finger at her]. Hasn't Miss Sweet-Tooth been breaking rules in town to-day?

NORA. No; what makes you think that?

HELMER. Hasn't she paid a visit to the confectioner's?

NORA. No, I assure you, Torvald—

HELMER. Not been nibbling sweets?

NORA. No, certainly not.

HELMER. Not even taken a bite at a macaroon or two?

NORA. No, Torvald, I assure you really—

HELMER. There, there, of course I was only joking.

NORA [going to the table on the right]. I should not think of going against your wishes.

HELMER. No, I am sure of that; besides, you gave me your word—[Going up to her.] Keep your little Christmas secrets to yourself, my darling. They will all be revealed to-night when the Christmas Tree is lit, no doubt.

NORA. Did you remember to invite Doctor Rank?

HELMER. No. But there is no need; as a matter of course he will come to dinner with us. However, I will ask him when he comes in this morning. I have ordered some good wine. Nora, you can't think how I am looking forward to this evening.

NORA. So am I! And how the children will enjoy themselves, Torvald!

HELMER. It is splendid to feel that one has a perfectly safe appointment, and a big enough income. It's delightful to think of, isn't it?

NORA. It's wonderful!

HELMER. Do you remember last Christmas? For a full three weeks beforehand you shut yourself up every evening till long after midnight, making ornaments for the Christmas Tree and all the other fine things that were to be a surprise to us. It was the dull-est three weeks I ever spent!

NORA. I didn't find it dull.

HELMER [smiling]. But there was precious little result, Nora.

NORA. Oh, you shouldn't tease me about that again. How could I help the cat's going in and tearing everything to pieces?

HELMER. Of course you couldn't, poor little girl. You had the best of intentions to please us all, and that's the main thing. But it is a good thing that our hard times are over.

NORA. Yes, it is really wonderful.

HELMER. This time I needn't sit here and be dull all alone, and you needn't ruin your dear eyes and your pretty little hands—

NORA [clapping her hands]. No, Torvald, I needn't any longer, need I! It's wonderfully lovely to hear you say so! [Taking his arm]. Now I will tell you how I have been thinking we ought to arrange things, Torvald. As soon as Christmas is over— [A bell rings in the hall]. There's the bell. [She tidies the room a little]. There's someone at the door. What a nuisance!

HELMER. If it is a caller, remember I am not at home.

MAID [in the doorway]. A lady to see you, ma'am,—a stranger.

NORA. Ask her to come in.

MAID [to HELMER]. The doctor came at the same time, sir.

HELMER. Did he go straight into my room?

MAID. Yes, sir.

[HELMER goes into his room. The MAID ushers in MRS. LINDE, who is in travelling dress, and shuts the door].

MRS. LINDE [in a dejected and timid voice]. How do you do, Nora?

NORA [doubtfully]. How do you do—

MRS. LINDE. You don't recognise me, I suppose.

NORA. No, I don't know—yes, to be sure, I seem to—[Suddenly]. Yes! Christine! Is it really you?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, it is I.

NORA. Christine! To think of my not recognising you? And yet how could I— [In a gentle voice]. How you have altered, Christine!

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I have indeed. In nine, ten long years—

NORA. Is it so long since we met? I suppose it is. The last eight years have been a happy time for me, I can tell you. And so now you have come into the town, and have taken this long journey in winter—that was plucky of you.

MRS. LINDE. I arrived by steamer this morning.

NORA. To have some fun at Christmas-time, of course. How delightful! We will have such fun together! But take off your things. You are not cold, I hope. [Helps her]. Now we will sit down by the stove, and be cosy. No, take this arm-chair; I will sit here in the rocking-chair. [Takes her hands]. Now you look like your old self again; it was only the first moment— You are a little paler, Christine, and perhaps a little thinner.

MRS. LINDE. And much, much older, Nora.

NORA. Perhaps a little older; very, very little; certainly not much. [Stops suddenly and speaks seriously]. What a thoughtless creature I am, chattering away like this. My poor, dear Christine, do forgive me.

MRS. LINDE. What do you mean, Nora?

NORA [gently]. Poor Christine, you are a widow.

MRS. LINDE. Yes; it is three years ago now.

NORA. Yes, I knew; I saw it in the papers. I assure you, Christine, I meant ever so often to write to you at the time, but I always put it off and something always prevented me.

MRS. LINDE. I quite understand, dear.

NORA. It was very bad of me, Christine. Poor thing, how you must have suffered. And he left you nothing?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. And no children?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. Nothing at all, then?

MRS. LINDE. Not even any sorrow or grief to live upon.

NORA [looking incredulously at her]. But, Christine, is that possible?

MRS. LINDE [smiles sadly and strokes her hair]. It sometimes happens, Nora.

NORA. So you are quite alone. How dreadfully sad that must be. I have three lovely children. You can't see them just now, for they are out with their nurse. But now you must tell me all about it.

MRS. LINDE. No, no; I want to hear about you.

NORA. No, you must begin. I mustn't be selfish to-day; to-day I must only think of your affairs. But there is one thing I must tell you. Do you know we have just had a great piece of good luck?

MRS. LINDE. No, what is it?

NORA. Just fancy, my husband has been made manager of the Bank!

MRS. LINDE. Your husband? What good luck!

NORA. Yes, tremendous! A barrister's profession is such an uncertain thing, especially if he won't undertake unsavoury cases; and naturally Torvald has never been willing to do that, and I quite agree with him. You may imagine how pleased we are! He is to take up his work in the Bank at the New Year, and then he will have a big salary and lots of commissions. For the future we can live quite differently—we can do just as we like. I feel so relieved and so happy, Christine! It will be splendid to have heaps of money and not need to have any anxiety, won't it?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, anyhow I think it would be delightful to have what one needs.

NORA. No, not only what one needs, but heaps and heaps of money.

MRS. LINDE [smiling]. Nora, Nora, haven't you learnt sense yet? In our school-days you were a great spendthrift.

NORA [laughing]. Yes, that is what Torvald says now. [Wags her finger at her.] But "Nora, Nora" is not so silly as you think. We have not been in a position for me to waste money. We have both had to work.

MRS. LINDE. You too?

NORA. Yes; odds and ends, needlework, crochet-work, embroidery, and that kind of thing. [Dropping her voice.] And other things as well. You know Torvald left his office when we were married? There was no prospect of promotion there, and he had to try and earn more than before. But during the first year he overworked himself dreadfully. You see, he had to make money every way he could, and he worked early and late; but he couldn't stand it, and fell dreadfully ill, and the doctors said it was necessary for him to go south.

MRS. LINDE. You spent a whole year in Italy, didn't you?

NORA. Yes. It was no easy matter to get away, I can tell you. It was just after Ivar was born; but naturally we had to go. It was a wonderfully beautiful journey, and it saved Torvald's life. But it cost a tremendous lot of money, Christine.

MRS. LINDE. So I should think.

NORA. It cost about two hundred and fifty pounds. That's a lot, isn't it?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, and in emergencies like that it is lucky to have the money.

NORA. I ought to tell you that we had it from papa.

MRS. LINDE. Oh, I see. It was just about that time that he died, wasn't it?

NORA. Yes; and, just think of it, I couldn't go and nurse him. I was expecting little Ivar's birth every day and I had my poor sick Torvald to look after. My dear, kind father—I never saw him again, Christine. That was the saddest time I have known since our marriage.

MRS. LINDE. I know how fond you were of him. And then you went off to Italy?

NORA. Yes; you see we had money then, and the doctors insisted on our going, so we started a month later.

MRS. LINDE. And your husband came back quite well?

NORA. As sound as a bell!

MRS. LINDE. But—the doctor?

NORA. What doctor?

MRS. LINDE. I thought your maid said the gentleman who arrived here just as I did, was the doctor?

NORA. Yes, that was Doctor Rank, but he doesn't come here professionally. He is our greatest friend, and comes in at least once every day. No, Torvald has not had an hour's illness since then, and our children are strong and healthy and so am I. [Jumps up and claps her hands.] Christine! Christine! it's good to be alive and happy!—But how horrid of me; I am talking of nothing but my own affairs. [Sits on a stool near her, and rests her arms on her knees.] You mustn't be angry with me. Tell me, is it really true that you did not love your husband? Why did you marry him?

MRS. LINDE. My mother was alive then, and was bed-ridden and helpless, and I had to provide for my two younger brothers; so I did not think I was justified in refusing his offer.

NORA. No, perhaps you were quite right. He was rich at that time, then?

MRS. LINDE. I believe he was quite well off. But his business was a precarious one; and, when he died, it all went to pieces and there was nothing left.

NORA. And then?—

MRS. LINDE. Well, I had to turn my hand to anything I could find—first a small shop, then a small school, and so on. The last three years have seemed like one long working-day, with no rest. Now it is at an end, Nora. My poor mother needs me no more, for she is gone; and the boys do not need me either; they have got situations and can shift for themselves.

NORA. What a relief you must feel it—

MRS. LINDE. No, indeed; I only feel my life unspeakably empty. No one to live for any more. [Gets up restlessly.] That was why I could not stand the life in my little backwater any longer. I hope it may be easier here to find something which will busy me and occupy my thoughts. If only I could have the good luck to get some regular work—office work of some kind—

NORA. But, Christine, that is so frightfully tiring, and you look tired out now. You had far better go away to some watering place.

MRS. LINDE [walking to the window]. I have no father to give me money for a journey, Nora.

NORA [rising]. Oh, don't be angry with me.

MRS. LINDE [going up to her]. It is you that must not be angry with me, dear. The worst of a position like mine is that it makes one so bitter. No one to work for, and yet obliged to be always on the look-out for chances. One must live, and so one becomes selfish. When you told me of the happy turn your fortunes have taken—you will hardly believe it—I was delighted not so much on your account as on my own.

NORA. How do you mean?—Oh, I understand. You mean that perhaps Torvald could get you something to do.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that was what I was thinking of.

NORA. He must, Christine. Just leave it to me; I will broach the subject very cleverly—I will think of something that will please him very much. It will make me so happy to be of some use to you.

MRS. LINDE. How kind you are, Nora, to be so anxious to help me! It is doubly kind in you, for you know so little of the burdens and troubles of life.

NORA. I—? I know so little of them?

MRS. LINDE [smiling]. My dear! Small household cares and that sort of thing!—You are a child, Nora.

NORA [tosses her head and crosses the stage]. You ought not to be so superior.

MRS. LINDE. No?

NORA. You are just like the others. They all think that I am incapable of anything really serious—

MRS. LINDE. Come, come—

NORA. —that I have gone through nothing in this world of cares.

MRS. LINDE. But, my dear Nora, you have just told me all your troubles.

NORA. Pooh!—those were trifles. [Lowering her voice.] I have not told you the important thing.

MRS. LINDE. The important thing? What do you mean?

NORA. You look down upon me altogether, Christine—but you ought not to. You are proud, aren't you, of having worked so hard and so long for your mother?

MRS. LINDE. Indeed, I don't look down on any one. But it is true that I am both proud and glad to think that I was privileged to make the end of my mother's life almost free from care.

NORA. And you are proud to think of what you have done for your brothers.

MRS. LINDE. I think I have the right to be.

NORA. I think so, too. But now, listen to this; I too have something to be proud and glad of.

MRS. LINDE. I have no doubt you have. But what do you refer to?

NORA. Speak low. Suppose Torvald were to hear! He mustn't on any account—no one in the world must know, Christine, except you.

MRS. LINDE. But what is it?

NORA. Come here. [Pulls her down on the sofa beside her.] Now I will show you that I too have something to be proud and glad of. It was I who saved Torvald's life.

MRS. LINDE. "Saved"? How?

NORA. I told you about our trip to Italy. Torvald would never have recovered if he had not gone there—

MRS. LINDE. Yes, but your father gave you the necessary funds.

NORA [smiling]. Yes, that is what Torvald and all the others think, but—

MRS. LINDE. But—

NORA. Papa didn't give us a shilling. It was I who procured the money.

MRS. LINDE. You? All that large sum?

NORA. Two hundred and fifty pounds. What do you think of that?

MRS. LINDE. But, Nora, how could you possibly do it? Did you win a prize in the Lottery?

NORA [contemptuously]. In the Lottery? There would have been no credit in that.

MRS. LINDE. But where did you get it from, then?

NORA [humming and smiling with an air of mystery]. Hm, hm! Aha!

MRS. LINDE. Because you couldn't have borrowed it.

NORA. Couldn't I? Why not?

MRS. LINDE. No, a wife cannot borrow without her husband's consent.

NORA [tossing her head]. Oh, if it is a wife who has any head for business—a wife who has the wit to be a little bit clever—

MRS. LINDE. I don't understand it at all, Nora.

NORA. There is no need you should. I never said I had borrowed money. I may have got it some other way. [Lies back on the sofa.] Perhaps I got it from some other admirer. When anyone is as attractive as I am—

MRS. LINDE. You are a mad creature.

NORA. Now, you know you're full of curiosity, Christine.

MRS. LINDE. Listen to me, Nora dear. Haven't you been a little bit imprudent?

NORA [sits up straight]. Is it imprudent to save your husband's life?

MRS. LINDE. It seems to me imprudent, without his knowledge, to—

NORA. But it was absolutely necessary that he should not know! My goodness, can't you understand that? It was necessary he should have no idea what a dangerous condition he was in. It was to me that the doctors came and said that his life was in danger, and that the only thing to save him was to live in the south. Do you suppose I didn't try, first of all, to get what I wanted as if it were for myself? I told him how much I should love to travel abroad like other young wives; I tried tears and entreaties with him; I told him that he ought to remember the condition I was in, and that he ought to be kind and indulgent to me; I even hinted that he might raise a loan. That nearly made him angry, Christine. He said I was thoughtless, and that it was his duty as my husband not to indulge me in my whims and caprices—as I believe he called them. Very well, I thought, you must be saved—and that was how I came to devise a way out of the difficulty—

MRS. LINDE. And did your husband never get to know from your father that the money had not come from him?

NORA. No, never. Papa died just at that time. I had meant to let him into the secret and beg him never to reveal it. But he was so ill then—alas, there never was any need to tell him.

MRS. LINDE. And since then have you never told your secret to your husband?

NORA. Good Heavens, no! How could you think so? A man who has such strong opinions about these things! And besides, how painful and humiliating it would be for Torvald, with his manly independence, to know that he owed me anything! It would upset our mutual relations altogether; our beautiful happy home would no longer be what it is now.

MRS. LINDE. Do you mean never to tell him about it?

NORA [meditatively, and with a half smile]. Yes—some day, perhaps, after many years, when I am no longer as nice-looking as I am now. Don't laugh at me! I mean, of course, when Torvald is no longer as devoted to me as he is now; when my dancing and dressing-up and reciting have palled on him; then it may be a good thing to have something in reserve— [Breaking off.] What nonsense! That time will never come. Now, what do you think of my great secret, Christine? Do you still think I am of no use? I can tell you, too, that this affair has caused me a lot of worry. It has been by no means easy for me to meet my engagements punctually. I may tell you that there is something that is called, in business, quarterly interest, and another thing called payment in instalments, and it is always so dreadfully difficult to manage them. I have had to save a little here and there, where I could, you understand. I have not been able to put aside much from my housekeeping money, for Torvald must have a good table. I couldn't let my children be shabbily dressed; I have felt obliged to use up all he gave me for them, the sweet little darlings!

MRS. LINDE. So it has all had to come out of your own necessities of life, poor Nora?

NORA. Of course. Besides, I was the one responsible for it. Whenever Torvald has given me money for new dresses and such things, I have never spent more than half of it; I have always bought the simplest and cheapest things. Thank Heaven, any clothes look well on me, and so Torvald has never noticed it. But it was often very hard on me, Christine—because it is delightful to be really well dressed, isn't it?

MRS. LINDE. Quite so.

NORA. Well, then I have found other ways of earning money. Last winter I was lucky enough to get a lot of copying to do; so I locked myself up and sat writing every evening until quite late at night. Many a time I was desperately tired; but all the same it was a tremendous pleasure to sit there working and earning money. It was like being a man.

MRS. LINDE. How much have you been able to pay off in that way?

NORA. I can't tell you exactly. You see, it is very difficult to keep an account of a business matter of that kind. I only know that I have paid every penny that I could scrape together. Many a time I was at my wits' end. [Smiles.] Then I used to sit here and imagine that a rich old gentleman had fallen in love with me—

MRS. LINDE. What! Who was it?

NORA. Be quiet!—that he had died; and that when his will was opened it contained, written in big letters, the instruction: "The lovely Mrs. Nora Helmer is to have all I possess paid over to her at once in cash."

MRS. LINDE. But, my dear Nora—who could the man be?

NORA. Good gracious, can't you understand? There was no old gentleman at all; it was only something that I used to sit here and imagine, when I couldn't think of any way of procuring money. But it's all the same now; the tiresome old person can stay where he is, as far as I am concerned; I don't care about him or his will either, for I am free from care now. [Jumps up.] My goodness, it's delightful to think of, Christine! Free from care! To be able to be free from care, quite free from care; to be able to play and romp with the children; to be able to keep the house beautifully and have everything just as Torvald likes it! And, think of it, soon the spring will come and the big blue sky! Perhaps we shall be able to take a little trip—perhaps I shall see the sea again! Oh, it's a wonderful thing to be alive and be happy. [A bell is heard in the hall.]

MRS. LINDE [rising]. There is the bell; perhaps I had better go.

NORA. No, don't go; no one will come in here; it is sure to be for Torvald.

SERVANT [at the hall door]. Excuse me, ma'am—there is a gentleman to see the master, and as the doctor is with him—

NORA. Who is it?

KROGSTAD [at the door]. It is I, Mrs. Helmer. [MRS. LINDE starts, trembles, and turns to the window.]

NORA [takes a step towards him, and speaks in a strained, low voice]. You? What is it? What do you want to see my husband about?

KROGSTAD. Bank business—in a way. I have a small post in the Bank, and I hear your husband is to be our chief now—

NORA. Then it is—

KROGSTAD. Nothing but dry business matters, Mrs. Helmer; absolutely nothing else.

NORA. Be so good as to go into the study, then. [She bows indifferently to him and shuts the door into the hall; then comes back and makes up the fire in the stove.]

MRS. LINDE. Nora—who was that man?

NORA. A lawyer, of the name of Krogstad.

MRS. LINDE. Then it really was he.

NORA. Do you know the man?

MRS. LINDE. I used to—many years ago. At one time he was a solicitor's clerk in our town.

NORA. Yes, he was.

MRS. LINDE. He is greatly altered.

NORA. He made a very unhappy marriage.

MRS. LINDE. He is a widower now, isn't he?

NORA. With several children. There now, it is burning up. [Shuts the door of the stove and moves the rocking-chair aside.]

MRS. LINDE. They say he carries on various kinds of business.

NORA. Really! Perhaps he does; I don't know anything about it. But don't let us think of business; it is so tiresome.

DOCTOR RANK [comes out of HELMER'S study. Before he shuts the door he calls to him.] No, my dear fellow, I won't disturb you; I would rather go in to your wife for a little while. [Shuts the door and sees Mrs. LINDE.] I beg your pardon; I am afraid I am disturbing you too.

NORA. No, not at all. [Introducing him.] Doctor Rank, Mrs. Linde.

RANK. I have often heard Mrs. Linde's name mentioned here. I think I passed you on the stairs when I arrived, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I go up very slowly; I can't manage stairs well.

RANK. Ah! some slight internal weakness?

MRS. LINDE. No, the fact is I have been overworking myself.

RANK. Nothing more than that? Then I suppose you have come to town to amuse yourself with our entertainments?

MRS. LINDE. I have come to look for work.

RANK. Is that a good cure for overwork?

MRS. LINDE. One must live, Doctor Rank.

RANK. Yes, the general opinion seems to be that it is necessary.

NORA. Look here, Doctor Rank—you know you want to live.

RANK. Certainly. However wretched I may feel, I want to prolong the agony as long as possible. All my patients are like that. And so are those who are morally diseased; one of them, and a bad case too, is at this very moment with Helmer—

MRS. LINDE [sadly]. Ah!

NORA. Whom do you mean?

RANK. A lawyer of the name of Krogstad, a fellow you don't know at all. He suffers from a diseased moral character, Mrs. Helmer; but even he began talking of its being highly important that he should live.

NORA. Did he? What did he want to speak to Torvald about?

RANK. I have no idea; I only heard that it was something about the Bank.

NORA. I didn't know this—what's his name—Krogstad had anything to do with the Bank.

RANK. Yes, he has some sort of appointment there. [To Mrs. LINDE.] I don't know whether you find also in your part of the world that there are certain people who go zealously snuffing about to smell out moral corruption, and, as soon as they have found some, put the person concerned into some lucrative position where they can keep their eye on him. Healthy natures are left out in the cold.

MRS. LINDE. Still I think the sick are those who most need taking care of.

RANK [shrugging his shoulders]. Yes, there you are. That is the sentiment that is turning Society into a sickhouse.

NORA, who has been absorbed in her thoughts, breaks out into smothered laughter and claps her hands.

RANK. Why do you laugh at that? Have you any notion what Society really is?

NORA. What do I care about tiresome Society? I am laughing at something quite different, something extremely amusing. Tell me, Doctor Rank, are all the people who are employed in the Bank dependent on Torvald now?

RANK. Is that what you find so extremely amusing?

NORA [smiling and humming]. That's my affair! [Walking about the room.] It's perfectly glorious to think that we have—that Torvald has so much power over so many people. [Takes the packet from her pocket.] Doctor Rank, what do you say to a macaroon?

RANK. What, macaroons? I thought they were forbidden here.

NORA. Yes, but these are some Christine gave me.

MRS. LINDE. What! I?—

NORA. Oh, well, don't be alarmed! You couldn't know that Torvald had forbidden them. I must tell you that he is afraid they will spoil my teeth. But, bah!—once in a way— That's so, isn't it, Doctor Rank? By your leave! [Puts a macaroon into his mouth.] You must have one too, Christine. And I shall have one, just a little one—or at most two. [Walking about.] I am tremendously happy. There is just one thing in the world now that I should dearly love to do.

RANK. Well, what is that?

NORA. It's something I should dearly love to say, if Torvald could hear me.

RANK. Well, why can't you say it?

NORA. No, I daren't; it's so shocking.

MRS. LINDE. Shocking?

RANK. Well, I should not advise you to say it. Still with us you might. What is it you would so much like to say if Torvald could hear you?

NORA. I should just love to say—Well, I'm damned!

RANK. Are you mad?

MRS. LINDE. Nora, dear—!

RANK. Say it, here he is!

NORA [hiding the packet]. Hush! Hush! Hush!

HELMER comes out of his room, with his coat over his arm and his hat in his hand.

NORA. Well, Torvald dear, have you got rid of him?

HELMER. Yes, he has just gone.

NORA. Let me introduce you—this is Christine, who has come to town.

HELMER. Christine—? Excuse me, but I don't know—

NORA. Mrs. Linde, dear; Christine Linde.

HELMER. Of course. A school friend of my wife's, I presume?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, we have known each other since then.

NORA. And just think, she has taken a long journey in order to see you.

HELMER. What do you mean?

MRS. LINDE. No, really, I—

NORA. Christine is tremendously clever at book-keeping, and she is frightfully anxious to work under some clever man so as to perfect herself—

HELMER. Very sensible, Mrs. Linde.

NORA. And when she heard you had been appointed manager of the Bank—the news was telegraphed, you know—she travelled here as quick as she could. Torvald, I am sure you will be able to do something for Christine, for my sake, won't you?

HELMER. Well, it is not altogether impossible. I presume you are a widow, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

HELMER. And have had some experience of bookkeeping?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, a fair amount.

HELMER. Ah! well, it's very likely I may be able to find something for you—

NORA [clapping her hands]. What did I tell you? What did I tell you?

HELMER. You have just come at a fortunate moment, Mrs. Linde.

MRS. LINDE. How am I to thank you?

HELMER. There is no need. [Puts on his coat.] But to-day you must excuse me—

RANK. Wait a minute; I will come with you. [Brings his fur coat from the hall and warms it at the fire.]

NORA. Don't be long away, Torvald dear.

HELMER. About an hour, not more.

NORA. Are you going too, Christine?

MRS. LINDE [putting on her cloak]. Yes, I must go and look for a room.

HELMER. Oh, well then, we can walk down the street together.

NORA [helping her]. What a pity it is we are so short of space here; I am afraid it is impossible for us—

MRS. LINDE. Please don't think of it! Good-bye, Nora dear, and many thanks.

NORA. Good-bye for the present. Of course you will come back this evening.

And you too, Dr. Rank. What do you say? If you are well enough? Oh, you must be! Wrap yourself up well. [They go to the door all talking together. Children's voices are heard on the staircase.]

NORA. There they are. There they are! [She runs to open the door. The Nurse comes in with the children.] Come in! Come in! [Stoops and kisses them.] Oh, you sweet blessings! Look at them, Christine! Aren't they darlings?

RANK. Don't let us stand here in the draught.

HELMER. Come along, Mrs. Linde; the place will only be bearable for a mother now! RANK, HELMER, and MRS. LINDE go downstairs. The Nurse comes forward with the children; NORA shuts the hall door.

NORA. How fresh and well you look! Such red cheeks!—like apples and roses. [The children all talk at once while she speaks to them.] Have you had great fun? That's splendid! What, you pulled both Emmy and Bob along on the sledge?—both at once?

—that was good. You are a clever boy, Ivar. Let me take her for a little, Anne.

My sweet little baby doll! [Takes the baby from the MAID and dances it up and down.]

Yes, yes, mother will dance with Bob too. What! Have you been snowballing?

I wish I had been there too! No, no, I will take their things off, Anne; please let me do it, it is such fun. Go in now, you look half frozen. There is some hot coffee for you on the stove.

The NURSE goes into the room on the left. NORA takes off the children's things and throws them about, while they all talk to her at once.

NORA. Really! Did a big dog run after you? But it didn't bite you? No, dogs don't bite nice little dolly children. You mustn't look at the parcels, Ivar. What are they? Ah, I daresay you would like to know. No, no—it's something nasty! Come, let us have a game! What shall we play at? Hide and Seek? Yes, we'll play Hide and Seek. Bob shall hide first. Must I hide? Very well, I'll hide first.

She and the children laugh and shout, and romp in and out of the room; at last NORA hides under the table, the children rush in and look for her, but do not see her; they hear her smothered laughter, run to the table, lift up the cloth and find her. Shouts of laughter. She crawls forward and pretends to frighten them. Fresh laughter. Meanwhile there has been a knock at the hall door, but none of them has noticed it. The door is half opened, and KROGSTAD appears. He waits a little; the game goes on.

KROGSTAD. Excuse me, Mr. Helmer.

NORA [with a stifled cry, turns round and gets up on to her knees]. Ah! what do you want?

KROGSTAD. Excuse me, the outer door was ajar; I suppose someone forgot to shut it.

NORA [rising]. My husband is out, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. I know that.

NORA. What do you want here, then?

KROGSTAD. A word with you.

NORA. With me?—[To the children, gently.] Go in to nurse. What? No, the strange man won't do mother any harm. When he has gone we will have another game. [She takes the children into the room on the left, and shuts the door after them.] You want to speak to me?

KROGSTAD. Yes, I do.

NORA. To-day? It is not the first of the month yet.

KROGSTAD. No, it is Christmas Eve, and it will depend on yourself what sort of a Christmas you will spend.

NORA. What do you want? To-day it is absolutely impossible for me—

KROGSTAD. We won't talk about that till later on. This is something different. I presume you can give me a moment?

NORA. Yes—yes, I can—although—

KROGSTAD. Good. I was in Olsen's Restaurant and saw your husband going down the street—

NORA. Yes?

KROGSTAD. With a lady.

NORA. What then?

KROGSTAD. May I make so bold as to ask if it was a Mrs. Linde?

NORA. It was.

KROGSTAD. Just arrived in town?

NORA. Yes, to-day.

KROGSTAD. She is a great friend of yours, isn't she?

NORA. She is. But I don't see—

KROGSTAD. I knew her too, once upon a time.

NORA. I am aware of that.

KROGSTAD. Are you? So you know all about it; I thought as much. Then I can ask you, without beating about the bush—is Mrs. Linde to have an appointment in the Bank?

NORA. What right have you to question me, Mr. Krogstad?—You, one of my husband's subordinates! But since you ask, you shall know. Yes, Mrs. Linde is to have an appointment. And it was I who pleaded her cause, Mr. Krogstad, let me tell you that.

KROGSTAD. I was right in what I thought then.

NORA [walking up and down the stage]. Sometimes one has a tiny little bit of influence, I should hope. Because one is a woman, it does not necessarily follow that—When anyone is in a subordinate position, Mr. Krogstad, they should really be careful to avoid offending anyone who—who—

KROGSTAD. Who has influence?

NORA. Exactly.

KROGSTAD [changing his tone]. Mrs. Helmer, you will be so good as to use your influence on my behalf.

NORA. What? What do you mean?

KROGSTAD. You will be so kind as to see that I am allowed to keep my subordinate position in the Bank.

NORA. What do you mean by that? Who proposes to take your post away from you?

KROGSTAD. Oh, there is no necessity to keep up the pretence of ignorance. I can quite understand that your friend is not very anxious to expose herself to the chance of rubbing shoulders with me; and I quite understand, too, whom I have to thank for being turned off.

NORA. But I assure you—

KROGSTAD. Very likely; but, to come to the point, the time has come when I should advise you to use your influence to prevent that.

NORA. But, Mr. Krogstad, I have no influence.

KROGSTAD. Haven't you? I thought you said yourself just now—

NORA. Naturally I did not mean you to put that construction on it. I! What should make you think I have any influence of that kind with my husband?

KROGSTAD. Oh, I have known your husband from our student days. I don't suppose he is any more unassailable than other husbands.

NORA. If you speak slightly of my husband, I shall turn you out of the house.

KROGSTAD. You are bold, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA. I am not afraid of you any longer. As soon as the New Year comes, I shall in a very short time be free of the whole thing.

KROGSTAD [controlling himself]. Listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. If necessary, I am prepared to fight for my small post in the Bank as if I were fighting for my life.

NORA. So it seems.

KROGSTAD. It is not only for the sake of the money; indeed, that weighs least with me in the matter. There is another reason—well, I may as well tell you. My position is this. I daresay you know, like everybody else, that once, many years ago, I was guilty of an indiscretion.

NORA. I think I have heard something of the kind.

KROGSTAD. The matter never came into court; but every way seemed to be closed to me after that. So I took to the business that you know of. I had to do something; and, honestly, I don't think I've been one of the worst. But now I must cut myself free from all that. My sons are growing up; for their sake I must try and win back as much respect as I can in the town. This post in the Bank was like the first step up for me—and now your husband is going to kick me downstairs again into the mud.

NORA. But you must believe me, Mr. Krogstad; it is not in my power to help you at all.

KROGSTAD. Then it is because you haven't the will; but I have means to compel you.

NORA. You don't mean that you will tell my husband that I owe you money?

KROGSTAD. Hm!—suppose I were to tell him?

NORA. It would be perfectly infamous of you. [Sobbing.] To think of his learning my secret, which has been my joy and pride, in such an ugly, clumsy way—that he should learn it from you! And it would put me in a horribly disagreeable position—

KROGSTAD. Only disagreeable?

NORA [impetuously]. Well, do it, then!—and it will be the worse for you. My husband will see for himself what a blackguard you are, and you certainly won't keep your post then.

KROGSTAD. I asked you if it was only a disagreeable scene at home that you were afraid of?

NORA. If my husband does get to know of it, of course he will at once pay you what is still owing, and we shall have nothing more to do with you.

KROGSTAD [coming a step nearer]. Listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. Either you have a very bad memory or you know very little of business. I shall be obliged to remind you of a few details.

NORA. What do you mean?

KROGSTAD. When your husband was ill, you came to me to borrow two hundred and fifty pounds.

NORA. I didn't know any one else to go to.

KROGSTAD. I promised to get you that amount—

NORA. Yes, and you did so.

KROGSTAD. I promised to get you that amount, on certain conditions. Your mind was so taken up with your husband's illness, and you were so anxious to get the money for your journey, that you seem to have paid no attention to the conditions of our bargain. Therefore it will not be amiss if I remind you of them. Now, I promised to get the money on the security of a bond which I drew up.

NORA. Yes, and which I signed.

KROGSTAD. Good. But below your signature there were a few lines constituting your father a surety for the money; those lines your father should have signed.

NORA. Should? He did sign them.

KROGSTAD. I had left the date blank; that is to say your father should himself have inserted the date on which he signed the paper. Do you remember that?

NORA. Yes, I think I remember—

KROGSTAD. Then I gave you the bond to send by post to your father. Is that not so?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. And you naturally did so at once, because five or six days afterwards you brought me the bond with your father's signature. And then I gave you the money.

NORA. Well, haven't I been paying it off regularly?

KROGSTAD. Fairly so, yes. But—to come back to the matter in hand—that must have been a very trying time for you, Mrs. Helmer?

NORA. It was, indeed.

KROGSTAD. Your father was very ill, wasn't he?

NORA. He was very near his end.

KROGSTAD. And died soon afterwards?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Tell me, Mrs. Helmer, can you by any chance remember what day your father died?—on what day of the month, I mean.

NORA. Papa died on the 29th of September.

KROGSTAD. That is correct; I have ascertained it for myself. And, as that is so, there is a discrepancy [taking a paper from his pocket] which I cannot account for.

NORA. What discrepancy? I don't know—

KROGSTAD. The discrepancy consists, Mrs. Helmer, in the fact that your father signed this bond three days after his death.

NORA. What do you mean? I don't understand—

KROGSTAD. Your father died on the 29th of September. But, look here; your father has dated his signature the 2nd of October. It is a discrepancy, isn't it? [NORA is silent.] Can you explain it to me? [NORA is still silent.] It is a remarkable thing, too, that the words "2nd of October," as well as the year, are not written in your father's handwriting but in one that I think I know. Well, of course it can be explained; your father may have forgotten to date his signature, and someone else may have dated it haphazard before they knew of his death. There is no harm in that. It all depends on the signature of the name; and that is genuine, I suppose, Mrs. Helmer? It was your father himself who signed his name here?

NORA [after a short pause, throws her head up and looks defiantly at him]. No, it was not. It was I that wrote papa's name.

KROGSTAD. Are you aware that is a dangerous confession?

NORA. In what way? You shall have your money soon.

KROGSTAD. Let me ask you a question; why did you not send the paper to your father?

NORA. It was impossible; papa was so ill. If I had asked him for his signature, I should have had to tell him what the money was to be used for; and when he was so ill himself I couldn't tell him that my husband's life was in danger—it was impossible.

KROGSTAD. It would have been better for you if you had given up your trip abroad.

NORA. No, that was impossible. That trip was to save my husband's life; I couldn't give that up.

KROGSTAD. But did it never occur to you that you were committing a fraud on me?

NORA. I couldn't take that into account; I didn't trouble myself about you at all. I couldn't bear you, because you put so many heartless difficulties in my way, although you knew what a dangerous condition my husband was in.

KROGSTAD. Mrs. Helmer, you evidently do not realise clearly what it is that you have been guilty of. But I can assure you that my one false step, which lost me all my reputation, was nothing more or nothing worse than what you have done.

NORA. You? Do you ask me to believe that you were brave enough to run a risk to save your wife's life?

KROGSTAD. The law cares nothing about motives.

NORA. Then it must be a very foolish law.

KROGSTAD. Foolish or not, it is the law by which you will be judged, if I produce this paper in court.

NORA. I don't believe it. Is a daughter not to be allowed to spare her dying father anxiety and care? Is a wife not to be allowed to save her husband's life? I don't know much about law; but I am certain that there must be laws permitting such things as that. Have you no knowledge of such laws—you who are a lawyer? You must be a very poor lawyer, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. Maybe. But matters of 10 business—such business as you and I have had together—do you think I don't understand that? Very well. Do as you please. But let me tell you this—if I lose my position a second time, you shall lose yours with me. 15 [He bows, and goes out through the hall.]

NORA [appears buried in thought for a short time, then tosses her head]. Nonsense! Trying to frighten me like that!—I am not so silly as he thinks. [Begins to busy herself 20 putting the children's things in order.] And yet—? No, it's impossible! I did it for love's sake.

THE CHILDREN [in the doorway on the left]. Mother, the stranger man has gone out 25 through the gate.

NORA. Yes, dears, I know. But, don't tell anyone about the stranger man. Do you hear? Not even papa.

CHILDREN. No, mother; but will you 30 come and play again?

NORA. No no,—not now.

CHILDREN. But, mother, you promised 35 us.

NORA. Yes, but I can't now. Run away 35 in; I have such a lot to do. Run away in, my sweet little darlings. [She gets them into the room by degrees and shuts the door on them; then sits down on the sofa, takes up a piece of needlework and sews a few stitches, but soon 40 stops.] No! [Throws down the work, gets up, goes to the hall door and calls out.] Helen! bring the Tree in. [Goes to the table on the left, opens a drawer, and stops again.] No, no! it is quite impossible!

MAID [coming in with the Tree]. Where shall I put it, ma'am?

NORA. Here, in the middle of the floor.

MAID. Shall I get you anything else?

NORA. No, thank you. I have all I 50 want. Exit MAID.

NORA [begins dressing the tree]. A candle here—and flowers here—. The horrible man! It's all nonsense—there's nothing wrong. The Tree shall be splendid! I will do everything I can think of to please you, Torvald!—I will sing for you, dance for you —[HELMER comes in with some papers under 5 his arm.] Oh! are you back already?

HELMER. Yes. Has anyone been here?

NORA. Here? No.

HELMER. That is strange. I saw Krogstad going out of the gate.

NORA. Did you? Oh, yes, I forgot, Krogstad was here for a moment.

HELMER. Nora, I can see from your manner that he has been here begging you to say a good word for him.

NORA. Yes.

HELMER. And you were to appear to do it of your own accord; you were to conceal from me the fact of his having been here; didn't he beg that of you too?

NORA. Yes, Torvald, but—

HELMER. Nora, Nora, and you would be a party to that sort of thing? To have any talk with a man like that, and give him any sort of promise? And to tell me a lie into the bargain?

NORA. A lie—?

HELMER. Didn't you tell me no one had been here? [Shakes his finger at her.] My little song-bird must never do that again. A song-bird must have a clean beak to chirp with—no false notes! [Puts his arm round her waist.] That is so, isn't it? Yes, I am sure it is. [Lets her go.] We will say no more about it. [Sits down by the stove.] How 45 warm and snug it is here! [Turns over his papers.]

NORA [after a short pause, during which she busies herself with the Christmas Tree]. Torvald!

HELMER. Yes.

NORA. I am looking forward tremendously to the fancy dress ball at the Stenborgs' the day after to-morrow.

HELMER. And I am tremendously curious 45 to see what you are going to surprise me with.

NORA. It was very silly of me to want to do that.

HELMER. What do you mean?

NORA. I can't hit upon anything that will do; everything I think of seems so silly and insignificant.

HELMER. Does my little Nora acknowledge that at last?

NORA [standing behind his chair with her arms on the back of it]. Are you very busy, Torvald?

HELMER. Well—

NORA. What are all those papers?

HELMER. Bank business.

NORA. Already?

HELMER. I have got authority from the retiring manager to undertake the necessary changes in the staff and in the rearrangement of the work; and I must make use of the Christmas week for that, so as to have everything in order for the new year.

NORA. Then that was why this poor Krogstad—

HELMER. Hm!

NORA [leans against the back of his chair and strokes his hair]. If you hadn't been so busy I should have asked you a tremendously big favour, Torvald.

HELMER. What is that? Tell me.

NORA. There is no one has such good taste as you. And I do so want to look nice at the fancy-dress ball. Torvald, couldn't you take me in hand and decide what I shall go as, and what sort of a dress I shall wear?

HELMER. Aha! so my obstinate little woman is obliged to get someone to come to her rescue?

NORA. Yes, Torvald, I can't get along a bit without your help.

HELMER. Very well, I will think it over, we shall manage to hit upon something.

NORA. That is nice of you. [Goes to the Christmas Tree. A short pause.] How pretty the red flowers look—. But, tell me, was it really something very bad that this Krogstad was guilty of?

HELMER. He forged someone's name. Have you any idea what that means?

NORA. Isn't it possible that he was driven to do it by necessity?

HELMER. Yes; or, as in so many cases, by imprudence. I am not so heartless as to condemn a man altogether because of a single false step of that kind.

NORA. No you wouldn't, would you, Torvald?

HELMER. Many a man has been able to retrieve his character, if he has openly confessed his fault and taken his punishment.

NORA. Punishment—?

HELMER. But Krogstad did nothing of that sort; he got himself out of it by a cunning trick, and that is why he has gone under altogether.

NORA. But do you think it would—?

HELMER. Just think how a guilty man like that has to lie and play the hypocrite with everyone, how he has to wear a mask in the presence of those near and dear to him, even before his own wife and children. And about the children—that is the most terrible part of it all, Nora.

NORA. How?

HELMER. Because such an atmosphere of lies infects and poisons the whole life of a home. Each breath the children take in such a house is full of the germs of evil.

NORA [coming nearer him]. Are you sure of that?

HELMER. My dear, I have often seen it in the course of my life as a lawyer. Almost everyone who has gone to the bad early in life has had a deceitful mother.

NORA. Why do you only say—mother?

HELMER. It seems most commonly to be the mother's influence, though naturally a bad father's would have the same result. Every lawyer is familiar with the fact. This Krogstad, now, has been persistently poisoning his own children with lies and dissimulation; that is why I say he has lost all moral character. [Holds out his hands to her.] That is why my sweet little Nora must promise me not to plead his cause. Give me your hand on it. Come, come, what is this? Give me your hand. There now, that's settled. I assure you it would be quite impossible for me to work with him; I literally feel physically ill when I am in the company of such people.

NORA [takes her hand out of his and goes to the opposite side of the Christmas Tree]. How hot it is in here; and I have such a lot to do.

HELMER [getting up and putting his papers in order]. Yes, and I must try and read through some of these before dinner; and I must think about your costume, too. And it is just possible I may have something ready in gold paper to hang up on the Tree. [Puts his hand on her head.] My precious little singing-bird! [He goes into his room and shuts the door after him.]

NORA [after a pause, whispers]. No, no—it isn't true. It's impossible; it must be impossible.

The Nurse opens the door on the left.

NURSE. The little ones are begging so hard to be allowed to come in to mamma.

NORA. No, no, no! Don't let them come in to me! You stay with them, Anne.

NURSE. Very well, ma'am. [Shuts the door.]

NORA [pale with terror]. Deprave my little children? Poison my home? [A short pause. Then she tosses her head.] It's not true. It can't possibly be true.

ACT II

THE SAME SCENE.—The Christmas Tree is in the corner by the piano, stripped of its ornaments and with burnt-down candle-ends on its dishevelled branches. NORA's cloak and hat are lying on the sofa. She is alone in the room, walking about uneasily. She stops by the sofa and takes up her cloak.

NORA [drops the cloak]. Someone is coming now! [Goes to the door and listens.] No—it is no one. Of course, no one will come to-day, Christmas Day—nor to-morrow either. But, perhaps—[opens the door and looks out]. No, nothing in the letter-box; it is quite empty. [Comes forward.] What rubbish! of course he can't be in earnest about it. Such a thing couldn't happen; it is impossible—I have three little children.

Enter the NURSE from the room on the left, carrying a big cardboard box.

NURSE. At last I have found the box with the fancy dress.

NORA. Thanks; put it on the table.

NURSE [doing so]. But it is very much in want of mending.

NORA. I should like to tear it into a hundred thousand pieces.

NURSE. What an idea! It can easily be put in order—just a little patience.

NORA. Yes, I will go and get Mrs. Linde to come and help me with it.

NURSE. What, out again? In this horrible weather? You will catch cold, ma'am, and make yourself ill.

NORA. Well, worse than that might happen. How are the children?

NURSE. The poor little souls are playing with their Christmas presents, but—

NORA. Do they ask much for me?

NURSE. You see, they are so accustomed to have their mamma with them.

NORA. Yes, but, nurse, I shall not be able to be so much with them now as I was before.

NURSE. Oh well, young children easily get accustomed to anything.

NORA. Do you think so? Do you think they would forget their mother if she went away altogether?

NURSE. Good heavens!—went away altogether?

NORA. Nurse, I want you to tell me something I have often wondered about—how could you have the heart to put your own child out among strangers?

NURSE. I was obliged to, if I wanted to be little Nora's nurse.

NORA. Yes, but how could you be willing to do it?

NURSE. What, when I was going to get such a good place by it? A poor girl who has got into trouble should be glad to. Besides, that wicked man didn't do a single thing for me.

NORA. But I suppose your daughter has quite forgotten you.

NURSE. No, indeed she hasn't. She wrote to me when she was confirmed, and when she was married.

NORA [putting her arms round her neck]. Dear old Anne, you were a good mother to me when I was little.

NURSE. Little Nora, poor dear, had no other mother but me.

NORA. And if my little ones had no other mother, I am sure you would—What nonsense I am talking! [Opens the box.] Go in to them. Now I must—. You will see to-morrow how charming I shall look.

NURSE. I am sure there will be no one at the ball so charming as you, ma'am. [Goes into the room on the left.]

NORA [begins to unpack the box, but soon pushes it away from her]. If only I dared go out. If only no one would come. If only I could be sure nothing would happen here in the meantime. Stuff and nonsense! No one will come. Only I mustn't think about it. I will brush my muff. What lovely, lovely gloves! Out of my thoughts, out of my thoughts! One, two, three, four, five, six—[Screams.] Ah! there is someone coming—. [Makes a movement towards the door, but stands irresolute.]

Enter MRS. LINDE from the hall, where she has taken off her cloak and hat.

NORA. Oh, it's you, Christine. There is no one else out there, is there? How good of you to come!

MRS. LINDE. I heard you were up asking for me.

NORA. Yes, I was passing by. As a matter of fact, it is something you could help me with. Let us sit down here on the sofa. Look here. To-morrow evening there is to be a fancy-dress ball at the Stenborgs', who live above us; and Torvald wants me to go as a Neapolitan fisher-girl, and dance the Tarantella that I learnt at Capri.

MRS. LINDE. I see; you are going to keep up the character.

NORA. Yes, Torvald wants me to. Look, here is the dress; Torvald had it made for me there, but now it is all so torn, and I haven't any idea—

MRS. LINDE. We will easily put that right. It is only some of the trimming come unsewn here and there. Needle and thread? Now then, that's all we want.

NORA. It is nice of you.

MRS. LINDE [sewing]. So you are going to be dressed up to-morrow, Nora. I will tell you what—I shall come in for a moment and see you in your fine feathers. But I have completely forgotten to thank you for a delightful evening yesterday.

NORA [gets up, and crosses the stage]. Well I don't think yesterday was as pleasant as usual. You ought to have come to town a little earlier, Christine. Certainly Torvald does understand how to make a house dainty and attractive.

MRS. LINDE. And so do you, it seems to me; you are not your father's daughter for nothing. But tell me, is Doctor Rank always as depressed as he was yesterday?

NORA. No; yesterday it was very noticeable. I must tell you that he suffers from a very dangerous disease. He has consumption of the spine, poor creature. His father was a horrible man who committed all sorts of excesses; and that is why his son was sickly from childhood, do you understand?

MRS. LINDE [dropping her sewing]. But, my dearest Nora, how do you know anything about such things?

NORA [walking about]. Pooh! When you have three children, you get visits now and then from—from married women, who know something of medical matters, and they talk about one thing and another.

MRS. LINDE [goes on sewing. A short silence]. Does Doctor Rank come here every day?

NORA. Every day regularly. He is Torvald's most intimate friend, and a great friend of mine too. He is just like one of the family.

MRS. LINDE. But tell me this—is he perfectly sincere? I mean, isn't he the kind of man that is very anxious to make himself agreeable?

NORA. Not in the least. What makes you think that?

MRS. LINDE. When you introduced him to me yesterday, he declared he had often heard my name mentioned in this house; but afterwards I noticed that your husband hadn't the slightest idea who I was. So how could Doctor Rank—?

NORA. That is quite right, Christine. Torvald is so absurdly fond of me that he wants me absolutely to himself, as he says. At first he used to seem almost jealous if I mentioned any of the dear folk at home, so naturally I gave up doing so. But I often talk about such things with Doctor Rank, because he likes hearing about them.

MRS. LINDE. Listen to me, Nora. You are still very like a child in many things, and I am older than you in many ways and have a little more experience. Let me tell you this—you ought to make an end of it with Doctor Rank.

NORA. What ought I to make an end of?

MRS. LINDE. Of two things, I think. Yesterday you talked some nonsense about a rich admirer who was to leave you money—

NORA. An admirer who doesn't exist, unfortunately! But what then?

MRS. LINDE. Is Doctor Rank a man of means?

NORA. Yes, he is.

MRS. LINDE. And has no one to provide for?

NORA. No, no one; but—

MRS. LINDE. And comes here every day?

NORA. Yes, I told you so.

MRS. LINDE. But how can this well-bred man be so tactless?

NORA. I don't understand you at all.

MRS. LINDE. Don't prevaricate, Nora. Do you suppose I don't guess who lent you the two hundred and fifty pounds?

NORA. Are you out of your senses? How can you think of such a thing! A friend of ours, who comes here every day! Do you realise what a horribly painful position that would be?

MRS. LINDE. Then it really isn't he?

NORA. No, certainly not. It would never have entered into my head for a moment. Besides, he had no money to lend then; he came into his money afterwards.

MRS. LINDE. Well, I think that was lucky for you, my dear Nora.

NORA. No, it would never have come into my head to ask Doctor Rank. Although I am quite sure that if I had asked him—

MRS. LINDE. But of course you won't.

NORA. Of course not. I have no reason to think it could possibly be necessary. But I am quite sure that if I told Doctor Rank—

MRS. LINDE. Behind your husband's back?

NORA. I must make an end of it with the other one, and that will be behind his back too. I must make an end of it with him.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that is what I told you yesterday, but—

NORA [walking up and down]. A man can put a thing like that straight much easier than a woman—

MRS. LINDE. One's husband, yes.

NORA. Nonsense! [Standing still]. When you pay off a debt you get your bond back, don't you?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, as a matter of course.

NORA. And can tear it into a hundred thousand pieces, and burn it up—the nasty dirty paper!

MRS. LINDE [looks hard at her, lays down her sewing and gets up slowly]. Nora, you are concealing something from me.

NORA. Do I look as if I were?

MRS. LINDE. Something has happened to you since yesterday morning. Nora, what is it?

NORA [going nearer to her]. Christine! [Listens]. Hush! there's Torvald come home. Do you mind going in to the children for the present? Torvald can't bear to see dress-making going on. Let Anne help you.

MRS. LINDE [gathering some of the things to- gether]. Certainly—but I am not going away from here till we have had it out with one another. [She goes into the room on the left, as HELMER comes in from the hall.]

NORA [going up to HELMER]. I have wanted you so much, Torvald dear.

HELMER. Was that the dressmaker?

NORA. No, it was Christine; she is helping me to put my dress in order. You will see I shall look quite smart.

HELMER. Wasn't that a happy thought of mine, now?

NORA. Splendid! But don't you think it is nice of me, too, to do as you wish?

HELMER. Nice?—because you do as your husband wishes? Well, well, you little rogue, I am sure you did not mean it in that way. But I am not going to disturb you; you will want to be trying on your dress, I expect.

NORA. I suppose you are going to work.

HELMER. Yes. [Shows her a bundle of papers]. Look at that. I have just been into the bank. [Turns to go into his room].

NORA. Torvald.

HELMER. Yes.

NORA. If your little squirrel were to ask you for something very, very prettily—?

HELMER. What then?

NORA. Would you do it?

HELMER. I should like to hear what it is, first.

NORA. Your squirrel would run about and do all her tricks if you would be nice, and do what she wants.

HELMER. Speak plainly.

NORA. Your skylark would chirp about in every room, with her song rising and falling—

HELMER. Well, my skylark does that anyhow.

NORA. I would play the fairy and dance for you in the moonlight, Torvald.

HELMER. Nora—you surely don't mean that request you made of me this morning?

NORA [going near him]. Yes, Torvald, I beg you so earnestly—

HELMER. Have you really the courage to open up that question again?

NORA. Yes, dear, you must do as I ask; you must let Krogstad keep his post in the bank.

HELMER. My dear Nora, it is his post that I have arranged Mrs. Linde shall have.

NORA. Yes, you have been awfully kind about that; but you could just as well dismiss some other clerk instead of Krogstad.

HELMER. This is simply incredible obstinacy! Because you chose to give him a thoughtless promise that you would speak for him, I am expected to—

NORA. That isn't the reason, Torvald. It is for your own sake. This fellow writes in the most scurrilous newspapers; you have told me so yourself. He can do you an unspeakable amount of harm. I am frightened to death of him—

HELMER. Ah, I understand; it is recollections of the past that scare you.

NORA. What do you mean?

HELMER. Naturally you are thinking of your father.

NORA. Yes—yes, of course. Just recall to your mind what these malicious creatures wrote in the papers about papa, and how horribly they slandered him. I believe they would have procured his dismissal if the Department had not sent you over to inquire into it, and if you had not been so kindly disposed and helpful to him.

HELMER. My little Nora, there is an important difference between your father and me. Your father's reputation as a public official was not above suspicion. Mine is, and I hope it will continue to be so, as long as I hold my office.

NORA. You never can tell what mischief these men may contrive. We ought to be so well off, so snug and happy here in our peaceful home, and have no cares—you and I and the children, Torvald! That is why I beg you so earnestly—

HELMER. And it is just by interceding for him that you make it impossible for me to keep him. It is already known at the Bank that I mean to dismiss Krogstad. Is it to get about now that the new manager has changed his mind at his wife's bidding—

NORA. And what if it did?

HELMER. Of course!—if only this obstinate little person can get her way! Do you suppose I am going to make myself ridiculous before my whole staff, to let people think that I am a man to be swayed by all sorts of outside influence? I should very soon feel the consequences of it, I can tell you! And besides, there is one thing that makes it quite impossible for me to have Krogstad in the bank as long as I am manager.

NORA. Whatever is that?

HELMER. His moral failings I might perhaps have overlooked, if necessary—

NORA. Yes, you could—couldn't you?

HELMER. And I hear he is a good worker, too. But I knew him when we were boys. It was one of those rash friendships that so often prove an incubus in after life. I may as well tell you plainly, we were once on very intimate terms with one another. But this tactless fellow lays no restraint on himself when other people are present. On the contrary, he thinks it gives him the right to adopt a familiar tone with me, and every minute it is "I say, Helmer, old fellow!" and that sort of thing. I assure you it is extremely painful for me. He would make my position in the bank intolerable.

NORA. Torvald, I don't believe you mean that.

HELMER. Don't you? Why not?

NORA. Because it is such a narrow-minded way of looking at things.

HELMER. What are you saying? Narrow-minded? Do you think I am narrow-minded?

NORA. No, just the opposite, dear—and it is exactly for that reason.

HELMER. It's the same thing. You say my point of view is narrow-minded, so I must be so too. Narrow-minded! Very well—I must put an end to this. [Goes to the hall-door and calls.] Helen!

NORA. What are you going to do?

HELMER [looking among his papers]. Settle it. [Enter MAID.] Look here; take this letter and go downstairs with it at once. Find a messenger and tell him to deliver it, and be quick. The address is on it, and here is the money.

MAID. Very well, sir. [Exit with the letter.]

HELMER [putting his papers together]. Now then, little Miss Obstinate.

NORA [breathlessly]. Torvald—what was that letter?

HELMER. Krogstad's dismissal.

NORA. Call her back, Torvald! There is still time. Oh Torvald, call her back! Do it for my sake—for your own sake—for the children's sake! Do you hear me, Torvald? Call her back! You don't know what that letter can bring upon us.

HELMER. It's too late.

NORA. Yes, it's too late.

HELMER. My dear Nora, I can forgive the anxiety you are in, although really it is an insult to me. It is, indeed. Isn't it an insult to think that I should be afraid of a starving quill-driver's vengeance? But I forgive you nevertheless, because it is such eloquent witness to your great love for me. [Takes her in his arms.] And that is as it should be, my own darling Nora. Come what will, you may be sure I shall have both courage and strength if they be needed. You will see I am man enough to take everything upon myself.

NORA [in a horror-stricken voice]. What do you mean by that?

HELMER. Everything, I say—

NORA [recovering herself]. You will never have to do that.

HELMER. That's right. Well, we will share it, Nora, as man and wife should. That is how it shall be. [Caressing her.] Are you content now? There! there!—not these frightened dove's eyes! The whole thing is only the wildest fancy!—Now, you must go and play through the Tarantella and practise with your tambourine. I shall go into the inner office and shut the door, and I shall hear nothing; you can make as much noise as you please. [Turns back at the door.] And when Rank comes, tell him where he will find me. [Nods to her, takes his papers and goes into his room, and shuts the door after him.]

NORA [bewildered with anxiety, stands as if rooted to the spot, and whispers]. He was capable of doing it. He will do it. He will do it in spite of everything.—No, not that! Never, never! Anything rather than that! Oh, for some help, some way out of it! [The door-bell rings.] Doctor Rank! Anything rather than that—anything, whatever it is! [She puts her hands over her face, pulls herself together, goes to the door and opens it.] RANK is standing without, hanging up his coat. During the following dialogue it begins to grow dark.]

NORA. Good-day, Doctor Rank. I knew your ring. But you mustn't go into Torvald now; I think he is busy with something.

RANK. And you?

NORA [brings him in and shuts the door after him]. Oh, you know very well I always have time for you.

RANK. Thank you. I shall make use of as much of it as I can.

NORA. What do you mean by that? As much of it as you can?

RANK. Well, does that alarm you?

NORA. It was such a strange way of putting it. Is anything likely to happen?

RANK. Nothing but what I have long been prepared for. But I certainly didn't expect it to happen so soon.

NORA [gripping him by the arm]. What have you found out? Doctor Rank, you must tell me.

RANK [sitting down by the stove]. It is all up with me. And it can't be helped.

NORA [with a sigh of relief]. Is it about yourself?

RANK. Who else? It is no use lying to one's self. I am the most wretched of all my patients, Mrs. Helmer. Lately I have been taking stock of my internal economy. Bankrupt! Probably within a month I shall lie rotting in the churchyard.

NORA. What an ugly thing to say!

RANK. The thing itself is cursedly ugly, and the worst of it is that I shall have to face so much more that is ugly before that. I shall only make one more examination of myself; when I have done that, I shall know pretty certainly when it will be that the horrors of dissolution will begin. There is something I want to tell you. Helmer's refined nature gives him an unconquerable disgust at everything that is ugly; I won't have him in my sick-room.

NORA. Oh, but, Doctor Rank—

RANK. I won't have him there. Not on any account. I bar my door to him. As soon as I am quite certain that the worst has come, I shall send you my card with a black cross on it, and then you will know that the loathsome end has begun.

NORA. You are quite absurd to-day. And I wanted you so much to be in a really good humor.

RANK. With death stalking beside me?—To have to pay this penalty for another man's sin! Is there any justice in that? And in every single family, in one way or another, some such inexorable retribution is being exacted—

NORA [putting her hands over her ears]. Rubbish! Do talk of something cheerful.

RANK. Oh, it's a mere laughing matter, the whole thing. My poor innocent spine has to suffer for my father's youthful amusements.

NORA [sitting at the table on the left]. I suppose you mean that he was too partial to asparagus and pâté de foie gras, don't you.

RANK. Yes, and to truffles.

NORA. Truffles, yes. And oysters too, I suppose?

RANK. Oysters, of course, that goes with—out saying.

NORA. And heaps of port and champagne. It is sad that all these nice things should take their revenge on our bones.

RANK. Especially that they should revenge themselves on the unlucky bones of those who have not had the satisfaction of enjoying them.

NORA. Yes, that's the saddest part of it all.

RANK [with a searching look at her]. Hm!—

NORA [after a short pause]. Why did you smile?

RANK. No, it was you that laughed.

NORA. No, it was you that smiled, Doctor Rank!

RANK [rising]. You are a greater rascal than I thought.

NORA. I am in a silly mood to-day.

RANK. So it seems.

NORA [putting her hands on his shoulders]. Dear, dear Doctor Rank, death mustn't take you away from Torvald and me.

RANK. It is a loss you would easily recover from. Those who are gone are soon forgotten.

NORA [looking at him anxiously]. Do you believe that?

RANK. People form new ties, and then—

NORA. Who will form new ties?

RANK. Both you and Helmer, when I am gone. You yourself are already on the high road to it, I think. What did that Mrs. Linde want here last night?

NORA. Oh!—you don't mean to say you are jealous of poor Christine?

RANK. Yes, I am. She will be my successor in this house. When I am done for, this woman will—

NORA. Hush! don't speak so loud. She is in that room.

RANK. To-day again. There, you see.

NORA. She has only come to sew my dress for me. Bless my soul, how unreasonable you are! [Sits down on the sofa]. Be nice now, Doctor Rank, and to-morrow you will see how beautifully I shall dance, and you can imagine I am doing it all for you—and for Torvald too, of course. [Takes various things out of the box]. Doctor Rank, come and sit down here, and I will show you something.

RANK [sitting down]. What is it?

NORA. Just look at those!

RANK. Silk stockings.

NORA. Flesh-coloured. Aren't they lovely? It is so dark here now, but to-morrow—. No, no, no! you must only look at the feet. Oh well, you may have leave to look at the legs too.

RANK. Hm!—

NORA. Why are you looking so critical? Don't you think they will fit me?

RANK. I have no means of forming an opinion about that.

NORA [looks at him for a moment]. For shame! [Hits him lightly on the ear with the stockings]. That's to punish you. [Folds them up again].

RANK. And what other nice things am I to be allowed to see?

NORA. Not a single thing more, for being so naughty. [She looks among the things, humming to herself].

RANK [after a short silence]. When I am sitting here, talking to you as intimately as this, I cannot imagine for a moment what would have become of me if I had never come into this house.

NORA [smiling]. I believe you do feel thoroughly at home with us.

RANK [in a lower voice, looking straight in front of him]. And to be obliged to leave it all—

NORA. Nonsense, you are not going to leave it.

RANK [as before]. And not be able to leave behind one the slightest token of one's gratitude, scarcely even a fleeting regret—nothing but an empty place which the first comer can fill as well as any other.

NORA. And if I asked you now for a—? No!

RANK. For what?

NORA. For a big proof of your friendship—

RANK. Yes, yes!

NORA. I mean a tremendously big favour—

RANK. Would you really make me so happy for once?

NORA. Ah, but you don't know what it is yet.

RANK. No—but tell me.

NORA. I really can't, Doctor Rank. It is something out of all reason; it means advice, and help, and a favour—

RANK. The bigger a thing it is the better. I can't conceive what it is you mean. Do 10 tell me. Haven't I your confidence?

NORA. More than anyone else. I know you are my truest and best friend, and so I will tell you what it is. Well, Doctor Rank, it is something you must help me to prevent. 15 You know how devotedly, how inexpressibly deeply Torvald loves me; he would never for a moment hesitate to give his life for me.

RANK [leaning towards her]. Nora—do you think he is the only one—?

NORA [with a slight start]. The only one—?

RANK. The only one who would gladly give his life for your sake.

NORA [sadly]. Is that it?

RANK. I was determined you should 25 know it before I went away, and there will never be a better opportunity than this. Now you know it, Nora. And now you know, too, that you can trust me as you would trust no one else.

NORA [rises, deliberately and quietly]. Let me pass.

RANK [makes room for her to pass him, but sits still]. Nora!

NORA [at the hall door]. Helen, bring in 35 the lamp. [Goes over to the stove.] Dear Doctor Rank, that was really horrid of you.

RANK. To have loved you as much as anyone else does? Was that horrid? 40

NORA. No, but to go and tell me so. There was really no need—

RANK. What do you mean? Did you know—? [MAID enters with lamp, puts it 45 down on the table, and goes out.] Nora—Mrs. Helmer—tell me, had you any idea of this?

NORA. Oh, how do I know whether I had or whether I hadn't? I really can't tell you— To think you could be so clumsy, Doctor Rank! We were getting on so 50 nicely.

RANK. Well, at all events you know now that you can command me, body and soul. So won't you speak out?

NORA [looking at him]. After what happened?

RANK. I beg you to let me know what it is.

5 NORA. I can't tell you anything now.

RANK. Yes, yes. You mustn't punish me in that way. Let me have permission to do for you whatever a man may do.

NORA. You can do nothing for me now. Besides, I really don't need any help at all. You will find that the whole thing is merely fancy on my part. It really is so—of course it is! [Sits down in the rocking-chair, and looks at him with a smile.] You are a nice 15 sort of man, Doctor Rank!—don't you feel ashamed of yourself, now the lamp has come?

RANK. Not a bit. But perhaps I had better go—for ever?

20 NORA. No, indeed, you shall not. Of course you must come here just as before. You know very well Torvald can't do without you.

RANK. Yes, but you?

25 NORA. Oh, I am always tremendously pleased when you come.

RANK. It is just that, that put me on the wrong track. You are a riddle to me. I have often thought that you would almost 30 as soon be in my company as in Helmer's.

NORA. Yes—you see there are some people one loves best, and others whom one would almost always rather have as companions.

RANK. Yes, there is something in that.

NORA. When I was at home, of course I loved papa best. But I always thought it tremendous fun if I could steal down into the maids' room, because they never moralised at all, and talked to each other about such entertaining things.

RANK. I see—it is their place I have taken.

NORA [jumping up and going to him]. Oh, dear, nice Doctor Rank, I never meant that at all. But surely you can understand that being with Torvald is a little like being with papa—

Enter MAID from the hall.

MAID. If you please, ma'am. [Whispers and hands her a card.]

NORA [glancing at the card]. Oh! [Puts it in her pocket.]

RANK. Is there anything wrong?

NORA. No, no, not in the least. It is only something—it is my new dress—RANK. What? Your dress is lying there.

NORA. Oh, yes, that one; but this is another. I ordered it. Torvald mustn't know about it—

RANK. Oho! Then that was the great secret.

NORA. Of course. Just go in to him; he is sitting in the inner room. Keep him as long as—

RANK. Make your mind easy; I won't let him escape. [Goes into HELMER'S room.]

NORA [to the MAID]. And he is standing waiting in the kitchen?

MAID. Yes, he came up the back stairs.

NORA. But didn't you tell him no one was in?

MAID. Yes, but it was no good.

NORA. He won't go away?

MAID. No; he says he won't until he has seen you, ma'am.

NORA. Well, let him come in—but quietly. Helen, you mustn't say anything about it to anyone. It is a surprise for my husband.

MAID. Yes, ma'am, I quite understand.

Exit.

NORA. This dreadful thing is going to happen! It will happen in spite of me! No, no, no, it can't happen—it shan't happen! [She bolts the door of HELMER'S room. The MAID opens the hall door for KROGSTAD and shuts it after him. He is wearing a fur coat, high boots and a fur cap.]

NORA [advancing towards him]. Speak low—my husband is at home.

KROGSTAD. No matter about that.

NORA. What do you want of me?

KROGSTAD. An explanation of something.

NORA. Make haste then. What is it?

KROGSTAD. You know, I suppose, that I have got my dismissal.

NORA. I couldn't prevent it, Mr. Krogstad. I fought as hard as I could on your side, but it was no good.

KROGSTAD. Does your husband love you so little, then? He knows what I can expose you to, and yet he ventures—

NORA. How can you suppose that he has any knowledge of the sort?

KROGSTAD. I didn't suppose so at all.

It would not be the least like our dear Torvald Helmer to show so much courage—

NORA. Mr. Krogstad, a little respect for my husband, please.

KROGSTAD. Certainly—all the respect he deserves. But since you have kept the matter so carefully to yourself, I make bold to suppose that you have a little clearer idea, than you had yesterday, of what it actually is that you have done?

NORA. More than you could ever teach me.

KROGSTAD. Yes, such a bad lawyer as I am.

NORA. What is it you want of me?

KROGSTAD. Only to see how you were, Mrs. Helmer. I have been thinking about you all day long. A mere cashier, a quill-driver, a—well, a man like me—even he has a little of what is called feeling, you know.

NORA. Show it, then; think of my little children.

KROGSTAD. Have you and your husband thought of mine? But never mind about that. I only wanted to tell you that you need not take this matter too seriously. In the first place there will be no accusation made on my part.

NORA. No, of course not; I was sure of that.

KROGSTAD. The whole thing can be arranged amicably; there is no reason why anyone should know anything about it. It will remain a secret between us three.

NORA. My husband must never get to know anything about it.

KROGSTAD. How will you be able to prevent it? Am I to understand that you can pay the balance that is owing?

NORA. No, not just at present.

KROGSTAD. Or perhaps that you have some expedient for raising the money soon?

NORA. No expedient that I mean to make use of.

KROGSTAD. Well, in any case, it would have been of no use to you now. If you stood there with ever so much money in your hand, I would never part with your bond.

NORA. Tell me what purpose you mean to put it to.

KROGSTAD. I shall only preserve it—keep it in my possession. No one who is not concerned in the matter shall have the slightest hint of it. So that if the thought of it has driven you to any desperate resolution—

NORA. It has.

KROGSTAD. If you had it in your mind 5 to run away from your home—

NORA. I had.

KROGSTAD. Or even something worse—

NORA. How could you know that?

KROGSTAD. Give up the idea.

NORA. How did you know I had thought 10 of that?

KROGSTAD. Most of us think of that at first. I did, too—but I hadn't the courage.

NORA [faintly]. No more had I.

KROGSTAD [in a tone of relief]. No, that's 15 it, isn't it—you hadn't the courage either?

NORA. No, I haven't—I haven't.

KROGSTAD. Besides, it would have been 20 a great piece of folly. Once the first storm at home is over—. I have a letter for your husband in my pocket.

NORA. Telling him everything?

KROGSTAD. In as lenient a manner as I 25 possibly could.

NORA [quickly]. He mustn't get the letter. Tear it up. I will find some means of getting money.

KROGSTAD. Excuse me, Mrs. Helmer, but 30 I think I told you just now—

NORA. I am not speaking of what I owe you. Tell me what sum you are asking my husband for, and I will get the money.

KROGSTAD. I am not asking your husband for a penny.

NORA. What do you want, then?

KROGSTAD. I will tell you. I want to rehabilitate myself, Mrs. Helmer; I want to get on; and in that your husband must help me. For the last year and a half I have not 40 had a hand in anything dishonourable, and all that time I have been struggling in most restricted circumstances. I was content to work my way up step by step. Now I am turned out, and I am not going to be satisfied with merely being taken into favour again. I want to get on, I tell you. I want to get into the Bank again, in a higher position. Your husband must make a place for me—

NORA. That he will never do!

KROGSTAD. He will; I know him; he dare not protest. And as soon as I am in there again with him, then you will see!

Within a year I shall be the manager's right hand. It will be Nils Krogstad and not Torvald Helmer who manages the Bank.

NORA. That's a thing you will never see!

KROGSTAD. Do you mean that you will—?

NORA. I have courage enough for it now.

KROGSTAD. Oh, you can't frighten me.

A fine, spoilt lady like you—

10 NORA. You will see, you will see.

KROGSTAD. Under the ice, perhaps? Down into the cold, coal-black water? And then, in the spring, to float up to the surface, all horrible and unrecognisable, with your 15 hair fallen out—

NORA. You can't frighten me.

KROGSTAD. Nor you me. People don't do such things, Mrs. Helmer. Besides, what use would it be? I should have him 20 completely in my power all the same.

NORA. Afterwards? When I am no longer—

KROGSTAD. Have you forgotten that it is I who have the keeping of your reputation? 25 [NORA stands speechlessly looking at him.]

Well, now, I have warned you. Do not do anything foolish. When Helmer has had my letter, I shall expect a message from him. And be sure you remember that it is your husband himself who has forced me into 30 such ways as this again. I will never forgive him for that. Good-bye, Mrs. Helmer. [Exit through the hall.]

NORA [goes to the hall door, opens it slightly 35 and listens]. He is going. He is not putting the letter in the box. Oh no, no! that's impossible! [Opens the door by degrees.] What is that? He is standing outside. He is not going downstairs. Is he hesitating? Can he—? [A letter drops into the box; then KROGSTAD's footsteps are heard, till they die away as he goes downstairs. NORA utters a stifled cry, and runs across the room to the table by the sofa. A short pause.]

45 NORA. In the letter-box. [Steals across to the hall-door.] There it lies—Torvald, Torvald, there is no hope for us now!

MRS. LINDE comes in from the room on the left, carrying the dress.

50 MRS. LINDE. There, I can't see anything more to mend now. Would you like to try it on—?

NORA [in a hoarse whisper]. Christine, come here.

MRS. LINDE [throwing the dress down on the sofa]. What is the matter with you? You look so agitated!

NORA. Come here. Do you see that letter? There, look—you can see it through the glass in the letter-box.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I see it.

NORA. That letter is from Krogstad.

MRS. LINDE. Nora—it was Krogstad who lent you the money!

NORA. Yes, and now Torvald will know all about it.

MRS. LINDE. Believe me, Nora, that's the best thing for both of you.

NORA. You don't know all. I forged a name.

MRS. LINDE. Good heavens—!

NORA. I only want to say this to you, Christine—you must be my witness.

MRS. LINDE. Your witness? What do you mean? What am I to—?

NORA. If I should go out of my mind—and it might easily happen—

MRS. LINDE. Nora!

NORA. Or if anything else should happen to me—anything, for instance, that might prevent my being here—

MRS. LINDE. Nora! Nora! you are quite out of your mind.

NORA. And if it should happen that there were someone who wanted to take all the responsibility, all the blame, you understand—

MRS. LINDE. Yes, yes—but how can you suppose—?

NORA. Then you must be my witness, that it is not true, Christine. I am not out of my mind at all; I am in my right senses now, and I tell you no one else has known anything about it; I, and I alone, did the whole thing. Remember that.

MRS. LINDE. I will, indeed. But I don't understand all this.

NORA. How should you understand it? A wonderful thing is going to happen?

MRS. LINDE. A wonderful thing?

NORA. Yes, a wonderful thing!—But it is so terrible. Christine; it mustn't happen, not for all the world.

MRS. LINDE. I will go at once and see Krogstad.

NORA. Don't go to him; he will do you some harm.

MRS. LINDE. There was a time when he would gladly do anything for my sake.

NORA. He?

MRS. LINDE. Where does he live?

NORA. How should I know—? Yes [feeling in her pocket], here is his card. But the letter, the letter—!

HELMER [calls from his room, knocking at the door]. Nora!

NORA [cries out anxiously]. Oh, what's that? What do you want?

HELMER. Don't be so frightened. We are not coming in; you have locked the door. Are you trying on your dress?

NORA. Yes, that's it. I look so nice, Torvald.

MRS. LINDE [who has read the card]. I see he lives at the corner here.

NORA. Yes, but it's no use. It is hopeless. The letter is lying there in the box.

MRS. LINDE. And your husband keeps the key?

NORA. Yes, always.

MRS. LINDE. Krogstad must ask for his letter back unread, he must find some pretence—

NORA. But it is just at this time that Torvald generally—

MRS. LINDE. You must delay him. Go in to him in the meantime. I will come back as soon as I can. [She goes out hurriedly through the hall door.]

NORA [goes to HELMER's door, opens it and peeps in]. Torvald!

HELMER [from the inner room]. Well? May I venture at last to come into my own room again? Come along, Rank, now you will see— [Halting in the doorway.] But what is this?

NORA. What is what, dear?

HELMER. Rank led me to expect a splendid transformation.

RANK [in the doorway]. I understood so, but evidently I was mistaken.

NORA. Yes, nobody is to have the chance of admiring me in my dress until tomorrow.

HELMER. But, my dear Nora, you look so worn out. Have you been practising too much?

NORA. No, I have not practised at all.

HELMER. But you will need to—

NORA. Yes, indeed I shall, Torvald. But I can't get on a bit without you to help me; I have absolutely forgotten the whole thing.

HELMER. Oh, we will soon work it up again.

NORA. Yes, help me, Torvald. Promise that you will! I am so nervous about it—all the people—. You must give yourself up to me entirely this evening. Not the tiniest bit of business—you mustn't even take a pen in your hand. Will you promise, Torvald dear?

HELMER. I promise. This evening I will be wholly and absolutely at your service, you helpless little mortal. Ah, by the way, first of all I will just— [Goes towards the hall-door.]

NORA. What are you going to do there?

HELMER. Only see if any letters have come.

NORA. No, no! don't do that, Torvald!

HELMER. Why not?

NORA. Torvald, please don't. There is nothing there.

HELMER. Well, let me look. [Turns to go to the letter-box. NORA, at the piano, plays the first bars of the Tarantella. HELMER stops in the doorway.] Aha!

NORA. I can't dance to-morrow if I don't practise with you.

HELMER [going up to her]. Are you really so afraid of it, dear?

NORA. Yes, so dreadfully afraid of it. Let me practise at once; there is time now, before we go to dinner. Sit down and play for me, Torvald dear; criticise me, and correct me as you play.

HELMER. With great pleasure, if you wish me to. [Sits down at the piano.]

NORA [takes out of the box a tambourine and a long variegated shawl. She hastily drapes the shawl round her. Then she springs to the front of the stage and calls out]. Now play for me! I am going to dance!

HELMER plays and NORA dances. RANK stands by the piano behind HELMER, and looks on.

HELMER [as he plays]. Slower, slower!

NORA. I can't do it any other way.

HELMER. Not so violently, Nora!

NORA. This is the way.

HELMER [stops playing]. No, no—that is not a bit right.

NORA [laughing and swinging the tambourine]. Didn't I tell you so?

RANK. Let me play for her.

HELMER [getting up]. Yes, do. I can correct her better then.

RANK sits down at the piano and plays.

NORA dances more and more wildly. HELMER has taken up a position beside the stove, and during her dance gives her frequent instructions. She does not seem to hear him; her hair comes down and falls over her shoulder; she pays no attention to it, but goes on dancing. Enter MRS. LINDE.

MRS. LINDE [standing as if spell-bound in the doorway]. Oh!—

NORA [as she dances]. Such fun, Christine!

HELMER. My dear darling Nora, you are dancing as if your life depended on it.

NORA. So it does.

HELMER. Stop, Rank; this is sheer madness. Stop, I tell you! [RANK stops playing, and NORA suddenly stands still. HELMER goes up to her.] I could never have believed it. You have forgotten everything I taught you.

NORA [throwing away the tambourine]. There, you see.

HELMER. You will want a lot of coaching.

NORA. Yes, you see how much I need it. You must coach me up to the last minute. Promise me that, Torvald!

HELMER. You can depend on me.

NORA. You must not think of anything but me, either to-day or to-morrow; you mustn't open a single letter—not even open the letter-box—

HELMER. Ah, you are still afraid of that fellow—

NORA. Yes, indeed I am.

HELMER. Nora, I can tell from your looks that there is a letter from him lying there.

NORA. I don't know; I think there is; but you must not read anything of that kind now. Nothing horrid must come between us till this is all over.

RANK [whispers to HELMER]. You mustn't contradict her.

HELMER [taking her in his arms]. The child shall have her way. But to-morrow night, after you have danced—

NORA. Then you will be free. [The MAID appears in the doorway to the right.]

MAID. Dinner is served, ma'am.

NORA. We will have champagne, Helen.

MAID. Very good, ma'am. Exit.

HELMER. Hullo!—are we going to have a banquet?

NORA. Yes, a champagne banquet till the small hours. [Calls out.] And a few macaroons, Helen—lots, just for once!

HELMER. Come, come, don't be so wild and nervous. Be my own little skylark, as you used.

NORA. Yes, dear, I will. But go in now and you too, Doctor Rank. Christine, you must help me to do up my hair.

RANK [whispers to HELMER as they go out.] I suppose there is nothing—she is not expecting anything?

HELMER. Far from it, my dear fellow; it is simply nothing more than this childish nervousness I was telling you of. [They go into the right-hand room.]

NORA. Well!

MRS. LINDE. Gone out of town.

NORA. I could tell from your face.

MRS. LINDE. He is coming home to-morrow evening. I wrote a note for him.

NORA. You should have let it alone; you must prevent nothing. After all, it is splendid to be waiting for a wonderful thing to happen.

MRS. LINDE. What is it that you are waiting for?

NORA. Oh, you wouldn't understand. Go in to them, I will come in a moment. [MRS. LINDE goes into the dining-room.] NORA stands still for a little while, as if to compose herself. Then she looks at her watch. Five o'clock. Seven hours till midnight; and then four-and-twenty hours till the next midnight. Then the Tarantella will be over. Twenty-four and seven? Thirty-one hours to live.

HELMER [from the doorway on the right]. Where's my little skylark?

NORA [going to him with her arms outstretched]. Here she is!

ACT III

THE SAME SCENE.—The table has been placed in the middle of the stage, with chairs round it. A lamp is burning on the table. The door into the hall stands open. Dance music is heard in the room above. MRS. LINDE is sitting at the table idly turning over the leaves of a book; she tries to read, but does not seem able to collect her thoughts. Every now and then she listens intently for a sound at the outer door.

MRS. LINDE [looking at her watch]. Not yet—and the time is nearly up. If only he does not—. [Listens again.] Ah, there he is. [Goes into the hall and opens the outer door carefully. Light footsteps are heard on the stairs. She whispers.] Come in. There is no one here.

KROGSTAD [in the doorway]. I found a note from you at home. What does this mean?

MRS. LINDE. It is absolutely necessary that I should have a talk with you.

KROGSTAD. Really? And is it absolutely necessary that it should be here?

MRS. LINDE. It is impossible where I live; there is no private entrance to my rooms. Come in; we are quite alone. The maid is asleep, and the Helmers are at the dance upstairs.

KROGSTAD [coming into the room]. Are the Helmers really at a dance to-night?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, why not?

KROGSTAD. Certainly—why not?

MRS. LINDE. Now, Nils, let us have a talk.

KROGSTAD. Can we two have anything to talk about?

MRS. LINDE. We have a great deal to talk about.

KROGSTAD. I shouldn't have thought so.

MRS. LINDE. No, you have never properly understood me.

KROGSTAD. Was there anything else to understand except what was obvious to all the world—a heartless woman jilts a man when a more lucrative chance turns up.

MRS. LINDE. Do you believe I am as absolutely heartless as all that? And do you believe that I did it with a light heart?

KROGSTAD. Didn't you?

MRS. LINDE. Nils, did you really think that?

KROGSTAD. If it were as you say, why did you write to me as you did at the time?

MRS. LINDE. I could do nothing else. As I had to break with you, it was my duty also to put an end to all that you felt for me.

KROGSTAD [wringing his hands]. So that was it. And all this—only for the sake of money!

MRS. LINDE. You must not forget that I had a helpless mother and two little brothers. We couldn't wait for you, Nils; your prospects seemed hopeless then.

KROGSTAD. That may be so, but you had no right to throw me over for any one else's sake.

MRS. LINDE. Indeed I don't know. Many a time did I ask myself if I had the right to do it.

KROGSTAD [more gently]. When I lost you, it was as if all the solid ground went from under my feet. Look at me now—I am a shipwrecked man clinging to a bit of wreckage.

MRS. LINDE. But help may be near.

KROGSTAD. It was near; but then you came and stood in my way.

MRS. LINDE. Unintentionally, Nils. It was only to-day that I learnt it was your place I was going to take in the bank.

KROGSTAD. I believe you, if you say so. But now that you know it, are you not going to give it up to me?

MRS. LINDE. No, because that would not benefit you in the least.

KROGSTAD. Oh, benefit, benefit—I would have done it whether or no.

MRS. LINDE. I have learnt to act prudently. Life, and hard, bitter necessity have taught me that.

KROGSTAD. And life has taught me not to believe in fine speeches.

MRS. LINDE. Then life has taught you something very reasonable. But deeds you must believe in?

KROGSTAD. What do you mean by that?

MRS. LINDE. You said you were like a shipwrecked man clinging to some wreckage.

KROGSTAD. I had good reason to say so.

MRS. LINDE. Well, I am like a shipwrecked woman clinging to some wreckage—no one to mourn for, no one to care for.

KROGSTAD. It was your own choice.

MRS. LINDE. There was no other choice—then.

KROGSTAD. Well, what now?

MRS. LINDE. Nils, how would it be if we two shipwrecked people could join forces?

KROGSTAD. What are you saying?

MRS. LINDE. Two on the same piece of wreckage would stand a better chance than each on their own.

KROGSTAD. Christine!

MRS. LINDE. What do you suppose brought me to town?

KROGSTAD. Do you mean that you gave me a thought?

MRS. LINDE. I could not endure life without work. All my life, as long as I can remember, I have worked, and it has been my greatest and only pleasure. But now I am quite alone in the world—my life is so dreadfully empty and I feel so forsaken. There is not the least pleasure in working for one's self. Nils, give me someone and something to work for.

KROGSTAD. I don't trust that. It is nothing but a woman's overstrained sense of generosity that prompts you to make such an offer of yourself.

MRS. LINDE. Have you ever noticed anything of the sort in me?

KROGSTAD. Could you really do it? Tell me—do you know all about my past life?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

KROGSTAD. And do you know what they think of me here?

MRS. LINDE. You seemed to me to imply that with me you might have been quite another man.

KROGSTAD. I am certain of it.

MRS. LINDE. Is it too late now?

KROGSTAD. Christine, are you saying this deliberately? Yes, I am sure you are. I see it in your face. Have you really the courage, then—?

MRS. LINDE. I want to be a mother to someone, and your children need a mother. We two need each other. Nils, I have faith in your real character—I can dare anything together with you.

KROGSTAD [grasps her hands]. Thanks, thanks, Christine! Now I shall find a way to clear myself in the eyes of the world. Ah, but I forgot—

MRS. LINDE [listening]. Hush! The Tarantella! Go, go!

KROGSTAD. Why? What is it?

MRS. LINDE. Do you hear them up there? When that is over, we may expect them back.

KROGSTAD. Yes, yes—I will go. But it is all no use. Of course you are not aware what steps I have taken in the matter of the Helmers.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I know all about that.

KROGSTAD. And in spite of that have you the courage to—?

MRS. LINDE. I understand very well to what lengths a man like you might be driven by despair.

KROGSTAD. If I could only undo what I have done!

MRS. LINDE. You cannot. Your letter is lying in the letter-box now.

KROGSTAD. Are you sure of that?

MRS. LINDE. Quite sure, but—

KROGSTAD [with a searching look at her]. Is that what it all means?—that you want to save your friend at any cost? Tell me frankly. Is that it?

MRS. LINDE. Nils, a woman who has once sold herself for another's sake, doesn't do it a second time.

KROGSTAD. I will ask for my letter back.

MRS. LINDE. No, no.

KROGSTAD. Yes, of course I will. I will wait here till Helmer comes; I will tell him he must give me my letter back—that it only concerns my dismissal—that he is not to read it—

MRS. LINDE. No, Nils, you must not recall your letter.

KROGSTAD. But, tell me, wasn't it for that very purpose that you asked me to meet you here?

MRS. LINDE. In my first moment of fright, it was. But twenty-four hours have elapsed since then, and in that time I have witnessed incredible things in this house. Helmer must know all about it. This unhappy secret must be disclosed; they must have a complete understanding between them, which is impossible with all this concealment and falsehood going on.

KROGSTAD. Very well, if you will take the responsibility. But there is one thing I can do in any case, and I shall do it at once.

MRS. LINDE [listening]. You must be quick and go! The dance is over; we are not safe a moment longer.

KROGSTAD. I will wait for you below.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, do. You must see me back to my door.

KROGSTAD. I have never had such an amazing piece of good fortune in my life! [Goes out through the outer door. The door between the room and the hall remains open.]

MRS. LINDE [tidying up the room and laying her hat and cloak ready]. What a difference! what a difference! Someone to work for and live for—a home to bring comfort into. That I will do, indeed. I wish they would be quick and come— [Listens]. Ah, there they are now. I must put on my things.

[Takes up her hat and cloak. HELMER's and NORA's voices are heard outside; a key is turned, and HELMER brings NORA almost by force into the hall. She is in an Italian costume with a large black shawl round her; he is in evening dress, and a black domino which is flying open.]

NORA [hanging back in the doorway, and struggling with him]. No, no, no!—don't take me in. I want to go upstairs again; I don't want to leave so early.

HELMER. But, my dearest Nora—

NORA. Please, Torvald dear—please, please—only an hour more.

HELMER. Not a single minute, my sweet Nora. You know that was our agreement. Come along into the room; you are catching cold standing there. [He brings her gently into the room, in spite of her resistance.]

MRS. LINDE. Good-evening.

NORA. Christine!

HELMER. You here, so late, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, you must excuse me; I was so anxious to see Nora in her dress.

NORA. Have you been sitting here waiting for me?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, unfortunately I came too late, you had already gone upstairs; and I thought I couldn't go away again without having seen you.

HELMER [taking off NORA's shawl]. Yes, take a good look at her. I think she is worth looking at. Isn't she charming, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, indeed she is.

HELMER. Doesn't she look remarkably pretty? Everyone thought so at the dance. But she is terribly self-willed, this sweet little person. What are we to do with her? You will hardly believe that I had almost to bring her away by force.

NORA. Torvald, you will repent not having let me stay, even if it were only for half an hour.

HELMER. Listen to her, Mrs. Linde! She had danced her Tarantella, and it had been a tremendous success, as it deserved—although possibly the performance was a trifle too realistic—a little more so, I mean, than was strictly compatible with the limitations of art. But never mind about that! The chief thing is, she had made a success—she had made a tremendous success. Do you think I was going to let her remain there after that, and spoil the effect? No, indeed!

I took my charming little Capri maiden—my capricious little Capri maiden, I should say—on my arm; took one quick turn round the room; a curtsey on either side, and, as they say in novels, the beautiful apparition disappeared. An exit ought always to be effective, Mrs. Linde; but that is what I cannot make Nora understand. Pooh! this room is hot. [Throws his domino on a chair, and opens the door of his room.] Hullo! it's all dark in here. Oh, of course—excuse me—. [He goes in, and lights some candles.]

NORA [in a hurried and breathless whisper]. Well?

MRS. LINDE [in a low voice]. I have had a talk with him.

NORA. Yes, and—

MRS. LINDE. Nora, you must tell your husband all about it.

NORA [in an expressionless voice]. I knew it.

MRS. LINDE. You have nothing to be afraid of as far as Krogstad is concerned; but you must tell him.

NORA. I won't tell him.

MRS. LINDE. Then the letter will.

NORA. Thank you, Christine. Now I know what I must do. Hush—!

HELMER [coming in again]. Well, Mrs. Linde, have you admired her?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, and now I will say good-night.

HELMER. What, already? Is this yours, this knitting?

MRS. LINDE [taking it]. Yes, thank you, I had very nearly forgotten it.

HELMER. So you knit?

MRS. LINDE. Of course.

HELMER. Do you know, you ought to embroider.

MRS. LINDE. Really? Why?

HELMER. Yes, it's far more becoming. Let me show you. You hold the embroidery thus in your left hand, and use the needle with the right—like this—with a long, easy sweep. Do you see?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, perhaps—

HELMER. But in the case of knitting—that can never be anything but ungraceful; look here—the arms close together, the knitting-needles going up and down—it has a sort of Chinese effect—. That was really excellent champagne they gave us.

MRS. LINDE. Well,—good-night, Nora, and don't be self-willed any more.

HELMER. That's right, Mrs. Linde.

MRS. LINDE. Good-night, Mr. Helmer.

HELMER [accompanying her to the door]. Good-night, good-night. I hope you will get home all right. I should be very happy to—but you haven't any great distance to go. Good-night, good-night. [She goes out; he shuts the door after her, and comes in again.] Ah!—at last we have got rid of her. She is a frightful bore, that woman.

NORA. Aren't you very tired, Torvald?

HELMER. No, not in the least.

NORA. Nor sleepy?

HELMER. Not a bit. On the contrary, I feel extraordinarily lively. And you?—you really look both tired and sleepy.

NORA. Yes, I am very tired. I want to go to sleep at once.

HELMER. There, you see it was quite right of me not to let you stay there any longer.

NORA. Everything you do is quite right, Torvald.

HELMER [kissing her on the forehead].

Now my little skylark is speaking reasonably. Did you notice what good spirits Rank was in this evening?

NORA. Really! Was he? I didn't speak to him at all.

HELMER. And I very little, but I have not for a long time seen him in such good form. [Looks for a while at her and then goes nearer to her.] It is delightful to be at home by ourselves again, to be all alone with you—you fascinating, charming little darling!

NORA. Don't look at me like that, Torvald.

HELMER. Why should I not look at my dearest treasure?—at all the beauty that is mine, all my very own?

NORA [going to the other side of the table]. You mustn't say things like that to me tonight.

HELMER [following her]. You have still got the Tarantella in your blood, I see. And it makes you more captivating than ever. Listen—the guests are beginning to go now. [In a lower voice.] Nora—soon the whole house will be quiet.

NORA. Yes, I hope so.

HELMER. Yes, my own darling Nora. Do you know, when I am out at a party with you like this, why I speak so little to you, keep away from you, and only send a stolen glance in your direction now and then?—do you know why I do that? It is because I make believe to myself that we are secretly in love, and you are my secretly promised bride, and that no one suspects there is anything between us.

NORA. Yes, yes—I know very well your thoughts are with me all the time.

HELMER. And when we are leaving, and I am putting the shawl over your beautiful young shoulders—on your lovely neck—then I imagine that you are my young bride and that we have just come from the wedding, and I am bringing you for the first time into our home—to be alone with you for the first time—quite alone with my shy little darling! All this evening I have longed for nothing but you. When I watched the seductive figures of the Tarantella, my blood was on fire; I could endure it no longer, and that was why I brought you down so early—

NORA. Go away, Torvald! You must let me go. I won't—

HELMER. What's that? You're joking, my little Nora! You won't—you won't? Am I not your husband—? [A knock is heard at the outer door.]

NORA [starting]. Did you hear—?

HELMER [going into the hall]. Who is it?

RANK [outside]. It is I. May I come in for a moment?

HELMER [in a fretful whisper]. Oh, what does he want now? [Aloud.] Wait a minute? [Unlocks the door.] Come, that's kind of you not to pass by our door.

RANK. I thought I heard your voice, and felt as if I should like to look in. [With a swift glance round.] Ah, yes!—these dear familiar rooms. You are very happy and cosy in here, you two.

HELMER. It seems to me that you looked after yourself pretty well upstairs too.

RANK. Excellently. Why shouldn't I? Why shouldn't one enjoy everything in this world?—at any rate as much as one can, and as long as one can. The wine was capital—

HELMER. Especially the champagne.

RANK. So you noticed that too? It is almost incredible how much I managed to put away!

NORA. Torvald drank a great deal of champagne to-night, too.

RANK. Did he?

NORA. Yes, and he is always in such good spirits afterwards.

RANK. Well, why should one not enjoy a merry evening after a well-spent day?

HELMER. Well spent? I am afraid I can't take credit for that.

RANK [clapping him on the back]. But I can, you know!

NORA. Doctor Rank, you must have been occupied with some scientific investigation to-day.

RANK. Exactly.

HELMER. Just listen!—little Nora talking about scientific investigations!

NORA. And may I congratulate you on the result?

RANK. Indeed you may.

NORA. Was it favourable, then?

RANK. The best possible, for both doctor and patient—certainty.

NORA [quickly and searchingly]. Certainty?

RANK. Absolute certainty. So wasn't I entitled to make a merry evening of it after that?

NORA. Yes, you certainly were, Doctor Rank.

HELMER. I think so too, so long as you don't have to pay for it in the morning.

RANK. Oh well, one can't have anything in this life without paying for it.

NORA. Doctor Rank—are you fond of fancy-dress balls?

RANK. Yes, if there is a fine lot of pretty costumes.

NORA. Tell me—what shall we two wear at the next?

HELMER. Little featherbrain!—are you thinking of the next already?

RANK. We two? Yes, I can tell you. You shall go as a good fairy—

HELMER. Yes, but what do you suggest as an appropriate costume for that?

RANK. Let your wife go dressed just as she is in everyday life.

HELMER. That was really very prettily turned. But can't you tell us what you will be?

RANK. Yes, my dear friend, I have quite made up my mind about that.

HELMER. Well?

RANK. At the next fancy-dress ball I shall be invisible.

HELMER. That's a good joke!

RANK. There is a big black hat—have you never heard of hats that make you invisible? If you put one on, no one can see you.

HELMER [suppressing a smile]. Yes, you are quite right.

RANK. But I am clean forgetting what I came for. Helmer, give me a cigar—one of the dark Havanas.

HELMER. With the greatest pleasure. [Offers him his case].

RANK [takes a cigar and cuts off the end]. Thanks.

NORA [striking a match]. Let me give you a light.

RANK. Thank you. [She holds the match for him to light his cigar]. And now good-bye!

HELMER. Good-bye, good-bye, dear old man!

NORA. Sleep well, Doctor Rank.

RANK. Thank you for that wish.

NORA. Wish me the same.

RANK. You? Well, if you want me to sleep well! And thanks for the light. [He nods to them both and goes out].

HELMER [in a subdued voice]. He has drunk more than he ought.

NORA [absently]. Maybe. [HELMER takes a bunch of keys out of his pocket and goes into the hall]. Torvald! what are you going to do there?

HELMER. Empty the letter-box; it is quite full; there will be no room to put the newspaper in to-morrow morning.

NORA. Are you going to work to-night?

HELMER. You know quite well I'm not. What is this? Some one has been at the lock.

NORA. At the lock—?

HELMER. Yes, someone has. What can it mean? I should never have thought the maid—. Here is a broken hairpin. Nora, it is one of yours.

NORA [quickly]. Then it must have been the children—

HELMER. Then you must get them out of those ways. There, at last I have got it open. [Takes out the contents of the letter-box, and calls to the kitchen]. Helen!—Helen, put out the light over the front door. [Goes back into the room and shuts the door into the hall]. He holds out his hand full of letters.] Look at that—look what a heap of them there are. [Turning them over]. What on earth is that?

NORA [at the window]. The letter—No! Torvald, no!

HELMER. Two cards—of Rank's.

NORA. Of Doctor Rank's?

HELMER [looking at them]. Doctor Rank. They were on the top. He must have put them in when he went out.

NORA. Is there anything written on them?

HELMER. There is a black cross over the name. Look there—what an uncomfortable idea! It looks as if he were announcing his own death.

NORA. It is just what he is doing.

HELMER. What? Do you know anything about it? Has he said anything to you?

NORA. Yes. He told me that when the cards came it would be his leave-taking from us. He means to shut himself up and die.

HELMER. My poor old friend. Certainly I knew we should not have him very long with us. But so soon! And so he hides himself away like a wounded animal.

NORA. If it has to happen, it is best it should be without a word—don't you think so, Torvald?

HELMER [walking up and down]. He had so grown into our lives. I can't think of him as having gone out of them. He, with his sufferings and his loneliness, was like a cloudy background to our sunlit happiness. Well, perhaps it is best so. For him, anyway. [Standing still]. And perhaps for us too, Nora. We two are thrown quite upon each other now. [Puts his arms round her]. My darling wife, I don't feel as if I could hold you tight enough. Do you know, Nora, I have often wished that you might be threatened by some great danger, so that I might risk my life's blood, and everything, for your sake.

NORA [disengages herself, and says firmly and decidedly]. Now you must read your letters, Torvald.

HELMER. No, no; not to-night. I want to be with you, my darling wife.

NORA. With the thought of your friend's death—

HELMER. You are right, it has affected us both. Something ugly has come between us—the thought of the horrors of death. We must try and rid our minds of that. Until then—we will each go to our own room.

NORA [hanging on his neck]. Good-night, 5
Torvald—Good-night!

HELMER [kissing her on the forehead].
Good-night, my little singing-bird. Sleep sound, Nora. Now I will read my letters through. [He takes his letters and goes into 10 his room, shutting the door after him.]

NORA [gropes distractedly about, seizes HELMER'S domino, throws it round her, while she says in quick, hoarse, spasmodic whispers].
Never to see him again. Never! Never! 15 [Puts her shawl over her head.] Never to see my children again either—never again.

Never! Never!—Ah! the icy, black water—the unfathomable depths—If only it were over! He has got it now—now he is reading 20
it. Good-bye, Torvald and my children.
[She is about to rush out through the hall, when HELMER opens his door hurriedly and stands with an open letter in his hand.]

HELMER. Nora!

NORA. Ah!—

HELMER. What is this? Do you know what is in this letter?

NORA. Yes, I know. Let me go! Let me get out!

HELMER [holding her back]. Where are you going?

NORA [trying to get free]. You shan't save me, Torvald!

HELMER [reeling]. True? Is this true, 35 that I read here? Horrible! No, no—it is impossible that it can be true.

NORA. It is true. I have loved you above everything else in the world.

HELMER. Oh, don't let us have any silly 40 excuses.

NORA [taking a step towards him]. Torvald—!

HELMER. Miserable creature—what have you done?

NORA. Let me go. You shall not suffer for my sake. You shall not take it upon yourself.

HELMER. No tragedy airs, please. [Locks
the hall door.] Here you shall stay and give 50 me an explanation. Do you understand what you have done? Answer me? Do you understand what you have done?

NORA [looks steadily at him and says with a growing look of coldness in her face]. Yes, now I am beginning to understand thoroughly.

HELMER [walking about the room]. What a horrible awakening! All these eight years—she who was my joy and pride—a hypocrite, a liar—worse, worse—a criminal! The unutterable ugliness of it all!—For shame! For shame! [NORA is silent and looks steadily at him. He stops in front of her.] I ought to have suspected that something of the sort would happen. I ought to have foreseen it.
All your father's want of principle—be silent!
—all your father's want of principle has come out in you. No religion, no morality, no sense of duty—. How I am punished for having winked at what he did! I did it for your sake, and this is how you repay me.

NORA. Yes, that's just it.

HELMER. Now you have destroyed all my happiness. You have ruined all my future. It is horrible to think of! I am in the power of an unscrupulous man; he can do what he likes with me, ask anything he 25 likes of me, give me any orders he pleases—I dare not refuse. And I must sink to such miserable depths because of a thoughtless woman!

NORA. When I am out of the way, you
30 will be free.

HELMER. No fine speeches, please. Your father had always plenty of those ready, too.
What good would it be to me if you were out of the way, as you say? Not the slightest.
He can make the affair known everywhere;
and if he does, I may be falsely suspected of having been a party to your criminal action.
Very likely people will think I was behind it all—that it was I who prompted you! And I have to thank you for all this—you whom I have cherished during the whole of our married life. Do you understand now what it is you have done for me?

NORA [coldly and quietly]. Yes.

HELMER. It is so incredible that I can't 45 take it in. But we must come to some understanding. Take off that shawl. Take it off, I tell you. I must try and appease him some way or another. The matter must be hushed up at any cost. And as for you and me, it must appear as if everything between us were just as before—but naturally only in the eyes of the world. You still remain in my house, that is a matter of course. But I shall not allow you to bring up the children; I dare not trust them to you. To think that I should be obliged to say so to one whom I have loved so dearly, and whom I still— No, that is all over. From this moment happiness is not the question; all that concerns us is to save the remains, the fragments, the appearance—

A ring is heard at the front-door bell.

HELMER [with a start]. What is that? So late! Can the worst—? Can he—? Hide yourself, Nora. Say you are ill.

NORA stands motionless. HELMER goes and unlocks the hall door.

MAID [half-dressed, comes to the door]. A letter for the mistress.

HELMER. Give it to me. [Takes the letter, and shuts the door]. Yes, it is from him. You shall not have it; I will read it myself.

NORA. Yes, read it.

HELMER [standing by the lamp]. I scarcely have the courage to do it. It may mean ruin for both of us. No, I must know. [Tears open the letter, runs his eye over a few lines, looks at a paper enclosed, and gives a shout of joy]. Nora! [She looks at him questioningly]. Nora!— No, I must read it once again—. Yes, it is true! I am saved! Nora, I am saved!

NORA. And I?

HELMER. You too, of course; we are both saved, both you and I. Look, he sends you your bond back. He says he regrets and repents—that a happy change in his life—never mind what he says! We are saved, Nora! No one can do anything to you. Oh, Nora, Nora!—no, first I must destroy these hateful things. Let me see—. [Takes a look at the bond]. No, no, I won't look at it. The whole thing shall be nothing but a bad dream to me. [Tears up the bond and both letters, throws them all into the stove, and watches them burn]. There—now it doesn't exist any longer. He says that since Christmas Eve you—. These must have been three dreadful days for you, Nora.

NORA. I have fought a hard fight these three days.

HELMER. And suffered agonies, and seen no way out but—. No, we won't call any of the horrors to mind. We will only shout with joy, and keep saying, "It's all over!

It's all over!" Listen to me, Nora. You don't seem to realise that it is all over. What is this?—such a cold, set face! My poor little Nora, I quite understand; you don't feel as if you could believe that I have forgiven you. But it is true, Nora, I swear it; I have forgiven you everything. I know that what you did, you did out of love for me.

NORA. That is true.

HELMER. You have loved me as a wife ought to love her husband. Only you had not sufficient knowledge to judge of the means you used. But do you suppose you are any the less dear to me, because you don't understand how to act on your own responsibility? No, no; only lean on me; I will advise you and direct you. I should not be a man if this womanly helplessness did not just give you a double attractiveness in my eyes. You must not think any more about the hard things I said in my first moment of consternation, when I thought everything was going to overwhelm me. I have forgiven you, Nora; I swear to you I have forgiven you.

NORA. Thank you for your forgiveness. [She goes out through the door to the right].

HELMER. No, don't go—. [Looks in]. What are you doing in there?!

NORA [from within]. Taking off my fancy dress.

HELMER [standing at the open door]. Yes, do. Try and calm yourself, and make your mind easy again, my frightened little singing-bird. Be at rest, and feel secure; I have broad wings to shelter you under. [Walks up and down by the door]. How warm and cosy our home is, Nora. Here is shelter for you; here I will protect you like a hunted dove that I have saved from a hawk's claws; I will bring peace to your poor beating heart. It will come, little by little, Nora, believe me. To-morrow morning you will look upon it all quite differently; soon everything will be just as it was before. Very soon you won't need me to assure you that I have forgiven you; you will yourself feel the certainty that I have done so. Can you suppose I should ever think of such a thing as repudiating you, or even reproaching you? You have no idea what a true man's heart is like, Nora. There is something so indescribably sweet and satisfying, to a man, in the knowledge that he has forgiven his wife—forgiven her freely, and with all his heart. It seems as if that had made her, as it were, doubly his own; he has given her a new life, so to speak; and she has in a way become both wife and child to him. So you shall be for me after this, my little scared, helpless darling. Have no anxiety about anything, Nora; only be frank and open with me, and I will serve as will and conscience both to you—. What is this? Not gone to bed? Have you changed your things?

NORA [in everyday dress]. Ye, Torvald, I have changed my things now.

HELMER. But what for?—so late as this.

NORA. I shall not sleep to-night.

HELMER. But, my dear Nora—

NORA [looking at her watch]. It is not so very late. Sit down here, Torvald. You and I have much to say to one another. [She sits down at one side of the table.]

HELMER. Nora—what is this?—this cold, set face?

NORA. Sit down. It will take some time; I have a lot to talk over with you.

HELMER [sits down at the opposite side of the table]. You alarm me, Nora!—and I don't understand you.

NORA. No, that is just it. You don't understand me, and I have never understood you either—before to-night. No, you mustn't interrupt me. You must simply listen to what I say. Torvald, this is a settling of accounts.

HELMER. What do you mean by that?

NORA [after a short silence]. Isn't there one thing that strikes you as strange in our sitting here like this?

HELMER. What is that?

NORA. We have been married now eight years. Does it not occur to you that this is the first time we two, you and I, husband and wife, have had a serious conversation?

HELMER. What do you mean by serious?

NORA. In all these eight years—longer than that—from the very beginning of our acquaintance, we have never exchanged a word on any serious subject.

HELMER. Was it likely that I would be continually and for ever telling you about worries that you could not help me to bear?

NORA. I am not speaking about business matters. I say that we have never sat down in earnest together to try and get at the bottom of anything.

HELMER. But, dearest Nora, would it have been any good to you?

NORA. That is just it; you have never understood me. I have been greatly wronged, Torvald—first by papa and then by you.

HELMER. What! By us two—by us two, who have loved you better than anyone else in the world?

NORA [shaking her head]. You have never loved me. You have only thought it pleasant to be in love with me.

HELMER. Nora, what do I hear you saying?

NORA. It is perfectly true, Torvald. When I was at home with papa, he told me his opinion about everything, and so I had the same opinions; and if I differed from him I concealed the fact, because he would not have liked it. He called me his doll-child, and he played with me just as I used to play with my dolls. And when I came to live with you—

HELMER. What sort of an expression is that to use about our marriage?

NORA [undisturbed]. I mean that I was simply transferred from papa's hands into yours. You arranged everything according to your own taste, and so I got the same tastes as you—or else I pretended to, I am really not quite sure which—I think sometimes the one and sometimes the other. When I look back on it, it seems to me as if I had been living here like a poor woman—just from hand to mouth. I have existed merely to perform tricks for you, Torvald. But you would have it so. You and papa have committed a great sin against me. It is your fault that I have made nothing of my life.

HELMER. How unreasonable and how ungrateful you are, Nora! Have you not been happy here?

NORA. No, I have never been happy. I thought I was, but it has never really been so.

HELMER. Not—not happy!

NORA. No, only merry. And you have always been so kind to me. But our home has been nothing but a playroom. I have been your doll-wife, just as at home I was papa's doll-child; and here the children have been my dolls. I thought it great fun when you played with me, just as they thought it great fun when I played with them. That is what our marriage has been, Torvald.

HELMER. There is some truth in what you say—exaggerated and strained as your view of it is. But for the future it shall be different. Playtime shall be over, and lesson-time shall begin.

NORA. Whose lessons? Mine, or the children's?

HELMER. Both yours and the children's, my darling Nora.

NORA. Alas, Torvald, you are not the man to educate me into being a proper wife for you.

HELMER. And you can say that!

NORA. And I—how am I fitted to bring up the children?

HELMER. Nora!

NORA. Didn't you say so yourself a little while ago—that you dare not trust me to bring them up?

HELMER. In a moment of anger! Why do you pay any heed to that?

NORA. Indeed, you were perfectly right. I am not fit for the task. There is another task I must undertake first. I must try and educate myself—you are not the man to help me in that. I must do that for myself. And that is why I am going to leave you now.

HELMER [springing up]. What do you say?

NORA. I must stand quite alone, if I am to understand myself and everything about me. It is for that reason that I cannot remain with you any longer.

HELMER. Nora, Nora!

NORA. I am going away from here now, at once. I am sure Christine will take me in for the night—

HELMER. You are out of your mind! I won't allow it! I forbid you!

NORA. It is no use forbidding me anything any longer. I will take with me what belongs to myself. I will take nothing from you, either now or later.

HELMER. What sort of madness is this!

NORA. To-morrow I shall go home—I mean, to my old home. It will be easiest for me to find something to do there.

HELMER. You blind, foolish woman!

NORA. I must try and get some sense, Torvald.

HELMER. To desert your home, your husband and your children! And you don't consider what people will say!

NORA. I cannot consider that at all. I only know that it is necessary for me.

HELMER. It's shocking. This is how you would neglect your most sacred duties.

NORA. What do you consider my most sacred duties?

HELMER. Do I need to tell you that?

Are they not your duties to your husband and your children?

NORA. I have other duties just as sacred.

HELMER. That you have not. What duties could those be?

NORA. Duties to myself.

HELMER. Before all else, you are a wife and a mother.

NORA. I don't believe that any longer. I believe that before all else I am a reasonable human being, just as you are—or, at all events, that I must try and become one. I know quite well, Torvald, that most people would think you right, and that views of that kind are to be found in books; but I can no longer content myself with what most people say, or with what is found in books. I must think over things for myself and get to understand them.

HELMER. Can you not understand your place in your own home? Have you not a reliable guide in such matters as that?—have you no religion?

NORA. I am afraid, Torvald, I do not exactly know what religion is.

HELMER. What are you saying?

NORA. I know nothing but what the clergyman said, when I went to be confirmed. He told us that religion was this, and that, and the other. When I am away from all this, and am alone, I will look into that matter too. I will see if what the clergyman said is true, or at all events if it is true for me.

HELMER. This is unheard of in a girl of your age! But if religion cannot lead you aright, let me try and awaken your conscience. I suppose you have some moral sense? Or—answer me—am I to think you have none?

NORA. I assure you, Torvald, that is not an easy question to answer. I really don't know. The thing perplexes me altogether. I only know that you and I look at it in quite a different light. I am learning, too, that the law is quite another thing from what I supposed; but I find it impossible to convince myself that the law is right. According to it a woman has no right to spare her old dying father, or to save her husband's life. I can't believe that.

HELMER. You talk like a child. You don't understand the conditions of the world in which you live.

NORA. No, I don't. But now I am going to try. I am going to see if I can make out who is right, the world or I.

HELMER. You are ill, Nora; you are delirious; I almost think you are out of your mind.

NORA. I have never felt my mind so clear and certain as to-night.

HELMER. And is it with a clear and certain mind that you forsake your husband and your children?

NORA. Yes, it is.

HELMER. Then there is only one possible explanation.

NORA. What is that?

HELMER. You do not love me any more.

NORA. No, that is just it.

HELMER. Nora!—and you can say that?

NORA. It gives me great pain, Torvald, for you have always been so kind to me, but I cannot help it. I do not love you any more.

HELMER [regaining his composure]. Is that a clear and certain conviction too?

NORA. Yes, absolutely clear and certain. That is the reason why I will not stay here any longer.

HELMER. And can you tell me what I have done to forfeit your love?

NORA. Yes, indeed I can. It was to-night, when the wonderful thing did not happen; then I saw you were not the man I had thought you.

HELMER. Explain yourself better—I don't understand you.

NORA. I have waited so patiently for eight years; for, goodness knows, I knew very well that wonderful things don't happen every day. Then this horrible misfortune came upon me; and then I felt quite certain that the wonderful thing was going to happen at last. When Krogstad's letter was lying out there, never for a moment did I imagine that you would consent to accept this man's conditions. I was so absolutely certain that you would say to him: Publish the thing to the whole world. And when that was done—

HELMER. Yes, what then?—when I had exposed my wife to shame and disgrace?

NORA. When that was done, I was so absolutely certain, you would come forward and take everything upon yourself, and say: I am the guilty one.

HELMER. Nora—!

NORA. You mean that I would never have accepted such a sacrifice on your part? No, of course not. But what would my assurances have been worth against yours? That was the wonderful thing which I hoped for and feared; and it was to prevent that, that I wanted to kill myself.

HELMER. I would gladly work night and day for you, Nora—bear sorrow and wait for your sake. But no man would sacrifice his honour for the one he loves.

NORA. It is a thing hundreds of thousands of women have done.

HELMER. Oh, you think and talk like a heedless child.

NORA. Maybe. But you neither think nor talk like the man I could bind myself to. As soon as your fear was over—and it was not fear for what threatened me, but for what might happen to you—when the whole thing was past, as far as you were concerned it was exactly as if nothing at all had happened. Exactly as before, I was your little skylark, your doll, which you would in future treat with doubly gentle care, because it was so brittle and fragile.

[Getting up.] Torvald—it was then it dawned upon me that for eight years I had been living here with a strange man, and had borne him three children—. Oh, I can't bear to think of it! I could tear myself into little bits!

HELMER [sadly]. I see, I see. An abyss has opened between us—there is no denying it. But, Nora, would it not be possible to fill it up?

NORA. As I am now, I am no wife for you.

HELMER. I have it in me to become a different man.

NORA. Perhaps—if your doll is taken away from you.

HELMER. But to part!—to part from you! No, no, Nora, I can't understand that idea.

NORA [going out to the right]. That makes it all the more certain that it must be done. [She comes back with her cloak and hat and a small bag which she puts on a chair by the table.]

HELMER. Nora, Nora, not now! Wait till to-morrow.

NORA [putting on her cloak]. I cannot spend the night in a strange man's room.

HELMER. But can't we live here like brother and sister—?

NORA [putting on her hat]. You know very well that would not last long. [Puts the shawl round her.] Good-bye, Torvald. I won't see the little ones. I know they are in better hands than mine. As I am now, I can be of no use to them.

HELMER. But some day, Nora—some day?

NORA. How can I tell? I have no idea what is going to become of me.

HELMER. But you are my wife, whatever becomes of you.

NORA. Listen, Torvald. I have heard that when a wife deserts her husband's house, as I am doing now, he is legally freed from all obligations towards her. In any case I set you free from all your obligations. You are not to feel yourself bound in the slightest way, any more than I shall. There must be perfect freedom on both sides. See, here is your ring back. Give me mine.

HELMER. That too?

NORA. That too.

HELMER. Here it is.

NORA. That's right. Now it is all over. I have put the keys here. The maids know all about everything in the house—better than I do. To-morrow, after I have left her, Christine will come here and pack up my own things that I brought with me from home. I will have them sent after me.

HELMER. All over! All over!—Nora, shall you never think of me again?

NORA. I know I shall often think of you and the children and this house.

HELMER. May I write to you, Nora?

NORA. No—never. You must not do that.

HELMER. But at least let me send you—

NORA. Nothing—nothing—

HELMER. Let me help you if you are in want.

NORA. No. I can receive nothing from a stranger.

HELMER. Nora—can I never be anything more than a stranger to you?

NORA [taking her bag]. Ah, Torvald, the most wonderful thing of all would have to happen.

HELMER. Tell me what that would be!

NORA. Both you and I would have to be so changed that—. Oh, Torvald, I don't believe any longer in wonderful things happening.

HELMER. But I will believe in it. Tell me? So changed that—?

NORA. That our life together would be a real wedlock. Good-bye. [She goes out through the hall.]

HELMER [sinks down on a chair at the door and buries his face in his hands]. Nora! Nora! [Looks round, and rises.] Empty. She is gone. [A hope flashes across his mind.] The most wonderful thing of all—?

The sound of a door shutting is heard from below.

JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE

(1749–1832)

FAUST¹

A TRAGEDY

FAUST. All that philosophy can teach,
The craft of lawyer and of leech,
I've mastered, ah! and sweated through Theology's dreary deserts, too;

¹Translated by Sir Theodore Martin.

Yet here, poor fool! for all my lore,
I stand no wiser than before.
They call me magister, save the mark!
Doctor, withal! and these ten years I Have been leading my pupils a dance in the dark,
Up hill, down dale, through wet and through dry—

And yet, that nothing can ever be
 By mortals known, too well I see!
 This is burning the heart clean out of me.
 More brains have I than all the tribe
 Of doctor, magister, parson, and scribe. 15
 From doubts and scruples my soul is free;
 Nor hell nor devil has terrors for me:
 But just for this I am dispossessed
 Of all that gives pleasure to life and zest.
 I can't even juggle myself to own 20
 There is any one thing to be truly known,
 Or ought to be taught in science or arts,
 To better mankind and to turn their hearts.
 Besides, I have neither land nor pence,
 Nor worldly honour nor influence. 25
 A dog in my case would scorn to live!

So myself to magic I've vowed to give,
 And see, if through spirit's might and tongue
 The heart from some mysteries cannot be wrung;
 If I cannot escape from the bitter woe 30
 Of babbling of things that I do not know,
 And get to the root of those secret powers
 Which hold together this world of ours,
 The sources and centres of force explore,
 And chaffer and dabble in words no more. 35

Oh, broad bright moon, if this might be
 The last of the nights of agony,
 The countless midnights, these weary eyes
 Have from this desk here watched thee rise!
 Then, sad-eyed friend, thy wistful looks 40
 Shone in upon me o'er paper and books;
 But oh! might I wander, in thy dear light,
 O'er the trackless slopes of some mountain
 height,
 Round mountain caverns with spirits sail,
 Or float o'er the meads in thy hazes pale; 45
 And, freed from the fumes of a fruitless lore,
 Bathe in thy dews, and be whole once more!

Ah me! am I penned in this dungeon still?
 Accursed doghole, clammy and chill! 49
 Where heaven's own blessed light must pass,
 Shorn of its rays, through the painted glass,
 Narrowed and cumbered by piles of books,
 That are gnawed by worms and grimed with
 dust,
 And which, with its smoke-stained paper looks
 Swathed to the roof in a dingy rust; 55
 Stuck round with phials, and chests untold,
 With instruments littered, and lumbered with old,

Crazy, ancestral household ware—
 This is your world! A world most rare!

And yet can you wonder why your soul 60
 Is numbed within your breast, and why
 A dead, dull anguish makes your whole
 Life's pulses falter, and ebb, and die?
 How should it be but so? Instead
 Of the living nature, whereinto 65
 God has created man, things dead
 And drear alone, encompass you—
 Smoke, litter, dust, the skeletons
 Of birds and beasts, and dead men's bones!

Up, up! Away to the champaign free! 70
 And this mysterious volume, writ
 By Nostradamus' self, is it
 Not guide and counsel enough for thee?
 Then wilt thou learn by what control
 The stars within their orbits roll, 75
 And if thou wilt let boon Nature be
 The guide and monitress to thee,
 Thy soul shall expand with tenfold force,
 As spirit with spirit holds discourse.
 Dull poring, think not, that can here 80
 Expound these holy signs to thee!
 Ye spirits, ye are hovering near,
 If ye can hear me, answer me!
Throws open the book, and discovers the sign of the Macrocosm.

Ha! as it meets my gaze, what rapture, gush-
 ing
 Through all my senses, mounts into my brain! 85
 Youth's ecstasy divine, I feel it rushing,
 Like quickening fire, through every nerve and vein!
 Was it a god who chronicled these signs,
 Which all the war within me still,
 The aching heart with sweetness fill, 90
 And to mine eyes, in clearest lines,
 Unveil all Nature's powers as with a mystic thrill?

Am I a god? All grows so bright.
 In these pure outlines I behold
 Nature at work before my soul unrolled. 95
 Now can I read the sage's saw aright:
 "Not barred to man the world of spirits is;
 Thy sense is shut, thy heart is dead!
 Up, student, lave,—nor dread the bliss,—
 Thy earthly breast in the morning-red!"

Gazes intently at the sign.

Into one whole how all the things blend,
 One in the other working, living!

What powers celestial, lo! ascend, descend,
Each unto each the golden pitchers giving!
And, wafting blessings from their wings, 105
From heaven through farthest earth career,
While through the universal sphere
One universal concord rings!

Oh, what a show! yet but a show! Ah me!
Where, countless Nature, shall I clutch at
thee? 110

Ye breasts, where are ye? Ye perennial springs

Of life, whereon hang heaven and earth,
Whereto the blighted bosom clings,
Ye gush, ye slake all thirst, yet I pine on in dearth!

Turns the leaves of the book angrily, and sees the sign of the Earth Spirit.

How differently I feel before this sign! 115

Earth Spirit, thou to me art nearer;

My faculties grow loftier, clearer,

Even now I glow as with new wine.

Courage I feel, into the world to roam,

To bid earth's joy and sorrows hail, 120

'Mid storm and struggle to make my home,

And in the crash of shipwreck not to quail.

Clouds gather o'er my head;

The moon conceals her light,

The lamp's gone out. The air 125

Grows thick and close! Red flashes play Around me. From the vaulted roof

A shuddering horror creeps

And on me lays its gripe!

Spirit by me invoked, I feel 130

Thou'rt hovering near,—thou art, thou art!

Unveil thyself!

Ha! What a tugging at my heart!

Stirred through their depths, my senses reel

With passions new and strange! I feel 135

My heart is thine, thine wholly! Hear!

Thou must! ay, though it cost my life, thou must appear!

Seizes the book, and utters the sign of the Spirit mysteriously. A red light flashes, in which the Spirit appears.

SPIRIT. Who calls on me?

FAUST [turning away]. Dread vision gaunt!

SPIRIT. By potent art thou'st dragged me here;

Thou'st long been sucking at my sphere, 140

And now—

FAUST. I loathe thee. Hence, avault!

SPIRIT. To view me were thy prayer and

choice,

To see my face, to hear my voice.
Well! by thy potent prayer won o'er,
I come. And thou, that wouldst be more 145
Than mortal, having thy behest,
Art with a craven fear possessed!
Where is thy pride of soul? Where now the breast

Which in itself a universe created,
Sustained and fostered,—which dilated 150
With giant throes of rapture, in the hope
As peer with spirits such as me to cope?

Where art thou, Faust, whose summons rang so wide,

Is this thing thou? This, my mere breath doth make

Through every nerve and fibre quake? 155
A crawling, cowering, timorous worm?

FAUST. Thou film of flame, art thou a thing to fear?

I am, I am that Faust! I am thy peer!

SPIRIT. In the currents of Life, in Action's
storm,

I wander and I wave; 160

Everywhere I be!

Birth and the grave,

An infinite sea,

A web ever growing,

A life ever glowing; 165

Thus at Time's whizzing loom I spin,

And weave the living vesture that God is mantled in!

FAUST. Thou busy Spirit, who dost sweep

From sphere to sphere, from deep to deep,

Ranging the world from end to end, 170

How near akin I feel to thee!

SPIRIT. Thou'rt like the Spirit, thou dost comprehend,

But not like me! Vanishes.

FAUST. O happy he who still can hope

Out of this sea of error to arise! 175

We long to use what lies beyond our scope,

Yet cannot use even what within it lies.

But let us not, by saddening thoughts like
these,

The blessing of this happy hour o'errun.

See, how they gleam, the green-girt cottages,

Fired by the radiance of the evening sun! 181

It slopes, it sets. Day wanes. On with a

bound

It speeds, and lo! a new world is alive!

O God, for wings to lift me from the ground,

Onward, still onward, after it to strive! 185
Beneath me, I should see, as on I pressed,
The hushed world ever bathed in evening's beams,

Each mountain-top on fire, each vale at rest,
The silver brook flow into golden streams.
Nor peak nor mountain-chasm should then
defeat 190

My onward course, so godlike and so free.
Lo, with its bays all winking in the heat,
Bursts on my wonder-smitten eyes the sea!
But now the god appears about to sink!
Fresh impulse stirs me, not to be confined. 195
I hurry on, his deathless light to drink,
The day before me, and the night behind,
The heavens above me, and the waves below.
A lovely dream! Meanwhile, the sun his face
Has hid. Ah, with the spirit's wing will no
Corporeal wings so readily keep pace! 201
Yet is the yearning with us all inborn,
Upwards and onwards to be struggling still,
When over us we hear the lark, at morn,
Lost in the sky, her quivering carol trill; 205
When o'er the mountains' pine-clad summits
drear

The eagle wheels afar on outstretched wing,
When over flat and over mere
The crane is homewards labouring.

WAGNER. I too have often had my whims and moods, 210

But never was by such an impulse stirred.
A man soon looks his fill at fields and woods;
The wings I ne'er shall envy of a bird.
How differently the spirit's pure delights Waft us from book to book, from page to page! 215

They give a beauty to the winter's nights,
A cheerful glow that can its chill assuage.
And some fine manuscript when you unroll,
Ah, then all heaven descends into your soul!

FAUST. One only aspiration thou hast
known, 220

Oh, never seek to know the other, never!
Two souls, alas! within my bosom throne,
That each from other fiercely longs to sever.
One, with a passionate love that never tires, Cleaves as with cramps of steel to things of
earth, 225

The other upwards through earth's mists aspires

To kindred regions of a loftier worth.

Oh, in the air if spirits be,

That float 'twixt earth and heaven, and lord
it there,

Then from your golden haze descend, and me
Far hence to fields of new existence bear! 231
Yes, if a magic mantle were but mine,
To stranger lands to waft me at my call,
I'd prize it more than robes of costliest shine,
I would not change it for a monarch's pall

MEPHISTOPHELES. These my tiny spirits
be. 236

Hark, with what sagacity
They advise thee to pursue Action, pleasure ever new!
Out into the world so fair 240
They would lure and lead thee hence,
From this lonely chamber, where Stagnate life and soul and sense.

No longer trifle with the wretchedness,
That, like a vulture, gnaws your life away!
The worst society will teach you this, 246
You are a man 'mongst men, and feel as
they.

Yet 'tis not meant, I pray you, see,
To thrust you 'mong the rabble rout;—
I'm done of your great folks, no doubt, 250
But if, in fellowship with me,
To range through life you are content,
I will most cheerfully consent
To be your own upon the spot.
I am your chum. You'd rather not? 255
Well! If your scruples it will save,
I am your servant, yea, your slave!

FAUST. And in return what must I do for
you?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Oh, time enough to talk of that!

FAUST. Nay, nay!

The devil's selfish—is and was always— 260
And is not like for mere God's sake to do
A liberal turn to any child of clay.
Out with the terms, and plainly! Such as
thou

Are dangerous servants in a house, I trow.

MEPHISTOPHELES. I bind myself to serve you here,—to do 265

Your bidding promptly, whatsoe'er it be,
And, when we come together yonder, you
Are then to do the same for me.

FAUST. I prize that yonder at a rush!
Only this world to atoms crush, 270
And then that other may arise!
From earth my every pleasure flows,
Yon Sun looks down upon my woes;
Let me but part myself from those.

Then come what may, in any guise! 275
To idle prate I'll close mine ears,
If we hereafter hate or love,
Or if there be in yonder spheres,
As here, an Under and Above!

MEPHISTOPHELES. You're in the proper mood to venture! Bind 280 Yourself, and pleasure in my sleights you'll find,

While this life lasts. I'll give you more
Than eye of man hath ever seen before.

FAUST. What wilt thou give, thou sorry devil? When

Were the aspiring souls of men 285
Fathomed by such a thing as thee?
Oh, thou hast food that satisfieth never,
Gold, ruddy gold thou hast, that restlessly Slips, like quicksilver, through the hand for ever;

A game, where we must losers be; 290
A girl, that, on my very breast,
My neighbour woos with smile and wink;
Fame's rapturous flash of godlike zest,
That, meteor-like, is doomed to sink.
Show me the fruit that, ere 'tis plucked, doth rot, 295

And trees that every day grow green anew!
MESPHISTOPHELES. Such task as this affrights me not.

I have such treasures at command for you.
But, my good friend, the time draws nigh
When we may banquet on the best in peace!

FAUST. If e'er at peace on sluggard's couch I lie, 301

Then may my life upon the instant cease!
Cheat thou me ever by thy glozing wile,
So that I cease to scorn myself, or e'er
My senses with a perfect joy beguile, 305
Then be that day my last! I offer fair,
How say'st thou?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Done!

FAUST. My hand upon it! There!
If to the passing moment e'er I say,
"Oh, linger yet, thou art so fair!"
Then cast me into chains you may, 310
Then will I die without a care!
Then may the death-bell sound its call,
Then art thou from thy service free,
The clock may stand, the index fall,
And time and tide may cease for me! 315

MEPHISTOPHELES. Think well; we sha'n't forget the terms you name.

FAUST. Your perfect right I must allow.
Not rashly to the pact I came.

I am a slave as I am now;
Yours or another's, 'tis to me the same! 320

MEPHISTOPHELES. Then at the Doctors' feast this very day

Will I my post, as your attendant take.

Just one thing more! To guard against mistake,

Oblige me with a line or two, I pray.

FAUST. Pedant, must thou have writing,
too? 325

Hast thou no true man, or man's promise,
known?

Is not my word of mouth enough for you,
To pledge my days for all eternity?

Does not the universe go raving on,

In all its ever-eddying currents, free 330

To pass from change to change and I alone,
Shall a mere promise curb or fetter me?

Yet doth man's heart so hug the dear deceit,
Who would its hold without a pang undo?

Blest he, whose soul is with pure truth replete, 335

No sacrifice shall ever make him rue.

But, oh, your stamped and scribbled parchment sheet

A spectre is, which all men shrink to view.

The word dies ere it quits the pen,

And wax and sheepskin lord it then. 340

What would you have, spirit of ill!

Brass, marble, parchment, paper?—Say,

Am I to write with pen, or style, or graver?

I care not—choose whiche'er you will.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Why, throw your eloquence away, 345

Or give it such a very pungent savour?

Pshaw! Any scrap will do—'tis quite the same—

With the least drop of blood just sign your name.

FAUST. If that will make you happy,
why, a claim

So very whimsical I'll freely favour. 350

MEPHISTOPHELES. Blood is a juice of quite peculiar kind.

FAUST. Fear not that I the compact will evade!

My life's whole struggle, heart and mind,

Chimes with the promise I have made. 354

Too high I've soared—too proudly dreamt,
I'm only peer for such as thee;

The Mighty Spirit spurns me with contempt,
And Nature veils her face from me.

Thought's chain is snap;—for many a day
I've loathed all knowledge every way. 360

So quench we now our passion's fires
 In sense and sensual delights,
 Unveil all hidden magic sleights,
 To minister to our desires!
 Let us plunge in the torrent of time, and range 365
 Through the weltering chaos of chance and
 change,
 Then pleasure and pain, disaster and gain,
 May course one another adown my brain.
 Change and excitement may work as they
 can,
 Rest there is none for the spirit of man. 370

FOREST AND CAVERN

FAUST [alone]. Majestic spirit, thou hast given me all
 For which I prayed. Thou not in vain didst
 turn
 Thy countenance to me in fire and flame.
 Thou glorious Nature for my realm hast
 given, 4
 With power to feel, and to enjoy her. Thou
 No mere cold glance of wonder hast vouch-
 safed,
 But lett'st me peer deep down into her
 breast,
 Even as into the bosom of a friend.
 Before me thou in long procession lead'st 9
 All things that live, and teachest me to know
 My kindred in still grove, in air, and stream.
 And, when the storm sweeps roaring through the woods,
 Upwrenching by the roots the giant pines,
 Whose neighbouring trunks, and inter-tangled boughs,
 In crashing ruin tear each other down, 15
 And shake with roar of thunder all the hills,
 Then dost thou guide me to some sheltering
 cave,
 There show'st me to myself, and mine own
 soul
 Teems marvels forth I weened not of before.
 And when the pure moon, with her mellowing light, 20
 Mounts as I gaze, then from the rocky walls,
 And out from the dank underwood, ascend
 Forms silvery-clad of ages long ago,
 And soften the austere delight of thought.

Oh, now I feel no perfect boon is e'er 25
 Achieved by man. With this ecstatic power,
 Which brings me hourly nearer to the gods,

A yokemate thou hast given me, whom even
 now
 I can no more dispense with, though his cold
 Insulting scorn degrades me to myself, 30
 And turns my gifts to nothing with a breath.
 Within my breast he fans unceasingly
 A raging fire for that bewitching form.
 So to fruition from desire I reel,
 And 'midst fruition languish for desire. 35

MARGARET'S ROOM

MARGARET [at her spinning-wheel, alone].
 My peace is gone,
 My heart is sore;
 'Tis gone for ever
 And evermore.

Where he is not, 5
 Is the grave to me,
 The whole world's changed,
 Ah, bitterly.

I sit and I ponder
 One only thought, 10
 My senses wander,
 My brain's distraught

My peace is gone,
 My heart is sore;
 'Tis gone for ever 15
 And evermore.

From my window to greet him
 I gaze all day,
 I stir out, if meet him
 I only may. 20

His noble form,
 His bearing high,
 His mouth's sweet smile,
 His mastering eye;

And the magic flow 25
 Of his talk, the bliss
 In the clasp of his hand,
 And oh! his kiss!

My peace is gone,
 My heart is sore;
 'Tis gone for ever 30
 And evermore.

For him doth my bosom
 Cry out and pine;
 Oh, if I might clasp him, 35
 And keep him mine!

And kiss him, kiss him.
 As fain would I,
 I'd faint on his kisses,
 Yes, faint and die! 40

MARTHA'S GARDEN

MARGARET, FAUST.

MARGARET. Promise me, Henry!

FAUST. What I can, I will.

MARGARET. How do you stand about religion, say?

You are a thoroughly good man, but still I fear you don't think much about it any-
 way.

FAUST. Hush, hush, my child! You feel I love you,—good! 5

For those I love could lay down life, and would.

No man would I of creed or church bereave.

MARGARET. That is not right, we must ourselves believe.

FAUST. Must we?

MARGARET. Ah! could I but persuade you, dear!

You do not even the sacraments revere. 10

FAUST. Revere I do.

MARGARET. But seek them not, alas!

For long you've never gone to shrift or mass.

Do you believe in God?

FAUST. Love, who dare say

I do believe in God? You may

Ask priest or sage, and their reply 15

Will only seem to mystify,

And mock you.

MARGARET. Then you don't believe?

FAUST. My meaning, darling, do not misconceive.

Him who dare name?

Or who proclaim, 20

Him I believe?

Who feel,

Yet steel

Himself to say, Him I do not believe?

The All-Embracer, 25

The All-Sustainer.

Embraces and sustains He not

Thee, me, Himself?

Rears not the heaven its arch above? 29

Doth not the firm-set earth beneath us lie?
 And with the tender gaze of love
 Climb not the everlasting stars on high?
 Do I not gaze upon thee, eye to eye?
 And all the world of sight and sense and
 sound,

Bears it not in upon thy heart and brain, 35
 And mystically weave around
 Thy being influences that never wane?
 Fill thy heart thence even unto overflowing,
 And when with thrill ecstatic thou art glow-
 ing,

Then call it whatsoe'er thou wilt, 40

Bliss! Heart! Love! God!

Name for it have I none!

Feeling is all in all;

Name is but sound and smoke,

Shrouding heaven's golden glow! 45

MARGARET. All this is beautiful and good; just so

The priest, too, speaks to us at times,

In words, though, somewhat different.

FAUST. So speak the hearts of all men in all climes,

O'er which the blessed sky is bent, 50

On which the blessed light of heaven doth
 shine.

Then why not I in mine?

MARGARET. To hear you speak, it looks not much amiss,

But still there's something, love, about it
 wrong;

For Christian you are not, I see. 55

FAUST. Dear child!

MARGARET. My heart has ached for
 long,

To see you in such company.

FAUST. How so?

MARGARET. The man that is your mate
 Wakes in my inmost soul the deepest hate.

In all my life not anything 60

Has given my heart so sharp a sting

As that man's loathsome visage grim.

FAUST. Nay, dearest, have no fear of
 him.

MARGARET. His presence makes my blood congeal.

Kindly to all men else I feel; 65

But howsoe'er for you I long,

From that man with strange dread I shrink;

That he's a knave I needs must think.

God pardon me, if I do him wrong!

FAUST. Such odd fish there must always
 be. 70

MARGARET. I would not live with such as he.

Whenever he comes, he's sure to peer
In at the door with such a sneer,
Half angry-like with me. 74
That he in no one thing takes part, is clear;
On his brow 'tis written, as on a scroll,
That he can love no human soul.
I feel so happy within thy arms,
So free, so glowing, so fearless of harms,
But in his presence my heart shuts to. 80

FAUST. You sweet, foreboding angel,
you!

SCENE III

A Dungeon. FAUST with a bundle of keys, before a small iron door.

FAUST. I quake with a strange dread.
The woe of all

Mankind possesses me. This is her cell!
Here does she lie behind this cold dank wall,
And all her crime was having loved too well.
Why do I hang back thus? Is't fear 5
To think how I again shall see her?

Onward! Each moment's pause brings nearer her death-knell.

Opening the lock. A voice is heard within singing.

My mother, the wanton,
She took my life.
My father, the rogue, 10
Ate me up with his knife!
My wee little sister,
She picked up my bones,
And laid them to cool
All under the stones. 15
Then I turned to a woodbird,
So bonnie to see!
Fly away, fly away
To the woodland with me!

FAUST [opens the door]. She little dreams that her beloved is near, 20
The rattling chains, the rustling straw can hear.

He enters.

MARGARET [hiding her face on her pallet].
They come! Oh, bitter death! Oh, woe is me!

FAUST [softly]. Hush! hush! I come to set thee free!

MARGARET [throwing herself at his feet]. If thou be'st human, feel for my distress!

FAUST. Thou'lt wake the sentinels! These cries repress. 25

Takes hold of her fetters to unlock them.

MARGARET [on her knees]. Who, hangman, who has given you right
To treat me thus—or who could give?
You fetch me, while 'tis yet midnight.
Oh, pity me, and let me live!
Is daybreak to-morrow not soon enough?
[Rises.] 30

Oh, I am still so young, so young,
And yet must die!
Fair, too, they told me, once was I,
And that was my undoing. He was nigh,
My own dear love, in those sweet hours. 35
But now he's far away from me.
My wreath is torn, and scattered are its flowers.

Seize me not with a grasp so rough!
Spare me, what have I ever done to thee?
Oh, let me not in vain implore! 40
I never saw thee all my days before.

FAUST. Can I survive this miserable
hour?

MARGARET. Now I am wholly in your
power,

To do with me whatever you think best 44
But to the babe first let me give the breast!
All through the night I coaxed and stilled it;
They took it from me to vex my brain,
And now they say, I would have killed it,
And never shall I be blithe again.
The people, they sing songs about me, 50
To sting me, and flout me.

Ah! they mean me unkindly by it;
An old tale ends so. Who bade them apply
it?

FAUST [flings himself on the ground]. The lover here lies prostrate at thy feet,
To rend these miserable bonds, my sweet! 55

MARGARET [throws herself by his side]. Oh, let us kneel to call upon the saints!
Look! Look! Under the stair!

Under the door there,
The fires of hell,
They seethe, and they roar there! 60
The fiend within,
Furious and fell,
Is making a din!

FAUST. Margaret! Margaret!

MARGARET [listening]. That was my loved one's voice! 65

She springs up—her fetters fall off.
Where is he? Where? I heard him call.

I'm free! I'm free! Let no one try
To stay me! On his neck I'll fall,
Upon his bosom lie!
He called on Margaret! stood there at the door 70

Through all hell's howling and its roar,
Through devilish scoff, and gibe, and groan,
I recognised the sweet, the loving tone!

FAUST. 'Tis I!

MARGARET. Thou, thou! Oh, say it once again!

Clasping him.

'Tis he, 'tis he! Where now are all my pains? 75

The anguish of the dungeon? Of the chains?

'Tis thou! Thou com'st to rescue me! Oh,
then,

Then I am saved. Oh, now again

Along the street I wander free,

Where first I met with thee; 80

Am in the cheerful garden, by the gate,

Where for thee I and Martha wait.

FAUST [trying to force her away]. Come with me! Come!

MARGARET. Oh, stay!

I like so much to stay, love, where thou stay'st.

FAUST. Quick, quick, away! 85

Of, if thou wilt not haste,

We shall rue dearly the delay!

MARGARET. How's this?

Thou canst no longer kiss?

Parted from me so short a time, and yet 90

Thou couldst the way to kiss forget?

Why do I grow so sad upon thy bosom now,

When from thy words, thy looks, in other days

A whole heaven flooded me, and thou

Didst kiss, as thou wouldst stifle me, always? 95

Kiss me, or I'll kiss thee!

Oh, woe is me!

Thy lips are cold, they chill me through.

How! not one word! Where hast thou left

Thy love? Oh, who 100

Has thy poor Margaret of that bereft?

Turns away from him.

FAUST. Come, follow me! Take courage,
oh, my sweet!

I'll clasp thee to my heart, when this is o'er,

A thousand times more fondly than before,

So thou'lt but follow me. Hence, I entreat!

MARGARET [turning to him]. And is it thou, then, thou? And is this true? 106

FAUST. Oh, yes! Come! Come!

MARGARET. My chains thou wilt undo,
Take me again into thy breast!—So, so!
How comes it that thou shrinkest not from
me?

Oh, my sweet love, dost thou, then, know 110
Whom thou art setting free?

FAUST. Come! Come! The night's already on the wane!

MARGARET. My mother I have slain,
And drowned my child! To thee
The little one was given, and me; 115
To thee, love, too! 'Tis thou! Oh, can it
be?

Give me thy hand! Yes! Yes! these are no dreams,—

Thine own dear hand. But, woe is me!
'tis wet!

How! dripping, dripping yet?

How it doth run! 120

Oh, wipe it off! Meseems,

There's blood upon 't! Ah, God! what hast thou done?

Put up thy sword! Oh, sheathe it, I implore!

FAUST. Let what is past be past! I can
no more.

Each word thou speak'st is death to me. 125

MARGARET. No, I must go, but thou must stay.

I will describe the graves to thee:

To-morrow thou to them must see

By break of day.

For mother the best place provide. 130

Then to her lay my brother nearest;

Me a little to one side,

But not too far off, dearest!

And the little one on my breast to the right!

No one else shall lie by me. 135

Ah, love, to nestle up to thee,

It was a sweet, a dear delight!

But that I never again shall know.

I have a feeling as if I must 139

Hang, cling to thee, and thou didst thrust

Me back—back—back! Yet, wherefore so?

Thou art, thou lookest, so good, so kind!

FAUST. If such thou feel'st I am, come, come, love!

MARGARET. Where?
Out yonder?

FAUST. Out to the open air!

MARGARET. If the grave is there, 145

If death is waiting, come! 'Tis best.

From here into the bed of everlasting rest,

And not a step beyond! Ah, me!

Thou'rt going? Henry, if I might with thee!

FAUST. Thou canst! Decide! See, open stands the door! 150

MARGARET. I dare not go. For me all hope is o'er.

What boots to fly? Beset with spies am I.

It is so hard to have to beg your way,

And with an evil conscience harder still;

It is so hard in a strange land to stray, 155

And they will catch me, do whate'er I will.

FAUST. Then I remain with thee!

MARGARET. Fly, fly!

Thy child will die!

Save it! oh, save it! 160

Away! away!

Keep to the path,

Up by the brook,

And into the wood beyond!

Strike to the left 165

By the plank in the pond!

Quick! Seize it, seize it!

It tries to rise!

It is struggling yet.

Help! Help! 170

FAUST. Be calm! be still!

Only one step, and thou art free.

MARGARET. Oh, were we only past the hill!

There sits my mother upon a stone;
My temples throb with an icy dread. 175

There sits my mother upon a stone,

And to and fro she waves her head:

Her eyes are set, she makes no moan,

Her hand is heavy as lead.

She slept so long, no more she'll wake; 180

She slept, that we our delight, might take.

That was a happy time!

FAUST. Thou'rt deaf to all remonstrance,
prayer,

And I perforce must bear thee hence.

MARGARET. Unhand me! Cruel one,
forbear! 185

I will endure no violence.

Lay not this murderous grasp on me.

Time was, I gave up all to pleasure thee!

FAUST. The day is breaking! Darling!
Darling!

MARGARET. Ay!

The day, indeed! The last day draweth
nigh. 190

It should have been my wedding-day. Let no one know

That thou hast been with Margaret before.

Woe to my garland, woe!

Already all is o'er.

Love, we shall meet once more, 195

But not in the dance, ah, no!

The multitude, they come!

So hushed, you cannot hear the hum.

The lanes, the streets, the square,

Scarce hold the thousand there. 200

The bell! Hark to its boom!

The staff of doom

Is broken. How they bind me, blind me!

Now to the seat of blood they drag me off;

And every neck doth feel 205

The quiver of the steel,

That's quivering for mine!

Now lies the world all silent as the grave.

FAUST. Oh, that I never had been born!

MEPHISTOPHELES [appears at the door].
Away!

Away! Or you are lost for ever! 210

Truce to this waiting and prating, this boot-less delay!

My horses shiver!

The morning is dawning gray!

MARGARET. What's that, sprang from the ground? I know its face!

Send him away! 'tis he! 'tis he! 215

What should he do in a holy place?

He comes for me.

FAUST. Thou shalt—must live!

MARGARET. Judgment of God!

Myself unto Thy mercy I resign! 220

MEPHISTOPHELES [to FAUST]. Come!

Come! How's this? You will not stir!

I'll leave you in the lurch with her.

MARGARET. Thine am I, Father, thine!

Save me! Ye angels! Ministers of light

Compass me round with your protecting
might! 225

Henry, I shudder as I think of thee.

MEPHISTOPHELES. She's judged.

VOICE [from above]. She's saved.

MEPHISTOPHELES [to FAUST]. Away with
me!

Disappears with FAUST.

VOICE [from within, dying away]. Henry!
Henry!

From PART II

THE DEATH OF FAUST

MEPHISTOPHELES [as overseer, leading the way]. This way, this way! Come in,
you

Lemures, stumbling, hobbled,—
 Abortions, out of sinew,
 Bone, and tendon cobbled!
 LEMURES [in chorus]. Here we are at your command! 5

We've half heard why we came—it
 Is all about a stretch of land,
 And we are to reclaim it.
 Sharp-pointed stakes, long chains withal,
 To measure with, we've brought in. 10
 On us why you were pleased to call—
 That we have clean forgotten.

MEPHISTOPHELES. The work here needs
 no artist-touches nice;
 To measure from yourselves will quite
 suffice. 14
 Let him that's tallest lie upon the ground,
 And then you others pile the turf all round.
 As for our sires they did, prepare
 A sunken pit oblong and square.
 Out of the palace to the narrow home—
 Such is the sorry end to which they all must
 come. 20

LEMURES [digging with elvish gestures]. In youth when I did live, did love,
 Methought 'twas very sweet;
 Where mirth was free, and jollity,
 That place for me was meet.
 But age with stealing steps 25
 Hath clawed me with his crutch.
 A grave, its door I stumbled o'er;
 Why leave they open such?

FAUST [comes out of the palace, groping by the doorposts]. The clink of spades!
 What rapture in the sound! 29
 Hark! multitudes at work to do my bidding,
 The soil of what disturbs it ridding,
 Imposing on the waves a bound,
 And drawing a strong curb the sea around!

MEPHISTOPHELES [aside]. Yet all your labour's spent for us alone.
 With your fine dams and bulwarks vast, 35
 You're but preparing a superb repast
 For Neptune, the sea-fiend, to feast upon.
 You're trumped and done for every way,
 Into our hands the elements play,
 Destruction onward is striding fast. 40

FAUST. Inspector!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Here!

FAUST. Howe'er, where'er you may,
 Get labourers, heaps on heaps. Excite
 By threats, cajoling, extra pay,
 And extra cheer, to work with all their
 might.

Each day I'd have the tidings brought me,
 how 45
 The trench is getting on, they're digging
 now.

MEPHISTOPHELES [half aloud]. Their talk to me, it is as if they gave,
 Not tidings of a trench, but of—a grave.

FAUST. The marsh, that spread hence to the mountain's base,
 Empoisons all the land already gained; 50
 But drain the noisome swamp off from the
 place,
 My last, my highest aim were then attained.
 Though not quite safe, still there would be broad lands,

Free for the tillage of a million hands! 54
 Fields green and fertile; men and cattle both
 Would to the virgin soil draw, nothing loath, Hedging themselves betimes by dike and
 mound,

Which their bold busy hands will pile around.
 Within, a very paradise; outside,
 Howe'er may rage the angry baffled tide, 60
 Striving to sap, to force an entrance, each
 And all rush swiftly to close up the breach.
 Yes! This one thought absorbs me wholly
 —rife

With wisdom's final lesson, and most true;
 He only merits freedom, merits life, 65
 Who daily has to conquer them anew.
 So, girt by danger, shall youth, manhood,
 age,

Pass kindly here their busy pilgrimage.
 Such swarming multitudes I fain would see,
 Free people standing on a soil as free; 70
 Then to the passing moment might I say,
 "Oh, linger yet, thou art so fair!

So may the traces of my earthly day
 Not with the ages fade away in air!"
 In the foretaste of such high bliss, I seem 75
 Even now to enjoy that moment all supreme.
 FAUST sinks back; the LEMURES seize him and lay him upon the ground.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Him does no pleasure sate, nor gain content!
 From change to change his fancy ever went.
 The last vile empty moment fain
 Would he, poor creature, as it flies, retain. 80
 He, who defied me with so high a hand,
 Time masters him—there lies he on the sand.
 The clock stands still—

CHORUS. Stands still! Hushed as mid-
 night.

The index falls.

MEPHISTOPHELES. It falls; 'tis finished quite!

CHORUS. 'Tis past!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Pshaw! Past? A stupid phrase! Why past? . 85
Past and pure nothingness are one at last!

What boots this evermore creating, when Things all sweep into nothingness again?
"There! Now 'tis past!" From this what can we glean?

'Tis all the same as though it ne'er had been; 90

Yet round and round it goes, as though it were.

Eternal Void I, for my part, prefer.

THE SALVATION OF FAUST

ANGELS [hovering in the higher sphere, bearing the immortal part of FAUST]. Rescued from the Evil One

Is our brother's soul here;
Who hath nobly wrestled, run,
Him can we enroll here.
And if 'twas love divine's behest 5
That sin should not defeat him,
Then will the spirits of the blest
With cordial welcome greet him.

THE YOUNGER ANGELS. Roses that from hands were sent,

Loving—holy—penitent, 10
Helped us to inflict defeat,
And our lofty task complete,
Rescuing this precious soul
From the Evil One's control.

As we strewed them on their head, 15
Demons shrank and devils fled.
Not the wonted pangs of hell,
But love's anguish on them fell.
Even the Arch-Fiend with pain
Quivered, pierced through every vein. 20
Shout aloud through all the sky!
We have triumphed! Victory!

THE MORE ADVANCED ANGELS. Alas!
still with earthly taint

Is he encumbered,
Not yet with the pure, a saint, 25
May he be numbered.
When spirit-force strong
Hath the earthly attracted.
And this with itself has Inwoven and compacted, 30
No angels can part what

Is twofold, yet one,
By Love Everlasting
This alone may be done.

THE YOUNGER ANGELS. Round yonder peak on high, 35

Mist-like and trailing,
Spirits of good I spy
Hitherward sailing.
Now clears the cloud away;

I see a bright array 40
Circling and soaring,

Boys, blessed boys they be,
Set from earth's burden free,

Rapt and adoring;
Drinking in quickened life 45
From all the beauty rife,

Fresh to their gaze unfurled,
Here in the upper world.

Let him, where they begin
Perfected bliss to win, 50
Be mated with them!

THE BLESSED BOYS. Him we are fain to Receive as a chrysalis;

Thus we attain to
The pledge of angelic bliss. 55
Loosen the films of earth

He is still heir to;
E'en now in his second birth
He is great,—fair too!

DOCTOR MARIANUS [in the highest, purest cell]. Here the outlook is free, 60

The spirit aspiring!
Women I yonder see
Floating up, quiring.

Midmost, in wondrous sheen,
Star-crowned and beaming, 65
Lo! there is Heaven's queen,

Gloriously gleaming! [Enraptured.]
Ruler of sky and earth below,

In Thy azure vaulted,
Unto me vouchsafe to show 70
Thy mystery exalted!

Bless all that in man's heart hath fired
Emotions gentler, dearer,

And, with a saintly love inspired,
To Thee still draws it nearer! 75
If Thy behests inspire our will;

What then may daunt or curb it?
But if Thou biddest us be still,
Our calm, what may disturb it?

Virgin pure from spot or taint, 80
Mother, holy, tender,

Queen, elect of us, and saint,
Throned with God in splendour!

Light cloudlets free
 Around her bent; 85
 Women they be,
 That have sinned and repent—
 Sinned in their weakness
 Of nature too tender,
 Now in all meekness 90
 Kneeling to render Lowly contrition,
 Imploring remission
 Of sins from her grace.
 To thee, whom passion could not touch, 95
 Still, still it hath been granted,
 That those who fall, through loving much,
 May come with trust undaunted.
 'Tis hard from ruin to defend
 Them, so their weakness blindeth; 100
 And who by his own strength may rend
 The fetters passion bindeth!
 How on smooth slippery slope the feet
 Slide swift to their undoing!
 Whom fool not words and glances sweet, 105
 And flattery's subtle wooing?

MATER GLORIOSA comes floating forward.

CHORUS OF REPENTANT WOMEN. Upward thou'rt soaring
 To regions eternal;
 Hear our imploring,
 Thou, peerless, supernal. 110
 Thou rich to o'erflowing
 In pardoning grace!
 MAGNA PECCATRIX (St. Luke vii. 36-50).
 By the love, that bent in weeping
 O'er thy Son, divinely born,
 His feet with balmy teardrops steeping, 115
 Spite of Pharisaic scorn;
 By the box, that dropped profusely
 Ointment precious, odour fine;
 By the tresses clustering loosely,
 That did wipe the limbs divine! 120
 MULIER SAMARITANA (St. John iv. 4-42).
 By the spring, whereto in dim Far ages Abraham's flocks were led;
 By the pitcher's cooling rim,
 That touched His lips, the Saviour dread;
 By the clear, full source that now 125
 Wells out there in stream abundant,
 Through the universe to flow,
 Ever sparkling and redundant!
 MARIA AEGYPTIACA. By that hallowed spot and dear,
 Where was laid the Lord Immortal; 130

By the arm in warning clear
 Raised, that thrust me from its portal;
 By the forty years I passed,
 In deserts lone, of true repentance;
 By what on the sand at last 135
 I traced, a blessed farewell sentence!
 THE THREE. Thou, who from the greatly sinning
 Never dost avert Thy face,
 Still for their repentance winning
 An eternal resting-place, 140
 To her, who only once forgot Herself, vouchsafe Thy blessing!—
 To her, who fell, yet weeted not Wherein she was transgressing!
 UNA PENITENTUM [formerly called
 GRETCHEN]. Incline, incline, 145
 Thou peerless one, bright
 With effulgence of light,
 Unto my bliss thy glance benign!
 My early love, my lover,
 All trial, struggle over, 150
 Returns to me—is mine!
 THE BLESSED BOYS [circling round and drawing near]. Already us far above Towers he in might;
 Richly our fost'ring love
 Will be requite. 155
 From life were we brought, ere
 Its lessons could reach us;
 But he hath been taught there,
 And he will teach us.
 UNA PENITENTUM. In rapt amazement
 he is lost, 160
 While round the choir celestial shineth;
 He grows so like the heavenly host,
 That his fresh life he scarce divineth.
 Lo, every bond of earth hath he Off with its whilom vesture flung, 165
 And, in celestial panoply
 Arrayed, comes stately forth and young!
 Vouchsafe, I may his teacher be—
 Still dazzles him the unwonted light.
 MATER GLORIOSA. Come! Mount to higher spheres! and he 170
 Will follow, holding thee in sight.
 DOCTOR MARIANUS [prostrate on his face in prayer]. Touched hearts, that true repentance know,
 Gaze on those pitying eyes,
 And, ever grateful, ever grow
 More meet for Paradise! 175
 May every better thought serene

Be to thy service given!
Oh, bless us, Virgin, Mother, Queen,
Omnipotent in heaven!

CHORUS MYSTICUS. All in earth's fleeting state

180

As symbol is still meant;

Here the inadequate
Grows to fulfilment;
Here is wrought the inscrutable,
To silence that awes us;
Love eternal, immutable,
On, ever on, draws us.

COMEDY

COMEDY

COMEDY is to be distinguished from tragedy by its appeal to the intellect rather than to the feelings. Its primary purpose is to arouse laughter, to amuse and entertain by exposing the follies, vices, and incongruities of life. Naturally what excites the laughter of one age may move another to disgust, but from Aristotle down critics generally agree that the comic spirit is aroused when we perceive some departure from the normal, "some defect or ugliness which is not painful or destructive," which appeals to our intellects rather than to our sympathies. According to Horace Walpole, "The world is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel."

Comedy may be divided into social, or high, comedy, low comedy, and farce. Such intermediate steps as that of farce-comedy reveal how easily one form may shade into another. In high comedy, or the comedy of manners, the interest for the spectator lies in sharing the playwright's knowledge of the discrepancies between the hero's opinion of himself, or what he pretends to be, and the actual fact. Its purpose is frequently corrective and educational. In farce and farce-comedy the emphasis is placed on situation, or upon character which makes itself absurd. Its purpose is pure entertainment.

The Old Comedy of Athens produced one extraordinary figure, the greatest of all writers of farce-comedy, and one of the greatest names in the history of the drama. Aristophanes (448-380 B. C.), the spokesman of the conservative party in the theatre, satirized uproariously, and often obscenely, the various antics of the unruly Athenian democracy.

The Birds (414 B. C.) is a rollicking burlesque of national mythology. In his depiction of Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, or walled city of the birds, the great comic poet's exuberant imagination has free rein. Aristophanes displayed, moreover, an exquisite lyrical gift, particularly in his choruses.

The two Roman poets Plautus (245-184 B. C.) and Terence (195-159 B. C.) followed models set by the so-called New Comedy of the Greeks, all but fragments of which have been lost. In place of burlesque we find stock types—the parasite, the deceived husband, the courtesan, the rascally servant, the vainglorious soldier—providing the entertainment by the complicated intrigues in which they display themselves.

Shakespearean comedy as contrasted with the satiric social comedy of Aristophanes is purely romantic. The great poet by his sunny and sage humor and his delightful verse transformed many tales of common-place romantic intrigue into light comedies of sweetness and charm. An exquisite pastoral atmosphere pervades these plays. But there is always present in Shakespearean comedy a draught of ironic reality entering the make-believe world so delicately created by the author. As You Like It is an exquisite example of Shakespeare's comedy—with Touchstone and Jaques, each in his own way, acting as humorous critics of the absurd romantic love story.

The greatest representative in all literature of social comedy in its most perfect form is Jean Baptiste Poquelin, who called himself Molière (1622-1673). Not until a highly artificial society like that of the court of Louis XIV had come into being could such comedies be written. Molière, in his greatest plays, Tartuffe and The Misanthrope, has discarded everything unessential to his purpose of exposing the failings of men, and correcting them by ridicule and thoughtful laughter. The eternal clash between the claims of society and the individual honesty of such a character as Alceste has never been more searchingly portrayed than in The Misanthrope.

Farce-comedy is represented in this book by The Rivals by Richard Brinsley Sheridan (1751-1816) and The Importance of Being Earnest by Oscar Wilde (1836-1900): the former is selected because it is a true comedy of manners, holding up for our amusement the vanities and affectations of eighteenth century society; the latter, because of its keen satire and brilliancy of dialogue.

ARISTOPHANES (448-380 B. C.)

THE BIRDS¹

PEISTHETAIRUS, an Athenian citizen, but disgusted with his own country, starts on his travels proposing to seek his fortune in the kingdom of the Birds. He is represented as the essential man of business and ability, the true political adventurer; the man who directs everything and everybody; who is never in the wrong, never at a loss, never satisfied with what has been done by others, uniformly successful in his operations. He maintains a constant ascendancy, or if he loses it for a moment, recovers it immediately.

EUELPIDES, a simple easy-minded droll companion, his natural follower and adherent; as the Merry Andrew is of the Mountebank. It will be seen that, like the Merry Andrew, he interposes his buffoonish comments on the grand oration delivered by his master.

EPOPS, King of the Birds; formerly Tereus, King of Thrace, but long ago, according to the records of mythology, transformed into a Hoopoe. He appears as the courteous dignified sovereign of a primitive uncivilized race, whom he is desirous to improve: he gives a gracious reception to strangers arriving from a country more advanced in civilization; and adopts the projects of aggrandizement suggested to him by Peisthetairus.

THE CHORUS OF BIRDS, his subjects, retain, on the contrary, their hereditary hatred and suspicion of the human race; they are ready to break out into open mutiny against their king, and to massacre his foreign (human) advisers upon the spot. It is with the greatest difficulty that they can be prevailed upon to hear reason, and attend to the luminous exposition of Peisthetairus. His harangue has the effect of conciliating and convincing them; his projects are adopted without a dissentient voice. War is not immediately declared against the gods, but a sort of Mexican blockade is established by proclamation.

PROMETHEUS, a malcontent deity, the ancient patron of the human race, still retaining a concealed attachment to the deposed dynasty of Saturn. He comes over secretly with intelligence, which Peisthetairus avails himself of, and which proves ultimately decisive of the subjugation of the gods.

NEPTUNE
HERCULES
TRIBALLUS, or the TRIBALLIAN

} joint ambassadors from the } gods, commissioned to treat } with Peisthetairus. Neptune is represented as a formal dignified personage of the old school.
Hercules as a passionate, wrong-headed, greedy

blockhead: he is cajoled and gained over by Peisthetairus; and in his turn intimidates the Triballian, an ignorant barbarian deity, who is hardly able to speak intelligibly. They join together, Neptune is out-voted, and Peisthetairus concludes a treaty by which his highest pretensions are realized.

The characters above-mentioned are the only ones who contribute in any way to the progress of the drama; the remainder, a very amusing set of persons, are introduced in detached scenes, exemplifying the various interruptions and annoyances incident to the man of business, distracting his attention and embarrassing him in the exercise of his authoritative functions. There are, however, exceptions.

IRIS, who is brought in, having been captured and detained for an infringement of the blockade.

A Priest who comes to sacrifice at the inauguration of the new city.

Two Messengers arriving from different quarters, with very interesting and satisfactory intelligence.

The rest are a mere series of intruders on the time and attention of the great man.

Poet, a ragged vagabond, who comes begging with an inaugural ode on the foundation of the new city.

A Soothsayer, arriving with oracles relative to the same important event, and a demand of perquisites due to himself by divine authority.

METON, the Astronomer, proposes to make a plan and survey of the new city.

A Commissioner from Athens, a very authoritative personage.

A Vendor of copies of decrees: he enters, reading them aloud, like a hawker to attract purchasers.

Paricide, a young man who has beaten his father, and proposes to strangle him, offers himself as a desirable acquisition to the new colony.

KINESIAS, the dithyrambic poet, applies for a pair of wings.

Informers, a young man whose hereditary trade is that of an informer, and whose practice extends to the Islands, comes with the same application.

SCENE.—A wild desolate country with a bare open prospect on one side, and some upright rocks covered with shrubs and brushwood in the centre of the stage. PEISTHETAIRUS and EUELPIDES appear as a couple of worn-out pedestrian travellers, the one with a Raven and the other with a Jackdaw on his hand:—they appear to be seeking for a direction from the motions and signals made to them by the Birds.

¹Translation by John Hookhan Frere.

EUELPIDES [speaking to his Jackdaw].
Right on, do ye say? to the tree there in the distance?

PEISTHETAIRUS [*speaking first to his Raven,
and then to his companion*].

Plague take ye! Why, this creature calls us
back!

EU. What use can it answer tramping up and down?

We're lost, I tell ye: our journey's come to nothing.

PEIS. To think of me travelling a thousand stadia

With a Raven for my adviser!

EU. Think of me too,
Going at the instigation of a Jackdaw,
To wear my toes and my toenails to pieces!

PEIS. I don't know even the country, where we've got to.

EU. And yet you expect to find a country here,

A country for yourself!

PEIS. Truly, not I;

Not even Excestides could do it,

That finds himself a native everywhere.

EU. Oh dear! We're come to ruin, utter ruin!

PEIS. Then go that way, can't ye?—'the Road to Ruin!'

EU. He has brought us to a fine pass, that crazy fellow,

Philocrates the poulterer; he pretended

To enable us to find where Tereus lives;

The King that was, the Hoopoe that is now;

Persuading us to buy these creatures of
him,

That Raven there for three-pence, and this other,

This little Tharrelides of a Jackdaw,—

He charged a penny for: but neither of 'em
Are fit for anything but to bite and scratch.

[Speaking to his Jackdaw.]

Well, what are ye after now? gaping and pok-
ing!

You've brought us straight to the rock.

Where would you take us?

There's no road here!

PEIS. No, none, not even a path.

EU. Nor don't your Raven tell us anything?

PEIS. She's alter'd somehow—she croaks differently.

EU. But which way does she point?
What does she say?

PEIS. Say? Why, she says, she'll bite
my fingers off.

EU. Well, truly it's hard upon us, hard
indeed,

To go with our own carcasses to the crows,
And not be able to find 'em after all.

[Turning to the audience.]

For our design, most excellent spectators, 35
(Our passion, our disease, or what you will),
Is the reverse of that which Sacas feels;

For he, though not a native, strives perforce
To make himself a citizen: whilst we,

Known and acknowledged as Athenians
born,

(Not hustled off, nor otherwise compell'd),
Have deem'd it fitting to betake ourselves

To these our legs, and make our person scarce.

Not through disgust or hatred or disdain
Of our illustrious birthplace, which we deem

Glorious and free; with equal laws ordain'd
For fine and forfeiture and confiscation; 47

With taxes universally diffused;
And suits and pleas abounding in the Courts.

For grasshoppers sit only for a month 50
Chirping upon the twigs; but our Athenians
Sit chirping and discussing all the year,

Perch'd upon points of evidence and law.

Therefore we trudge upon our present travels,

With these our sacrificial implements, 55
To seek some easier unlitigious place,
Meaning to settle there and colonize.

Our present errand is in search of Tereus,
(The Hoopoe that is now) to learn from him

If in his expeditions, flights, and journeys, 60
He ever chanced to light on such a spot.

PEIS. Holloh!

EU. What's that?

PEIS. My Raven here points upwards.
—Decidedly!

EU. Aye, and here's my Jackdaw, too,
Gaping as if she saw something above.—

Yes,—I'll be bound for it; this must be the
place:

We'll make a noise, and know the truth of it.

PEIS. Then 'kick against the rock'.

EU. Knock you your head Against the rock!—and make it a double knock!

PEIS. Then fling a stone at it!

EU. With all my heart,
Holloh, there!

PEIS. What do you mean with your Holloh? 70
You should cry Hoop for a Hoopoe.
EU. Well, then, Hoop!
Hoop and holloh, there!—Hoopoe, Hoopoe,
I say!
TROCHILUS. What's here? Who's bawling
there? Who wants my master?
The door is opened, and both parties start at seeing each other.
EU. Oh mercy, mighty Apollo! what a beak!
TR. Out! out upon it! a brace of bird-catchers! 75
EU. No, no; don't be disturb'd; think better of us.
TR. You'll both be put to death.
EU. But we're not men.
TR. Not men! what are ye? what do ye call yourselves?
EU. The fright has turn'd me into a Yellow-Hammer.
TR. Poh! Stuff and nonsense!
EU. I can prove it to ye. 80
Search!
TR. But your comrade here, what bird is he?
PEIS. I'm changed to a Golden Pheasant
just at present.
EU. Now tell me, in heaven's name, what creature are ye?
TR. I'm a Slave Bird.
EU. A slave! how did it happen;
Were you made prisoner by a fighting cock?
TR. No. When my master made himself a Hoopoe, 86
He begg'd me to turn bird to attend upon
him.
EU. Do birds, then, want attendance?
TR. Yes, of course;
In his case, having been a man before,
He longs occasionally for human diet, 90
His old Athenian fare: pilchards for instance,—
Then I must fetch the pilchards; sometimes porridge;
He calls for porridge, and I mix it for him.
EU. Well, you're a dapper waiter, a didapper;
But didapper, I say, do step within there, 95
And call your master out.
TR. But just at present
He's taking a little rest after his luncheon,
Some myrtle berries and a dish of worms.

EU. No matter, call him here; we wish to speak to him.
TR. He'll not be pleased, I'm sure; but notwithstanding, 100
Since you desire it, I'll make bold to call him.
Exit.
PEIS. [looking after him]. Confound ye,
I say, you've frighten'd me to death.
EU. He has scared away my Jackdaw;
it's flown away.
PEIS. You let it go yourself, you coward.
EU. Tell me.
Have you not let your Raven go?
PEIS. Not I. 105
EU. Where is it then?
PEIS. Flown off of its own accord.
EU. You did not let it go! you're a brave
fellow!
THE HOOPOE [from within]. Open the door, I say let me go forth.
THE ROYAL HOOPOE appears with a tremendous beak and crest.
EU. O Hercules, what a creature! What a plumage!
And a triple tier of crests; what can it be! 110
Hoo. Who call'd? who wanted me?
EU. May the heavenly powers!—
—Confound ye! I say [aside].
Hoo. You mock at me, perhaps,
Seeing these plumes.—But, stranger, you must know
That once I was a man.
EU. We did not laugh
At you, Sir.
Hoo. What, then, were you laughing at?
EU. Only that beak of yours seem'd rather odd. 116
Hoo. It was your poet Sophocles that reduced me
To this condition with his tragedies.
EU. What are you, Tereus? Are you a bird, or what?
Hoo. A Bird.
EU. Then where are all your feathers?
Hoo. Gone. 120
EU. In consequence of an illness?
Hoo. No; the Birds
At this time of the year leave off their feathers.
But you! what are ye? Tell me.
EU. Mortal men.
Hoo. What countrymen?
EU. Of the country of the Triremes.
Hoo. Jury-men, I suppose?

Eu. Quite the reverse, 125
 We're anti-jurymen.
 Hoo. Does that breed still Continue amongst you?
 Eu. Some few specimens
 You'll meet with here and there in country places.
 Hoo. And what has brought you here?
 What was your object?
 Eu. We wish'd to advise with you.
 Hoo. With me! For what? 130
 Eu. Because you were a man: the same as us;
 And found yourself in debt: the same as us;
 And did not like to pay: the same as us;
 And after that, you changed into a bird, 134
 And ever since have flown and wander'd far
 Over the lands and seas, and have acquired
 All knowledge that a bird or man can learn.
 Therefore we come, as suppliants, to beseech
 Your favour and advice to point us out 139
 Some comfortable country, close and snug,
 A country like a blanket or a rug,
 Where we might fairly fold ourselves to rest.
 Hoo. Do you wish then for a greater state than Athens? 143
 Eu. Not greater, but more suitable for us.
 Hoo. It's clear you're fond of aristocracy.
 Eu. What, him, the son of Scellias!
 Aristocrates? I abhor him.
 Hoo. Well, what kind of a town would suit ye?
 Eu. Why, such a kind of town as this, for instance, 148
 A town where the importunities and troubles
 Are of this sort. Suppose a neighbour calls Betimes in the morning with a sudden summons:
 'Now, don't forget,' says he, 'for heaven's sake,
 To come to me to-morrow; bring your friends, Children, and all, we've wedding cheer at
 home.
 Come early, mind ye, and if you fail me
 now, 155
 Don't let me see your face when I'm in trouble.'
 Hoo. So you're resolved to encounter all these hardships!
 [TO PEISTHETAIRUS.] And what say you?
 PEIS. My fancy's much the same.
 Hoo. How so?
 PEIS. To find a place of the same sort;

A kind of place where a good, jolly father 160
 Meets and attacks me thus—'What's come to ye
 With my young people? You don't take to 'em.
 What! they're not reckon'd ugly! You might treat 'em,
 As an old friend, with a little attention,
 surely, 164
 And take a trifling civil freedom with 'em.'
 Hoo. Ay! You're in love, I see, with difficulties
 And miseries. Well, there's a city, in fact, Much of this sort; one that I think might suit ye,
 Near the Red Sea.
 Eu. No, no! not near the sea;
 Lest I should have the Salaminian galley 170
 Arriving some fine morning with a summons
 Sent after me, and a pursuivant to arrest me.
 But could not you tell us of some Grecian city?
 Hoo. Why, there's in Elis there, the town of Lepreum.
 Eu. No, no! No Lepreums; nor no
 lepers neither. 175
 No leprosy for me. Melanthius
 Has given me a disgust for leprosy.
 Hoo. Then there's Opuntius in the land of Locris.
 Eu. Opuntius? Me to be like Opuntius!
 With his one eye! Not for a thousand drachmas. 180
 But tell me, among the birds here, how do ye find it?
 What kind of an existence?
 Hoo. Pretty fair;
 Not much amiss. Time passes smoothly enough;
 And money is out of the question. We don't use it.
 Eu. You've freed yourselves from a great load of dross. 185
 Hoo. We've our field sports. We spend our idle mornings
 With banqueting and collations in the gardens,
 With poppy-seeds and myrtle.
 Eu. So your time
 Is pass'd like a perpetual wedding-day.
 PEISTHETAIRUS, who has hitherto felt his way by putting EUCLIPIDES forward, and allowing him to take the lead, and who has paid no attention to this trifling, inconclusive conversation, breaks out as from a profound reflective reverie.

PEIS. Hah! What a power is here; what opportunities! 190

If I could only advise you. I see it all! The means for an infinite empire and command!

Hoo. And what would you have us do? What's your advice?

PEIS. Do! what would I have ye do? Why, first of all

Don't flutter and hurry about all open-mouth'd 195

In that undignified way. With us for instance,

At home, we should cry out, 'What creature's that?'

And Teleas would be the first to answer:

'A mere poor creature, a weak restless animal,

A silly bird, that's neither here nor there.' 200

Hoo. Yes, Teleas might say so. It would be like him.

But tell me, what would you have us do?

PEIS. [emphatically.] Concentrate; —Bring all your birds together. Build a city.

Hoo. The Birds! How could we build a city? Where?

PEIS. Nonsense. You can't be serious. What a question! 205

Look down.

Hoo. I do.

PEIS. Look up now.

Hoo. So I do.

PEIS. Now turn your neck round.

Hoo. I should sprain it though.

PEIS. Come, what d'ye see?

Hoo. The clouds and sky;—that's all.

PEIS. Well, that we call the pole and the atmosphere;

And would it not serve you 'birds for a metropole? 210

Hoo. Pole? Is it call'd a pole?

PEIS. Yes, that's the name.

Philosophers of late call it the pole;

Because it wheels and rolls itself about,

As it were, in a kind of roly-poly way. 214

Well, there then, you may build and fortify,

And call it your Metropolis,—your Acropolis.

From that position you'll command mankind,

And keep them in utter thorough subjugation:

Just as you do the grasshoppers and locusts. And if the gods offend you, you'll blockade 'em, 220

And starve 'em to a surrender.

Hoo. In what way?

PEIS. Why thus. Your atmosphere is placed, you see,

In a middle point, just betwixt earth and heaven.

A case of the same kind occurs with us.

Our people in Athens, if they send to Delphi

With deputations, offerings, or what not, 226

Are forced to obtain a pass from the Boeotians:

Thus when mankind on earth are sacrificing,

If you should find the gods grown mutinous

And insubordinate, you could intercept 230

All their supplies of sacrificial smoke.

Hoo. By the earth and all its springs! springs and nooses!

Odds, nets and snares! this is the cleverest notion:

And I could find it in my heart to venture;

If the other Birds agree to the proposal. 235

PEIS. But who must state it to them?

Hoo. You yourself,

They'll understand ye, I found them mere barbarians,

But living here a length of time amongst them,

I have taught them to converse and speak correctly.

PEIS. How will you summon them?

Hoo. That's easy enough; 240

I'll just step into the thicket here hard by,

And call my Nightingale. She'll summon them.

And when they hear her voice, I promise you

You'll see them all come running here pell-mell.

PEIS. My dearest, best of Birds! don't lose moment, 245

I beg, but go directly into the thicket;

Nay, don't stand here, go call your Nightingale.

Exit HOOPOE.

SONG from behind the scene, supposed to be sung by the HOOPOE.

Awake! awake!

Sleep no more my gentle mate!

With your tiny tawny bill,

Wake the tuneful echo shrill,

On vale or hill;

Or in her airy rocky seat,
 Let her listen and repeat
 The tender ditty that you tell, 255
 The sad lament,
 The dire event,
 To luckless Itys that befell.
 Thence the strain
 Shall rise again, 260
 And soar amain,
 Up to the lofty palace gate,
 Where mighty Apollo sits in state
 In Jove's abode, with his ivory lyre,
 Hymning aloud to the heavenly choir. 265
 While all the gods shall join with thee
 In a celestial symphony.

A solo on the flute supposed to be the Nightingale's call.

PEIS. Oh, Jupiter! the dear delicious
 bird! 268
 With what a lovely tone she swells and falls,
 Sweetening the wilderness with delicate air.

EU. Hist!

PEIS. What?

EU. Be quiet, can't ye?

PEIS. What's the matter?

EU. The Hoopoe is just preparing for a
 song.

EUO. Hoop! hoop!

 Come in a troop,

 Come at a call, 275

 One and all,

 Birds of a feather,

 All together.

 Birds of an humble gentle bill

 Smooth and shrill, 280

 Dieted on seeds and grain,

 Rioting on the furrow'd plain,

 Pecking, hopping,

 Picking, popping,

 Among the barley newly sown. 285

 Birds of bolder louder tone,

 Lodging in the shrubs and bushes,

 Mavises and Thrushes.

 On the summer berries browsing,

 On the garden fruits carousing, 290

 All the grubs and vermin smouzing.

 You that in an humbler station,

 With an active occupation,

 Haunt the lowly watery mead,

 Warring against the native breed, 295

 The gnats and flies, your enemies;

 In the level marshy plain

 Of Marathon pursued and slain.

 You that in a squadron driving
 From the seas are seen arriving, 300
 With the Cormorants and Mews
 Haste to land and hear the news!

 All the feather'd airy nation,
 Birds of every size and station,
 Are convened in convocation. 305

 For an envoy queer and shrewd
 Means to address the multitude,
 And submit to their decision

 A surprising proposition,
 For the welfare of the state 310

 Come in a flurry,

 With a hurry-scurry,

 Hurry to the meeting and attend to the debate.

 EU. How they thicken, how they muster,
 How they clutter, how they cluster! 315

 Now they ramble here and thither,

 Now they scramble altogether.

 What a fidgeting and clattering!

 What a twittering and chattering!

 Don't they mean to threaten us? What think ye?

 PEIS. Yes, methinks they do. 320

 EU. They're gaping with an angry look against us both.

 PEIS. It's very true.

 CHOR. Where is He, the Magistrate that asssembled us to deliberate?

 HOO. Friends and comrades, here am I,
 your old associate and ally.

 CHOR. What have ye to communicate for the benefit of the state?

 HOO. A proposal safe and useful, practicable, profitable, 325

 Two projectors are arrived here, politicians shrewd and able.

 CHOR. Whee! whaw! where! where!

 What? what? what? what? what?

 HOO. I repeat it—human envoys are arrived, a steady pair,

 To disclose without reserve a most stupendous huge affair. 330

 CHOR. Chief, of all that ever were, the worst, the most unhappy one!

 Speak, explain!

 HOO. Don't be alarm'd!

 CHOR. Alas, alas! what have you done?

 HOO. I've received a pair of strangers, who desired to settle here.

 CHOR. Have you risk'd so rash an act?

 HOO. I've done it, and I persevere.

 CHOR. But where are they?

- Hoo. Near beside you; near as I am; very near. 335
- CHOR. Oût, alàs! oût, alàs!
We are betray'd, crûelly betray'd
To a calâmitous end.
Our cômrade and our friënd,
Our compânon in the fields and in the pâstures 340
Is the aùthor of all our mîseries and disasters,
Our âncient sâcred lâws and sòlemn oâth!
Transgrëssing bôth!
Trëasonably delivering us as a prize
To our hòrrible immemòrial enemiès, 345
To a detëstable race,
Exëcrably base!
For the Bird our Chief, hereafter he must answer to the state;
With respect to these intruders, I propose,
without debate,
On the spot to tear and hack them.
EU. There it is, our death and ruin! 350
Ah, the fault was all your own, you know it;
it was all your doing;
You that brought me here, and why?
PEIS. Because I wanted an attendant.
EU. Here to close my life in tears.
PEIS. No, that's a foolish fear, depend on't.
EU. Why a foolish fear?
PEIS. Consider; when you're left without an eye,
It's impossible in nature; how could you contrive to cry? 355
CHOR. Form in rank, Form in rank;
Then move forward and outflank.
Let me see them overpower'd,
Hack'd, demolish'd, and devour'd,
Neither earth, nor sea, nor sky, 360
Nor woody fastnesses on high,
Shall protect them if they fly.
Where's the Captain? what detains him?
what prevents us to proceed?
On the right there, call the Captain! let him form his troop and lead.
EU. There it is; where can I fly?
PEIS. Sirrah, be quiet; wait a bit. 365
EU. What, to be devour'd amongst them!
PEIS. Will your legs or will your wit
Serve to escape them?
EU. I can't tell.
PEIS. But I can tell; do as you're bid;
Fight we must. You see the pot just there before ye; take the lid
- And present it for a shield; the spit will serve you for a spear;
With it you may scare them off, or spike them if they venture near. 370
EU. What can I find to guard my eyes?
PEIS. Why, there's the very thing you
wish,
Two vizard helmets ready made, the cullender and skimming dish.
EU. What a clever, capital, lucky device, sudden and new!
Nicias, with all his tactics, is a simpleton to
you.
CHOR. Steady, Birds! present your beaks!
in double time, charge and attack! 375
Pounce upon them, smash the pot-lid, clapperclaw them, tear and hack.
Hoo. Tell me, most unworthy creatures, scandal of the feather'd race,
Must I see my friends and kinsmen massacred before my face?
CHOR. What, do you propose to spare them? Where will your forbearance
cease,
Hesitating to destroy destructive creatures
such as these? 380
Hoo. Enemies they might have been;
but here they come, with fair design,
With proposals of advice, for your advantage and for mine.
CHOR. Enemies time out of mind! they that have spilt our father's blood, How should they be friends of ours, or give us counsel for our good?
Hoo. Friendship is a poor adviser;
politicians deep and wise 385
Many times are forced to learn a lesson from their enemies;
Diligent and wary conduct is the method soon or late
Which an adversary teaches; whilst a friend or intimate Trains us on to sloth and ease; to ready confidence; to rest
In a careless acquiescence; to believe and hope the best. 390
Look on earth! behold the nations, all in emulation vying,
Active all, with busy science engineering,
fortifying;
To defend their hearths and homes, with patriotic industry,
Facing every city round with massy walls of masonry;

Tactical devices old they modify with new design; 395
 Arms offensive and defensive to perfection they refine;
 Galleys are equip'd and arm'd, and armies train'd to discipline.
 Look to life, in every part; in all they practise, all they know,
 Every nation has derived its best instruction from the foe.
 CHOR. We're agreed to grant a hearing; if an enemy can teach 400
 Anything that's wise or useful, let him prove it in his speech.
 PEIS. [aside.] Let's retire a pace or two; you see the change in their behaviour.
 HOO. Simple justice I require, and I request it as a favour.
 CHOR. Faith and equity require it, and the nation hitherto Never has refused to take direction and advice from you. 405
 PEIS. [aside.] They're relenting by degrees;
 Recover arms and stand at ease.
 CHOR. Back to the rear! resume your station,
 Ground your wrath and indignation, Sheathe your fury, stand at ease! 410
 While I proceed to question these:
 What design has brought them here?
 Hoh, there, Hoopoe! can't he hear?
 HOO. What's your question?
 CHOR. Who are these?
 HOO. Strangers from the land of Greece.
 CHOR. What design has brought them thence? 416
 What's their errand or pretence?
 HOO. They come here simply with a view To settle and reside with you;
 Here to remain and here to live. 420
 CHOR. What is the reason that they give?
 HOO. A project marvellous and strange.
 CHOR. Will it account for such a change, Coming here so vast a distance?
 Does he look for our assistance 425
 To serve a friend or harm a foe?
 HOO. Mighty plans he has to show
 (Hinted and proposed in brief—)
 For a power beyond belief;
 Ocean, earth, he says, and air, 430
 All creation everywhere,
 Everything that's here or there,
 An empire and supremacy

Over all beneath the sky
 Is attainable by you, 435
 Your just dominion and your due.
 CHOR. Tell us, was he fool or mad?
 HOO. No, believe me, grave and sad.
 CHOR. Did his reasons and replies
 Mark him as discreet and wise? 440
 HOO. With a force, a depth, a reach
 Of judgment; a command of speech;
 An invention, a facility,
 An address, a volubility,
 More than could be thought believable; 445
 'Tis a varlet inconceivable!
 CHOR. Let us hear him! let us hear him!
 Bid him begin! for raised on high
 Our airy fancy soars; and I Am rapt in hope, ready to fly. 450
 HOO. [to the CHORUS.] Here you, take these same arms, in the name of Heaven,
 And hang them quietly in the chimney-corner; [turning to PEISTHETAIROS]
 And you, communicate your scheme, exhibiting
 Your proofs and calculations—the discourse
 Which they were call'd to attend to.
 PEIS. No, not I, 455
 By Jove! unless they agree to an armistice;
 Such as the little poor baboon, our neighbour,
 The sword cutler, concluded with his wife;
 That they shan't bite me, or take unfair advantage
 In any way.
 CHOR. We won't.
 PEIS. Well, swear it then! 460
 CHOR. We swear, by our hope of gaining the first prize
 With the general approval and consent
 Of the whole audience, and of all the judges—
 And if we fail, may the reproach befall us,
 Of gaining it only by the casting vote. 465
 HER. Hear ye, good people all! the troops are order'd
 To take their arms within doors; and consult
 On the report and entry to be made Upon our journal of this day's proceedings.
 CHOR. Since time began 470
 The race of man
 Has ever been deceitful, faithless ever.
 Yet may our fears be vain!
 Speak therefore and explain:
 If in this realm of ours, 475
 Your clearer intellect, searching and clever,
 Has noticed means or powers
 Unknown and undetected,

In unambitious indolence neglected.
 Guide and assist our ignorant endeavour: 480
 You, for your willing aid and ready wit,
 Will share with us the common benefit.

Now speak to the business and be not afraid,
 The Birds will adhere to the truce that we made.

PEIS. I'm fill'd with the subject and long to proceed— 485

My rhetorical leaven is ready to knead.—
 Boy, bring me a crown and a basin and ewer.

EU. Why, what does he mean? Are we banqueting, sure?

PEIS. A rhetorical banquet I mean; and I wish 489

To serve them at first with a sumptuous dish,
 To astound and delight them. 'The grief and compassion

That oppresses my mind on beholding a nation,

A people of sovereigns! . . . '

CHOR. Sovereigns we!

PEIS. Of all the creation! of this man and
 me,

And of Jupiter too; for observe that your birth 495

Was before the old Titans, and Saturn and Earth.

CHOR. And Earth!

PEIS. I repeat it.

CHOR. That's wonderful news!

PEIS. Your wonder implies a neglect to peruse

And examine old Aesop, from whom you might gather

That the lark was embarrass'd to bury his
 father 500

On account of the then non-existence of
 Earth;

And how to repair so distressing a dearth,
 He adopted a method unheard of and new.

CHOR. If the story you quote is authentic
 and true,

No doubt can exist of our clear seniority, 505
 And the gods must acknowledge our right to authority.

EU. Your beaks will be worn with distinction and pride;

The woodpecker's title will scarce be denied;
 And Jove the pretender will surely surrender.

PEIS. . . . Moreover, most singular facts are combined 510

In proof that the birds were adored by mankind:

For instance, the Cock was a sovereign of yore

In the empire of Persia, and ruled it before
 Darius's time; and you all may have heard That his title exists as the 'Persian
 bird'. . . . 515

EU. And hence you behold him stalk in
 pride,

Majestic and stout, with a royal stride,
 With his turban upright, a privilege known
 Reserved to kings and kings alone.

PEIS. . . . So wide was his empire, so mighty his sway, 520

That the people of earth to the present day,
 Attend to his summons and freely obey:

Tinkers, tanners, cobblers, all,
 Are roused from rest at his royal call,
 And shuffle their shoes on before it is light,
 To trudge to the workshop.

EU. I warrant you're right; 526
 I know to my cost, by the cloak that I lost;
 It was owing to him I was robb'd and beguiled.

For a feast had been made for a neighbour's
 child,

To give it a name; and I went as a guest, 530
 And sat there carousing away with the rest;
 But drinking too deep, I feel soundly asleep;
 And he began crowing; and I never knowing,
 But thinking it morning, went off at the warning 534

(With the wine in my pate, to the city gate),
 And fell in with a footpad was lying in wait,
 Just under the town, and was fairly knock'd
 down;

Then I tried to call out; but before I could
 shout,

He stripp'd me at once with a sudden pull,
 Of a bran new mantle of Phrygian wool. 540

PEIS. . . . Then the kite was the monarch of Greece heretofore . . .

HOO. Of Greece?

PEIS. . . . and instructed our fathers
 of yore,

On beholding a kite, to fall down and adore . . .

EU. Well, a thing that befell me, was comical quite,

I threw myself down on beholding a kite; 545
 But turning my face up to stare at his flight,
 With a coin in my mouth, forgetting my penny,

I swallow'd it down, and went home without any.

PEIS. . . . In Sidon and Egypt the Cuckoo was king;

They wait to this hour for the Cuckoo to sing; 550

And when he begins, be it later or early, They reckon it lawful to gather their barley

EU. Ah, thence it comes our harvest cry, Cuckoo, Cuckoo, to the passers-by.

PEIS. . . . At an era, moreover, of modern date, 555

Menelaus the king, Agamemnon the great, Had a bird as assessor attending in state, Perch'd on his sceptre, to watch for a share Of fees and emoluments, secret or fair.

EU. Ah, there I perceive I was right in my guess, 560

For when Priam appear'd in his tragical dress,

The bird on his sceptre, I plainly could see, Was watching Lysicrates taking a fee.

PEIS. . . . Nay, Jupiter now that usurps the command 564

Appears with an Eagle, appointed to stand As his emblem of empire; a striking example Of authority once so extended and ample: And each of the gods had his separate fowl, Apollo a Hawk, and Minerva an Owl.

EU. That's matter of fact, and you're right in the main; 570

But what was the reason I wish you'd explain.

PEIS. The reason was this: that the bird should be there

To demand as of right a proportional share Of the entrails and fat; when an offering was made,

A suitable portion before them was laid: 575 Moreover you'll find that the race of mankind

Always swore by a bird; and it never was heard

That they swore by the gods at the time that I mention.

And Lampon himself, with a subtle intention, Adheres to the old immemorial use; 580

He perjures and cheats us, and swears 'by the goose'.

Thus far forth have I proved and shown The power and estate that were once your own,

Now totally broken and overthrown:

And need I describe your present tribe, 585

Weak, forlorn, exposed to scorn, Distress'd, oppress'd, never at rest, Daily pursued with outrage rude, With cries and noise of men and boys, Screaming, hooting, pelting, shooting, 590 The fowler sets his traps and nets, Twigs of bird-lime, loops, and snares, To catch you kidnapp'd unawares, Even within the temple's pale.

They set you forth to public sale, 595

Paw'd and handled most severely; And, not content with roasting merely, In an insolent device,

Sprinkle you with cheese and spice; With nothing of respect or favour, 600

Derogating from your flavour. Or, for a further outrage, have ye Soused in greasy sauce and gravy. Hoo. Sad and dismal is the story, 505

Human stranger, which you tell, Of our fathers' ancient glory,

Ere the fated empire fell. From the depth of degradation, A benignant happy fate

Sends you to restore the nation, 610 To redeem and save the state.

I consign to your protection, Able to preserve them best,

All my objects of affection, My wife, my children, and my nest. 615

Hoo. Explain then the method you mean to pursue

To recover our empire and freedom anew. For thus to remain in dishonour and scorn,

Our life were a burthen no more to be borne.

PEIS. Then I move, that the birds shall in common repair 620

To a central point, and encamp in the air; And intrench and enclose it, and fortify

there;

And build up a rampart impregnable strong, Enormous in thickness, enormously long;

Bigger than Babylon, solid and tall, 625 With bricks and bitumen! a wonderful wall.

EU. Bricks and bitumen! I'm longing to see

What a daub of a building the city will be! PEIS. . . . As soon as the fabric is brought to an end, A herald or envoy to Jove we shall send, 630

To require his immediate prompt abdication; And if he refuses, or shows hesitation,

Or evades the demand, we shall further proceed,
 With legitimate warfare, avow'd and decreed; 634
 With a warning and notices, formally given,
 To Jove, and all others residing in heaven,
 Forbidding them ever to venture again
 To trespass on our atmospheric domain,
 With scandalous journeys, to visit a list
 Of Alcmenas and Semeles; if they persist, 640
 We warn them that means will be taken moreover
 To stop their gallanting and acting the lover.
 Another ambassador also will go
 Dispatch'd upon earth, to the people below,
 To notify briefly the fact of accession; 645
 And enforcing our claims upon taking possession;
 With orders in future, that every suitor,
 Who applies to the gods with an offering
 made,
 Shall begin with a previous offering paid
 To a suitable Bird, of a kind and degree. 650
 That accords with the god, whosoever he be.
 In Venus's fane, if a victim is slain,
 First let a Sparrow be feasted with grain.
 When gifts and oblations to Neptune are
 made, 654
 To the Drake let a tribute of barley be paid.
 Let the Cormorant's appetite first be appeased,
 And let Hercules then have an Ox for his
 feast.
 If you offer to Jove, as the sovereign above,
 A Ram for his own, let the Golden-crown,
 As a sovereign Bird, be duly preferr'd, 660
 Feasted and honour'd, in right of his reign,
 With a jolly fat pismire offer'd and slain.
 EU. A pismire, how droll! I shall laugh till I burst!
 Let Jupiter thunder, and threaten his worst!
 Hoo. But mankind, will they, think ye, respect and adore, 665
 If they see us all flying, the same as before?
 They will reckon us merely as Magpies and Crows.
 PEIS. Poh! nonsense, I tell ye—no block-head but knows
 That Mercury flies; there is Iris too:
 Homer informs us how she flew: 670
 'Smooth as a Dove she went sailing along.'
 And pinions of gold, both in picture and song,
 To Cupid and Victory fairly belong.

Hoo. But Jove's thunder has wings; if he send but a volley, 674
 Mankind for a time may abandon us wholly.
 PEIS. What then? we shall raise a grani-vorous troop,
 To sweep their whole crops with a ravenous
 swoop:
 If Ceres is able, perhaps she may deign
 To assist their distress with a largess of rain. . . .
 EU. No, no! she'll be making excuses, I warrant. 680
 PEIS. . . . Then the Crows will be sent on a different errand,
 To pounce all at once, with a sudden surprise,
 On their oxen and sheep, to peck out their
 eyes,
 And leave them stone-blind for Apollo to cure:
 He'll try it; he'll work for his salary sure! 685
 EU. Let the cattle alone; I've two beeves of my own:
 Let me part with them first, and then do your worst.
 PEIS. But, if men shall acknowledge your merit and worth,
 As equal to Saturn, to Neptune, and Earth.
 And to everything else, we shall freely bestow 690
 All manner of blessings.
 Hoo. Explain them and show.
 PEIS. For instance: if locusts arrive to consume
 All their hopes of a crop, when the vines are in bloom,
 A squadron of Owls may demolish them all;
 The Midges moreover, which canker and gall
 The figs and the fruit, if the Thrush is employ'd, 696
 By a single battalion will soon be destroy'd.
 Hoo. But wealth is their object; and how can we grant it?
 PEIS. We can point them out mines; and our help will be wanted
 To inspect and direct navigation and trade;
 Their voyages all will be easily made, 701
 With a saving of time and a saving of cost;
 And a seaman in future will never be lost.
 Hoo. How so?
 PEIS. We shall warn them: 'Now hasten to sail,
 Now keep within harbour; your voyage will fail.' 705

EU. How readily then will a fortune be made!

I'll purchase a vessel and venture on trade.

PEIS. . . . And old treasure conceal'd will again be reveal'd;

The Birds as they know it will readily show it.

'Tis a saying of old, 'My silver and gold 710
Are so safely secreted, and closely interr'd,
No creature can know it, excepting a Bird.'

EU. I'll part with my vessel, I'll go not aboard;

I'll purchase a mattock and dig up a hoard.

HOO. We're clear as to wealth; but the blessing of health 715
Is the gift of the gods.

PEIS. It will make no such odds:
If they're going on well, they'll be healthy still,

And none are in health that are going on ill.

HOO. But then for longevity; that is the gift

Of the gods.

PEIS. But the Birds can afford them a lift, 720

And allow them a century, less or more.

HOO. How so?

PEIS. From their own individual store,
They may reckon it fair, to allot them a share;

For old proverbs affirm, that the final term
Of a Raven's life exceeds the space 725
Of five generations of human race.

HOO. What need have we then for Jove as a king?

Surely the Birds are a better thing!

PEIS. Surely! surely! First and most,
We shall economize the cost 730

Of marbled domes and gilded gates.

The Birds will live at cheaper rates,

Lodging, without shame or scorn,

In a maple or a thorn;

The most exalted and divine 735

Will have an olive for his shrine.

We need not run to foreign lands,

Or Ammon's temple in the sands;

But perform our easy vows

Among the neighbouring shrubs and boughs;

Paying our oblations fairly 741

With a pennyworth of barley.

CHOR. O best of all envoys, suspected before,

Now known and approved, and respected the more;

To you we resign the political lead, 745
Our worthy director in council and deed.

Elated with your bold design,

I swear and vow:

If resolutely you combine
Your views and interest with mine, 750

In steadfast counsels as a trusty friend,

Without deceit, or guile, or fraudulent end:

They that rule in haughty state,

The gods, ere long shall abdicate

Their high command, 755

And yield the sceptre to my rightful hand.

Then reckon on us for a number and force;

As on you we rely for a ready resource,

In council and policy, trusting to you

To direct the design we resolve to pursue. 760

HOO. That's well, but we've no time, by

Jove! to loiter,

And dawdle and postpone like Nicias.

We should be doing something. First, however,

I must invite you to my roosting place,

This nest of mine, with its poor twigs and leaves. 765

And tell me what your names are?

PEIS.

Certainly;

My name is Peisthetairus.

HOO.

And your friend?

EU. Euelpides from Thria.

HOO.

Well, you're welcome—

Both of ye.

PEIS.

We're obliged.

HOO.

Walk in together.

PEIS. Go first then, if you please.

HOO.

No, pray move forward. 770

PEIS. But bless me—stop, pray—just for a single moment—

Let's see—do tell me—explain—how shall we manage

To live with you—with a person wearing wings?

Being both of us unfledged?

HOO.

Perfectly well!

PEIS. Yes, but I must observe, that Aesop's fables 775

Report a case in point—the fox and eagle:

The fox repented of his fellowship,

And with good cause; you recollect the story.

HOO. Oh! don't be alarm'd; we'll give you a certain root

That immediately promotes the growth of wings. 780

PEIS. Come, let's go in then; Xanthias, do you mind,
And Manodorus, follow with the bundles.

CHOR. Holloh!

HOO. What's the matter?

CHOR. Go in with your party,
And give them a jolly collation and hearty.
But the Bird to the Muses and Graces so
dear, 785

The lovely, sweet Nightingale, bid her appear,
And leave her amongst us, to sport with us
here.

PEIS. [with a hurried, nervous eagerness.]

O yes, by Jove! indeed, you must indulge
them;

Do, do me, the favour; call her from the thicket!

For heaven's sake—let me entreat you—bring her here, 790

And let us have a sight of her ourselves.

HOO. [*with grave good-breeding, implying a kind of rebuke to the fussy importunity
into which PEISTHETAIROS had fallen.*]

Since it is your wish and pleasure, it must be
so;

Come here to the strangers, Procne! show
yourself!

PEIS. O Jupiter! what a graceful, charming bird!

What a beautiful creature it is!

EU. I'll tell ye what; 795

I could find in my heart to rumple her feathers.

PEIS. And what an attire she wears, all bright with gold!

EU. Well, I should like to kiss her for my part.

PEIS. You blockhead! With that beak she'd run you through.

EU. By Jove, then, one must treat her like an egg; 800

Just clear away the shell and kiss her—thus.

HOO. [gravely disapproving the liberties which are taken in his presence.] Let's go!

PEIS. Go first, then, and good luck go with us.

Exeunt.

CHOR. O lovely, sweet companion meet,
From morn to night my sole delight,
My little, happy, gentle mate, 805
You come, you come, O lucky fate!
Returning here with new delight,
To charm the sight, to charm the sight,
And charm the ear.

Come then, anew combine
Your notes in harmony with mine,
And with a tone beyond compare
Begin your Anapaestic air.

810

Ye Children of Man! whose life is a span,
Protracted with sorrow from day to day, 815
Naked and featherless, feeble and querulous,
Sickly, calamitous creatures of clay!
Attend to the words of the Sovereign Birds
(Immortal, illustrious, lords of the air),
Who survey from on high, with a merciful
eye, 820

Your struggles of misery, labour, and care.
Whence you may learn and clearly discern
Such truths as attract your inquisitive turn;
Which is busied of late with a mighty debate,
A profound speculation about the creation,
And organical life, and chaotical strife, 826
With various notions of heavenly motions,
And rivers and oceans, and valleys and mountains,

And sources of fountains, and meteors on
high,

And stars in the sky . . . We propose by and by 830

(If you'll listen and hear), to make it all
clear.

And Prodicus henceforth shall pass for a dunce,

When his doubts are explain'd and expounded at once.

Before the creation of Aether and Light,
Chaos and Night together were plight, 835
In the dungeon of Erebus foully bedight.

Nor Ocean, or Air, or substance was there,
Or solid or rare, or figure or form,
But horrible Tartarus ruled in the storm:

At length, in the dreary chaotical closet
Of Erebus old, was a privy deposit, 841

By Night the primaeval in secrecy laid—
A Mystical Egg, that in silence and shade
Was brooded and hatch'd, till time came about,

And Love, the delightful, in glory flew out,
In rapture and light, exulting and bright, 846
Sparkling and florid, with stars in his forehead,

His forehead and hair, and a flutter and flare,
As he rose in the air, triumphantly furnish'd
To range his dominions on glittering pinions,
All golden and azure, and blooming and burnish'd: 851

He soon, in the murky Tartarean recesses,
 With a hurricane's might, in his fiery caresses
 Impregnated Chaos; and hastily snatched
 To being and life, begotten and hatch'd, 855
 The primitive Birds: but the Deities all,
 The celestial Lights, the terrestrial Ball,
 Were later of birth, with the dwellers on
 earth

More tamely combined, of a temperate kind;
 When chaotic mixture approach'd to a fix-ture. 860

Our antiquity proved, it remains to be shown
 That Love is our author, and master alone;
 Like him we can ramble and gambol and fly
 O'er ocean and earth, and aloft to the sky:
 And, all the world over, we're friends to the lover, 865

And when other means fail, we are found to prevail,

When a Peacock or Pheasant is sent as a present.

All lessons of primary daily concern
 You have learnt from the Birds, and continue to learn, 869

Your best benefactors and early instructors;
 We give you the warning of seasons return-
 ing.

When the Cranes are arranged, and muster afloat

In the middle air, with a creaking note,
 Steering away to the Lybian sands,
 Then careful farmers sow their lands; 875
 The crazy vessel is haul'd ashore,
 The sail, the ropes, the rudder, and oar
 Are all unshipp'd, and housed in store,

The shepherd is warn'd, by the Kite reappearing,

To muster his flock, and be ready for shear-
 ing. 880

You quit your old cloak at the Swallow's
 behest,

In assurance of summer, and purchase a vest.

For Delphi, for Ammon, Dodona, in fine
 For every oracular temple and shrine,
 The Birds are a substitute equal and fair, 885
 For on us you depend, and to us you repair
 For counsel and aid when a marriage is made,
 A purchase, a bargain, a venture in trade:
 Unlucky or lucky, whatever has struck ye,
 An ox or an ass that may happen to pass, 890
 A voice in the street, or a slave that you meet,

A name or a word by chance overheard,

If you deem it an omen, you call it a Bird;
 And if birds are your omens, it clearly will follow

That birds are a proper prophetic Apollo.

Then take us as gods, and you'll soon find the odds, 896

We'll serve for all uses, as prophets and
 muses;

We'll give ye fine weather, we'll live here together;

We'll not keep away, scornful and proud,
 a-top of a cloud

(In Jupiter's way); but attend every day 900
 To prosper and bless all you possess,
 And all your affairs, for yourselves and your heirs.

And as long as you live, we shall give You wealth and health, and pleasure and treasure,

In ample measure; 905

And never bilk you of pigeon's milk
 Or potable gold; you shall live to grow old,
 In laughter and mirth, on the face of the
 earth,

Laughing, quaffing, carousing, boozing,
 Your only distress shall be the excess 1000
 Of ease and abundance and happiness.

SEMICHORUS.

Muse, that in the deep recesses
 Of the forest's dreary shade,
 Vocal with our wild addresses;
 Or in the lonely lowly glade 1005
 Attending near, art pleased to hear
 Our humble bill, tuneful and shrill:

When to the name of omnipotent Pan
 Our notes we raise, or sing in praise
 Of mighty Cybele, from whom we began, 1010
 Mother of nature and every creature,
 Wing'd or unwing'd, of birds or man;
 Aid and attend, and chant with me
 The music of Phrynichus, open and plain,
 The first that attempted a loftier strain, Ever busy like the bee, with the sweets of harmony. 1016

EPIRRHEMA.

Is there any person present sitting a spectator here,
 Who desires to pass his time freely without restraint or fear?

Should he wish to colonize, he never need be check'd or chid

For the trifling indiscretions which the testy laws forbid. 1020

Parricides are in esteem: among the birds
we deem it fair,

A combat honourably fought betwixt a game-cock and his heir!

There the branded runagate, branded and mottled in the face,

Will be deem'd a motley bird; a motley mark is no disgrace.

Spintharus, the Phrygian born, will pass
a muster there with ease, 1025

Counted as a Phrygian fowl; and even Exceestides,

Once a Carian and a slave, may there be nobly born and free,

Plume himself on his descent, and hatch a proper pedigree.

SEMICHORUS.

Thus the Swans in chorus follow,
On the mighty Thracian stream, 1030

Hymning their eternal theme—

Praise to Bacchus and Apollo:

The welkin rings with sounding wings,

With songs and cries and melodies,

Up to the thunderous Aether ascending:

Whilst all that breathe on earth beneath, 1036

The beasts of the wood, the plain, and
the flood,

In panic amazement, are crouching and bending,

With the awful qualm of a sudden calm,

Ocean and air in silence blending. 1040

The ridge of Olympus is sounding on high,

Appalling with wonder the lords of the sky,

And the Muses and Graces,

Enthroned in their places,

Join in the solemn symphony. 1045

ANTEPIRRHEMA.

Nothing can be more delightful than the having wings to wear!

A spectator sitting here, accommodated
with a pair,

Might for instance (if he found a tragic chorus dull and heavy)

Take his flight and dine at home, and if he did not choose to leave ye,

Might return in better humour when the weary drawl was ended. 1050

Introduce then wings in use—believe me, matters will be mended:

Patroclides would not need to sit there and befoul his seat;

Flying off, he might return, eased in a moment, clean and neat.

Trust me, wings are all in all! Diitrephes has mounted quicker

Than the rest of our aspirants, soaring on his wings of wicker: 1055

Basket-work and crates and hampers first enabled him to fly;

First a captain, then promoted to command
the cavalry;

With his fortunes daily rising, office and preferment new,

An illustrious, enterprising, airy, gallant Cockatoo.

PEIS. Well, there it is! Such a comical set out, 1060

By Jove, I never saw!

EU. Why, what's the matter?

What are you laughing at?

PEIS. At your pen feathers;
I'll tell ye exactly now the thing you're like;
You're just the perfect image of a Goose, Drawn with a pen in a writing-master's flourish. 1065

EU. And you're like a pluck'd Blackbird to a tittle.

PEIS. Well, then, according to the line in Aeschylus,

'It's our own fault, the feathers are our own.'

EU. Come, what's to be done?

HOO. First we must choose a name—
Some grand, sonorous name, for our new city; 1070

Then we must sacrifice.

EU. I think so too.

PEIS. Let's see—let's think of a name—what shall it be?

What say ye to the Lacedaemonian name?
Sparta sounds well—suppose we call it Sparta.

EU. Sparta! What, Sparto?—Rushes!—
no, not I, 1075

I'd not put up with Sparto for a mattress,
Much less for a city—we're not come to that.

PEIS. Come, then, what name shall it be?

EU. Something appropriate,
Something that sounds majestic, striking,
and grand, 1079

Alluding to the clouds and the upper regions.

PEIS. What think ye of Clouds and Cuckoos? Cuckoo-cloudlands
Or Nephelococcugia?

Hoo. That will do;
A truly noble and sonorous name!

EU. I wonder if that Nephelococcugia
Is the same place I've heard of; people tell
me 1085

That all Theagenes's rich possessions
Lie there; and Aeschines's whole estate.

PEIS. Yes! and a better country it is by far

Than all that land in Thrace, the fabulous
plain

Of Phlegra, where those earth-born landed giants 1090

Were bullied and out-vapour'd by the gods.

EU. It will be a genteelish, smart concern, I reckon,

This city of ours.—Which of the deities

Shall we have for a patron? We must weave our mantle,

Our sacred mantle, of course—the yearly mantle 1095

To one or other of 'em.

PEIS. Well, Minerva?
Why should not we have Minerva? She's establish'd,

Let her continue; she'll do mighty well.

EU. No—there I object; for a well-order'd city 1099

The example would be scandalous, to see
The goddess, a female born, in complete amour

From head to foot; and Cleisthenes with a distaff.

PEIS. What warden will ye appoint for the Eagle tower,
Your Citadel, the fort upon the rock?

Hoo. That charge will rest with a chief of our own choice, 1105

Or Persian race, a chicken of the game,
An eminent warrior.

EU. Oh my chick-hiddy—
My little master. I should like to see him
Strutting about and roosting on the rock.

PEIS. Come you now! please to step to the atmosphere, 1110

And give a look to the work, and help the workmen;

And between whiles, fetch bricks and tiles,
and such like;

Draw water, stamp the mortar,—do it barefoot;

Climb up the ladders; tumble down again;
Keep constant watch and ward; conceal your watch-lights; 1115

Then go the rounds, and give the counter-
sign,

Till you fall fast asleep. Send heralds off,
—A brace of them—one to the gods above,

And another, down below there, to mankind.
Bid them, when they return, inquire for me.

EU. For me! for me! You may be hang'd for me. 1121

PEIS. Come, friend, go where I bid you;
never mind;

The business can't go on without you, anyhow.

It's just a sacrifice to these new deities,

That I must wait for, and the priest that's coming. 1125

Holloh, you boy there! bring the basin and ewer!

CHOR. We urge, we exhort you, and advise,

To ordain a mighty sacrifice;

And before the gods to bring

A stupendous offering; 1130

—Either a sheep or some such thing!—

To please the critics of the age,

Sacrificed upon the stage.—

Sound amain the Pythian strain!

Let Chaeris be brought here to sing. 1135

PEIS. Have done there with your puffing

—Heaven and earth,

What's here? I've seen a many curious
things,

But never saw the like of this before,

A Crow with a flute and a mouthpiece.

Priest, your office:

Perform it! Sacrifice to the new deities!

PRIEST. I will—but where's the boy gone with the basket? 1141

Let us pray to the holy flame,

And the holy Hawk that guards the same;

To the sovereign Deities,

All and each, of all degrees, 1145

Female and male!

CHOR. Hail, thou Hawk of Suniurn, hail!

PRIEST. To the Delian and the Pythian
Swan,

And to the Latonian Quail,

All hail! 1150

CHOR. To the Bird of awful stature,

Mother of Gods, mother of Man;

Great Cybele! nurse of Nature!

Glorious Ostrich, hear our cry!

Fearful and enormous creature,
 Hugest of all things that fly,
 O preserve and prosper us,
 Thou mother of Cleocritus!
 Grant the blessings that we seek
 For us, and for the Chians eke! 1155 PEIS. That's right, the Chians—don't forget the Chians!
 PRIEST. To the Heroes, Birds, and Heroes' sons,
 We call at once, we call and cry,
 To the Woodpecker, the Jay, the Pie,
 To the Mallard and the Widgeon, 1165
 To the Ringdove and the Pigeon,
 To the Petrel and Sea-mew,
 To the Dottrel and Curlew,
 To the Vultures and the Hawks,
 To the Cormorants and Storks, 1170
 To the Rail, to the Quail,
 To the Peewit, to the Tomtit—PEIS. Have done there! call no more of 'em; are you mad?
 Inviting all the Cormorants and Vultures,
 For a victim such as this! Why don't you
 see, 1175
 A Kite at a single swoop would carry it off?
 Get out of my way there with your Crowns and Fillets!
 I'll do it myself! I'll make the sacrifice!
 PRIEST. Then must I commence again,
 In a simple humble strain; 1180
 And invite the gods anew,
 To visit us—but very few—
 Or only just a single one,
 All alone
 In a quiet easy way; 1185
 Wishing you may find enough,
 If you dine with us to-day;
 Our victim is so poor and thin,
 Merely bones, in fact, and skin.
 PEIS. We sacrifice and pray to the winged deities. 1190
Enter a Poet, very ragged and shabby.
 POET. 'For the festive, happy day,
 Muse, prepare an early lay
 To Nephelococcugia.' PEIS. What's here to do? What are you? Where do you come from?
 POET. A humble menial of the Muses'
 train, 1195
 As Homer expresses it.
 PEIS. A menial, are you,
 With your long hair? A menial?
 POET 'Tis not that

No!—but professors of the poetical art
 Are simply styled, the 'Menials of the Muses.'
 As Homer expresses it.
 PEIS. Aye, the Muse has given you 1200
 A ragged livery. Well, but friend, I say—Friend! Poet! What the plague has brought you here?
 POET. I've made an Ode upon your new-built City,
 And a charming composition for a Chorus,
 And another, in Simonides's manner. 1205
 PEIS. [in a sharp cross-examining tone.]
 When were they made?
 What time? How long ago?
 POET. From early date, I celebrate in
 song
 The noble Nephelococcugian state.
 PEIS. That's strange, when I'm just sacrificing here, 1210
 For the first time, to give the town a name.
 POET. Intimations, swift as air,
 To the Muses' ear are carried,
 Swifter than the speed and force
 Of the fiery-footed horse, 1215
 Hence, the tidings never tarried;
 Father, patron, mighty lord,
 Founder of the rising state,
 What thy bounty can afford,
 Be it little, be it great, 1220
 With a quick resolve incline
 To bestow on me and mine.
 PEIS. This fellow will breed a bustle, and make mischief,
 If we don't give him a trifle, and get rid of
 him.
 You there, you've a spare waistcoat; pull it off! 1225
 And give it this same clever ingenious poet—
 There, take the waistcoat, friend! Ye seem to want it!
 POET. Freely, with a thankful heart,
 What the bounteous hand bestows,
 Is received in friendly part; 1230
 But amid the Thracian snows,
 Or the chilly Scythian plain,
 He the wanderer, cold and lonely,
 With an under-waistcoat only,
 Must a further wish retain; 1235
 Which, the Muse, averse to mention,
 To your gentle comprehension
 Trusts her enigmatic strain.
 PEIS. I comprehend it enough; you want a jerkin.

Here, give him yours; one ought to encourage genius. 1240

There, take it, and good-bye to ye!

POET. Well, I'm going;

And, as soon as I get to the town, I'll set to work;

And finish something, in this kind of way.

'Seated on your golden throne,
Muse, prepare a solemn ditty 1245

To the mighty,

To the flighty,

To the cloudy, quivering, shivering,

To the lofty-seated city.'

PEIS. Well, I should have thought, that jerkin might have cured him 1250

Of his 'quiverings and shiverings.' How the plague

Did the fellow find us out? I should not have thought it.

Come once again, go round with the basin and ewer.

Peace! Silence!

Enter a Soothsayer.

SOOTH. Stop the sacrifice! 1254

PEIS. What are you?

SOOTH. A Soothsayer, that's what I am.

PEIS. The worse luck for ye.

SOOTH. Friend, are you in your senses?

Don't trifle absurdly with religious matters.
Here's a prophecy of Bakis, which expressly Alludes to Nephelococcugia.

PEIS. How came it, then, you never prophesied 1260

Your prophecies, before the town was built?

SOOTH. The spirit withheld me.

PEIS. And is it allowable now,

To give us a communication of them?

SOOTH. Hem!

'Moreover, when the Crows and Daws unite,

To build and settle, in the midway right 1265
Between tall Corinth and fair Sicyon's
height.

Then to Pandora let a milk white Goat
Be slain, and offer'd, and a comely coat
Given to the Soothsayer, and shoes a pair;
When he to you this oracle shall bear.' 1270

PEIS. Are the shoes mention'd?

SOOTH. [pretending to feel for his papers.]

Look at the book, and see!

'And let him have the entrails for his share.'

PEIS. Are the entrails mention'd?

SOOTH. [as before.] Look at the book,
and see!

'If you, predestined youth, shall do these things, 1275

Then you shall soar aloft, on eagle's wings;
But, if you do not, you shall never be

An Eagle, nor a Hawk, nor bird of high degree.'

PEIS. Is all this there?

SOOTH. [as before.] Look at the book,
and see!

PEIS. This oracle differs most remarkably From that which I transcribed in Apollo's temple. 1281

'If at the sacrifice . . . which you
prepare,

An uninvited vagabond . . . should dare

To interrupt you, and demand a share,

Let cuffs and buffets . . . be the var-
let's lot. 1285

Smite him between the ribs . . . and spare him not.'

SOOTH. Nonsense you're talking!

PEIS. [with the same action as the Soothsayer, as if he were feeling for papers.]

Look at the book, and see!

'Thou shalt in no wise heed them, or for-
bear

To lash and smite those Eagles of the air,
Neither regard their names, for it is written,
Lampon and Diopethes shall be smitten.' 1291

SOOTH. Is all this there?

PEIS. [producing a horsewhip.] Look at the book, and see!

Get out, with a plague and a vengeance.

SOOTH. Oh dear! oh!

PEIS. Go soothsay somewhere else, you rascal, run!

Exit Soothsayer.

Enter METON the Astronomer.

MET. I'm come, you see, to join you.

PEIS. [aside.] (Another plague!) 1295
For what? What's your design? Your plan, your notion?

Yourscheme,—your apparatus,—your equipment,

Your outfit? What's the meaning of it all?

MET. I mean to take a geometrical plan
Of your atmosphere—to allot it, and survey
it 1300

In a scientific form.

PEIS. In the name of heaven!

Who are ye and what? What name?
What manner of man?

MET. Who am I and what? Meton's my name, well known.

In Greece, and in the village of Colonos.

PEIS. [*going up to him and pulling them
about.*]

But tell me pray;—these implements, these articles, 1305

What are they meant for?

MET. These are—Instruments!
An atmospherical geometrical scale.

First, you must understand, that the atmosphere

Is form'd,—in a manner,—altogether,— partly,

In the fashion of a furnace, or a funnel; 1310

I take this circular arc, with the moveable
arm,

And so, by shifting it round, till it coincides
At the angle;—you understand me?

PEIS. Not in the least.

MET. [with animation and action illustrative of the proposed plan.] . . . I obtain a true division, with the quadra-
ture

Of the equilateral circle. Here, I trace 1315

Your market-place, in the centre, with the streets,—

Converging inwards,—and the roads, diverg-
ing—

From the circular wall, without—like solar rays

From the circular circumference of the Sun.

PEIS. [in a pretended soliloquy; then calling to him with a tone of mystery and alarm.] Another Thales! absolutely, a Thales!— 1320

Meton!

MET. [startled.] Why, what's the matter?

PEIS. You're aware
That I've a regard for you. Take my advice;

Don't be seen here—Withdraw yourself,— abscond!

MET. Is there any alarm or risk?

PEIS. Why, much the same
As it might be in Lacedaemon. There's a bustle 1325

Of expelling aliens; people are dragg'd out
From the inns and lodgings, with a deal of uproar,

And blows and abuse in plenty, to be met
with

In the public streets.

MET. A popular tumult—heh?

PEIS. [scandalized at the supposition.]

Oh, fie! no, nothing of that kind.

MET. How do you mean then? 1330

PEIS. We're carrying into effect a resolution

Adopted lately; to discard and cudgel—

Coxcombs and Mountebanks—of every
kind:

MET. Perhaps—I had best withdraw.

PEIS. Why yes, perhaps—

But yet, I would not answer for it, neither;

Perhaps, you may be too late; the blows I mention'd 1336

Are coming—close upon you—there they
come!

MET. Oh bless me!

PEIS. Did I not tell you and give you warning?

Get out, you coxcomb, find out by your Geometry

The road you came, and measure it back:
you'd best. 1340

Exit METON.

Enter a Commissioner from Athens.

COM. Is nobody here? None of the Proxeni,

To receive and attend upon me?

PEIS. What's all this?

Sardanapalus in person come amongst us!

COM. I come, appointed as Commissioner
To Nephelococcugia.

PEIS. A Commissioner! 1345

What brings you here?

COM. A paltry scrap of paper,
A trifling silly decree, that sent me away
Here to this place of yours.

PEIS. Well now! suppose,

To make things easy on both sides—could not you 1349

Just take your salary at once; and so return,
Without any further trouble?

COM. Truly yes,

I've other affairs at home: a speech and a motion,

That I meant to have made in the general assembly,

About a business, that I took in hand

On the part of my friend Pharnaces, the satrap. 1355

PEIS. Agreed then, and farewell. Here, take your salary.

COM. What's here?

PEISTHETAIRUS has held out his left hand as if with an offer of money, he grasps the right hand of the Commissioner, and with this advantage proceeds to buffet him.

PEIS. A motion on the part of Pharnaces!

COM. Bear witness here! I'm beaten and abused

In my character of Commissioner!

Exit COM.

PEIS.

Get out!

With your balloting-box and all. It's quite a shame,

1360

Quite scandalous! They send commissioners here,

Before we've finish'd our first sacrifice.

Enter a Hawker.

HAW. 'Moreover, if a Nephelococugian Should assault or smite an Athenian citizen'—

PEIS. What's this? What's all this trumpery paper here?

1365

HAW. I've brought you the new laws and ordinances,

And copies of the last decrees to sell.

PEIS. [dryly and bitterly.] Let's hear 'em.

HAW. 'It's enacted and ordain'd,

That the Nephelococugians shall use

Such standard weights and measures'—

PEIS. Friend, you'll find

1370

Hard measure here, and a heavy weight, I promise you,

Upon your shoulders shortly.

HAW. What's the matter?

What's come to you?

PEIS. Get out, with your decrees!

I've bloody decrees against you, dire decrees.

[Drives him off.]

COM. [returning.] I summon Peisthetairus to his answer,

1375

In an action of assault and battery,

For the first day of the month Munychion.

PEIS. Hah! say you so? You're there again! Have at you. [Drives him off.]

HAW. [returning.] 'And in case of any assault or violence,

Against the person of the Magistrate'—

1380

PEIS. Bless me! What you! You're there again.

[Drives him off.]

COM. [returning again.] I'll ruin you;

I'll lay my damages at ten thousand drachmas.

PEIS. In the meantime, I'll smash your balloting boxes.

COM. Remember, how you effaced the public monument,

1384

On the pillar, and defiled it late last night.

PEIS. Pah! stuff! There, seize him, somebody. —What, you're off, too.

Come, let's remove, and get away from hence,

And sacrifice our goat to the gods within doors.

CHORUS.

Henceforth—Our Worth,

Our Right—Our Might,

1390

Shall be shown,

Acknowledged, known;

Mankind shall raise

Prayers, vows, praise,

To the Birds alone.

1395

Our employ is to destroy

The vermin train,

Ravaging amain

Your fruits and grain:

We're the wardens

1400

Of your gardens,

To watch and chase

The wicked race,

And cut them shorter

In hasty slaughter.

1405

EPIRRHEMA.

At the present urgent crisis, all your efforts and attention

Are directed to secure Diagoras's apprehension:

Handsome bounties have been offer'd of a talent for his head,

Likewise with respect to Tyrants (Tyrants, that are gone and dead),

Bounties of a talent each, for all that can be kill'd or caught.

1410

With a zealous emulation, we, the Birds, have also thought

Just and proper to proclaim, from this time forth, that we withdraw

From Philocrates, the fowler, the protection of the law;

Furthermore, we fix a price for bringing him alive or dead,

Four, if he's secured alive, a single talent for his head:

1415

He, that Ortolans and Quails to market has presumed to bring,

And the Sparrows, six a penny, tied together in a string,

With a wicked art retaining sundry Doves in his employ,

Fasten'd, with their feet in fetters, forced to serve for a decoy.

Further, we declare and publish our command to men below, 1420

All the Birds you keep in prison, to release and let them go.

We shall, else, revenge ourselves, and we shall teach the tyrants yet,

How to chirp and dance in fetters, in the tangles of a net.

CHORUS.

Blest are they,

The Birds alway, 1425

With perfect clothing,

Fearing nothing,

Cold or sleet or summer heat.

As it chances,

As he fancies, 1430

Each his own vagary follows,

Dwelling in the dells and hollows;

When, with eager weary strain,

The shrilly grasshoppers complain,

Parch'd upon the sultry plain, 1435

Madden'd with the raging heat,

We secure a cool retreat,

In the shady nooks and coves,

Recesses of the sacred groves,

Many a herb, and many a berry 1440

Serves to feast, and make us merry.

ANTEPIRRHEMA.

To the judges of the prize, we wish to mention in a word

The return we mean to make, if our performance is preferr'd.

First, then, in your empty coffers you shall see the sterling Owl,

From the mines of Laurium, familiar as a common fowl; 1445

Roosting among the bags and pouches, each at ease upon his nest;

Undisturb'd, rearing and hatching little broods of interest:

If you wish to cheat in office, but are inexpert and raw,

You should have a Kite for agent, capable to gripe and claw;

Cranes and Cormorants shall help you to a stomach and a throat 1450

When you feast abroad; but if you give a vile, unfriendly vote,

Hasten and provide yourselves, each, with a little silver plate,

Like the statues of the gods, for the protection of his pate;

Else, when forth abroad you ramble on a summer holiday,

We shall take a dirty vengeance, and befool
your best array. 1455

PEIS. Well, Friends and Birds, the sacrifice has succeeded;

Our omens have been good ones, good and
fair.

But what's the meaning of it? We've no
news. 1458

From the new building yet! No messenger!

Oh! there at last, I see,—There's somebody
Running at speed, and panting like a racer.

Enter a messenger, quite out of breath, and speaking in short snatches.

MESS. Where is he? Where? Where is he? Where? Where is he?—

The president, Peisthetairus?

PEIS. [coolly.] Here am I.

MESS. [in a gasp of breath.] Your fortification's finish'd.

PEIS. Well! that's well.

MESS. A most amazing, astonishing work it is! 1465

So that Theagenes and Proxenides

Might flourish, and gasconade, and prance
away,

Quite at their ease, both of them four-in-
hand,

Driving abreast upon the breadth of the wall,

Each in his own chariot.

PEIS. You surprise me. 1470

MESS. And the height (for I made the measurement myself)

Is exactly a hundred fathom.

PEIS. Heaven and earth!

How could it be? Such a mass! Who could have built it?

MESS. The Birds; no creature else—no foreigners, 1474

Egyptian bricklayers, workmen or masons,
But they themselves, alone, by their own efforts

(Even to my surprise, as an eye-witness)—

The Birds, I say, completed everything.

There came a body of thirty thousand
Cranes 1479

(I won't be positive, there might be more)
With stones from Africa, in their craws and gizzards,

Which the Stone-curlaws and Stone-chatterers Work'd into shape and finish'd. The Sand-Martins,
And Mud-larks, too, were busy in their department,

1484

Mixing the mortar, while the Water-Birds,
As fast as it was wanted, brought the water
To temper, and work it.

PEIS. [in a fidget.] But who served the masons?

Who did you get to carry it?

MESS.

To carry it?

Of course, the Carrion Crows and Carrying Pigeons.

PEIS. [in a fuss, which he endeavours to conceal.] Yes! yes! But after all, to load your hods—

1490

How did you manage that?

MESS.

Oh, capitally,

I promise you.—There were the Geese, all barefoot,

Trampling the mortar, and, when all was ready,

They handed it into the hods so cleverly,
With their flat feet!

PEIS. [A bad joke, as a vent for irritation.]

They footed it, you mean—

1495

Come; it was handily done though, I confess.

MESS. Indeed, I assure you, it was a sight to see them;

And trains of Ducks there were, clambering the ladders,

With their duck legs, like bricklayer's 'prentices,

All dapper and handy, with their little trowels.

1500

PEIS. In fact, then, it's no use engaging foreigners;

Mere folly and waste; we've all within ourselves.

Ah, well now, come! But about the wood-work? Heh!

Who were the carpenters? Answer me that!

MESS. The Woodpeckers, of course: and there they were,

1505

Labouring upon the gates, driving and banging,

With their hard hatchet beaks, and such a din,

Such a clatter as they made, hammering and hacking,

In a perpetual peal, pelting away

Like shipwrights hard at work in the arsenal.

And now their work is finish'd, gates and all,

1511

Staples and bolts, and bars and everything;
The sentries at their posts; patrols appointed;

The watchmen in the barbican; the beacons
Ready prepared for lighting; all their signals
Arranged—But I'll step out, just for a moment,

1516

To wash my hands.—You'll settle all the rest.

Exit.

PEISTHETAIRUS, surprised at the rapid conclusion of the work, feeling from the volubility and easy manner of the messenger the blow which his authority has received; seeing that nothing is left for him to superintend, nothing to direct, nothing to suggest, or to find fault with, remains in an attitude of perplexity and astonishment, with his hands clasped across his forehead.

CHORUS. [to PEISTHETAIRUS, in a sort of self-satisfied, drawling tone.] Heighday!

Why, what's the matter with ye? Sure!

Ah! well now, I calculate, you're quite astonished;

1519

You did not know the nature of our birds:
I guess you thought it an impossible thing

To finish up your fortification job

Within the time so cleverly.

PEIS. [recovering himself and looking round.] Yes, truly.

Yes, I'm surprised, indeed, I must confess—

I could almost imagine to myself

1525

It was a dream, an illusion altogether—

—But there's the watchman of the town, I see!

In alarm and haste, it seems! He's running here—

The watchman enters, with a shout of alarm.

—Well, what's the matter?

W. A most dreadful business! 1529

One of the gods just now—Jupiter's gods—

Has bolted through the gates, and driven on

Right into the atmosphere, in spite of us,

And all the Jackdaws, that were mounting guard.

PEIS. [animated at the prospect of having something to manage.] What an outrage!

What an insult! Which of 'em?

Which of the gods?

W. We can't pretend to say; 1535

We just could ascertain that he wore wings.

We're clear upon that point.

PEIS. But a light party
Ought surely to have been sent in such a case;
A detachment—

W. A detachment has been sent
Already: a squadron of ten thousand Hawks, Besides a corps of twenty thousand Hobby-
hawks, 1541

As a light cavalry, to scour the country:
Vultures and Falcons, Ospreys, Eagles, all Have sallied forth; the sound of wings is
heard,

Rushing and whizzing round on every side,
In eager search.—The fugitive divinity 1546
Is not far off, and soon must be discovered.

PEIS. Did nobody think of slingers?
Where are they?

Where are the slingers got to? Give me a sling.

Arrows and slings, I say!—Make haste with 'em. 1550

CHOR. War is at hand,
On air and land,
Proclaim'd and fix'd.

War and strife, 1555
Eager and rife,
Are kindled atwixt

This state of ours,
And the heavenly powers.

Look with care
To the circuit of air; 1560

Watch lest he,
The deity,

Whatever he be,
Should unware

Escape and flee. 1565
But hark! The rushing sound of hasty
wings

Approaches us. The deity is at hand.

PEIS. Holloh, you! Where are ye flying?
Where are ye going?

Hold! Halt! Stop there, I tell ye!—Stop this instant!

What are ye? Where do you come from?
Speak, explain. 1570

IRIS. Me? From the gods, to be sure!
the Olympian gods.

PEIS. [pointing to the flaunting appendages of her dress.] What are ye? with all your flying trumpery!

A helmet, or a galley? What's your name?

IRIS. Iris, the messenger of the gods.

PEIS. A messenger!
Oh, you're a naval messenger, I reckon; 1575

The Salaminian galley, or the Paralian?

—You're in full sail, I see.

IRIS. What's here to do!

PEIS. Are there no birds in waiting?

Nobody

To take her into custody?

IRIS. Me, to custody?

Why, what's all this?

PEIS. You'll find to your cost, I promise
ye. 1580

IRIS. Well, this seems quite unaccountable!

PEIS. Which of the gates

Did ye enter at, ye jade? How came you
here?

IRIS. Gates!—I know nothing about your gates, not I.

PEIS. Fine innocent ignorant airs she gives herself!

You applied to the Pelicans, I suppose?—The captain 1585

Of the Cormorants on guard admitted you?

IRIS. Why, what the plague! what's this?

PEIS. So, you confess!

—You came without permission!

IRIS. Are you mad?

PEIS. Did neither the sitting magistrates nor birdmasters

Examine and pass you?

IRIS. Examine me, forsooth! 1590

PEIS. This is the way then!—without thanks or leave

You ramble and fly, committing trespasses
In an atmosphere belonging to your neighbours!

IRIS. And where would you have us fly then? Us, the gods!

PEIS. I neither know nor care.—But I know this— 1595

They sha'n't fly here.—And another thing I
know.

I know—that, if there ever was an instance
Of an Iris or a rainbow, such as you,
Detected in the fact, fairly condemn'd,

And justly put to death, it would be you. 1600
IRIS. But I'm immortal.

PEIS. [coolly and peremptorily.] That would make no difference;

We should be strangely circumstanced indeed,

With the possession of a Sovereign Power.
And you, the gods, in no subordination,

No kind of order; fairly mutinying, 1605
Infringing and disputing our commands.

—Now then, you'll please to tell me where you're going?

Which way you're steering with those wings of yours?

IRIS. [in a great fright, hesitating and hurried, but attempting to assume a tone of authority.] I? . . . I'm commission'd from my father Jove

To summon human mortals to perform 1610

Their rites and offerings and oblations, due To the powers above.

PEIS. And who do you mean? what powers?

IRIS. What powers? Ourselves, the Olympian deities!

PEIS. So then, you're deities, the rest of ye!

IRIS. Yes, to be sure. What others should there be? 1615

PEIS. Remember—once for all—that we, the Birds,

Are the only deities from this time forth,

And not your father Jove. By Jove! not he!

IRIS. Oh, rash, presumptuous wretch! Incense no more

The wrath of the angry gods, lest Ruin drive Her ploughshare o'er thy mansion; and Destruction, 1621

With hasty besom sweep thee to the dust;

Or flaming Lightning smite thee with a flash,

Left in an instant smouldering and extinct.

PEIS. Do ye hear her?—Quite in tragedy!—quite sublime! 1625

Come, let me try for a bouncer in return.

Let's see.—Let's recollect.—'Me dost thou deem,

Like a base Lydian or a Phrygian slave,

With hyperbolic bombast to scare?' 1629

I tell ye, and you may tell him—Jupiter—

If he provokes me, and pushes things too far—

Will see some eagles of mine, to outnumber his,

With firebrands in their claws, about his house.

And I shall send a flight of my Porphyrions, 1634

A hundred covey or more, arm'd cap-à-pie,

To assault him in his sublime celestial towers:

Perhaps he may remember, in old times

He found enough to do with one Porphyrion.

And for you, Madam Iris, I shall strip

Your rainbow-shanks, if you're impertinent,

Depend upon it, and I myself, in person, 1641

Will punish you, myself—old as I am.

IRIS. Curse ye, you wretch, and all your filthy words.

PEIS. Come, scuttle away; convey your person elsewhere;

Be brisk, and leave a vacancy. Brush off.

IRIS. I shall inform my father.—He shall know 1646

Your rudeness and impertinence. He shall,—He'll settle ye and keep ye in order.—You shall see.

PEIS. Oh dear! is it come to that? No, you're mistaken,

Young woman, upon that point; I'm not your man; 1650

I'm an old fellow grown; I'm thunder-proof; Proof against flames and darts and female arts:

You'd best look out for a younger customer.

CHOR. Notice is hereby given

To the deities of heaven, 1655

Not to trespass here,

Upon our atmosphere;

Take notice; from the present day

No smoke or incense is allow'd

To pass this way. 1660

PEIS. Quite strange it is! quite unaccountable!

That herald to mankind that was dispatch'd,

What has become of him? He's not yet return'd.

Enter HERALD.

HERALD. Oh, Peisthetairus, happiest, wisest, best,

Cleverest of men! Oh, most illustrious! 1665

Oh, most inordinately fortunate!

Oh, most . . . Oh, do, for shame, do bid me have done.

PEIS. What are you saying?

HER. All the people of Earth

Have join'd in a complimentary vote, decreeing 1669

A crown of gold to you, for your exertions.

PEIS. I'm much obliged to the people of Earth. But why?

What was their motive?

HER. Oh, most noble founder

Of this supereminent, celestial city,

You can't conceive the clamour of applause, The enthusiastic popularity, 1675

- That attends upon your name; th' impulse and stir
- That moves among mankind, to colonize
And migrate hither. In the time before,
There was a Spartan mania, and people went Stalking about the streets with Spartan staves, 1680
- With their long hair, unwash'd and slovenly,
Like so many Socrateses; but, of late,
Birds are the fashion—Birds are all in all—
Their modes of life are grown to be mere copies
- Of the birds' habits; rising with the Lark;
Scratching and scrabbling suits and informations;
- Picking and pecking upon points of law;
Brooding and hatching evidence;—in short,
It has grown to such a pitch, that names of Birds
- Are given to individuals; Chaerophon 1690
Is call'd an Owl, Theagenes a Goose,
Philocles a Cock Sparrow, Midias
A Dughill Cock.—And all the songs in vogue
- Have something about Birds, Swallows or Doves;
- Or about flying, or a wish for wings. 1695
Such is the state of things, and I must warn
you,
- That you may expect to see some thousands of them
- Arriving here, almost immediately,
With a clamorous demand for wings and claws:
- I advise you to provide yourself in time. 1700
- PEIS. Come, it won't do then, to stand dawdling here;
- Go you, fill the hampers and the baskets there With wings, and bid the loutish porter bring
them,
- While I stop here, to encounter the newcomers.
- CHOR. Shortly shall the noble town, 1705
Populous and gay,
Shine in honour and renown.
- PEIS. [dryly.] Why, perhaps she may.
- CHOR. The benignant powers of love,
From their happy sphere, 1710
From the blest abodes above—
- PEIS. [venting his ill-humour on the servant.]
- Curse ye, rascal! Can't ye move?
CHOR. —Are descending here,
Where in all this earthly range,
- He that wishes for a change, 1715
Can he find a seat,
Joyous and secure as this,
Fill'd with happiness and bliss,
Such a fair retreat?
- Here are all the lovely faces, 1720
Gentle Venus and the Graces,
And the little Cupid;
Order, ease and harmony,
Peace and affability.
- PEIS. The scoundrel is so stupid, 1725
Quicker, sirrah! bring it quicker!
- CHOR. Let him bring the woven wicker
With the winged store.
- I myself, in very deed,
With the varlet will proceed, 1730
And smite him more and more:
Like a sluggish ass he seems,
Or even as a man that dreams,
Therefore smite him sore.
- PEIS. [determined to cross them, relapses into good-humour.] He's a lazy rogue, it's true. 1735
- CHOR. Now range them forth, display'd
in order due;
Feathers of every form and size and hue,
With shrewd intent adapting every pinion
To the new residents of your dominion.
- PEIS. I vow by the Hawks and Eagles,
I won't bear it; 1740
I'll beat ye, I will myself, you lazy rascal!
- Enter a fellow, singing.*
- Y. MAN. 'Oh! for an Eagle's force and might,
Loftily to soar
Over land and sea, to light
On a lonely shore.' 1745
- PEIS. Well, here's a song that's something to the purpose.
- Y. MAN. Aye, aye, there's nothing like it —wings and flying!
- Wings are your only sort. I'm a birdfancier.
- In the new fashion quite. I've taken a notion
- To settle and live amongst ye. I-like your
laws. 1750
- PEIS. [very gravely and methodically.]
What laws do you mean? We've many laws amongst us.
- Y. MAN. Your laws in general; but particularly

The law that allows of beating one's own father.

PEIS. Why truly, Yes! we esteem it a point of valour

In a Chicken, if he clapperclaws the old Cock. 1755

Y. MAN. That was my view, feeling a wish in fact

To throttle mine, and seize the property.

PEIS. [with great candour and composure, simply stating a fact.]

Yes, but you'd find some difficulties here;
An obstacle insurmountable, I conceive;
An ancient statute standing unrepeal'd, 1760
Engraved upon our old Ciconian columns.
It says: that when a Stork or a Ciconia
Has brought his lawful progeny of young Storks

To bird's estate, and enabled them to fly,
The sire shall stand entitled to a maintenance, 1765

At the son's cost and charge, in his old age.

Y. MAN. [with a start of disappointment, slapping his forehead.]

I've managed finely, it seems, to mend myself!

Forced to maintain my father after all!

PEIS. [in a soothing consolatory tone.]

No, no; not quite so bad; since you're come here,

As a well-wisher to the establishment, 1770
Zealous and friendly, we'll contrive to equip you

With a suit of armour, as a soldier's orphan.
And now, young man, let me suggest some notions,

Things that were taught me when a boy.
'Your father?'

'Strike him not!' rather take this pair of wings; 1775

And this cockspur [giving him a sword];
imagine you've a coxcomb

Upon your head, to serve you for a helmet;
Look out for service, and enlist yourself;
Get into a garrison; live upon your pay;
And let your father live. You're fond of fighting, 1780

And fond of flying—take a flight to Thrace;
There you may please yourself, and fight your fill.

Y. MAN. By Jove, you're right. The notion's not a bad one,
I'll follow it up!

PEIS. [very gravely and quietly.] You'll find it the best way. Exit Y. MAN.

Enter KINESIAS, singing.

KIN. Fearless, I direct my flight 1785
To the vast Olympian height;

Thence at random I repair,
Wafted in the whirling air,
With an eddy, wild and strong,
Over all the fields of song. 1790

PEIS. Ah! well, Kinesias, I'm quite glad to see ye;

But what has brought ye and all your songs and music,
Hobbling along with your old chromatic joints?

KIN. [singing.] 'Let me live, and let me sing,

Like a bird upon the wing.' 1795

PEIS. No more of that; but tell us plainly, in prose,

What are ye come for? what's your scheme, your object?

KIN. I was anxious to procure a pair of wings,

To say the truth, wishing to make a tour
Among the clouds, collecting images, 1800
And metaphors, and things of that description.

PEIS. How so! do you procure 'em from the clouds?

KIN. Entirely! Our dithyrambic business absolutely

Depends upon them; our most approved commodities,

The dusky, misty, murky articles, 1805
With the suitable wings and feathers, are imported

Exclusively from thence. I'll give you a sample,

A thing of my own composing. You shall judge.

PEIS. But, indeed, I'd rather not.

KIN. But, indeed, you must;

It's a summary view of flying, comprehending it 1810

In all its parts, in every point of view.
[Singing.]

Ye gentle feather'd tribes,
Of every plume and hue,
That, in uninhabited air,
Are hurrying here and there; 1815
Oh! that I, like you,
Could leave this earthly level,

For a wild aerial revel;
O'er the waste of ocean
To wander and to dally 1820
With the billow's motion;

Or, in an eager sally,
Soaring to the sky,
To range and rove on high
With my plumy sails, 1825
Buffeted and baffled with the gusty gales,
Buffeted and baffled . . .

While KINESIAS is repeating these last lines PEISTHETAIRUS comes behind him and gives him a flap with a huge pair of wings.

KIN. A pretty, civil joke indeed!

PEIS. What joke?
I'm only buffeting you with the plumy sails;
I thought it was what you wanted.

KIN. Well, that's fine! 1830
Pretty respect for a master such as me;
A leader of the band, that all the tribes
Are ready to fight for, to bespeak him first.

PEIS. Well, we've a little unfledged chorus here,

That Leotrophides hatch'd, poor puny nestlings, 1835

I'll give 'em you for scholars.

KIN. Ah, laugh on!
Laugh on! but take my word for it, here I
stay,

Till you provide me with a pair of wings,
Proper to circumnavigate the skies.

Exit KINESIAS.

Enter SYCOPHANT, singing.

SYC. Tell us who the strangers are, 1840
Gentle Swallow. Birds of air, Party-colour'd, poor and bare,
Tell us who the strangers are.

Gentle Swallow, tell me true.

PEIS. Here's a fine plague broke out!
See yonder fellow 1845
Sauntering along this way, swaggering and
singing.

SYC. Hoh! gentle Swallow! I say, my gentle Swallow,
My gentle Swallow! How often must I call?

PEIS. Why, there it is; the prodigal in the fable

Seeking for Swallows in a ragged coat. 1850

SYC. [in an arrogant, overbearing tone.]
Who's he that's set to serve out wings?
Where is he?

PEIS. 'Tis I, but what do you want?
You should explain.

SYC. Wings! Wings! You need not have ask'd me. Wings I want.

PEIS. Do you mean to fly for flannel to Pellene?

SYC. [a little disconcerted at this allusion to his attire.] No, no! But I'm employ'd . . . I employ myself, 1855

In fact, among the allies and islanders;
I'm in the informing line.

PEIS. [in a tone of very grave irony, which the Sycophant not perceiving, he proceeds more fluently than before.] I wish you
joy.

SYC. And a mover and manager for prosecutions
In criminal suits, and so forth; you understand me;

So I wish to equip myself with a pair of
wings, 1860

To whisk about and trounce the islanders.

PEIS. Would it be doing things in better form

To serve a summons flying, think ye?

SYC. [not knowing very well what to make of him.] No, 1863

Not that, but just to avoid the risk of pirates,

To return in company with a flight of cranes
(As they do with the gravel in their gizzards)
With a belly-full of lawsuits for my ballast.

PEIS. [in a grave, primitive, and somewhat twaddling tone, intended to re-animate the impertinence of the Sycophant.] So this is your employment! A young man like you to be an informer! Is it possible?

SYC. Why shouldn't it? I was never bred to labour. 1870

PEIS. [as before.] But sure, there are other lawful occupations,

In which a brisk young fellow, such as you,
Might earn an honest, decent livelihood,

In credit and good-will, without informing.

SYC. [*thoroughly taken in, and thinking
he has to deal with a mere silly, well-meaning old man, becomes emphatically insolent.*]

Wings, my good fellow, wings—I want not
words! 1875

PEIS. [dryly.] I'm giving you wings, already.

SYC. [a little puzzled and taken aback.]
What, with words?

Is that your way?

PEIS. [in a tone of very grave banter.]
 Yes, for mankind in general
 Are wing'd, as it were, and brought to plume
 themselves
 In different ways, by speeches and discourse.
 SYC. [confused and puzzled.] What, all?
 PEIS. [as before.] Yes, all. I'll give you a striking instance: 1880
 You must have heard, yourself, elderly
 people
 Sitting conversing in the barber's shop.
 And one says—'Well, Diitrephes has talk'd
 So much to my young man, he has brought him at last 1884
 To plume himself in driving.' And another
 Says that his son is quite amongst the clouds,
 Grown flighty of late with studying tragedy.
 SYC. [with a sort of hesitating laugh.]
 So words are wings, you say.
 PEIS. No doubt of it.
 I say it, and I repeat it; human nature
 Is marvellously raised and elevated 1890
 By words. I was in hopes that I might raise
 you,
 By words of good advice, to another sphere,
 To live in an honest calling.
 SYC. [feeling himself bantered and beaten, but resolute and angry.] But I won't,
 though.
 PEIS. [coolly.] Why, what will you do?
 SYC. [sulkily at first, but animating as he proceeds.] Why, I won't disgrace my family:
 My father, and my grandfather before him,
 Served as informers; and I'll stick to it, 1896
 The profession.—So you'll please to hand
 'em me out,
 A pair of your best wings, Vultures or
 Hawks,
 To fly to the Islands, with my summonses,
 And home again to record them in the courts,
 And out again, to the Islands.
 PEIS. [in a tone of interest and sympathy, as if he was himself an amateur desirous of displaying his professional knowledge.]
 Yes, that's well; 1901
 I understand ye, I think; your method is,
 To be beforehand with 'em? Your defendant,
 You get him cast for non-appearance, heh!
 Before he can arrive; and finish him 1905
 In his absence, heh?
 SYC. [completely taken in, delighted, rubbing his hands.] By Jove, you're up to it!

PEIS. Then, whilst he's sailing here you get the start,
 And fly, to pounce upon the property,
 To rummage out the chattels.
 SYC. That's the trick,
 The notion of it!—I see you're up to it.—1910
 A man must whisk about, here and away,
 Just like a whipping-top.
 PEIS. Aye, yes, you're right;
 I understand you. The instance is a good
 one.—
 A whipping-top, you say. Well, by good luck,
 I've here a capital, slashing suit of wings 1915
 To serve ye, made of a cow-hide from Corcyra.
 SYC. Oh, heaven! what's there? a horse-whip?
 PEIS. Wings, I tell ye,
 To whisk ye about, to flog ye, and make ye
 fly.
 SYC. Oh dear! oh dear!
 PEIS. Scamper away, you scoundrel!
 Vanish, you vagabond! whisk yourself off!
 I'll pay ye for your practices in the courts,
 Your pettifoggicorascalities. Exit SYC. 1922
 [To the attendants.]
 Come, bundle up the wings; let's take 'em back. Exeunt.

STROPHE.

CHOR. We have flown and we have run,
 Viewing marvels many a one, 1925
 In every land beneath the sun.
 But the strangest sight to see
 Was a huge exotic tree,
 Growing, without heart or pith,
 Weak and sappy, like a withe; 1930
 But with leaves and boughs withal,
 Comely, flourishing, and tall.
 This the learned all ascribe
 To the Sycophantic tribe;
 But the natives there, like us, 1935
 Call it a Cleonymus.
 In the springs' delightful hours
 It blossoms with rhetoric flowers;
 I saw it standing in the field,
 With leaves in figure like a shield; 1940
 On the first tempestuous day
 I saw it cast those leaves away.

ANTISTROPHE.

There lies a region out of sight,
 Far within the realm of night,

Far from torch and candle-light. 1945
 There in feasts of meal and wine
 Men and demigods may join;
 There they banquet and they dine,
 Whilst the light of day prevails;
 At sunset their assurance fails. 1950
 If any mortal then presumes,
 Orestes, sallying from the tombs,
 Like a fierce heroic sprite,
 Assaults and strips the lonely wight. 1954

PROMETHEUS, PEISTHETAIRUS, CHORUS.

PRO. [enters muffled up, peeping about him with a look of anxiety and suspicion.]
 Oh, dear! if Jupiter should chance to see me!
 Where's Peisthetairus? Where?

PEIS. Why, what's all this?
 This fellow muffled up?

PRO. Do look behind me;
 Is anybody watching? any gods
 Following and spying after me?

PEIS. No, none; 1959
 None that I see; there's nobody—But you!
 What are ye?

PRO. Tell me, what's the time of day?
 PEIS. Why, noon; past noon; but tell me, who are ye? Speak.

PRO. Much past? How much?
 PEIS. [aside.] Confound the fool, I say!
 The insufferable blockhead!

PRO. How's the sky? 1964
 Open or overcast? Are there any clouds?

PEIS. [aloud and angrily.] Be hang'd!
 PRO. Then I'll disguise myself no longer.
 PEIS. My dear Prometheus!

PRO. Hold your tongue, I beg; Don't mention my name! If Jupiter should see me

Or overhear ye, I'm ruin'd and undone.
 —But now, to give you a full complete account 1970

Of everything that's passing there in
 Heaven—

The present state of things . . . But first, I'll trouble you

To take the umbrella, and hold it overhead,
 Lest they should overlook us.

PEIS. What a thought!
 Just like yourself! A true Promethean
 thought! 1975

Stand under it, here! Speak boldly; never fear.

PRO. D'ye mind me?

PEIS. Yes, I mind ye; speak away.

PRO. [emphatically.] Jupiter's ruined!

PEIS. Ruin'd! How? Since when?

PRO. From the first hour you fortified and planted

Your atmospheric settlements. Ever since,
 There's not a mortal offers anything 1981

In the shape of sacrifice.—No smoke of victims!

No fumes of incense! Absolutely nothing!
 We're keeping a strict fast—fasting perforce,
 From day to day—the whole community.

And the inland barbarous gods in the upper
 country 1986

Are broken out, quite mutinous and savage,
 With hunger and anger; threatening to come
 down

With all their force, if Jupiter refuses To open the ports and allow them a free traffic 1990

For their entrails and intestines, as before.
 PEIS. [a little annoyed at being obliged to ask the question.]

What, are there other barbarous gods, besides,

In the upper country?

PRO. Barbarous?—To be sure!
 They're all of Excestides's kindred.

PEIS. [as before hesitating, but with a sort of affected ease.] Well . . . but . . . the name now: These same barbarous deities . . . 1995

What name do you call 'em?

PRO. [surprised at PEISTHETAIRUS's ignorance.] Call them! The Triballi!

PEIS. [giving vent to his irritation by a forced joke.] Ah! well, then, that accounts for our old saying—

Confound the Tribe of them!

PRO. [annoyed and dryly.] Precisely so.
 But now to business. Thus much I can tel-
 ly—

That envoys will arrive immediately 2000
 From Jupiter and those upland wild Triballi,

To treat for a peace. But you must not consent

To ratify or conclude, till Jupiter
 Acknowledges the sovereignty of the Birds,
 Surrendering up to you the Sovereign Queen,
 Whom you must marry.

PEIS. Why, what Queen is that? 2006

PRO. What Queen?—A most delightful, charming girl—

Jove's housekeeper, that manages his matters,
Serves out his thunderbolts, arranges everything;
The constitutional laws and liberties, 2010
Morals and manners, the marine department,
Freedom of speech, and threepence for the juries.

PEIS. Why, that seems all in all.

PRO. Yes, everything,
I tell ye; in having her, you've everything;
I came down hastily to say thus much; 2015
I'm hearty, ye know; I stick to principle.
Steady to the human interest—always was.

PEIS. Yes, we're obliged to you for our roast victuals.

PRO. And I hate these present gods, you know, most thoroughly:
I need not tell you that.

PEIS. [with a sort of half sneer.] No, no, you need not, 2020
You're known of old for an enemy to the gods.

PRO. Yes, yes, like Timon; I'm a perfect Timon;
Just such another. But I must be going;
Give me the umbrella; if Jupiter should see me, 2024
He'll think that I'm attending a procession.

PEIS. That's well; but don't forget the folding chair,
For a part of your disguise. Here, take it with you. Exit.

CHOR. Beyond the navigable seas,
Amongst the fierce Antipodes,
There lies a lake, obscure and holy, 2030
Lazy, deep and melancholy,
Solitary, secret, hidden,
Where baths and washing are forbidden.

Socrates, beside the brink,
Summons from the murky sink 2035
Many a disembodied ghost;
And Pisander reach'd the coast
To raise the spirit that he lost;
With a victim strange and new,
A gawky Camel which he slew, 2040
Like Ulysses—Whereupon
The grizzly sprite of Chaerephon
Flitted round him, and appear'd
With his eyebrows and his beard,
Like a strange infernal fowl, 2045
Half a Vampyre, half an Owl.

NEPTUNE, the TRIBALLIAN ENVOY,
HERCULES.

NEP. There's Nephelococcugia, that's the town,
The point we're bound to, with our embassy.
[Turning to the TRIBALLIAN.]

But you! What a figure have ye made yourself! 2049

What a way to wear a mantle! slouching off
From the left shoulder! Hitch it round, I tell ye,

On the right side. For shame,—come,—so; that's better,

These folds too, bundled up.—There, throw them round 2053

Even and easy,—so.—Why, you're a savage, A natural born savage.—Oh, democracy! What will it bring us to? when such a ruffian Is voted into an embassy!

TRI. [To NEPTUNE who is pulling his dress about.] Come, hands off!

Hands off!

NEP. Keep quiet, I tell ye, and hold your tongue,

For a very beast; in all my life in heaven, I never saw such another.—Hercules, 2060
I say, what shall we do? What should you think?

HER. What would I do? What do I think? I've told you Already—I think to throttle him—the fellow, Whoever he is, that's keeping us blockaded.

NEP. Yes, my good friend; but we were sent, you know, 2065

To treat for a Peace. Our embassy is for peace.

HER. That makes no difference; or if it does,

It makes me long to throttle him the more.

PEIS. [very busy, affecting not to see them.]
Give me the Silphium spice.—Where's the cheese-grater?

Bring cheese here, somebody! Mend the charcoal fire. 2070

HER. Mortal, we greet you and hail you! Three of us.

Three deities—

PEIS. [without looking up.] But I'm engaged at present;

A little busy, you see, mixing my sauce.

HER. Why sure! How can it be? what dish is this?

Birds seemingly!

PEIS. [without looking up.] Some individual birds, 2075

Opposed to the popular democratic birds,
Render'd themselves obnoxious.

HER. So, you've pluck'd them,
And put them into sauce, provisionally?

PEIS. [looking up.] Oh! bless me, Hercules, I'm quite glad to see you!
What brings you here?

HER. We're come upon an embassy 2080
From Heaven, to put an end to this same war—

SERV. [to PEISTHETAIRUS.] The cruet's empty, our oil is out.

PEIS. No matter,
Fetch more, fetch plenty, I tell ye. We shall want it.

HER. . . . For, in fact it brings no benefit to us, 2084
The continuance of the War prolonging it;
And you yourselves, by being on good terms
Of harmony with the gods—why, for the future,

You'd never need to know the want of rain,
For water in your tanks; and we could serve ye

With reasonable, seasonable weather, 2090
According as you wish'd it, wet or dry.

And this is our commission coming here,
As envoys, with authority to treat.

PEIS. Well, the dispute, you know, from the beginning

Did not originate with us. The war 2095
(If we could hope in any way to bring you
To reasonable terms) might be concluded.
Our wishes, I declare it, are for Peace.

If the same wish prevails upon your part;
The arrangement in itself, is obvious.— 2100
—A retrocession on the part of Jupiter.—
The Birds again to be reintegrated

In their estate of sovereignty.—This seems
The fair result; and if we can conclude,
I shall hope to see the ambassadors to supper. 2105

HER. Well, this seems satisfactory; I consent.

NEP. [to HERCULES.] What's come to ye? What do ye mean? Are ye gone mad?

You Glutton! would you ruin your own father,

Depriving him of his ancient sovereignty?

PEIS. [to NEPTUNE, with the civil, good-humoured sneer of a superior understand- ing.] Indeed!—And would not it be a better method 2110

For all you deities, and confirm your power.
To leave the Birds to manage things below?

You sit there, muffled in your clouds above,

While all mankind are shifting, skulking, 2115
lurking,

And perjuring themselves here out of sight.

Whereas, if you would form a steady strict Alliance with the Birds, when any man

(Using the common old familiar oath—
'By Jupiter and the crow') forswore himself,

The Crow would pick his eyes out, for his pains. 2120

NEP. Well, that seems plausible—that's fairly put.

HER. I think so, too.

PEIS. [to the TRIBALLIAN.] Well, what say you?

TRIB. Say true.

PEIS. [very volubly,—quite at his ease.]

Yes. He consents, you see! But I'll explain now

The services and good offices we could do you. 2124

Suppose a mortal made a vow, for instance,
To any o' You; then he delays and shuffles,
And says 'The gods are easy creditors'.

In such a case, we could assist ye, I say,
To levy a fine.

NEP. [open to conviction, but anxious to proceed on sure ground.] How would you do it? Tell me.

PEIS. Why, for example, when he's counting money, 2130

Or sitting in the bath, we give the warrant
To a pursuivant of ours, a Kite or Magpie;
And they pounce down immediately, and dis-
train

Cash or apparel, money or money's worth,
To twice the amount of your demand upon him. 2135

HER. Well, I'm for giving up the sovereignty,

For my part.

NEP. [convinced, but wishing to avoid responsibility, by voting last.] The Triballian, what says he?

HER. [aside to the TRIBALLIAN, showing his fist.]

You, Sir; do you want to be well bang'd or not?

Mind, how you vote! Take care how you provoke me.

TRIB. Yaw, yaw. Goot, goot.

HER. He's of the same opinion. 2140

NEP. Then, since you're both agreed, I must agree.

HER. [shouting to PEISTHETAIRUS, the negotiators having withdrawn to consult at the extremity of the stage.] Well, you!

We've settled this concern, you see, About the sovereignty; we're all agreed.

PEIS. Oh, faith, there's one thing more, I recollect,

Before we part; a point that I must mention. 2145

As for dame Juno, we'll not speak of her; I've no pretensions, Jupiter may keep her; But, for that other Queen, his manager, The sovereign goddess, her surrender to me Is quite an article indispensable. 2150

NEP. [with gravity and dignity.] Your views, I find, are not disposed for peace: We must turn homewards.

PEIS. As you please, so be it. Cook, mind what you're about there with the sauce;

Let's have it rich and savoury, thicken it up!

HER. How now, man? Neptune! are you flying off? 2155

Must we remain at war, here, for a woman?

NEP. But, what are we to do?

HER. Do? Why, make peace.

NEP. [in great wrath, like a grave Uncle scolding a great fool of a Nephew.] I pity you really! I feel quite ashamed

And sorry to see you; ruining yourself!

If anything should happen to your father, After surrendering the sovereignty, 2161

What's to become of you? When you yourself

Have voted away your whole inheritance: At his decease, you must remain a beggar.

PEIS. [aside to HERCULES.] Ah there!

I thought so; he's coming over ye; 2165 Step here, a moment! Let me speak to ye!

Your Uncle's chousing you, my poor dear friend,

You've not a farthing's worth of expectation, From what your father leaves. Ye can't inherit

By law: ye're illegitimate, ye know. 2170

HER. Heighday! Why, what do you mean?

PEIS.

I mean the fact!

Your mother was a foreigner; Minerva Is counted an heiress, everybody knows; How could that be, supposing her own father To have had a lawful heir?

HER.

But, if my father 2175

Should choose to leave the property to me, In his last Will.

PEIS.

The law would cancel it! And Neptune, he that's using all his influence To work upon ye, he'd be the very first To oppose ye, and oust ye, as the testator's brother. 2180

I'll tell ye what the law says, Solon's law: 'A foreign heir shall not succeed,

Where there are children of the lawful breed: But, if no native heir there be,

The kinsman nearest in degree 2185 Shall enter on the property.'

HER. Does nothing come to me, then?—

Nothing at all,

Of all my father leaves?

PEIS.

Nothing at all,

I should conceive. But you perhaps can tell me;

Did he, your father, ever take ye with him, To get ye enroll'd upon the register? 2191

HER. No truly, I—thought it strange—he—never did.

PEIS. Well, but don't think things strange. Don't stand there, stammering,

Puzzling and gaping. Trust yourself to me, 'Tis I must make your fortune after all! 2195

If you'll reside and settle amongst us here,

I'll make you chief Commander among the Birds,

Captain, and Autocrat and everything.

Here you shall domineer and rule the roast, With splendour and opulence and pigeon's milk. 2200

HER. [in a more audible voice, and in a formal decided tone.] I agreed with you before: I think your argument

Unanswerable. I shall vote for the surrender.

PEIS. [to NEPTUNE.] And what say you?

NEP. [firmly and vehemently.] Decidedly, I dissent.

PEIS. Then it depends upon our other friend, 2204

It rests with the Triballian, what say you?

TRI. Me tell you; pretty girl, grand beautiful Queen.

Give him to Birds.

HER. Aye, give her up, you mean.

NEP. Mean! He knows nothing about it. He means nothing

But chattering like a Magpie.

PEIS. Well, 'The Magpies'

He means, the Magpies or the Birds in general. 2210

The Republic of the Birds—their government—

That the surrender should be made to them.

NEP. [in great wrath.] Well, settle it yourselves; amongst yourselves;

In your own style: I've nothing more to say.

HER. [to PEISTHETAIRUS.] Come, we're agreed, in fact, to grant your terms; 2215

But you must come, to accompany us to the sky;

To take back this same Queen, and the other matters.

PEIS. [very quietly.] It happens lucky enough, with this provision

For a marriage-feast. It seems prepared on purpose.

HER. Indeed, and it does. Suppose in the meanwhile, 2220

I superintend the cookery, and turn the roast,

While you go back together.

NEP. [with a start of surprise and disgust.] Turn the roast!

A pretty employment! Won't you go with us?

HER. No, thank ye; I'm mighty comfortable here.

PEIS. Come, give me a marriage robe; I must be going. 2225

CHOR. Along the Sycophantic shore, And where the savage tribes adore

The waters of the Clepsydra,

There dwells a nation, stern and strong, Armed with an enormous tongue, 2230

Wherewith they smite and slay:

With their tongues, they reap and sow, And gather all the fruits that grow,

The vintage and the grain;

Gorgias is their Chief of pride, 2235

And many more there be beside

Of mickle might and main.

Good they never teach, nor show

But how to work men harm and woe,

Unrighteousness and wrong; 2240
And hence, the custom doth arise,
When beasts are slain in sacrifice,
We sever out the tongue.

Enter a HARBINGER or HERALD, [announcing the approach of PEISTHETAIRUS].

HER. O fortunate! O triumphant! O beyond

All power of speech or thought, supremely blest, 2245

Prosperous happy Birds!—Behold your King Here in his glorious palace!—Mark his entrance,

Dazzling all eyes, resplendent as a Star; 2248
Outshining all the golden lights, that beam,
From the rich roof, even as a summer Sun,
Or brighter than the Sun, blazing at Noon.

He comes; and at his side a female form
Of beauty ineffable; wielding on high,
In his right hand, the winged thunderbolt,
Jove's weapon. While the fumes of incense spread, 2255

Circling around, and subtle odours steal
Upon the senses from the wreathed smoke.
Curling and rising in the tranquil air.

See, there he stands! Now must the sacred Muse 2259

Give with auspicious words her welcome due

SEMICHORUS.

Stand aside and clear the ground,
Spreading in a circle round
With a worthy welcoming;
To salute our noble King
In his splendour and his pride, 2265
Coming hither, side by side
With his happy lovely bride.

O the fair delightful face!
What a figure! What a grace!
What a presence! What a carriage! 2270
What a noble worthy marriage!

Let the Birds rejoice and sing,
At the wedding of the King:
Happy to congratulate Such a blessing to the state. 2275

Hymen Hymen Hoh!

Jupiter, that god sublime,
When the Fates, in former time,
Match'd him with the Queen of Heaven,
At a solemn banquet given. 2280

Such a feast was held above;
 And the charming God of Love,
 Being present in command,
 As a Bridesman took his stand,
 With the golden reins in hand. 2285
 Hymen Hymen Hoh!

PEIS. I accept and approve the marks of your love,
 Your music and verse I applaud and admire.
 But rouse your invention, and raising it higher, 2289
 Describe me the terrible engine of Jove,
 The thunder of Earth and the thunder above.
 CHOR. O dreaded Bolt of Heaven,
 The Clouds with horror cleaving, 2293
 And ye terrestrial thunders deep and low
 Closed in the subterranean caves below,

That even at this instant growl and rage,
 Shaking with awful sound this earthly stage;
 Our King by you has gain'd his due;
 By your assistance, yours alone,
 Everything is made his own, 2300
 Jove's dominion and his throne;
 And his happiness and pride,
 His delightful lovely bride.

Hymen Hymen Hoh!

PEIS. Birds of ocean and of air, 2305
 Hither in a troop repair,
 To the royal ceremony,
 Our triumphant matrimony!
 Come for us to feast and feed ye!
 Come to revel, dance, and sing!— 2310
 Lovely creature! Let me lead ye
 Hand in hand, and wing to wing.

PLAUTUS (254-184 B. C.)

THE CAPTIVES¹

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

ERGASILUS, a parasite
 HEGIO, an old gentleman
 PHILOCRATES, an Ælian Knight } the prisoners
 TYNDARUS, son of HEGIO }
 ARISTOPHONTES, a prisoner
 PHILOPOLEMUS, a young man, son of HEGIO
 STALAGMUS, a slave
Overseers of slaves
 A boy

The Scene represents the house of HEGIO in Ætolia. Before the house are seen standing in chains the two prisoners, PHILOCRATES and TYNDARUS.

PROLOGUE. You all can see two prisoners standing here,
 Standing in bonds; they stand, they do not sit;
 In this you'll witness that I speak the truth.
 Old Hegio, who lives here, is this one's
 father;
 But how he's come to be his father's slave 5
 My prologue shall inform you, if you'll listen.

This old man had two sons; the one of whom
 Was stolen by a slave when four years old.

¹Translated in the original meters by Edward H. Sugden.

He ran away to Elis and there sold him
 To this one's father.

—Do you see?—That's right! 10
 Yon fellow in the gallery says he does n't?
 Let him come nearer, then! What, there's no room?

If there's no room to sit, there's room to walk!

You'd like to send me begging, would you,
 sir!

Pray, don't suppose I'll crack my lungs for
 you! 15

You gentlemen of means and noble rank
 Receive the rest; I hate to be in debt.
 That run-a-way, as I've already said,
 When in his flight he'd stolen from his home
 His master's son, sold him to this man's
 father, 20

Who, having bought him, gave him to his
 son

To be his valet; for the two lads were Much of an age. Now he's his father's slave
 In his own home, nor does his father know
 it;

See how the gods play ball with us poor
 men! 25

Now then, I've told you how he lost one
 son.

The Ætolians and the Elians being at war,
 His other son a not uncommon thing
 In war, was taken prisoner; and a doctor

At Elis, called Menarchus, bought him
there. 30

His father then began to buy up Elians,
To see if he could find one to exchange
Against his son,—the one that is a prisoner;
The other, who's at home, he doesn't know.
Now, only yesterday he heard a rumor 35
How that an Elian knight of highest rank
And noblest family was taken prisoner;
He spared no cash if he might save his son;
And so, to get him home more readily,
He bought these two from the commissioners. 40

But they between themselves have laid a plot,

So that the slave may get his lord sent home.
Thus they've exchanged their clothing and their names;

He's called Philocrates, he Tyndarus,
And either plays the other's part to-day. 45
The slave to-day will work this clever dodge,
And get his master set at liberty.
By the same act he'll save his brother too,
And get him brought back free to home and
father,

Though all unwitting: oft we do more good 50
In ignorance than by our best-laid plans.
Well, ignorantly, in their own deceit,
They've so arranged and worked their little trick,

That he shall still remain his father's slave.
For now, not knowing it, he serves his
father. 55

What things of naught are men, when one reflects on 't!

This story's ours to act, and yours to see.
But let me give you one brief word of warn-
ing:

It's well worth while to listen to this play.
It's not been treated in a hackneyed fashion,
Nor like the rest of plays; here you'll not find

Verses that are too nasty to be quoted.
Here is no perjured pimp, or crafty girl,
Or braggart captain.—Pray, don't be afraid
Because I said a war was going on 65
Between the Ætolians and the Elians;
The battles won't take place upon the stage.
We're dressed for comedy; you can't expect
That we should act a tragedy all at once.
If anybody's itching for a fight, 70

Just let him start a quarrel; if he gets
An opposite that's stronger, I dare bet
He'll quickly see more fighting than he likes,

And never long to see a fight again. 74
I'm off. Farewell, ye most judicious judges
At home, most valiant fighters in the field!
Exit.

Enter ERGASILUS from the town.

ERG. Grace is the name the boys have given me,
Because I'm always found before the meat!
The wits, I know, say it's ridiculous;
But so don't I! For at the banquet-table 80
Your gamester throws the dice and asks for grace.

Then is grace there or not? Of course she is!
But, more of course, we parasites are there,
Though no one ever asks or summons us!
Like mice we live on other people's food; 85
In holidays, when folks go out of town,
Our teeth enjoy a holiday as well.

As, when it's warm, the snails lie in their shells,

And, failing dew, live on their native juices;
So parasites lie hid in misery 90
All through the holidays, living on their juices,

Whilst those they feed on jaunt it in the country.

During the holidays, we parasites
Are greyhounds; when they're over, we are mastiffs. 94

Bred out of "Odious" by "Prince of Bores."
Now here, unless your parasite can stand
Hard fisticuffs, and has no strong objection
To have the crockery broken on his pate,
He'd better go and take a porter's billet
At the Trigeminal gate; which lot, I fear, 100
Is not at all unlikely to be mine.

My patron has been captured by the foe—
The Ætolians and the Elians are at war,
(This is Ætolia); Philopolemus, 104
The son of Hegio here, whose house this is,
In Elis lies a prisoner; so this house

A house of lamentation is to me;
As oft as I behold it, I must weep.
Now for his son's sake, he's begun a trade,
Dishonorable, hateful to himself; 110

He's buying prisoners, if perchance he may Find any to exchange against his soft.

O how I pray that he may gain his wish!
Till he's recovered, I am past recovery.

The other youths are selfish, hopelessly, 115
And only he keeps up the ancient style.

I've never flattered him without reward;
And the good father takes after his son!

Now I'll go see him. Ha! the door is opening, Whence I have often come, just drunk with gorging. 120

Enter from the house HEGIO and an Overseer.

HEG. Attend to me; those prisoners that I bought

A day ago from the Commissioners
Out of the spoil, put lighter fetters on them;
Take off these heavier ones with which they're bound, 124
And let them walk indoors or out at will;
But watch them with the utmost careful-
ness.

For when a free man's taken prisoner,
He's just like a wild bird; if once he gets
A chance of running off, it's quite enough;
You need n't hope to catch your man again.

OVER. Why, all of us would rather far be free 131

Than slaves.

HEG. Why not take steps, then, to be free?

OVER. Shall I give leg-bail? I've naught else to give!

HEG. I fancy that in that case you would catch it!

OVER. I'll be like that wild bird you spoke about. 135

HEG. All right; then I will clap you in a cage.

Enough of this; do what I said, and go.

Exit Overseer into the house.

I'll to my brother's, to my other captives,
To see how they've behaved themselves last
night,

And then I'll come back home again straight-
way. 140

ERG. [aside]. It grieves me that the poor old man should ply

This gaoler's trade to save his hapless son.
But if perchance the son can be brought
back,

The father may turn hangman: what care
I? 144

HEG. Who speaks there?

ERG. One who suffers in your grief.
I'm growing daily thinner, older, weaker!
See, I'm all skin and bones, as lean as lean!
All that I eat at home does me no good;
Only a bite at a friend's agrees with me.

HEG. Ergasilus! hail!

ERG. Heav'n bless you, Hegio! 150

HEG. Don't weep!

ERG. Not weep for him? What, not bemoan

That excellent young man?

HEGIO. I always knew

You and my son to be the best of friends

ERG. Alas! we don't appreciate our blessings 154

Till we have lost the gifts we once enjoyed.
Now that your son is in the foeman's hands,
I realize how much he was to me!

HEG. Ah, if a stranger feels his loss so much,

What must I feel? He was my only joy.

ERG. A stranger? I a stranger?

Hegio, 160

Never say that nor cherish such a thought!

Your only joy he was, but oh! to me

Far dearer than a thousand only joys.

HEG. You're right to make your friend's distress your own;

But come, cheer up!

ERG. Alas! it pains me here, 165

That now the feaster's array is discharged.

HEG. And can't you meantime find another general

To call to arms this army that's discharged?

ERG. No fear! since Philopolemus was taken, 169

Who filled that post, they all refuse to act.

HEG. And it's no wonder they refuse to act.

You need so many men of divers races

To work for you; first, those of Bakerton;

And several tribes inhabit Bakerton; 174

Then men of Breadport and of Biscuit-ville,

Of Thrushborough and Ortolania,

And all the various soldiers of the sea.

ERG. How oft the noblest talents lie concealed!

O what a splendid general you would make,
Though now you're serving as a private merely. 180

HEG. Be of good cheer; in a few days, I t'ast,

I shall receive my dear son home again.

I've got a youthful Elian prisoner,

Whom I am hoping to exchange for him, 184

One of the highest rank and greatest wealth.

ERG. May Heaven grant it!

HEGIO. Where've you been invited
To dine to-day?

ERG. Why, nowhere that I know of
Why do you ask?

HEG. Because it is my birthday;
And so, I pray you, come and dine with me.

ERG. Well said indeed!

HEG. That is if you're content 190
With frugal fare.

ERG. Well, if it's not too frugal;
I get enough of that, you know, at home.

HEG. Well, name your figure!

ERG. Done! unless I get
A better offer, and on such conditions
As better suit my partners and myself. 195
As I am selling you my whole estate,
It's only fair that I should make my terms.

HEG. I fear that this estate you're selling
me

Has got a bottomless abyss within't!
But if you come, come early.

ERG. Now, if you like! 200

HEG. Go hunt a hare; you've only caught a weasel.

The path my guest must tread is full of stones.

ERG. You won't dissuade me, Hegio;
don't think it!

I'll get my teeth well shod before I come.

HEG. My table's really coarse.

ERG. Do you eat brambles? 205

HEG. My dinner's from the soil.

ERG. So is good pork.

HEG. Plenty of cabbage!

ERG. Food for invalids!
What more?

HEG. Be there in time.

ERG. I'll not forget.

Exit ERGASILUS to the marketplace.

HEG. Now I'll go in and look up my accounts, 209

To see what I have lying at my banker's;
Then to my brother's, as I said just now.

Exit HEGIO into the house.

Enter Overseers, PHILOCRATES and TYN-DARUS, each in the other's clothes, and other slaves.

OVER. Since Heaven has willed it should be so,

That you must drink this cup of woe,
Why, bear it with a patient mind,
And so your pain you'll lighter find. 215

At home, I dare say, you were free;
Now that your lot is slavery,
Just take it as a thing of course,

Instead of making matters worse;
Behave yourselves and don't be queasy 220
About your lord's commands; 't is easy.

PRISONERS. Oh, oh!

OVER. No need for howls and cries!
I see your sorrow in your eyes.

Be brave in your adversities.

TYN. But we're ashamed to wear these chains. 225

OVER. My lord would suffer far worse
pains,

Should he leave you to range at large out of his custody,

Or set you at liberty whom he bought yester-
day.

TYN. Oh, he need n't fear that he'll lose his gains;

Should he release us, we know what's our duty, sir. 230

OVER. Yes, you'll run off; I know that.
You're a beauty, sir!

TYN. Run off? run off where?

OVER. To the land of your birth.

TYN. Nay, truly, it never would answer
To imitate runaway slaves.

OVER. Well, by Jove!
I'd advise you, if you get a chance, sir. 235

TYN. One thing I beg of you.

OVER. What's your petition, sir?

TYN. Give us a chance of exchanging a word,

Where there's no fear that we'll be over-
heard.

OVER. Granted! Go, leave them. We'll take our position there.

See that your talk doesn't last too long! 240

TYN. Oh, that's my intention. So now, come along!

OVER. Go, leave them alone.

TYN. We ever shall own

We're in your debt for the kindness you've shown to us;

You have the power, and you've proved yourself bounteous. 245

PHILOC. Come away farther, as far as we can from them;

We must contrive to conceal our fine plan
from them,

Never disclose any trace of our trickery,
Else we shall find all our dodges a mockery.

Once they get wind of it, 250
There'll be an end of it;

For if you are my master brave,
And I pretend to be your slave

Then we must watch with greatest care;
Of eavesdroppers we must beware. 255
With caution and skill keep your senses all waking;

There's no time to sleep; it's a big undertaking.

TYN. So I'm to be master?

PHILOC. Yes, that is the notion.

TYN. And so for your head (I would pray you remark it),

You want me to carry my own head to market! 260

PHILOC. I know.

TYN. Well, when you've gained your wish, remember my devotion.

This is the way that you'll find most men
treating you;

Until they have

The boon they crave, 265

They're kind as can be; but success makes the knave!

When they have got it, they set to work
cheating you.

Now I have told you the treatment you owe
to me.

You I regard as a father, you know, to me.

PHILOC. Nay, let us say,—no conventions shall hinder us,— 270

Next to my own, you're my father, dear
Tyndarus.

TYN. That will do!

PHILOC. Now then, I warn you always to remember this;

I no longer am your master but your slave;
don't be remiss.

Since kind Heav'n has shown us plainly that the way ourselves to save 275

Is for me, who was your master, now to turn into your slave,

Where before I gave you orders, now I beg of you in prayer,

By the changes in our fortune, by my father's kindly care,

By the common fetters fastened on us by the enemy,

Think of who you were and are, and pay no more respect to me 280

Than I used to pay to you, when you were slave and I was free.

TYN. Well, I know that I am you and you are me!

PHILOC. Yes, stick to that!

Then I hope that by your shrewdness we shall gain what we are at.

Enter HEGIO from his house.

HEG. [addressing some one inside]. I'll be back again directly when I've looked into the case:

Where are those whom I directed at the door to take their place? 285

PHILOC. O by Pollux! you've been careful that we shouldn't be to seek;

Thus by bonds and guards surrounded we have had no chance to sneak!

HEG. Howsoever careful, none can be as careful as he ought;

When he thinks he's been most careful, oft your careful man is caught.

Don't you think that I've just cause to keep a careful watch on you, 290

When I've had to pay so large a sum of money for the two?

PHILOC. Truly we've no right to blame you, that you watch and guard us thus;
And if we should get a chance and run away,
you can't blame us.

HEG. Just like you, my son is held in slavery by your countrymen.

PHILOC. Was he taken prisoner?

HEG. Yes.

PHILOC. We were n't the only cowards
then. 295

HEG. Come aside here; there is something I would ask of you alone;

And I hope you'll not deceive me.

PHILOC. Everything I know I'll own;
If in aught I'm ignorant, I'll tell you so,
upon my life.

HEGIO and PHILOCRATES go aside; TYNDARUS standing where he can hear their conversation.

TYN. [aside]. Now the old man's at the barber's; see my master whets his knife!

Why, he has n't even put an apron on to shield his clothes! 300

Will he shave him close or only cut his hair?
Well, goodness knows!

But if he has any sense, he'll crop the old man properly!

HEG. Come now, tell me, would you rather be a slave or get set free?

PHILOC. What I want is that which brings me most of good and least of ill.

Though I must confess my slavery was n't very terrible; 305

Little difference was made between me and my master's son.

TYN. [aside]. Bravo! I'd not give a cent for Thales, the Milesian!
 For, compared with this man's cunning, he is but a trifling knave.
 Mark how cleverly he talks, as if he'd always been a slave!
 HEG. Tell me to what family Philocrates belongs?
 PHILOC. The Goldings; 310
 That's a family most wealthy both in honors and in holdings.
 HEG. Is your master there respected?
 PHILOC. Highly, by our foremost men.
 HEG. If his influence amongst them is as great as you maintain,
 Are his riches fat?
 PHILOC. I guess so! Fat as suet, one might say.
 HEG. Is his father living?
 PHILOC. Well, he was, sir, when we came away; 315
 Whether he still lives or not, you'll have to go to hell to see.
 TYN. [aside]. Saved again! for now he's adding to his lies philosophy!
 HEG. What's his name, I pray?
 PHILOC. Thensaurocræsonicochrysidēs.
 HEG. I suppose a sort of nickname given to show how rich he is.
 PHILOC. Nay, by Pollux! it was given him for his avarice and greed. 320
 'ruth to tell you, Theodoromedes is his name indeed.
 HEG. What is this? His father's grasping?
 PHILOC. Grasping? Ay, most covetous! Just to show you, when he sacrifices to his Genius,
 All the vessels that he uses are of Samian crockery,
 Lest the Genius should steal them! There's his character, you see. 325
 HEG. Come with me then. [Aside]. Now I'll ask the other what I want to know.
 [To TYNDARUS.] Now, Philocrates, your slave has acted as a man should do,
 For from him I've learnt your birth; the whole he has confessed to me.
 If you will admit the same, it shall to your advantage be;
 For your slave has told me all.
 TYN. It was his duty so to do. 330
 All is true that he's confessed; although I must admit to you,

'T was my wish to hide from you my birth, and wealth, and family;
 But now, Hegio, that I've lost my fatherland and liberty,
 Naturally he should stand in awe of you much more than me,
 Since by force of arms our fortunes stand on an equality. 335
 I remember when he durst not speak a word to do me ill;
 He may strike me now; so fortune plays with mortals as she will.
 I, once free, am made a slave and brought from high to low degree,
 And instead of giving orders must obey submissively.
 But if I should have a master, such as I was when at home, 340
 I've no fear that his commands will prove unjust or burdensome.
 Hegio, will you bear from me a word of warning?
 HEG. Yes, say on.
 TYN. Once I was as free and happy as your own beloved son.
 But the force of hostile arms has robbed him of his freedom, too;
 He's a slave amongst our people, just as I am here with you. 345
 Certainly there is a God who watches us where'er we be;
 He will treat your son exactly as He finds that you treat me.
 Virtue sure will be rewarded, vice will e'er bring sorrow on—
 I've a father misses me, as much as you your absent son.
 HEG. Yes, I know. Do you admit, then, what your slave confessed to me? 350
 TYN. I admit, sir, that my father is a man of property,
 And that I'm of noble birth. But I beseech you, Hegio,
 Do not let my ample riches cause your avarice to grow,
 Lest my father think it better, though I am his only son,
 That I should continue serving you and keep your livery on, 355
 Rather than come home a beggar to my infinite disgrace.
 HEG. Thanks to Heav'n and my forefathers, I've been wealthy all my days;

Nor is wealth, in my opinion, always useful to obtain—

Many a man I've known degraded to a beast
by too much gain;

There are times when loss is better far than gain, in every way. 360

Gold! I hate it! Oh, how many people has it led astray!

Now, attend to me, and I my purpose plainly will declare:

There in Elis, with your people, is my son a prisoner.

If you'll bring him back to me, you shall not pay a single cent:

I'll release you and your slave too; otherwise
I'll not relent. 365

TYN. That's the noblest, kindest offer!
All the world can't find your mate!

But is he in slavery to a private man or to the State?

HEG. To Menarchus, a physician.

TYN. Ah! my client! all is plain;
Everything will be as easy as the falling of the rain.

HEG. Bring him home as soon as may be.

TYN. Certainly; but, Hegio— 370

HEG. What's your wish? For I'll do ought in reason.

TYN. Listen; you shall know.

I don't ask that I should be sent back until your son has come.

Name the price you'll take for yonder slave,
to let me send him home,

That he may redeem your son.

HEG. Nay, some one else I should prefer,

Whom I'll send when truce is made to go and meet your father there. 375

He can take your father any message that you like to send.

TYN. It's no use to send a stranger; all your toil in smoke would end.

Send my slave, he'll do the business just as soon as he gets there;

You won't hit on anybody you can send who's trustier,

Or more faithful; he's a man who does his work with all his heart. 380

Boldly trust your son to him; and he will truly play his part.

Don't you fear! at my own peril I'll make trial of his truth;

For he knows my kindness to him; I can safely trust the youth.

HEG. Well, I'll send him at your risk,
if you consent.

TYN. Oh, I agree. 384

HEG. Let him start as soon as may be.

TYN. That will suit me perfectly.

HEG. Well, then, if he does n't come back here you'll pay me fifty pounds;

Are you willing?

TYN. Certainly.

HEG. Then go and loose him from his bonds;

And the other too.

TYN. May Heaven ever treat you graciously!

Since you've shown me so much kindness,
and from fetters set me free.

Ah, my neck's more comfortable, now I've cast that iron ruff! 390

HEG. Gifts when given to good people win their gratitude! Enough!

Now, if you are going to send him, teach and tell him what to say,

When he gets home to your father. Shall I call him?

TYN. Do so, pray!

HEGIO crosses the stage to PHILOCRATES and addresses him.

HEG. Heav'n bless this project to my son
and me, 394

And you as well! I, your new lord, desire
That you should give your true and faithful service

To your old master. I have lent you to him,
And set a price of fifty pounds upon you.
He says he wants to send you to his father
That he may ransom my dear son and make
An interchange between us of our sons. 401

PHILOC. Well, I'm prepared to serve either one or t' other;

I'm like a wheel, just twist me as you please!
I'll turn this way or that, as you command.

HEG. I'll see that you don't lose by your compliance; 405

Since you are acting as a good slave should.
Come on.

Now, here's your man.

TYN. I thank you, sir,
For giving me this opportunity

Of sending him to bring my father word
About my welfare and my purposes; 410

All which he'll tell my father as I bid him.
Now, Tyndarus, we've come to an agreement,

That you should go to Elis to my father;

And should you not come back, I've undertaken 414

To pay the sum of fifty pounds for you.

PHILOC. A fair agreement! for your father looks

For me or for some other messenger

To come from hence to him.

TYN. Then, pray attend,

And I will tell you what to tell my father.

PHILOC. I have always tried to serve you hitherto, Philocrates, 420

As you wished me, to the utmost of my poor abilities.

That I'll ever seek and aim at, heart and soul and strength alway.

TYN. That is right: you know your duty.

Listen now to what I say.

First of all, convey a greeting to my parents
dear from me,

And to other relatives and friends, if any you should see. 425

Say I'm well, and held in bondage by this worthy gentleman,

Who has shown and ever shows me all the honor that he can.

PHILOC. Oh, you need n't tell me that,
it's rooted in my memory.

TYN. If I did n't see my keeper, I should think that I was free.

Tell my father of the bargain I have made with Hegio, 430

For the ransom of his son.

PHILOC. Don't stay to tell me that. I
know.

TYN. He must purchase and restore him, then we both shall be set free.

PHILOC. Good!

HEG. Bid him be quick, for your sake and for mine in like degree.

PHILOC. You don't long to see your son more ardently than he does his!

HEG. Why, each loves his own.

PHILOC. Well, have you any other messages? 435

TYN. Yes; don't hesitate to say I'm well and happy, Tyndarus;

That no shade of disagreement ever separated us;

That you've never once deceived me nor opposed your master's will,

And have stuck to me like wax in spite of all this flood of ill.

By my side you've stood and helped me in my sore adversities, 440

True and faithful to me ever. When my father hears of this,

Tyndarus, and knows your noble conduct towards himself and me,

He will never be so mean as to refuse to set
you free;

When I'm back I'll spare no effort that it may be brought about.

To your toil, and skill, and courage, and your wisdom, there's no doubt 445

That I owe my chance of getting to my father's home again:

For 't was you confessed my birth and riches
to this best of men;

So you set your master free from fetters by your ready wit.

PHILOC. Yes, I did, sir, as you say; I'm glad that you remember it.

But indeed, you've well deserved it at my hands, Philocrates; 450

For if I should try to utter all your many kindnesses,

Night would fall before I'd finished; you have done as much for me

As if you had been my slave.

HEG. Good heavens, what nobility Shines in both their dispositions! I can scarce refrain from tears

When I see their true affection, and the way the slave reveres 455

And commends his master.

TYN. Truly he has not commended me
Even a hundredth part as much as he himself deserves to be.

HEG. Well, as you've behaved so nobly,
now you have a splendid chance

Here to crown your services by doubly faithful vigilance.

PHILOC. As I wish the thing accomplished, so I shall do all I know; 460

To assure you of it, I call Jove to witness,
Hegio!

That I never will betray Philocrates, I'll take my oath!

HEG. Honest fellow!

PHILOC. I will treat him as myself, upon my troth!

TYN. From these loving protestations, mind you never never swerve.

And if I've said less about you than your faithful deeds deserve, 465

Pray you, don't be angry with me on account of what I've said;

But remember you are going with a price upon your head;
 And that both my life and honor I have staked on your return;
 When you've left my sight, I pray you, don't forget what you have sworn,
 Or when you have left me here in slavery instead of you, 470
 Think that you are free, and so neglect what you are pledged to do,
 And forget your solemn promise to redeem this good man's son.
 Fifty pounds, remember, is the price that we've agreed upon.
 Faithful to your faithful master, do not let your faith be bought;
 And I'm well assured my father will do everything he ought. 475
 Keep me as your friend forever, and this good old man as well.
 Take my hand in yours, I pray you, swear an oath unbreakable,
 That you'll always be as faithful as I've ever been to you.
 Mind, you're now my master, aye protector, and my father too!
 I commit to you my hopes and happiness.
 PHILOC. O that'll do! 480
 Are you satisfied if I can carry this commission through?
 TYN. Yes.
 PHILOC. Then I'll return in such a manner as shall please you both.
 Is that all, sir?
 HEG. Come back quickly.
 PHILOC. So I will, upon my troth.
 HEG. Come along then to my banker's;
 I'll provide you for the way.
 Also I will get a passport from the prætor.
 TYN. Passport, eh? 485
 HEG. Yes, to get him through the army so that they may let him go.
 Step inside.
 TYN. A pleasant journey!
 PHILOC. Fare-you-well!
 HEG. By Pollux, though,
 What a blessing that I bought these men from the Commissioners!
 So, please Heav'n, I've saved my son from bondage to those foreigners.
 Dear! How long I hesitated whether I should buy or not! 490
 Please to take him in, good slaves, and do not let him leave the spot,

When there is no keeper with him; I shall soon be home again.
Exeunt TYNDARUS and slaves into the house.
 Now I'll run down to my brother's and inspect my other men.
 I'll inquire if any of them is acquainted with this youth.
 [To PHILOCRATES.] Come along and I'll despatch you. That must be done first, in sooth. 495
Exeunt HEGIO and PHILOCRATES to the market-place.

Enter ERGASILUS returning from the market-place.

 ERG. Wretched he who seeks his dinner, and with trouble gets a haul;
 Wretcheder who seeks with trouble, and can't find a meal at all;
 Wretchedest who dies for food, and can't get any anyway.
 If I could, I'd like to scratch the eyes out of this cursed day!
 For it's filled all men with meanness towards me. Oh, I never saw 500
 Day so hungry; why, it's stuffed with famine in its greedy maw.
 Never day pursued its purpose in so vacuous a way;
 For my gullet and my stomach have to keep a holiday.
 Out upon the parasite's profession: it's all gone to pot!
 For us impecunious wits the gilded youth don't care a jot. 505
 They no longer want us Spartans, owners of a single chair,
 Sons of Smacked-Face, whose whole stock-in-trade is words, whose board is bare.
 Those that they invite are fellows who can ask them back in turn.
 Then they cater for themselves and us poor parasites they spurn;
 You will see them shopping in the market with as little shame 510
 As when, sitting on the bench, the culprit's sentence they proclaim.
 For us wits they don't care twopence; keep entirely to their set.
 When I went just now to market, there a group of them I met;
 "Hail!" says I; "where shall we go," says I, "to lunch?" They all were mum.

"Who speaks first? Who volunteers?" says

I. And still the chaps were dumb. 515
Not a smile! "Where shall we dine together?
Answer." Not a word!

Then I flashed a jest upon them from my very choicest hoard,
One that meant a month of dinners in the old days, I declare.

No one smiled; and then I saw the whole was a got-up affair.

Why, they would n't even do as much as any angry cur; 520

If they could n't smile, they might at least have shown their teeth, I swear!

Well, I left the rascals when I saw that they were making game;

Went to others; and to others; and to others
—still the same!

They had formed a ring together, just like those who deal in oil

I' the Velabrum. So I left them when I saw they mocked my toil. 525

In the Forum vainly prowling other parasites I saw.

I've resolved that I must try to get my rights
by Roman law.

As they've formed a plot to rob us of our life and victuals too,

I shall summon them and fine them, as a magistrate would do.

They shall give me ten good dinners, at a time when food is dear! 530

So I'll do; now to the harbor; there I may to dinner steer;

If that fails me, I'll return and try this old man's wretched cheer.

Exit ERGASILUS to the harbor.

Enter HEGIO from his brother's with

ARISTOPHONTES.

HEG. How pleasant it is when you've managed affairs

For the good of the public, as yesterday I did,

When I bought those two fellows. Why, every one stares 535

And congratulates me on the way I decided.
To tell the plain truth, I am worried with standing,

And weary with waiting;

From the flood of their words I could scarce
get a landing,

And even at the prætor's it showed no
abating. 540

I asked for a passport; and when it had
come,

I gave it to Tyndarus; he set off home.
When he had departed, for home off I started;

Then went to my brother's, to question the
others, 544

Whether any among them Philocrates knew.
Then one of them cries, "He's my friend,
good and true."

I told him I'd bought him;
He begged he might see him; and so I have brought him.

I bade them loose him from his chains,
And came away. [To ARISTOPHONTES.]

Pray follow me; 550

Your earnest suit success obtains,
Your dear old friend you soon shall see.

Exeunt HEGIO and ARISTOPHONTES into the house; TYNDARUS immediately rushes out.

TYN. Alas! the day has come on which I wish I never had been born.

My hopes, resources, stratagems, have fled and left me all forlorn.

On this sad day no hope remains of saving my poor life, 'tis clear; 555

No help or hope remains to me to drive away
my anxious fear.

No cloak I anywhere can find to cover up my crafty lies,

No cloak, I say, comes in my way to hide
my tricks and rogueries.

There is no pardon for my fibs, and no escape for my misdeeds;

My cheek can't find the shelter, nor my craft
the hiding-place it needs. 560

All that I hid has come to light; my plans lie open to the day;

The whole thing's out, and in this scrape I fail to see a single ray

Of hope to shun the doom which I must suffer for my master's sake.

This Aristophontes, who's just come, will surely bring me to the stake;

He knows me, and he is the friend and kinsman of Philocrates. 565

Salvation could n't save me, if she would;
there is no way but this,

To plan some new and smarter trickeries.
Hang it, what? What shall I do? I am just up a lofty tree,

If I can't contrive some new and quite preposterous foolery. 569

Enter from the house HEGIO and ARISTOPHONTES.

HEG. Where's the fellow gone whom we saw rushing headlong from the house?
TYN. [aside]. Now the day of doom has come; the foe's upon thee, Tyndarus!
O, what story shall I tell thee? What deny and what confess?
My purposes are all at sea; O, ain't I in a pretty mess?
O would that Heaven had blasted you before you left your native land,
You wretch, Aristophontes, who have ruined
all that I had planned. 575
The game is up if I can't light on some atrocious villainy!
HEG. Ah, there's your man; go speak
to him.
TYN. [aside]. What man is wretched than I?
ARIS. How is this that you avoid my eyes and shun me, Tyndarus?
Why, you might have never known me, fellow, that you treat me thus!
I'm a slave as much as you, although in Elis I was free, 580
Whilst you from your earliest boyhood were enthralled in slavery.
HEG. Well, by Jove! I'm not surprised that he should shun you, when he sees That you call him Tyndarus, not, as you should, Philocrates.
TYN. Hegio, this man in Elis was considered raving mad.
Take no note of anything he tells you either good or bad. 585
Why, he once attacked his father and his mother with a spear;
And the epilepsy takes him in a form that's most severe.
Don't go near him!
HEG. Keep your distance!
ARIS. Rascal! Did I rightly hear,
That you say I'm mad, and once attacked
my father with a spear?
And that I have got the sickness for which men are wont to spit? 590
HEG. Never mind! for many men besides yourself have suffered it,
And the spitting was a means of healing them, and they were glad.
ARIS. What, do you believe the wretch?

HEG. In what respect?
ARIS. That I am mad!
TYN. Do you see him glaring at you?
Better leave him! O beware!
Hegio, the fit is on him; he'll be raving soon!
Take care! 595
HEG. Well, I thought he was a madman when he called you Tyndarus.
TYN. Why, he sometimes does n't know his own name. Oh, he's often thus.
HEG. But he said you were his comrade.
TYN. Ah, no doubt! precisely so!
And Alcmaeon, and Orestes, and Lyncurgus, don't you know,
Are my comrades quite as much as he is!
ARIS. Oh, you gallows bird, 600
Dare you slander me? What, don't I know
you?
HEG. Come, don't be absurd.
You don't know him, for you called him
Tyndarus; that's very clear.
You don't know the man you see; you name
the man who is n't here.
ARIS. Nay, he says he is the man he isn't,
not the man he is. 605
TYN. O yes! Doubtless you know better whether I'm Philocrates
Than Philocrates himself does!
ARIS. You'd prove truth itself a liar,
As it strikes me. But, I pray you, look at
me!
TYN. As you desire! 611
ARIS. Are n't you Tyndarus?
TYN. I'm not.
ARIS. You say you are Philocrates?
TYN. Certainly.
ARIS. Do you believe him?
HEG. Yes, and shall do, if I please.
For the other, who you say he is, went home from here to-day
To the father of this captive.
ARIS. Father? He's a slave.
TYN. And, pray!
Are you not a slave, though you were free
once, as I hope to be,
When I have restored good Hegio's son to home and liberty? 614
ARIS. What's that, gaol-bird? Do you tell me that you were a free-man born?
TYN. No! Philocrates, not Freeman, is my name.
ARIS. Pray, mark his scorn!
Hegio, I tell you, you're being mocked and swindled by this knave;

Why, he never had a slave except himself;
for he's a slave.

TYN. Ah, because you're poor yourself, and have no means of livelihood,
You'd wish everybody else to be like you.
I know your mood; 620
All poor men like you are spiteful, envy
those who're better off.

ARIS. Hegio, don't believe this fellow;
for he's doing naught but scoff;
Sure I am, he'll play some scurvy trick on you before he's done;
I don't like this tale of his about the ransom
of your son.

TYN. You don't like it, I dare say; but I'll accomplish it, you see! 625
I'll restore him to his father; he in turn releases me.

That's why I've sent Tyndarus to see my
father.

ARIS. Come, that's lame!
You are Tyndarus yourself, the only slave who bears that name!

TYN. Why reproach me with my bondage? I was captured in the fray. 629

ARIS. Oh, I can't restrain my fury!

TYN. Don't you hear him? Run away!
He'll be hurling stones at us just now, if you don't have him bound.

ARIS. Oh, damnation!

TYN. How he glares at us! I hope your ropes are sound.
See, his body's covered over with bright spots of monstrous size!

It's the black bile that afflicts him.

ARIS. Pollux! if this old man's wise,
You will find black pitch afflict you, when it blazes round your breast. 635

TYN. Ah, he's wandering now, poor fellow! by foul spirits he's possessed!

HEG. [to TYNDARUS]. What do you think?
Would it be best to have him bound?

TYN. Yes, so I said.

ARIS. Oh, perdition take it! Would
I had a stone to smash his head,
This whipped cur, who says I'm mad! By Jove, sir, I will make you smart!

TYN. Hear him calling out for stones!

ARIS. Pray, might we have a word apart,
Hegio? 640

HEG. Yes, but keep your distance; there's no need to come so close!

TYN. If, by Pollux, you go any nearer, he'll bite off your nose.

ARIS. Hegio, I beg and pray you, don't believe that I am mad,
Or that I have epilepsy as this shameless fellow said.

But if you're afraid of me, then have me bound; I won't say no, 645
If you'll bind that rascal too.

TYN. O no, indeed, good Hegio!
Bind the man who wishes it!

ARIS. Be quiet, you! The case stands
thus;

I shall prove Philocrates the false to be true
Tyndarus.

What are you winking for?

TYN. I was n't.

ARIS. He winks before your very face!

HEG. What, if I approached this mad-
man?

TYN. It would be a wild-goose chase.
He'll keep chattering, till you can't make either head or tail of it. 651

Had they dressed him for the part, you'd say 't was Ajax in his fit.

HEG. Never mind, I will approach him.

TYN. [aside]. Things are looking very blue.

I'm between the knife and altar, and I don't know what to do.

HEG. I attend, Aristophontes, if you've anything to say. 655

ARIS. You shall hear that that is true which you've been thinking false to-
day.

First I wish to clear myself of all suspicion that I rave,

Or that I am subject to disease—except that I'm a slave.

So may He who's king of gods and men restore me home again:

He's no more Philocrates than you or I.

HEG. But tell me then, 660
Who he is.

ARIS. The same that I have told you from the very first.

If you find it otherwise, I pray that I may be accursed,

And may suffer forfeit of fatherland and freedom sweet.

HEG. What say you?

TYN. That I'm your slave, and you're my master.

HEG. That's not it
Were you free?

TYN. I was.

ARIS. He was n't. He's just lying worse and worse. 665

TYN. How do you know? Perhaps it happened that you were my mother's nurse,

That you dare to speak so boldly!

ARIS. Why, I saw you when a lad.

TYN. Well, I see you when a man to-day!

So we are quits, by gad!

Did I meddle with your business? Just let mine alone then, please.

HEG. Was his father called Thensauro-cræsonicochrysidēs? 670

ARIS. No, he was n't, and I never heard the name before to-day.

Theodoromedes was his master's father.

TYN. [aside]. Deuce to pay!

O be quiet, or go straight and hang yourself,
my beating heart!

You are dancing there, whilst I can hardly stand to play my part.

HEG. He in Elis was a slave then, if you are not telling lies, 675

And is not Philocrates?

ARIS. You'll never find it otherwise.

HEG. So I've been chopped into fragments and dissected, goodness knows,

By the dodges of this scoundrel, who has led me by the nose.

Are you sure there's no mistake though?

ARIS. Yes, I speak of what I know.

HEG. Is it certain?

ARIS. Certain? Nothing could be more entirely so. 680

Why, Philocrates has been my friend from when he was a boy;

But where is he now?

HEG. Ah, that's what vexes me, but gives him joy.

Tell me though, what sort of looking man is this Philocrates?

ARIS. Thin i' the face, a sharpish nose, a fair complexion, coal-black eyes,

Reddish, crisp, and curly hair.

HEG. Yes, that's the fellow to a T. 685

TYN. [aside]. Curse upon it, everything has gone all wrong to-day with me.

Woe unto those wretched rods that on my back to-day must die!

HEG. So I see that I've been cheated.

TYN. [aside]. Come on, fetters, don't be shy!

Run to me and clasp my legs and I'll take care of you, no fear!

HEG. Well, I've been sufficiently bam-boozled by these villains here. 690

T' other said he was a slave, while this pretended to be free;

So I've gone and lost the kernel, and the husk is left to me.

Yes, they've corked my 'nose most finely!

Don't I make a foolish show?

But this fellow here shan't mock me! Colaphus, Corax, Cordalio,

Come out here and bring your thongs.

Enter Overseers.

OVER. To bind up faggots? Here's a go! 695

HEG. Come, bind your heaviest shackles on this wretch.

TYN. Why, what's the matter? what's my crime?

HEG. Your crime!

You've sowed and scattered ill, now you shall reap it.

TYN. Had n't you better say I harrowed
too?

For farmers always harrow first, then sow.

HEG. How boldly does he flout me to my face! 701

TYN. A harmless, guiltless man, although a slave,

Should boldly face his master, of all men.

HEG. Tie up his hands as tightly as you can.

TYN. You'd better cut them off; for I am yours. 705

But what's the matter? Why are you so angry?

HEG. Because my plans, as far as in you
lay,

By your thrice-villainous and lying tricks You've torn asunder, mangled limb from limb,

And ruined all my hopes and purposes. 710

Philocrates escaped me through your guile;
I thought he was the slave, and you the free;

For so you said, and interchanged your names

Between yourselves.

TYN. Yes, I admit all that. 714

'T is just as you have said, and cunningly

He's got away by means of my smart work;
But I beseech you, are you wroth at that?

HEG. You've brought the worst of torments on yourself. 718

TYN. If not for sin I perish, I don't care!

But though I perish, and he breaks his word,
And does n't come back here, my joy is this:
My deed will be remembered when I'm dead,
How I redeemed my lord from slavery,
And rescued him and saved him from his
foes, 724

To see once more his father and his home;
And how I rather chose to risk my life,
Than let my master perish in his bonds.

HEG. The only fame you'll get will be in hell.

TYN. Nay, he who dies for virtue doesn't perish.

HEG. When I've expended all my torments on you, 730

And given you up to death for your deceits,
People may call it death or perishing
Just as they like; so long as you are dead,
I don't mind if they say that you're alive.

TYN. By Pollux! if you do so, you'll repent, 735

When he comes back as I am sure he will.

ARIS. O Heavens! I see it now! and understand

What it all means. My friend Philocrates
Is free at home, and in his native land.

I'm glad of that; nothing could please me
more. 740

But I am grieved I've got him into trouble,
Who stands here bound because of what I
said.

HEG. Did I forbid you to speak falsely
to me?

TYN. You did, sir.

HEG. Then how durst you tell me lies?

TYN. Because to tell the truth would have done hurt 745

To him I served; he profits by my lie.

HEG. But you shall smart for it!

TYN. O that's all right!

I've saved my master and am glad of that,
For I've been his companion from a boy;
His father, my old master, gave me to him.
D' you now think this a crime?

HEG. A very vile one. 751

TYN. I say it's right; I don't agree with
you.

Consider, if a slave had done as much

For your own son, how grateful you would
be! 754

Would n't you give that slave his liberty?
Would n't that slave stand highest in your favor?

Answer!

HEG. Well, yes.

TYN. Then why be wroth with me?

HEG. Because you were more faithful to your master

Than e'er to me.

TYN. What else could you expect? 759

Do you suppose that in one night and day
You could so train a man just taken captive,
A fresh newcome, as to serve you better Than him with whom he'd lived from earliest childhood?

HEG. Then let him pay you for it. Take him off,

And fit him with the heaviest, thickest
chains; 765

Thence to the quarries you shall go right on.
And whilst the rest are hewing eight stones
each,

You shall each day do half as much again,
Or else be nicknamed the Six-hundred-striper.

ARIS. By gods and men, I pray you,
Hegio, 770

Do not destroy him.

HEG. I'll take care of him!

For in the stocks all night he shall be kept,
And quarry stones all day from out the
ground.

O, I'll prolong his torments day by day.

ARIS. Is this your purpose?

HEG. Death is not so sure. 775

Go take him to Hippolytus the smith;

Tell him to rivet heavy fetters on him.

Then cause him to be led out of the city

To Cordalus, my freedman at the quarries,

And tell him that I wish him to be treated With greater harshness than the worst slave
there. 781

TYN. Why should I plead with you when you're resolved?

The peril of my life is yours as well.

When I am dead I have no ill to fear;

And if I live to an extreme old age, 785

My time of suffering will be but short.

Farewell! though you deserve a different
wish.

Aristophontes, as you've done to me,

So may you prosper; for it is through you

That this has come upon me.

HEG. Take him off. 790

TYN. But if Philocrates returns to you,
Give me a chance of seeing him, I pray.

HEG. Come, take him from my sight or I'll destroy you!

TYN. Nay, this is sheer assault and battery!

Exeunt Overseers and TYNDARUS to the quarries.

HEG. There, he has gone to prison as he merits. 795

I'll give my other prisoners an example,
That none of them may dare repeat his crime.

Had it not been for him, who laid it bare,
The rascals would have led me in a string.

Never again will I put trust in man. 800

Once cheated is enough. Alas! I hoped
That I had saved my son from slavery.

My hope has perished. One of my sons I lost,

Stolen by a slave when he was four years old;

Nor have I ever found the slave or him. 805

The elder's now a captive. What's my crime,

That I beget my children but to lose them?
Follow me, you! I'll take you where you were.

Since no one pities me, I'll pity none.

ARIS. Under good auspices I left my chain; 810

But I must take the auspices again.

Exeunt ARISTOPHONTES and HEGIO to HEGIO's brother's.

Enter ERGASILUS from the harbor.

ERG. Jove supreme, thou dost protect me and increase my scanty store,

Blessings lordly and magnific thou bestowest
more and more;

Both thanks and gain, and sport and jest,
festivity and holidays,

Processions plenty, lots of drink and heaps of meat and endless praise. 815

Ne'er again I'll play the beggar, everything
I want I've got;

I'm able now to bless my friends, and send my enemies to pot.

With such joyful joyfulness this joyful day has loaded me!

Though it has n't been bequeathed me, I've come into property!

So now I'll run and find the old man Hegio.
O what a store 820

Of good I bring to him, as much as ever he could ask, and more.

I am resolved I'll do just what the slaves do
in a comedy;

I'll throw my cloak around my neck, that he may hear it first from me.

For this good news I hope to get my board in perpetuity.

Enter HEGIO from his brother's.

HEG. How sad the regrets in my heart that are kindled, 825

As I think over all that has happened to
me.

O is n't it shameful the way I've been swindled,

And yet could n't see!

As soon as it's known, how they'll laugh in the city!

When I come to the market they'll show me
no pity, 830

But chaffing say, "Wily old man up a tree!"

But is this Ergasilus coming? Bless me!

His cloak's o'er his shoulder. Why, what can it be?

ERG. Come, Ergasilus, act and act vigorously!

Hereby I denounce and threaten all who shall obstruct my way; 835

Any man who dares to do so will have seen his life's last day.

I will stand him on his head.

HEG. 'Fore me the man begins to spar!

ERG. I shall do it. Wherefore let all passers-by stand off afar;

Let none dare to stand conversing in this street, till I've passed by;

For my fist's my catapult, my arm is my artillery, 840

And my shoulder is my ram; who meets my knee, to earth he goes.

Folk will have to pick their teeth up, if with me they come to blows.

HEG. What's he mean by all this threatening? I confess I'm puzzled
quite.

ERG. I'll take care they don't forget this day, this place, my mickle might.

He who stops me in my course, will find he's stopped his life as well. 845

HEG. What he's after with these threats and menaces, I cannot tell.

ERG. I proclaim it first, that none may suffer inadvertently;

Stay at home, good people all, and then you won't get hurt by me.

HEG. Oh, depend on 't, it's a dinner that has stirred his valorous bile.

Woe to that poor wretch whose food has given him this lordly style! 850

ERG. First, for those pig-breeding millers, with their fat and bran-fed sows, Stinking so that one is hardly able to get past the house;

If in any public place I catch their pigs outside their pen,

With my fists I'll hammer out the bran from those same filthy—men!

HEG. Here's pot-valor with a vengeance!
He's as full as man could wish! 855

ERG. Then those fishmongers, who offer to the public stinking fish,

Riding to the market on a jumping, jolting,
joggling cob,

Whose foul smell drives to the Forum every loafer in the mob;

With their fish baskets I'll deal them on their face a few smart blows,

Just to let them feel the nuisance that they cause the public nose. 860

HEG. Listen to his proclamations! What a royal style they keep!

ERG. Then the butchers, who arrange to steal the youngsters from the sheep,

Undertake to kill a lamb, but send you home right tough old mutton;

Nickname ancient ram as yearling, sweet enough for any glutton;

If in any public street or square that ram comes in my view, 865

I will make them sorry persons—ancient ram and butcher, too!

HEG. Bravo! he makes rules as if he were a mayor and corporation.

Surely he's been made the master of the market to our nation.

ERG. I'm no more a parasite, but kinglier than a king of kings.

Such a stock of belly-timber from the port my message brings. 870

Let me haste to heap on Hegio this good news of jollity.

Certainly there's no man living who's more fortunate than he.

HEG. What's this news of gladness which he gladly hastes on me to pour?

ERG. Ho! where are you?

Who is there? Will some one open me this door?

HEG. Ah! the fellow's come to dinner.

ERG. Open me the door, I say; 875

Or I'll smash it into matchwood, if there's any more delay.

HEG. I'll speak to him. Ergasilus!

ERG. Who calls my name so lustily?

HEG. Pray, look my way!

ERG. You bid me do what Fortune never did to me!

Who is it?

HEG. Why, just look at me. It's Hegio!

ERG. Ye gods! It's he.

Thou best of men, in nick of time we have each other greeted. 880

HEG. You've got a dinner at the port;
that makes you so conceited.

ERG. Give me your hand.

HEG. My hand?

ERG. Your hand, I say, at once!

HEG. I give it. There!

ERG. Now rejoice!

HEG. Rejoice! but why?

ERG. 'T is my command. Begone dull care!

HEG. Nay, the sorrows of my household hinder me from feeling joy.

ERG. Ah, but I will wash you clean from every speck that can annoy. 885

Venture to rejoice!

HEG. All right, though I've no reason to be glad.

ERG. That's the way. Now order—

HEG. What?

ERG. To have a mighty fire made.

HEG. What, a mighty fire?

ERG. I said so; have it big enough.

HEG. What next?

Do you think I'll burn my house down at your asking?

ERG. Don't be vexed!

Have the pots and pans got ready. Is it to be done or not? 890

Put the ham and bacon in the oven, have it piping hot.

Send a man to buy the fish—

HEG. His eyes are open, but he dreams!

ERG. And another to buy pork, and lamb, and chickens—

HEG. Well, it seems

You could dine well, if you'd money.

ERG. —Perch and lamprey, if you please,
Pickled mackerel and sting-ray, then an eel
and nice soft cheese. 895

HEG. Naming's easy, but for eating you won't find facilities

At my house, Ergasilus.

ERG. Why, do you think I'm ordering
this
For myself?

HEG. Don't be deceived; for you'll eat neither much, nor little,
If you've brought no appetite for just your ordinary victual. 899

ERG. Nay, I'll make you eager for a feast though I should urge you not.

HEG. Me?

ERG. Yes, you.

HEG. Then you shall be my lord.

ERG. A kind one too, I wot!
Come, am I to make you happy?

HEG. Well, I'm not in love with woe.

ERG. Where's your hand?

HEG. There, take it.

ERG. Heaven's your friend!

HEG. But I don't mark it, though.

ERG. You're not in the market, that's why you don't mark it: come now, bid
That pure vessels be got ready for the offering, and a kid, 905

Fat and flourishing, be brought.

HEG. What for?

ERG. To make a sacrifice.

HEG. Why, to whom?

ERG. To me, of course!—I'm Jupiter in human guise!

Yes, to you I am Salvation, Fortune, Light, Delight, and Joy.

It's your business to placate my deity with food, dear boy! 909

HEG. Hunger seems to be your trouble.

ERG. Well, my hunger is n't yours.

HEG. As you say; so I can bear it.

ERG. Lifelong habit that ensures!

HEG. Jupiter and all the gods confound
you!

ERG. Nothing of the sort!

Thanks I merit for reporting such good tidings from the port.

Now I'll get a meal to suit me!

HEG. Idiot, go! you've come too late.

ERG. If I'd come before I did, your words would come with greater weight.

Now receive the joyful news I bring you.
I have seen your son 916

Philopolemus in harbor safe; and he'll be here anon.

He was on a public vessel; with him was that Elian youth

And your slave Stalagmus, he who ran away
—it's naught but truth—

He who stole your little boy when four years old so cruelly. 920

HEG. Curse you, cease your mocking!

ERG. So may holy Fulness smile on me, Hegio, and make me ever worthy of her sacred name,

As I saw him.

HEG. Saw my son?

ERG. Your son, my patron: they're the same.

HEG. And the prisoner from Elis?

ERG. Oui, parbleu!

HEG. And that vile thief,
Him who stole my younger son, Stalag-mus?

ERG. Oui, monsieur, par Crieff! 925

HEG. What, just now?

ERG. Par Killiecrankie!

HEG. Has he come?

ERG. Oui, par Dundee!

HEG. Are you sure?

ERG. Par Auchtermuchtie!

HEG. Certain?

ERG. Oui, par Kirkcudbright!

HEG. Why by these barbarian cities do you swear?

ERG. Because they're rude,

As you said your dinner was.

HEG. That's just like your ingratitude!

ERG. Ah, I see you won't believe me though it's simple truth I say. 930

But what countryman was this Stalagmus, when he went away?

HEG. A Sicilian.

ERG. Well, but he belongs to Colorado
now;

For he's married to a collar, and she squeezes him, I vow!

HEG. Tell me, is your story true?

ERG. It's really true—the very truth.

HEG. O good Heav'ns! if you're not mocking, I've indeed renewed my youth. 935

ERG. What? Will you continue doubting when I've pledged my sacred troth?

As a last resource then, Hegio, if you can't believe my oath,

Go and see.

HEG. Of course I will; go in, prepare the feast at once;

Everything's at your disposal; you're my steward for the nonce.

ERG. If my oracle's a false one, with a cudgel comb my hide! 940

HEG. You shall have your board forever, if you've truly prophesied.

ERG. Who will pay?

HEG. My son and I.

ERG. You promise that?

HEG. I do indeed.

ERG. Then I promise you your son has really come in very deed.

HEG. Take the best of everything!

ERG. May no delay your path impede!

Exit HEGIO to the harbor.

ERG. He has gone; and put his kitchen absolutely in my hands! 945

Heav'ns! how necks and trunks will be dissevered at my stern commands!

What a ban will fall on bacon, and what harm on humble ham!

O what labor on the lard, and what calamity on lamb!

Butchers and pork dealers, you shall find a deal to do to-day!

But to tell of all who deal in food would cause too long delay. 950

Now, in virtue of my office, I'll give sentence on the lard,

Help those gammons, hung though uncondemned—a fate for them too hard.

Exit ERGASILUS into the house.

Enter a boy from the house of HEGIO.

Boy. May Jupiter and all the gods, Ergasilus, confound you quite, And all who ask you out to dine, and every other parasite.

Destruction, ruin, dire distress, have come upon our family. 955

I feared that, like a hungry wolf, he'd make a fierce attack on me.

I cast an anxious look at him, he licked his lips and glared around;

I shook with dread, by Hercules! he gnashed his teeth with fearsome sound.

When he'd got in, he made a raid upon the meat-safe and the meats;

He seized a knife—from three fat sows he cut away the dainty teats. 960

Save those which held at least a peck, he shattered every pan and pot:

Then issued orders to the cook to get the copper boiling hot.

He broke the cupboard doors and searched the secrets of the storeroom's hoard.

So kindly watch him if you can, good slaves, whilst I go seek my lord.

I'll tell him to lay in fresh stores, if he wants any for himself, 965

For as this fellow's carrying on, there'll soon be nothing on the shelf.

Exit boy to the harbor.

Enter from the harbor HEGIO, PHILOPOLEMUS, PHILOCRATES, and STALAGMUS.

HEG. All praise and thanksgiving to Jove I would render

For bringing you back to your father again; For proving my staunch and successful defender,

When, robbed of my son, I was tortured with pain; 970

For restoring my runaway slave to my hands; For Philocrates' honor; unsullied it stands.

PHILOC. Grieved I have enough already, I don't want to grow still thinner,

And you've told me all your sorrows at the harbor, pending dinner.

Now to business!

PHILOC. Tell me, Hegio, have I kept my promises, 975

And restored your son to freedom?

HEG. Yes, you have, Philocrates. I can never, never thank you for the services you've done,

As you merit for the way you've dealt with me and with my son.

PHILOC. Yes, you can, dear father, and the gods will give us both a chance,

Worthily to recompense the source of my deliverance. 980

And I'm sure, my dearest father, it will be a pleasing task.

HEG. Say no more. I have no tongue that can deny you aught you ask.

PHILOC. Then restore to me the slave whom, as a pledge, I left behind.

He has always served me better than himself, with heart and mind.

To reward him for his kindness now shall be my earnest care. 985

HEG. For your goodness he shall be restored to you; 't is only fair.

That and aught beside you ask for, you shall have. But don't, I pray,

Be enraged with me because in wrath I've punished him to-day.

PHILOC. Ah, what have you done?

HEG. I sent him to the quarries bound with chains,

When I found how I'd been cheated.

PHILOC. Woe is me! he bears these pains,
Dear good fellow, for my sake, because he gained me my release. 991

HEG. And on that account you shall not pay for him a penny piece.
I will set him free for nothing.

PHILOC. Well, by Pollux! Hegio,
That is kind. But send and fetch him quickly, will you?

HEG. Be it so.
[To a slave.] Ho, where are you? Run and quickly bid young Tyndarus return.

Now, go in; for from this slave, this whippingblock, I fain would learn 996
What has happened to my younger son, and if he's living still.

Meanwhile you can take a bath.

PHILOP. Come in, Philocrates.

PHILOC. I will.
Exeunt PHILOPOLEMUS and PHILOCRATES into the house.

HEG. Now stand forth, my worthy sir, my slave so handsome, good, and wise!

STAL. What can you expect from me, when such a man as you tells lies? 1000
For I never was nor shall be fine or handsome, good or true;

If you're building on my goodness, it will be the worse for you.

HEG. Well, it is n't hard for you to see which way your interest lies;
if you tell the truth, 't will save you from the harshest penalties. 1004

Speak out, straight and true; although you've not done right and true, I guess.

STAL. Oh, you need n't think I blush to hear you say what I confess.

HEG. I will make you blush, you villain;
for a bath of blood prepare!

STAL. That will be no novelty! you threaten one who's oft been there!
But no more of that; just tell me what you want to ask of me.

Perhaps you'll get it.

HEG. You're too fluent; kindly speak with brevity. 1010

STAL. As you please.

HEG. Ah, from a boy he was a supple, flattering knave.

But to business! Pray attend to me, and tell me what I crave.

If you speak the truth, you'll find your interest 't will best subserve.

STAL. Don't tell me! D' you think that I don't know full well what I deserve?

HEG. But you may escape a part if not the whole of your desert. 1015

STAL. Oh, it's little I'll escape! and much will happen to my hurt:

For I ran away and stole your son from you,
and him I sold.

HEG. Oh, to whom?

STAL. To Theodoromedes of the house of Gold

For ten pounds.

HEG. Good Heav'ns! Why, that's the father of Philocrates.

STAL. Yes, I know that quite as well as you do—better, if you please. 1020

HEG. Jupiter in Heaven, save me, and preserve my darling son!

On your soul, Philocrates, come out! I want you. Make haste, run!

Enter PHILOCRATES from the house.

PHILOC. Hegio, I am at your service.

HEG. This man says he sold my son
To your father there in Elis for ten pounds.

PHILOC. When was this done?

STAL. Twenty years ago.

PHILOC. O, nonsense! Hegio, he's telling lies. 1025

STAL. Either you or I am lying; for when you were little boys,

He was given you by your father to be trained along with you.

PHILOC. Well, then, tell me what his name was, if this tale of yours is true.

STAL. Pægnium at first; in after time you called him Tyndarus.

PHILOC. How is it that I don't know
you?

STAL. Men are oft oblivious, 1030
And forget the names of those from whom they've nothing to expect.

PHILOC. Then this child you sold my father, if your story is correct,
Was bestowed on me as valet. Who was he?

STAL. My master's son.

HEG. Is he living, fellow?

STAL. Nay, I got the money; then I'd done.

HEG. What say you?

PHILOC. That Tyndarus is your lost son!
I give you joy! 1035

So at least this fellow's statements make me think; for he's the boy

Who received his education with myself all through our youth.

HEGIO. Well, I'm fortunate and wretched all at once, if you speak truth;
Wretched that I treated him so cruelly, if he's my son;

Oh, alas! I did both more and less than what I should have done! 1040

How I'm vexed that I chastised him! Would that I could alter it!

See, he comes! and in a fashion that is anything but fit.

Enter TYNDARUS from the quarries.

TYN. Well, I've often seen in pictures all the torments of the damned;
But I'm certain that you could n't find a hell that's stuffed and crammed
With such tortures as those quarries. There they've got a perfect cure 1045
For all weariness; you simply drive it off by working more.

When I got there, just as wealthy fathers oft will give their boys
Starlings, goslings, quills to play with in the place of other toys,

So when I got there, a crow was given me as plaything pretty!

Ah, my lord is at the door; and my old lord from Elis city 1150

Has returned!

HEG. O hail, my long lost son!

TYN. What means this talk of "sons"?
Oh, I see why you pretend to be my father; yes, for once

You have acted like a parent, for you've brought me to the light.

PHILOC. Hail, good Tyndarus!

TYN. All hail! for you I'm in this pretty plight.

PHILOC. Ah! but now you shall be free and wealthy; for you must be told, 1055

Hegio's your father. That slave stole you hence when four years old;

And then sold you to my father for ten pounds, who gave you me,

When we both were little fellows, that my valet you might be.

This man whom we brought from Elis has most certain proofs supplied.

TYN. What, am I his son?

PHILOC. You are; your brother too you'll find inside. 1060

TYN. Then you have brought back with you his son who was a prisoner?

PHILOC. Yes, and he is in the house.

TYN. You've done right well and nobly, sir.

PHILOC. Now you have a father; here's the thief who stole you when a boy.

TYN. Now that I'm grown up, he'll find that theft will bring him little joy.

PHILOC. He deserves your vengeance.

TYN. Oh, I'll have him paid for what he's done. 1065

Tell me though, are you my father really?

HEG. Yes, I am, my son.

TYN. Now at length it dawns upon me, and I seem, when I reflect,
Yes, I seem to call to mind and somewhat vaguely recollect,

As if looking through a mist, my father's name was Hegio.

HEG. I am he!

PHILOC. Then strike the fetters off your son and let him go! 1070

And attach them to this villain.

HEG. Certainly, it shall be so.

Let's go in, and let the smith be summoned to strike off your chains,

And to put them on this fellow.

STAL. Right! For they're my only gains.

EPILOGUE. Gentlemen, this play's been written on the lines of modesty;

Here are found no wiles of women, no gay lovers' gallantry; 1075

Here are no affiliations, and no tricks for getting gold;

No young lover buys his mistress whilst his father is cajoled.

It's not often nowadays, that plays are written of this kind,

In which good folk are made better. Now then, if it be your mind,

And we've pleased you and not bored you, kindly undertake our cause, 1080

And to modesty award the prize with heartiest applause.

ACT I

SCENE I

An Orchard, near OLIVER's House.

Enter ORLANDO and ADAM.

ORL. As I remember, Adam, it was upon this fashion bequeathed me by will but poor a thousand crowns; and, as thou sayest, charged my brother on his blessing, to breed me well: and there begins my sadness. My brother Jaques he keeps at school, and report speaks goldenly of his profit: for my part, he keeps me rustically at home, or, to speak more properly, stays me here at home unkept; for call you that keeping for a gentleman of my birth, that differs not from the stalling of an ox? His horses are bred better; for, besides that they are fair with their feeding, they are taught their manage, and to that end riders dearly hired: but I, his brother, gain nothing under him but growth, for the which his animals on his dunghills are as much bound to him as I. Besides this nothing that he so plentifully gives me, the something that nature gave me, his countenance seems to take from me: he lets me feed with his hinds, bars me the place of a brother, and, as much as in him lies, mines my gentility with my education. This is it, Adam, that grieves me; and the spirit of my father, which I think is within me, begins to mutiny against this servitude. I will no longer endure it, though yet I know no wise remedy how to avoid it. 29

ADAM. Yonder comes my master, your brother.

ORL. Go apart, Adam, and thou shalt hear how he will shake me up.

Enter OLIVER.

OLI. Now, sir! what make you here?

ORL. Nothing: I am not taught to make any thing. 36

OLI. What mar you then, sir?

ORL. Marry, sir, I am helping you to mar that which God made, a poor unworthy brother of yours, with idleness.

OLI. Marry, sir, be better employed, and be nought awhile. 42

ORL. Shall I keep your hogs, and eat husks with them? What prodigal portion have I spent, that I should come to such penury?

OLI. Know you where you are, sir?

ORL. O! sir, very well: here, in your orchard. 49

OLI. Know you before whom, sir?

ORL. Ay, better than him I am before knows me. I know you are my eldest brother; and, in the gentle condition of blood, you should so know me. The courtesy of nations allows you my better, in that you are the first-born; but the same tradition takes not away my blood, were there twenty brothers betwixt us. I have as much of my father in me as you; albeit, I confess, your coming before me is nearer to his reverence.

OLI. What, boy! 61

ORL. Come, come, elder brother, you are too young in this.

OLI. Wilt thou lay hands on me, villain?

ORL. I am no villain; I am the youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys; he was my father, and he is thrice a villain that says such a father begot villains. Wert thou not my brother, I would not take this hand from thy throat till this other had pulled out thy tongue for saying so: thou hast railed on thyself.

ADAM. Sweet masters, be patient: for your father's remembrance, be at accord.

OLI. Let me go, I say.

ORL. I will not, till I please: you shall hear me. My father charged you in his will to give me good education: you have trained me like a peasant, obscuring and hiding from me all gentlemanlike qualities: the spirit of my father grows strong in me, and I will no longer endure it; therefore, allow me such exercises as may become a gentleman, or give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament; with that I will go buy my fortunes.

OLI. And what wilt thou do? beg, when that is spent? Well, sir, get you in: I will not long be troubled with you; you shall have some part of your will: I pray you, leave me.

ORL. I will no further offend you than becomes me for my good.

OLI. Get you with him, you old dog.

ADAM. Is 'old dog' my reward? Most true, I have lost my teeth in your service. God be with my old master! he would not have spoke such a word.

Exeunt ORLANDO and ADAM.

OLI. Is it even so? begin you to grow upon me? I will physic your rankness, and yet give no thousand crowns neither. Holla, Dennis!

Enter DENNIS.

DEN. Calls your worship?

OLI. Was not Charles, the duke's wrestler, here to speak with me?

DEN. So please you, he is here at the door, and importunes access to you.

OLI. Call him in. Exit DENNIS.
'Twill be a good way; and to-morrow the wrestling is.

Enter CHARLES.

CHA. Good morrow to your worship.

OLI. Good Monsieur Charles, what's the new news at the new court?

CHA. There's no news at the court, sir, but the old news: that is, the old duke is banished by his younger brother the new duke; and three or four loving lords have put themselves into voluntary exile with him, whose lands and revenues enrich the new duke; therefore he gives them good leave to wander.

OLI. Can you tell if Rosalind, the duke's daughter, be banished with her father?

CHA. O, no; for the duke's daughter, her cousin, so loves her, being ever from their cradles bred together, that she would have followed her exile, or have died to stay behind her. She is at the court, and no less beloved of her uncle than his own daughter; and never two ladies loved as they do.

OLI. Where will the old duke live?

CHA. They say he is already in the forest of Arden, and a many merry men with him; and there they live like the old Robin Hood of England. They say many young gentlemen flock to him every day, and fleet the time carelessly, as they did in the golden world.

OLI. What! you wrestle to-morrow before the new duke?

CHA. Marry, do I, sir; and I came to acquaint you with a matter. I am given, sir, secretly to understand that your younger brother Orlando hath a disposition to come in disguised against me to try a fall. To-morrow, sir, I wrestle for my credit, and he that escapes me without some broken limb shall acquit him well. Your brother is but young and tender; and, for your love, I would be loath to foil him as I must, for my own honour, if he come in: therefore, out of my love to you, I came hither to acquaint you withal, that either you might stay him from his intendment, or brook such disgrace well as he shall run into, in that it is a thing of his own search and altogether against my will.

OLI. Charles, I thank thee for thy love to me, which thou shalt find I will most kindly requite. I had myself notice of my brother's purpose herein, and have by underhand means laboured to dissuade him from it, but he is resolute. I'll tell thee, Charles, it is the stubbornest young fellow of France; full of ambition, an envious emulator of every man's good parts, a secret and villainous contriver against me his natural brother: therefore use thy discretion. I had as lief thou didst break his neck as his finger. And thou wert best look to 't; for if thou dost him any slight disgrace, or if he do not mightily grace himself on thee, he will practise against thee by poison, entrap thee by some treacherous device, and never leave thee till he hath ta'en thy life by some indirect means or other; for, I assure thee, and almost with tears I speak it, there is not one so young and so villanous this day living. I speak but brotherly of him; but should I anatomize him to thee as he is, I must blush and weep, and thou must look pale and wonder. 182

CHA. I am heartily glad I came hither to you. If he come to-morrow, I'll give him his payment: if ever he go alone again, I'll never wrestle for prize more; and so, God keep your worship! Exit. 187

OLI. Farewell, good Charles. Now will I stir this gamester. I hope I shall see an end of him; for my soul, yet I know not why, hates nothing more than he. Yet he's gentle, never schooled and yet learned, full of noble device, of all sorts enchantingly beloved, and indeed so much in the heart of the world, and especially of my own people, who best know him, that I am altogether misprised. But it shall not be so long; this wrestler shall clear all: nothing remains but that I kindle the boy thither, which now I'll go about. Exit. 200

A Lawn before the DUKE's Palace.

Enter ROSALIND and CELIA.

CEL. I pray thee, Rosalind, sweet my coz, be merry.

Ros. Dear Celia, I show more mirth than I am mistress of, and would you yet I were merrier? Unless you could teach me to forget a banished father, you must not learn me how to remember any extraordinary pleasure. 8

CEL. Herein I see thou lovest me not with the full weight that I love thee. If my uncle, thy banished father, had banished thy uncle, the duke my father, so thou hadst been still with me, I could have taught my love to take thy father for mine: so would'st thou, if the truth of thy love to me were so righteously tempered as mine is to thee. 16

Ros. Well, I will forget the condition of my estate, to rejoice in yours.

CEL. You know my father hath no child but I, nor none is like to have; and, truly, when he dies, thou shalt be his heir: for what he hath taken away from thy father perforce, I will render thee again in affection; by mine honour, I will; and when I break that oath, let me turn monster. Therefore, my sweet Rose, my dear Rose, be merry. 27

Ros. From henceforth I will, coz, and devise sports. Let me see; what think you of falling in love?

CEL. Marry, I prithee, do, to make sport withal: but love no man in good earnest; nor no further in sport neither, than with safety of a pure blush thou mayest in honour come off again. 35

Ros. What shall be our sport then?

CEL. Let us sit and mock the good housewife Fortune from her wheel, that her gifts may henceforth be bestowed equally. 39

Ros. I would we could do so, for her benefits are mightily misplaced, and the bountiful blind woman doth most mistake in her gifts to women.

CEL. 'Tis true; for those that she makes fair she scarce makes honest, and those that she makes honest she makes very ill-favouredly. 47

Ros. Nay, now thou goest from Fortune's office to Nature's: Fortune reigns in gifts of the world, not in the lineaments of Nature. 51

Enter TOUCHSTONE.

CEL. No? when Nature hath made a fair creature, may she not by Fortune fall into the fire? Though Nature hath given us wit to flout at Fortune, hath not Fortune sent in this fool to cut off the argument?

Ros. Indeed, there is Fortune too hard for Nature, when Fortune makes Nature's natural the cutter-off of Nature's wit. 59

CEL. Peradventure this is not Fortune's work neither, but Nature's; who perceiving our natural wits too dull to reason of such goddesses, hath sent this natural for our whetstone: for always the dulness of the fool is the whetstone of the wits. How now, wit! whither wander you? 66

TOUCH. Mistress, you must come away to your father.

CEL. Were you made the messenger?

TOUCH. No, by mine honour; but I was bid to come for you. 71

ROS. Where learned you that oath, fool?

TOUCH. Of a certain knight that swore by his honour they were good pancakes, and swore by his honour the mustard was naught: now, I'll stand to it, the pancakes were naught and the mustard was good, and yet was not the knight forsworn. 78

CEL. How prove you that, in the great heap of your knowledge?

ROS. Ay, marry: now unmuzzle your wisdom.

TOUCH. Stand you both forth now: stroke your chins, and swear by your beards that I am a knave. 85

CEL. By our beards, if we had them, thou art.

TOUCH. By my knavery, if I had it, then I were; but if you swear by that that is not, you are not forsworn: no more was this knight, swearing by his honour, for he never had any; or if he had, he had sworn it away before ever he saw those pancakes or that mustard. 94

CEL. Prithee, who is 't that thou meanest?

TOUCH. One that old Frederick, your father, loves.

CEL. My father's love is enough to honour him. Enough! speak no more of him; you'll be whipped for taxation one of these days. 102

TOUCH. The more pity, that fools may not speak wisely what wise men do foolishly.

CEL. By my troth, thou sayest true; for since the little wit that fools have was silenced, the little foolery that wise men have makes a great show. Here comes Monsieur Le Beau. 109

ROS. With his mouth full of news.

CEL. Which he will put on us, as pigeons feed their young.

ROS. Then shall we be news-crammed.

CEL. All the better; we shall be the more marketable. 115

Enter LE BEAU.

Bon jour, Monsieur Le Beau: what's the news?

LE BEAU. Fair princess, you have lost much good sport.

CEL. Sport! Of what colour? 120

LE BEAU. What colour, madam! How shall I answer you?

ROS. As wit and fortune will.

TOUCH. Or as the Destinies decree.

CEL. Well said: that was laid on with a trowel. 126

TOUCH. Nay, if I keep not my rank,—

ROS. Thou lovest thy old smell.

LE BEAU. You amaze me, ladies: I would have told you of good wrestling, which you have lost the sight of. 131

ROS. Yet tell us the manner of the wrestling.

LE BEAU. I will tell you the beginning; and, if it please your ladyships, you may see the end, for the best is yet to do; and here, where you are, they are coming to perform it.

CEL. Well, the beginning, that is dead and buried. 139

LE BEAU. There comes an old man and his three sons,—

CEL. I could match this beginning with an old tale.

LE BEAU. Three proper young men, of excellent growth and presence;— 145

ROS. With bills on their necks, 'Be it known unto all men by these presents.'

LE BEAU. The eldest of the three wrestled with Charles, the duke's wrestler; which Charles in a moment threw him and broke three of his ribs, that there is little hope of life in him: so he served the second, and so the third. Yonder they lie; the poor old man, their father, making such pitiful dole over them that all the beholders take his part with weeping. 156

ROS. Alas!

TOUCH. But what is the sport, monsieur, that the ladies have lost?

LE BEAU. Why, this that I speak of. 160

TOUCH. Thus men may grow wiser every day: it is the first time that ever I heard breaking of ribs was sport for ladies.

CEL. Or I, I promise thee. 164

ROS. But is there any else longs to see this broken music in his sides? As there yet another dotes upon rib-breaking? Shall we see this wrestling, cousin? 168

LE BEAU. You must, if you stay here; for here is the place appointed for the wrestling, and they are ready to perform it.

CEL. Yonder, sure, they are coming: let us now stay and see it. 173

Flourish. Enter DUKE FREDERICK, Lords, ORLANDO, CHARLES, and Attendants.

DUKE F. Come on: since the youth will not be entreated, his own peril on his forwardness.

ROS. Is yonder the man?

LE BEAU. Even he, madam.

CEL. Alas! he is too young: yet he looks successfully. 180

DUKE F. How now, daughter and cousin! are you crept hither to see the wrestling?

ROS. Ay, my liege, so please you give us leave. 184

DUKE F. You will take little delight in it, I can tell you, there is such odds in the man. In pity of the challenger's youth I would fain dissuade him, but he will not be entreated. Speak to him, ladies; see if you can move him. 190

CEL. Call him hither, good Monsieur Le Beau.

DUKE F. Do so: I'll not be by.

DUKE goes apart.

LE BEAU. Monsieur the challenger, the princesses call for you. 195

ORL. I attend them with all respect and duty.

ROS. Young man, have you challenged Charles the wrestler?

ORL. No, fair princess; he is the general challenger: I come but in, as others do, to try with him the strength of my youth. 201

CEL. Young gentleman, your spirits are too bold for your years. You have seen cruel proof of this man's strength: if you saw yourself with your eyes or knew yourself with your judgment, the fear of your adventure would counsel you to a more equal enterprise. We pray you, for your own sake, to embrace your own safety and give over this attempt. 210

ROS. Do, young sir: your reputation shall not therefore be misprised. We will make it our suit to the duke that the wrestling might not go forward. 214

ORL. I beseech you, punish me not with your hard thoughts, wherein I confess me much guilty, to deny so fair and excellent ladies any thing. But let your fair eyes and gentle wishes go with me to my trial: wherein if I be foiled, there is but one shamed that was never gracious; if killed, but one dead that is willing to be so. I shall do my friends

no wrong, for I have none to lament me; the world no injury, for in it I have nothing; only in the world I fill up a place, which may be better supplied when I have made it empty. 226

ROS. The little strength that I have, I would it were with you.

CEL. And mine, to eke out hers.

ROS. Fare you well. Pray heaven I be deceived in you! 231

CEL. Your heart's desires be with you!

CHA. Come, where is this young gallant that is so desirous to lie with his mother earth? 235

ORL. Ready, sir; but his will hath in it a more modest working.

DUKE F. You shall try but one fall.

CHA. No, I warrant your grace, you shall not entreat him to a second, that have so mightily persuaded him from a first. 241

ORL. You mean to mock me after: you should not have mocked me before; but come your ways.

ROS. Now Hercules be thy speed, young man! 246

CEL. I would I were invisible, to catch the strong fellow by the leg.

CHARLES and ORLANDO wrestle.

ROS. O excellent young man!

CEL. If I had a thunderbolt in mine eye, I can tell who should down. 251

CHARLES is thrown. Shout.

DUKE F. No more, no more.

ORL. Yes, I beseech your grace: I am not yet well breathed.

DUKE F. How dost thou, Charles? 255

LE BEAU. He cannot speak, my lord.

DUKE F. Bear him away. What is thy name, young man?

ORL. Orlando, my liege; the youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys. 260

DUKE F. I would thou hadst been son to some man else:

The world esteem'd thy father honourable,

But I did find him still mine enemy:

Thou should'st have better pleas'd me with this deed, 265

Hadst thou descended from another house.

But fare thee well; thou art a gallant youth:

I would thou hadst told me of another father.

Exeunt DUKE FREDERICK, Train, and LE BEAU.

CEL. Were I my father, coz, would I do this?

ORL. I am more proud to be Sir Rowland's son, 270
His youngest son; and would not change that calling,

To be adopted heir to Frederick.

Ros. My father lov'd Sir Rowland as his soul,

And all the world was of my father's mind:
Had I before known this young man his son,
I should have given him tears unto entreaties, 276

Ere he should thus have ventur'd.

CEL. Gentle cousin,
Let us go thank him and encourage him:

My father's rough and envious disposition Sticks me at heart. Sir, you have well deserv'd: 280

If you do keep your promises in love

But justly, as you have exceeded all promise,
Your mistress shall be happy.

Ros. Gentleman,

Giving him a chain from her neck.

Wear this for me, one out of suits with fortune,

That could give more, but that her hand lacks means. 285

Shall we go, coz?

CEL. Ay. Fare you well, fair gentleman.

ORL. Can I not say, I thank you? My better parts

Are all thrown down, and that which here stands up

Is but a quintain, a mere lifeless block.

Ros. He calls us back: my pride fell with my fortunes; 290

I'll ask him what he would. Did you call,
sir?

Sir, you have wrestled well, and overthrown
More than your enemies.

CEL. Will you go, coz?

Ros. Have with you. Fare you well.

Exeunt ROSALIND and CELIA.

ORL. What passion hangs these weights upon my tongue? 295

I cannot speak to her, yet she urg'd conference.

O poor Orlando, thou art overthrown!

Or Charles or something weaker masters
thee.

Re-enter LE BEAU.

LE BEAU. Good sir, I do in friendship counsel you

To leave this place. Albeit you have
deserv'd 300

High commendation, true applause and love,
Yet such is now the duke's condition

That he misconstrues all that you have done.

The duke is humorous: what he is indeed,
More suits you to conceive than I to speak
of. 305

ORL. I thank you, sir; and pray you tell me this;

Which of the two was daughter of the duke,
That here was at the wrestling?

LE BEAU. Neither his daughter, if we judge by manners: 309

But yet indeed the smaller is his daughter:
The other is daughter to the banish'd duke,

And here detain'd by her usurping uncle,
To keep his daughter company; whose loves

Are dearer than the natural bond of sisters.
But I can tell you that of late this duke 315

Hath ta'en displeasure 'gainst his gentle niece,

Grounded upon no other argument

But that the people praise her for her virtues,
And pity her for her good father's sake;

And, on my life, his malice 'gainst the lady
Will suddenly break forth. Sir, fare you
well: 321

Hereafter, in a better world than this,
I shall desire more love and knowledge of
you.

ORL. I rest much bounden to you: fare
you well. Exit LE BEAU.

Thus must I from the smoke into the smother; 325

From tyrant duke unto a tyrant brother.
But heavenly Rosalind! Exit.

SCENE III

A Room in the Palace.

Enter CELIA and ROSALIND.

CEL. Why, cousin! why, Rosalind! Cupid have mercy! Not a word?

Ros. Not one to throw at a dog.

CEL. No, thy words are too precious to be cast away upon curs; throw some of them at me; come, lame me with reasons. 6

Ros. Then there were two cousins laid up; when the one should be lamed with reasons and the other mad without any.

CEL. But is all this for your father? 10

Ros. No, some of it is for my child's father:

O! how full of briers is this working-day world.

CEL. They are but burrs, cousin, thrown upon thee in holiday foolery: if we walk not in the trodden paths, our very petticoats will catch them.

Ros. I could shake them off my coat: these burrs are in my heart.

CEL. Hem them away.

Ros. I would try, if I could cry 'hem' and have him. 21

CEL. Come, come; wrestle with thy affections.

Ros. O! they take the part of a better wrestler than myself.

CEL. O! a good wish upon you! you will try in time, in despite of a fall. But, turning these jests out of service, let us talk in good earnest: is it possible, on such a sudden, you should fall into so strong a liking with old Sir Rowland's youngest son? 31

Ros. The duke my father loved his father dearly.

CEL. Doth it therefore ensue that you should love his son dearly? By this kind of chase, I should hate him, for my father hated his father dearly; yet I hate not Orlando. 38

Ros. No, faith, hate him not, for my sake.

CEL. Why should I not? doth he not deserve well?

Ros. Let him love him for that; and do you love him, because I do. Look, here comes the duke. 45

CEL. With his eyes full of anger.

Enter DUKE FREDERICK, with Lords.

DUKE F. Mistress, dispatch you with your safest haste,

And get you from our court.

Ros. Me, uncle?

DUKE F. You, cousin:
Within these ten days if that thou be'st found

So near our public court as twenty miles, 50
Thou diest for it.

Ros. I do beseech your grace,
Let me the knowledge of my fault bear with me.

If with myself I hold intelligence,

Or have acquaintance with mine own desires,

If that I do not dream or be not frantic, 55
As I do trust I am not, then, dear uncle,
Never so much as in a thought unborn
Did I offend your highness.

DUKE F. Thus do all traitors:

If their purgation did consist in words,
They are as innocent as grace itself: 60
Let it suffice thee that I trust thee not.

Ros. Yet your mistrust cannot make me a traitor:

Tell me whereon the likelihood depends.

DUKE F. Thou art thy father's daughter; there's enough.

Ros. So was I when your highness took his dukedom; 65

So was I when your highness banish'd him.
Treason is not inherited, my lord;

Or, if we did derive it from our friends,
What's that to me? my father was no traitor:
Then, good my liege, mistake me not so much
To think my poverty is treacherous. 71

CEL. Dear sovereign, hear me speak.

DUKE F. Ay, Celia; we stay'd her for your sake;

Else had she with her father rang'd along.

CEL. I did not then entreat to have her stay: 75

It was your pleasure and your own remorse.
I was too young that time to value her;

But now I know her: if she be a traitor,
Why so am I; we still have slept together,

Rose at an instant, learn'd, play'd, eat together; 80

And wheresoe'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still we went coupl'd and inseparable.

DUKE F. She is too subtle for thee; and her smoothness,

Her very silence and her patience,
Speak to the people, and they pity her. 85

Thou art a fool: she robs thee of thy name;
And thou wilt show more bright and seem more virtuous

When she is gone. Then open not thy lips:
Firm and irrevocable is my doom

Which I have pass'd upon her; she is banish'd. 90

CEL. Pronounce that sentence then on me, my liege:

I cannot live out of her company.

DUKE F. You are a fool. You, niece, provide yourself:

If you outstay the time, upon mine honour,
And in the greatness of my word, you die. 95

Exeunt DUKE FREDERICK and Lords.

CEL. O my poor Rosalind! whither wilt thou go?

Wilt thou change fathers? I will give thee mine.

I charge thee, be not thou more griev'd than I am.

Ros. I have more cause.

CEL. Thou hast not, cousin;
Prithee, be cheerful: know'st thou not, the duke

Hath banish'd me, his daughter?

Ros. That he hath not.

CEL. No, hath not? Rosalind lacks then the love

Which teacheth thee that thou and I am one:
Shall we be sunder'd? shall we part, sweet girl?

No: let my father seek another heir.

Therefore devise with me how we may fly,
Whither to go, and what to bear with us:

And do not seek to take your change upon you,

To bear your griefs yourself and leave me out;

For, by this heaven, now at our sorrows pale,
Say what thou canst, I'll go along with thee.

Ros. Why, whither shall we go?

CEL. To seek my uncle in the forest of Arden.

Ros. Alas, what danger will it be to us,
Maids as we are, to travel forth so far!
Beauty provoketh thieves sooner than gold.

CEL. I'll put myself in poor and mean attire,

And with a kind of umber smirch my face;
The like do you: so shall we pass along
And never stir assailants.

Ros. Were it not better,
Because that I am more than common tall,
That I did suit me all points like a man?

A gallant curtal-axe upon my thigh,
A boar-spear in my hand; and,—in my heart

Lie there what hidden woman's fear there will,—

We'll have a swashing and a martial outside,
As many other mannish cowards have
That do outface it with their semblances.

CEL. What shall I call thee when thou art a man?

Ros. I'll have no worse a name than Jove's own page,

And therefore look you call me Ganymede.
But what will you be call'd?

CEL. Something that hath a reference to my state:

No longer Celia, but Aliena.

Ros. But, cousin, what if we essay'd to steal

The clownish fool out of your father's court?
Would he not be a comfort to our travel?

CEL. He'll go along o'er the wide world with me;

Leave me alone to woo him. Let's away,
And get our jewels and our wealth together,
Devise the fittest time and safest way

To hide us from pursuit that will be made After my flight. Now go we in content

To liberty and not to banishment. Exeunt.

ACT II

SCENE I

The Forest of Arden.

Enter DUKE SENIOR, AMIENS, and other Lords, like Foresters.

DUKE S. Now, my co-mates and brothers in exile,

Hath not old custom made this life more sweet

Than that of painted pomp? Are not these woods

More free from peril than the envious court?
Here feel we but the penalty of Adam,

The seasons' difference; as the icy fang
And churlish chiding of the winter's wind,

Which, when it bites and blows upon my body,

Even till I shrink with cold, I smile and say
'This is no flattery: these are counsellors

That feelingly persuade me what I am.'
Sweet are the uses of adversity,

Which like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head;

And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running

brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in every thing.

I would not change it.

AMI. Happy is your grace,
That can translate the stubbornness of fortune

Into so quiet and so sweet a style.

DUKE S. Come, shall we go and kill us venison?

And yet it irks me, the poor dappled fools,
Being native burghers of this desert city.

Should, in their own confines, with forked heads

Have their round haunches gor'd.

FIRST LORD. Indeed, my lord, 25
The melancholy Jaques grieves at that;
And, in that kind, swears you do more usurp
Than doth your brother that hath banish'd you.

To-day my Lord of Amiens and myself
Did steal behind him as he lay along 30
Under an oak whose antique root peeps out
Upon the brook that brawls along this wood;
To the which place a poor sequester'd stag,
That from the hunter's aim had ta'en a hurt,

Did come to languish; and indeed, my lord,
The wretched animal heav'd forth such groans 36
That their discharge did stretch his leathern coat

Almost to bursting, and the big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase; and thus the hairy fool, 40
Much marked of the melancholy Jaques,
Stood on the extremest verge of the swift brook,

Augmenting it with tears.

DUKE S. But what said Jaques?
Did he not moralize this spectacle?

FIRST LORD. O, yes, into a thousand similes. 45
First, for his weeping into the needless stream;

'Poor deer,' quoth he, 'thou mak'st a testament

As worldings do, giving thy sum of more
To that which had too much': then, being there alone,

Left and abandon'd of his velvet friends; 50
'Tis right,' quoth he; 'thus misery doth part
The flux of company': anon, a careless herd
Full of the pasture, jumps along by him
And never stays to greet him; 'Ay,' quoth Jaques,

'Sweep on, you fat and greasy citizens; 55
'T is just the fashion; wherefore do you look Upon that poor and broken bankrupt there?'
Thus most invectively he pierceth through
The body of the country, city, court,
Yea, and of this our life; swearing that we 60
Are mere usurpers, tyrants, and what's worse,

To fright the animals and to kill them up
In their assign'd and native dwelling-place.

DUKE S. And did you leave him in this contemplation?

SECOND LORD. We did, my lord, weeping and commenting 65
Upon the sobbing deer.

DUKE S. Show me the place.
I love to cope him in these sullen fits,
For then he's full of matter.

SECOND LORD. I'll bring you to him straight. Exeunt.

SCENE II

A Room in the Palace.

Enter DUKE FREDERICK, Lords, and Attendants.

DUKE F. Can it be possible that no man saw them?

It cannot be: some villains of my court
Are of consent and sufferance in this.

FIRST LORD. I cannot hear of any that did see her.

The ladies, her attendants of her chamber, 5
Saw her a-bed; and in the morning early
They found the bed untreasur'd of their mistress.

SECOND LORD. My lord, the roynish clown, at whom so oft

Your grace was wont to laugh, is also missing.
Hesperia, the princess' gentlewoman, 10
Confesses that she secretly o'erheard
Your daughter and her cousin much commend

The parts and graces of the wrestler
That did but lately foil the sinewy Charles;
And she believes, wherever they are gone, 15
That youth is surely in their company.

DUKE F. Send to his brother; fetch that gallant hither;

If he be absent, bring his brother to me;
I'll make him find him. Do this suddenly,
And let not search and inquisition quail 20
To bring again these foolish runaways.

Exeunt.

SCENE III

Before OLIVER'S House.

Enter ORLANDO and ADAM, meeting.

ORL. Who's there?

ADAM. What! my young master? O my gentle master!

O my sweet master! O my memory

Of old Sir Rowland! why, what make you here?

Why are you virtuous? why do people love you? 5

And wherefore are you gentle, strong, and valiant?

Why would you be so fond to overcome

The bonny priser of the humorous duke?

Your praise is come too swiftly home before you.

Know you not, master, to some kind of men 10

Their graces serve them but as enemies?

No more do yours: your virtues, gentle master,

Are sanctified and holy traitors to you.

O, what a world is this, when what is comely

Envenoms him that bears it! 15

ORL. Why, what's the matter?

ADAM. O unhappy youth!

Come not within these doors; within this roof

The enemy of all your graces lives.

Your brother—no, no brother; yet the son—

Yet not the son, I will not call him son 20

Of him I was about to call his father—

Hath heard your praises, and this night he means

To burn the lodging where you use to lie,

And you within it: if he fail of that,

He will have other means to cut you off. 25

I overheard him and his practices.

This is no place; this house is but a butchery:

Abhor it, fear it, do not enter it.

ORL. Why, whither, Adam, wouldst thou have me go?

ADAM. No matter whither, so you come not here. 30

ORL. What! wouldst thou have me go and beg my food?

Or with a base and boisterous sword enforce

A thievish living on the common road?

This I must do, or know not what to do:

Yet this I will not do, do how I can. 35

I rather will subject me to the malice

Of a diverted blood and bloody brother.

ADAM. But do not so. I have five hundred crowns,

The thrifty hire I sav'd under your father,

Which I did store to be my foster-nurse 40

When service should in my old limbs lie lame,

And unregarded age in corners thrown.

Take that; and He that doth the ravens feed,

Yea, providently caters for the sparrow,

Be comfort to my age! Here is the gold; 45

All this I give you. Let me be your servant:

Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;

For in my youth I never did apply

Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood,

Nor did not with unbashful forehead woo 50

The means of weakness and debility;

Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,

Frosty, but kindly. Let me go with you;

I'll do the service of a younger man

In all your business and necessities. 55

ORL. O good old man! how well in thee appears

The constant service of the antique world,

When service sweat for duty, not for meed!

Thou art not for the fashion of these times,

Where none will sweat but for promotion, 60

And having that, do choke their service up

Even with the having: it is not so with thee.

But, poor old man, thou prun'st a rotten tree,

That cannot so much as a blossom yield,

In lieu of all thy pains and husbandry. 65

But come thy ways, we'll go along together,

And ere we have thy youthful wages spent,

We'll light upon some settled low content.

ADAM. Master, go on, and I will follow thee

To the last gasp with truth and loyalty. 70

From seventeen years till now almost fourscore,

Here lived I, but now live here no more.

At seventeen years many their fortunes seek;

But at fourscore it is too late a week:

Yet fortune cannot recompense me better 75

Than to die well and not my master's debtor.

Exeunt.

SCENE IV

The Forest of Arden.

Enter ROSALIND in boy's clothes, CELIA dressed like a shepherdess, and TOUCHSTONE.

ROS. O Jupiter! how weary are my spirits.

TOUCH. I care not for my spirits if my legs were not weary.

ROS. I could find in my heart to disgrace my man's apparel and to cry like a woman; but I must comfort the weaker vessel, as doublet and hose ought to show itself courageous to petticoat: therefore, courage, good Aliena!

CEL. I pray you, bear with me: I cannot go no further.

TOUCH. For my part, I had rather bear with you than bear you; yet I should bear no cross if I did bear you, for I think you have no money in your purse. 15

ROS. Well, this is the forest of Arden.

TOUCH. Ay, now am I in Arden; the more fool I: when I was at home, I was in a better place: but travellers must be content. 19

ROS. Ay, be so, good Touchstone. Look you, who comes here; a young man and an old in solemn talk. 22

Enter CORIN and SILVIUS.

COR. That is the way to make her scorn you still.

SIL. O Corin, that thou knew'st how I do love her!

COR. I partly guess, for I have lov'd ere now. 25

SIL. No, Corin; being old, thou canst not guess,

Though in thy youth thou wast as true a lover

As ever sigh'd upon a midnight pillow:

But if thy love were ever like to mine,

As sure I think did never man love so, 30
How many actions most ridiculous

Hast thou been drawn to by thy fantasy?

COR. Into a thousand that I have forgotten.

SIL. O thou didst then ne'er love so heartily.

If thou remember'st not the slightest folly
That ever love did make thee run into, 36
Thou hast not lov'd:

Or if thou hast not sat as I do now,
Wearing thy hearer in thy mistress' praise,

Thou hast not lov'd: 40

Or if thou hast not broke from company
Abruptly, as my passion now makes me,

Thou hast not lov'd. O Phebe, Phebe, Phebe! Exit.

ROS. Alas, poor shepherd! searching of thy wound, I have by hard adventure found
mine own. 46

TOUCH. And I mine. I remember, when I was in love I broke my sword upon a stone, and bid him take that for coming a-night to Jane Smile; and I remember the kissing of her batlet, and the cow's dugs that her pretty chopped hands had milked; and I remember the wooing of a peascod instead of her, from whom I took two cods, and giving her them again, said with weeping tears,

'Wear these for my sake.' We that are true lovers run into strange capers; but as all is mortal in nature, so is all nature in love mortal in folly. 59

ROS. Thou speakest wiser than thou art ware of.

TOUCH. Nay, I shall ne'er be ware of mine own wit till I break my shins against
it. 64

ROS. Jove, Jove! this shepherd's passion
Is much upon my fashion.

TOUCH. And mine; but it grows something stale with me.

CEL. I pray you, one of you question
yond man

If he for gold will give us any food: 69
I faint almost to death.

TOUCH. Holla, you clown!

ROS. Peace, fool: he's not thy kinsman.

COR. Who calls?

TOUCH. Your betters, sir.

COR. Else are they very wretched.

ROS. Peace, I say. Good even to you,
friend.

COR. And to you, gentle sir, and to you
all.

ROS. I prithee, shepherd, if that love or
gold 71

Can in this desert place buy entertainment, Bring us where we may rest ourselves and feed.

Here's a young maid with travel much oppress'd,

And fainets for succour.

COR. Fair sir, I pity her,

And, wish, for her sake more than for mine
own, 80

My fortunes were more able to relieve her;
But I am shepherd to another man,

And do not shear the fleeces that I graze:

My master is of churlish disposition,

And little reckes to find the way to heaven

By doing deeds of hospitality. 86

Besides, his cote, his flocks, and bounds of feed

Are now on sale; and at our sheepcote now,

By reason of his absence, there is nothing

That you will feed on; but what is, come see,

And in my voice most welcome shall you
be.

ROS. What is he that shall buy his flock and pasture? 92

COR. That young swain that you saw here but erewhile,
That little cares for buying any thing.

ROS. I pray thee, if it stand with honesty,
Buy thou the cottage, pasture, and the flock,
And thou shalt have to pay for it of us. 97

CEL. And we will mend thy wages. I like this place,
And willingly could waste my time in it.

COR. Assuredly the thing is to be sold.
Go with me: if you like upon report 101
The soil, the profit, and this kind of life,
I will your very faithful feeder be,
And buy it with your gold right suddenly.

Exeunt.

SCENE V

Another Part of the Forest.

Enter AMIENS, JAQUES, and others.

AMI.

Under the greenwood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And turn his merry note
Unto the sweet bird's throat,
Come hither, come hither, come hither: 5
Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

JAQ. More, more! I prithee, more.

AMI. It will make you melancholy,
Monsieur Jaques. 11

JAQ. I thank it. More! I prithee, more.
I can suck melancholy out of a song as a weasel sucks eggs. More! I prithee, more.

AMI. My voice is ragged; I know I cannot please you. 16

JAQ. I do not desire you to please me; I do desire you to sing. Come, more; another stanza. Call you 'em stanzas?

AMI. What you will, Monsieur Jaques. 20

JAQ. Nay, I care not for their names;
they owe me nothing. Will you sing?

AMI. More at your request than to please
myself. 24

JAQ. Well then, if ever I thank any man,
I'll thank you: but that they call compliment is like the encounter of two dog-apes, and when a man thanks me heartily, methinks
I have given him a penny and he renders me the beggarly thanks. Come, sing; and you that will not, hold your
tongues. 32

AMI. Well, I'll end the song. Sirs, cover the while; the duke will drink under this tree. He hath been all this day to look you JAQ. And I have been all this day to avoid him. He is too disputable for my company: I think of as many matters as he, but I give heaven thanks, and make no boast of them. Come, warble; come.

ALL. 40

Who doth ambition shun,
And loves to live i' the sun,
Seeking the food he eats
And pleas'd with what he gets,
Come hither, come hither, come hither: 45
Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

JAQ. I'll give you a verse to this note, that I made yesterday in despite of my invention. 51

AMI. And I'll sing it.

JAQ. Thus it goes:

If it do come to pass
That any man turn ass,
Leaving his wealth and ease,
A stubborn will to please,
Ducdame, ducdame, ducdame: 55
Here shall he see
Gross fools as he,
An if he will come to me. 60

AMI. What's that ducdame?

JAQ. 'T is a Greek invocation to call fools into a circle. I'll go sleep if I can; if I cannot, I'll rail against all the first-born of Egypt. 66

AMI. And I'll go seek the duke: his banquet is prepared. Exeunt severally.

SCENE VI

Another Part of the Forest.

Enter ORLANDO and ADAM.

ADAM. Dear master, I can go no further:
O! I die for food. Here lie I down, and measure out my grave. Farewell, kind master. 4

ORL. Why, how now Adam! no greater heart in thee? Live a little; comfort a little; cheer thyself a little. If this uncouth forest yield any thing savage, I will either be food for it, or bring it for food to thee. Thy conceit is nearer death than thy powers. For my sake be comfortable, hold death awhile at the arm's end, I will here be with thee presently, and if I bring thee not something to eat, I will give thee leave to die; but if thou diest before I come, thou art a mocker of my labour. Well said! thou lookest cheerly, and I'll be with thee quickly. Yet thou liest in the bleak air: come, I will bear thee to some shelter, and thou shalt not die for lack of a dinner, if there live any thing in this desert. Cheerly, good Adam. 21

Exeunt.

SCENE VII

Another Part of the Forest.

A table set out. Enter DUKE SENIOR, AMIENS, Lords, and others.

DUKE S. I think he be transform'd into a beast,
For I can no where find him like a man.

FIRST LORD. My lord, he is but even now gone hence:

Here was he merry, hearing of a song.

DUKE S. If he, compact of jars, grow musical, 5
We shall have shortly discord in the spheres.
Go, seek him: tell him I would speak with
him.

FIRST LORD. He saves my labour by his own approach.

Enter JAKUES.

DUKE S. Why, how now, monsieur! what a life is this,
That your poor friends must woo your company? 10

What, you look merrily.

JAG. A fool, a fool! I met a fool i' the forest,

A motley fool; a miserable world!

As I do live by food, I met a fool;

Who laid him down and bask'd him in the
sun, 15

And rail'd on Lady Fortune in good terms,

In good set terms, and yet a motley fool.

Good morrow, fool,' quoth I: 'No, sir,' quoth he,

'Call me not fool till heaven hath sent me
fortune.'

And then he drew a dial from his poke, 20

And looking on it with lack-lustre eye,

Says very wisely, 'It is ten o'clock:

Thus may we see,' quoth he, 'how the world
wags:

'T is but an hour ago since it was nine,

And after one hour more 'twill be eleven; 25

And so from hour to hour we ripe and ripe,
And then from hour to hour we rot and rot,
And thereby hangs a tale.' When I did hear
The motley fool thus moral on the time,
My lungs began to crow like chanticleer, 30
That fools should be so deep-contemplative,
And I did laugh sans intermission
An hour by his dial. O noble fool!
A worthy fool! Motley's the only wear.

DUKE S. What fool is this? 35

JAG. O worthy fool! One that hath been a courtier,

And says, if ladies be but young and fair,
They have the gift to know it; and in his
brain,

Which is as dry as the remainder biscuit
After a voyage, he hath strange places
cramm'd 40

With observation, the which he vents
In mangled forms. O! that I were a fool.

I am ambitious for a motley coat.

DUKE S. Thou shalt have one.

JAG. It is my only suit;
Provided that you weed your better judgments 45

Of all opinion that grows rank in them

That I am wise. I must have liberty

Withal, as large a charter as the wind,

To blow on whom I please; for so fools have:
And they that are most galled with my folly,

They most must laugh. And why, sir, must they so? 51

The 'why' is plain as way to parish church:

He that a fool doth very wisely hit,

Doth very foolishly, although he smart,

Not to seem senseless of the bob; if not, 55

The wise man's folly is anatomiz'd

Even by the squandering glances of the fool.

Invest me in my motley; give me leave

To speak my mind, and I will through and through 59

Cleanse the foul body of the infected world,

If they will patiently receive my medicine.

DUKE S. Fie on thee! I can tell what thou would'st do.

JAG. What, for a counter, would I do but
good?

DUKE S. Most mischievous foul sin, in chiding sin:

For thou thyself hast been a libertine, 65

As sensual as the brutish sting itself;

And all the embossed sores and headed evils,

That thou with license of free foot hast
caught,

Wouldst thou disgorge into the general world.

JAQ. Why, who cries out on pride, 70
That can therein tax any private party?

Doth it not flow as hugely as the sea,
Till that the wearer's very means do ebb?

What woman in the city do I name,
When that I say the city-woman bears 75

The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders!
Who can come in and say that I mean her,
When such a one as she such is her neighbour?

Or what is he of basest function
That says his bravery is not of my cost, 80

Thinking that I mean him, but therein suits
His folly to the mettle of my speech?

There then; how then? what then? Let me see wherein

My tongue hath wrong'd him: if it do him
right, 84

Then he hath wrong'd himself; if he be free,
Why then my taxing like a wild-goose flies, Unclaim'd of any man. But who comes
here?

Enter ORLANDO, with his sword drawn.

ORL. Forbear, and eat no more.

JAQ. Why, I have eat none yet.

ORL. Nor shalt not, till necessity be serv'd.

JAQ. Of what kind should this cock come
of? 90

DUKE S. Art thou thus bolden'd, man,
by thy distress,

Or else a rude despiser of good manners,
That in civility thou seem'st so empty?

ORL. You touch'd my vein at first: the thorny point 94

Of bare distress hath ta'en from me the show
Of smooth civility; yet am I inland bred,
And know some nurture. But forbear, I
say:

He dies that touches any of this fruit
Till I and my affairs are answered.

JAQ. An you will not be answered with reason, 100

I must die.

DUKE S. What would you have? Your gentleness shall force

More than your force move us to gentleness.

ORL. I almost die for food; and let me
have it.

DUKE S. Sit down and feed, and welcome to our table. 105

ORL. Speak you so gently? Pardon me,
I pray you:

I thought that all things had been savage
here,

And therefore put I on the countenance
Of stern commandment. But whate'er you are

That in this desert inaccessible, 110
Under the shade of melancholy boughs,

Lose and neglect the creeping hours of time;
If ever you have look'd on better days,

If ever been where bells have knoll'd to church,

If ever sat at any good man's feast, 115
If ever from your eyelids wip'd a tear,

And know what 'tis to pity, and be pitied,
Let gentleness my strong enforcement be:

In the which hope I blush, and hide my
sword.

DUKE S. True is it that we have seen better days, 120

And have with holy bell been knoll'd to
church,

And sat at good men's feasts, and wip'd our
eyes

Of drops that sacred pity hath engender'd;
And therefore sit you down in gentleness 124

And take upon command what help we have
That to your wanting may be minister'd.

ORL. Then but forbear your food a little while,

Whiles, like a doe, I go to find my fawn
And give it food. There is an old poor man,

Who after me hath many a weary step 130
Limp'd in pure love: till he be first suffic'd,

Oppress'd with two weak evils, age and hunger,

I will not touch a bit.

DUKE S. Go find him out,
And we will nothing waste till you return.

ORL. I thank ye; and be bless'd for your good comfort! Exit. 135

DUKE S. Thou seest we are not all alone unhappy:

This wide and universal theatre Presents more woeful pageants than the scene

Wherein we play in.

JAQ. All the world's a stage, 139

And all the men and woman merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. At first the infant,

Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.
 And then the whining school-boy, with his satchel, 145
 And shining morning face, creeping like snail
 Unwillingly to school. And then the lover,
 Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
 Made to his mistress' eyebrow. Then a soldier,
 Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard, 150
 Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,
 Seeking the bubble reputation Even in the cannon's mouth. And then the justice,
 In fair round belly with good capon lin'd,
 With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut, 155
 Full of wise saws and modern instances;
 And so he plays his part. The sixth age shifts
 Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloan,
 With spectacles on nose and pouch on side,
 His youthful hose well sav'd, a world too
 wide 160
 For his shrunk shank; and his big manly
 voice,
 Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
 And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all,
 That ends this strange eventful history,
 Is second childishness and mere oblivion, 165
 Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing.

Re-enter ORLANDO with ADAM.

DUKE S. Welcome. Set down your venerable burden,
 And let him feed.

ORL. I thank you most for him.

ADAM. So had you need: 169
 I scarce can speak to thank you for myself.

DUKE S. Welcome; fall to: I will not trouble you

As yet to question you about your fortunes.
 Give us some music; and, good cousin, sing.

AMI. Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
 Thou art not so unkind 175
 As man's ingratitude;
 Thy tooth is not so keen,
 Because thou art not seen,

Although thy breath be rude.

Heigh-ho! sing, heigh-ho! unto the green holly: 180
 Most friendship is feigning, most loving mere folly.

Then heigh-ho, the holly!

This life is most jolly.

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky, .
 That dost not bite so nigh 185

As benefits forgot:

Though thou the waters warp,

Thy sting is not so sharp

As friend remember'd not.

Heigh-ho! sing, heigh-ho! unto the green holly: 190

Most friendship is feigning, most loving mere folly.

Then heigh-ho, the holly!

This life is most jolly.

DUKE S. If that you were the good Sir
 Rowland's son, 194

As you have whisper'd faithfully you were,

And as mine eye doth his effigies witness

Most truly limn'd and living in your face,

Be truly welcome hither: I am the duke

That lov'd your father: the residue of your fortune, 199

Go to my cave and tell me. Good old man,

Thou art right welcome as thy master is.

Support him by the arm. Give me your
 hand,

And let me all your fortunes understand.

Exeunt.

ACT III

SCENE I

A Room in the Palace.

Enter DUKE FREDERICK, OLIVER, and Attendants.

DUKE F. Not see him since! Sir, sir, that cannot be:

But were I not the better part made mercy,
 I should not seek an absent argument

Of my revenge, thou present. But look to it:

Find out thy brother, whereso'er he is; 5

Seek him with candle; bring him, dead or living,

Within this twelvemonth, or turn thou no
 more

To seek a living in our territory.

Thy lands and all things that thou dost call
 thine

Worth seizure, do we seize into our hands, 10

Till thou canst quit thee by thy brother's mouth

Of what we think against thee.

OLI. O, that your highness knew my heart in this!

I never lov'd my brother in my life.

DUKE F. More villain thou. Well, push him out of doors; 15

And let my officers of such a nature

Make an extent upon his house and lands.
Do this expediently and turn him going.

Exeunt.

SCENE II

The Forest of Arden.

Enter ORLANDO, with a paper.

ORL. Hang there, my verse, in witness of my love;

And thou, thrice-crownèd queen of night, survey

With thy chaste eye, from thy pale sphere
above,

Thy huntress' name, that my full life doth
sway.

O Rosalind! these trees shall be my books, 5
And in their barks my thoughts I'll character,

That every eye, which in this forest looks,
Shall see thy virtue witness'd every where.

Run, run, Orlando: carve on every tree
The fair, the chaste, and unexpressive she. 10

Exit.

Enter CORIN and TOUCHSTONE.

COR. And how like you this shepherd's life, Master Touchstone?

TOUCH. Truly, shepherd, in respect of itself, it is a good life; but in respect that it is a shepherd's life, it is naught. In respect that it is solitary, I like it very well;
but in respect that it is private, it is a very vile life. Now, in respect it is in the fields, it pleaseth me well; but in respect it is not in the court, it is tedious. As it is a spare life, look you, it fits my humour well; but as there is no more plenty in it, it goes much against my stomach. Hast any philosophy in thee, shepherd? 24

COR. No more but that I know the more one sickens the worse at ease he is; and that he that wants money, means, and content, is without three good friends; that the property of rain is to wet, and fire to burn; that good pasture makes fat sheep, and that a great cause of the night is lack of the sun;
that he that hath learned no wit by nature nor art may complain of good breeding, or comes of a very dull kindred. 34

TOUCH. Such a one is a natural philosopher. Wast ever in court, shepherd?

COR. No, truly

TOUCH. Then thou art damned.

COR. Nay, I hope.

TOUCH. Truly, thou art damned like an ill-roasted egg, all on one side. 41

COR. For not being at court? Your reason.

TOUCH. Why, if thou never wast at court, thou never sawest good manners; if thou never sawest good manners, then thy manners must be wicked; and wickedness is sin, and sin is damnation. Thou art in a parlous state, shepherd. 49

COR. Not a whit, Touchstone: those that are good manners at the court are as ridiculous in the country as the behaviour of the country is most mockable at the court. You told me you salute not at the court, but you kiss your hands: that courtesy would be uncleanly if courtiers were shepherds. 56

TOUCH. Instance, briefly; come, instance.

COR. Why, we are still handling our ewes, and their fells, you know, are greasy.

TOUCH. Why, do not your courtier's hands sweat? and is not the grease of a mutton as wholesome as the sweat of a man?
Shallow, shallow. A better instance, I say;
come. 63

COR. Besides, our hands are hard.

TOUCH. Your lips will feel them the sooner: shallow again. A more sounder instance; come.

COR. And they are often tarred over with the surgery of our sheep; and would you have us kiss tar? The courtier's hands are perfumed with civet. 71

TOUCH. Most shallow man! Thou wormsmeat, in respect of a good piece of flesh, indeed! Learn of the wise, and per-pend: civet is of a baser birth than tar; the very uncleanly flux of a cat. Mend the instance, shepherd.

COR. You have too courtly a wit for me:
I'll rest. 79

TOUCH. Wilt thou rest damned? God help thee, shallow man! God make incision in thee! thou art raw.

COR. Sir, I am a true labourer: I earn that I eat, get that I wear, owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness, glad of other men's good, content with my harm; and the greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze and my lambs suck. 88

TOUCH. That is another simple sin in you, to bring the ewes and the rams together;

and to offer to get your living by the copulation of cattle; to be bawd to a bell-wether, and to betray a she-lamb of a twelvemonth to a crooked-pated, old, cuckoldy ram, out of all reasonable match. If thou be'st not damned for this, the devil himself will have no shepherds: I cannot see else how thou shouldst 'scape. 98

COR. Here comes young Master Gany-mede, my new mistress's brother.

Enter ROSALIND, reading a paper.

Ros.

From the east to western Ind,
No jewel is like Rosalind.
Her worth, being mounted on the wind,
Through all the world bears Rosalind. 105
All the pictures fairest lin'd
Are but black to Rosalind.
Let no face be kept in mind
But the fair of Rosalind.

TOUCH. I'll rime you so eight years together, dinners and suppers and sleeping hours excepted: it is the right butter-women's rank to market. 112

Ros. Out, fool!

TOUCH. For a taste:

If a hart do lack a hind, 115
Let him seek out Rosalind.
If the cat will after kind,
So be sure will Rosalind.
Winter garments must be lin'd,
So must slender Rosalind. 120
They that reap must sheaf and bind,
Then to cart with Rosalind.
Sweetest nut hath sourest rind,
Such a nut is Rosalind.
He that sweetest rose will find 125
Must find love's prick and Rosalind.

This is the very false gallop of verses: why do you infect yourself with them?

Ros. Peace! you dull fool: I found them on a tree. 130

TOUCH. Truly, the tree yields bad fruit.

Ros. I'll graff it with you, and then I shall graff it with a medlar: then it will be the earliest fruit i' the country; for you'll be rotten ere you be half ripe, and that's the right virtue of the medlar. 136

TOUCH. You have said; but whether wisely or no, let the forest judge.

Ros. Peace!

Here comes my sister, reading: stand aside.

Enter CELIA, reading a paper.

Why should this a desert be? 141

For it is unpeopled? No;

Tongues I'll hang on every tree,

That shall civil sayings show.

Some, how brief the life of man 145

Runs his erring pilgrimage,

That the stretching of a span

Buckles in his sum of age;

Some, of violated vows

'Twixt the souls of friend and friend: 150

But upon the fairest boughs,

Or at every sentence end,

Will I Rosalinda write;

Teaching all that read to know

The quintessence of every sprite 155

Heaven would in little show.

Therefore Heaven Nature charg'd

That one body should be fill'd

With all graces wide enlarg'd: 160

Nature presently distill'd

Helen's cheek, but not her heart,

Cleopatra's majesty,

Atalanta's better part,

Sad Lucretia's modesty.

Thus Rosalind of many parts 165

By heavenly synod was devis'd,

Of many faces, eyes, and hearts,

To have the touches dearest priz'd.

Heaven would that she these gifts should have,

And I to live and die her slave. 170

Ros. O most gentle pulpit! what tedious homily of love have you wearied your parishioners withal, and never cried, 'Have patience, good people!'

CEL. How now! back, friends! Shepherd, go off a little: go with him, sirrah. 176

TOUCH. Come, shepherd, let us make an honourable retreat; though not with bag and baggage, yet with scrip and scrippage.

Exeunt CORIN and TOUCHSTONE.

CEL. Didst thou hear these verses? 180

Ros. O! yes, I heard them all, and more too; for some of them had in them more feet than the verses would bear.

CEL. That's no matter: the feet might bear the verses. 185

Ros. Ay, but the feet were lame, and could not bear themselves without the verse, and therefore stood lamely in the verse.

CEL. But didst thou hear without wondering, how thy name should be hanged and carved upon these trees? 192

Ros. I was seven of the nine days out of the wonder before you came; for look here what I found on a palm-tree: I was never so be-rimed since Pythagoras' time, that I was an Irish rat, which I can hardly remember.

CEL. Trow you who hath done this? 198

ROS. Is it a man?

CEL. And a chain, that you once wore, about his neck. Change you colour?

ROS. I prithee, who? 202

CEL. O Lord, Lord! it is a hard matter for friends to meet; but mountains may be removed with earthquakes, and so encounter.

ROS. Nay, but who is it?

CEL. Is it possible?

ROS. Nay, I prithee now with most petitionary vehemence, tell me who it is. 209

CEL. O! wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful! and yet again wonderful! and after that, out of all whooping!

ROS. Good my complexion! dost thou think, though I am caparisoned like a man, I have a doublet and hose in my disposition? One inch of delay more is a South-sea of discovery; I prithee, tell me who is it, quickly, and speak apace. I would thou could'st stammer, that thou might'st pour this concealed man out of thy mouth, as wine comes out of a narrow-mouthed bottle; either too much at once, or none at all. I prithee, take the cork out of thy mouth, that I may drink thy tidings. 224

CEL. So you may put a man in your belly.

ROS. Is he of God's making? What manner of man? Is his head worth a hat, or his chin worth a beard? 229

CEL. Nay, he hath but a little beard.

ROS. Why, God will send more, if the man will be thankful. Let me stay the growth of his beard, if thou delay me not the knowledge of his chin. 234

CEL. It is young Orlando, that tripped up the wrestler's heels and your heart both in an instant.

ROS. Nay, but the devil take mocking: speak, sad brow and true maid.

CEL. I' faith, coz, 't is he. 240

ROS. Orlando?

CEL. Orlando.

ROS. Alas the day! what shall I do with my doublet and hose? What did he when thou sawest him? What said he? How looked he? Wherein went he? What makes he here? Did he ask for me? Where remains he? How parted he with thee, and when shalt thou see him again? Answer me in one word. 250

CEL. You must borrow me Gargantua's mouth first: 't is a word too great for any mouth of this age's size. To say ay and no to these particulars is more than to answer in a catechism. 255

ROS. But doth he know that I am in this forest and in man's apparel? Looks he as freshly as he did the day he wrestled?

CEL. It is as easy to count atomies as to resolve the propositions of a lover; but take a taste of my finding him, and relish it with good observance. I found him under a tree, like a dropped acorn. 263

ROS. It may well be called Jove's tree, when it drops forth such fruit.

CEL. Give me audience, good madam.

ROS. Proceed.

CEL. There lay he, stretched along like a wounded knight. 269

ROS. Though it be pity to see such a sight, it well becomes the ground.

CEL. Cry 'holla!' to thy tongue, I prithee; it curvets unseasonably. He was furnished like a hunter.

ROS. O ominous! he comes to kill my heart. 276

CEL. I would sing my song without a burthen: thou bringest me out of tune.

ROS. Do you not know I am a woman? when I think, I must speak. Sweet, say on.

CEL. You bring me out. Soft! comes he not here? 282

ROS. 'T is he: slink by, and note him.

Enter ORLANDO and JAQUES.

JAG. I thank you for your company; but, good faith, I had as lief have been myself alone.

ORL. And so had I; but yet, for fashion sake, I thank you too for your society. 288

JAG. God be wi' you: let's meet as little as we can.

ORL. I do desire we may be better strangers.

JAG. I pray you, mar no more trees with writing love-songs in their barks. 294

ORL. I pray you, mar no more of my verses with reading them ill-favouredly.

JAG. Rosalind is your love's name?

ORL. Yes, just.

JAQ. I do not like her name. 299

ORL. There was no thought of pleasing you when she was christened.

JAQ. What stature is she of?

ORL. Just as high as my heart. 303

JAQ. You are full of pretty answers. Have you not been acquainted with goldsmiths' wives, and conned them out of rings?

ORL. Not so; but I answer you right painted cloth, from whence you have studied your questions. 309

JAQ. You have a nimble wit: I think 't was made of Atalanta's heels. Will you sit down with me? and we two will rail against our mistress the world, and all our misery.

ORL. I will chide no breather in the world but myself, against whom I know most faults. 316

JAQ. The worse fault you have is to be in love.

ORL. 'T is a fault I will not change for your best virtue. I am weary of you. 320

JAQ. By my troth, I was seeking for a fool when I found you.

ORL. He is drowned in the brook: look but in, and you shall see him.

JAQ. There I shall see mine own figure.

ORL. Which I take to be either a fool or a cipher. 327

JAQ. I'll tarry no longer with you. Farewell, good Signior Love.

ORL. I am glad of your departure. Adieu, good Monsieur Melancholy.

Exit JAKES.

ROS. I will speak to him like a saucy lackey, and under that habit play the knave with him. Do you hear, forester? 334

ORL. Very well: what would you?

ROS. I pray you, what is 't o'clock?

ORL. You should ask me what time o' day; there's no clock in the forest. 338

ROS. Then there is no true lover in the forest; else sighing every minute and groaning every hour would detect the lazy foot of Time as well as a clock.

ORL. And why not the swift foot of Time? had not that been as proper? 344

ROS. By no means, sir. Time travels in divers paces with divers persons. I'll tell you who Time ambles withal, who Time trots withal, who Time gallops withal, and who he stands still withal. 349

ORL. I prithee, who doth he trot withal?

ROS. Marry, he trots hard with a young maid between the contract of her marriage and the day it is solemnized; if the interim be but a se'nnight, Time's pace is so hard that it seems the length of seven year. 355

ORL. Who ambles Time withal?

ROS. With a priest that lacks Latin, and a rich man that hath not the gout: for the one sleeps easily because he cannot study, and the other lives merrily because he feels no pain; the one lacking the burden of lean and wasteful learning, the other knowing no burden of heavy tedious penury. These Time ambles withal. 364

ORL. Who doth he gallop withal?

ROS. With a thief to the gallows; for though he go as softly as foot can fall, he thinks himself too soon there.

ORL. Who stays it still withal?

ROS. With lawyers in the vacation; for they sleep between term and term, and then they perceive not how Time moves. 372

ORL. Where dwell you, pretty youth?

ROS. With this shepherdess, my sister; here in the skirts of the forest, like fringe upon a petticoat.

ORL. Are you native of this place?

ROS. As the cony that you see dwell where she is kindled. 379

ORL. Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling.

ROS. I have been told so of many: but, indeed, an old religious uncle of mine taught me to speak, who was in his youth an inland man; one that knew courtship too well, for there he fell in love. I have heard him read many lectures against it; and I thank God I am not a woman, to be touched with so many giddy offences as he hath generally taxed their whole sex withal. 390

ORL. Can you remember any of the principal evils that he laid to the charge of women?

ROS. There were none principal; they were all like one another as half-pence are; every one fault seeming monstrous till his fellow fault came to match it. 397

ORL. I prithee, recount some of them.

ROS. No; I will not cast away my physic but on those that are sick. There is a man haunts the forest, that abuses our young plants with carving 'Rosalind' on their barks; hangs odes upon hawthorns, and elegies on brambles; all, forsooth, deifying

the name of Rosalind: if I could meet that fancy-monger, I would give him some good counsel, for he seems to have the quotidian of love upon him. 408

ORL. I am he that is so love-shaked. I pray you, tell me your remedy.

ROS. There is none of my uncle's marks upon you: he taught me how to know a man in love; in which cage of rushes I am sure you are not prisoner.

ORL. What were his marks? 415

ROS. A lean cheek, which you have not; a blue eye and sunken, which you have not; an unquestionable spirit, which you have not; a beard neglected, which you have not; but I pardon you for that, for simply your having in beard is a younger brother's revenue. Then your hose should be ungartered, your bonnet unbanded, your sleeve unbuttoned, your shoe untied, and every thing about you demonstrating a careless desolation. But you are no such man: you are rather point-device in your accoutrements; as loving yourself than seeming the lover of any other. 429

ORL. Fair youth, I would I could make thee believe I love.

ROS. Me believe it! you may as soon make her that you love believe it; which, I warrant, she is apter to do than to confess she does; that is one of the points in the which women still give the lie to their consciences. But, in good sooth, are you he that hangs the verses on the trees, wherein Rosalind is so admired? 439

ORL. I swear to thee, youth, by the white hand of Rosalind, I am that he, that unfortunate he.

ROS. But are you so much in love as your rimes speak?

ORL. Neither rime nor reason can express how much. 446

ROS. Love is merely a madness, and I tell you, deserves as well a dark house and a whip as madmen do; and the reason why they are not so punished and cured is, that the lunacy is so ordinary that the whippers are in love too. Yet I profess curing it by counsel. 453

ORL. Did you ever cure any so?

ROS. Yes, one; and in this manner. He was to imagine me his love, his mistress; and I set him every day to woo me: at which time would I, being but a moonish youth, grieve, be effeminate, changeable, longing and liking, proud, fantastical, apish, shallow, inconstant, full of tears, full of smiles, for every passion something, and for no passion truly any thing, as boys and women are for the most part, cattle of this colour; would now like him, now loathe him; then entertain him, then forswear him; now weep for him, then spit at him; that I drave my suitor from his mad humour of love to a living humour of madness, which was, to forswear the full stream of the world, and to live in a nook merely monastic. And thus I cured him; and this way will I take upon me to wash your liver as clean as a sound sheep's heart, that there shall not be one spot of love in 't.

ORL. I would not be cured, youth. 475

ROS. I would cure you, if you would but call me Rosalind, and come every day to my cote and woo me.

ORL. Now, by the faith of my love, I will: tell me where it is. 480

ROS. Go with me to it and I'll show it you; and by the way you shall tell me where in the forest you live. Will you go?

ORL. With all my heart, good youth.

ROS. Nay, you must call me Rosalind. Come, sister, will you go? Exeunt. 485

SCENE III

Another Part of the Forest.

*Enter TOUCHSTONE and AUDREY;
JAQUES behind.*

TOUCH. Come apace, good Audrey: I will fetch up your goats, Audrey. And how, Audrey? am I the man yet? doth my simple feature content you?

AUD. Your features! Lord warrant us! what features? 6

TOUCH. I am here with thee and thy goats, as the most capricious poet, honest Ovid, was among the Goths.

JAG. [Aside.] O knowledge ill-inhabited, worse than Jove in a thatched house! 11

TOUCH. When a man's verses cannot be understood, nor a man's good wit seconded with the forward child Understanding, it strikes a man more dead than a great reckoning in a little room. Truly, I would the gods had made thee poetical. 17

AUD. I do not know what 'poetical' is. Is it honest in deed and word? Is it a true thing?

TOUCH. No, truly, for the truest poetry is the most feigning; and lovers are given to poetry, and what they swear in poetry may be said as lovers they do feign. 24

AUD. Do you wish then that the gods had made me poetical?

TOUCH. I do, truly; for thou swearest to me thou art honest: now, if thou wert a poet, I might have some hope thou didst feign. 30

AUD. Would you not have me honest?

TOUCH. No, truly, unless thou wert hard-favoured; for honesty coupled to beauty is to have honey a sauce to sugar.

JAQ. [Aside.] A material fool. 35

AUD. Well, I am not fair, and therefore I pray the gods make me honest.

TOUCH. Truly, and to cast away honesty upon a foul slut were to put good meat into an unclean dish. 40

AUD. I am not a slut, though I thank the gods I am foul.

TOUCH. Well, praised be the gods for thy foulness! sluttishness may come hereafter. But be it as it may be, I will marry thee; and to that end I have been with Sir Oliver Martext, the vicar of the next village, who hath promised to meet me in this place of the forest, and to couple us. 49

JAQ. [Aside.] I would fain see this meeting. 50

AUD. Well, the gods give us joy!

TOUCH. Amen. A man may, if he were of a fearful heart, stagger in this attempt; for here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn-beasts. But what though? Courage! As horns are odious, they are necessary. It is said, 'many a man knows no end of his goods': right; many a man has good horns, and knows no end of them. Well, that is the dowry of his wife; 't is none of his own getting. Horns? Even so. Poor men alone? No, no; the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal. Is the single man therefore blessed? No: as a walled town is more worthier than a village, so is the forehead of a married man more honourable than the bare brow of a bachelor; and by how much defence is better than no skill, by so much is a horn more precious than to want. Here comes Sir Oliver. 72

Enter Sir OLIVER MARTEXT.

Sir Oliver Martext, you are well met: will you dispatch us here under this tree, or shall we go with you to your chapel?

SIR OLI. Is there none here to give the woman? 77

TOUCH. I will not take her on gift of any man.

SIR OLI. Truly, she must be given, or the marriage is not lawful.

JAQ. [Coming forward.] Proceed, proceed: I'll give her. 83

TOUCH. Good even, good Master What ye-call 't: how do you, sir? You are very well met: God 'ield you for your last company: I am very glad to see you: even a toy in hand here, sir: nay, pray be covered. 88

JAQ. Will you be married, motley?

TOUCH. As the ox hath his bow, sir, the horse his curb, and the falcon her bells, so man hath his desires; and as pigeons bill, so wedlock would be nibbling. 93

JAQ. And will you, being a man of your breeding, be married under a bush like a beggar? Get you to church, and have a good priest that can tell you what marriage is: this fellow will but join together as they join wainscot; then one of you will prove a shrunk panel, and like green timber, warp, warp. 101

TOUCH. [Aside.] I am not in the mind but I were better to be married of him than of another: for he is not like to marry me well, and not being well married, it will be a good excuse for me hereafter to leave my wife. 107

JAQ. Go thou with me, and let me counsel thee.

TOUCH. Come, sweet Audrey: We must be married, or we must live in bawdry.

Farewell, good Master Oliver: not,

O sweet Oliver!

O brave Oliver!

Leave me not behind thee: 113 but,—

Wind away,

Begone, I say,

I will not to wedding with thee. 119
Exeunt JAQUES, TOUCHSTONE, and AUDREY.

SIR OLI. 'T is no matter: ne'er a fantastical knave of them all shall flout me out of my calling. Exit.

SCENE IV

Another Part of the Forest.Enter ROSALIND and CELIA.

ROS. Never talk to me: I will weep. 5

CEL. Do, I prithee; but yet have the grace to consider that tears do not become a man.

ROS. But have I not cause to weep?

CEL. As good cause as one would desire; therefore weep.

ROS. His very hair is of the dissembling colour. 9

CEL. Something browner than Judas's: marry, his kisses are Judas's own children.

ROS. I' faith, his hair is of a good colour.

CEL. An excellent colour: your chestnut was ever the only colour.

ROS. And his kissing is as full of sanctity as the touch of holy bread. 16

CEL. He hath bought a pair of cast lips of Diana: a nun of winter's sisterhood kisses not more religiously; the very ice of chastity is in them.

ROS. But why did he swear he would come this morning, and comes not? 22

CEL. Nay, certainly, there is no truth in him.

ROS. Do you think so?

CEL. Yes: I think he is not a pick-purse nor a horse-stealer; but for his verity in love, I do think him as concave as a covered goblet or a worm-eaten nut. 29

ROS. Not true in love?

CEL. Yes, when he is in; but I think he is not in.

ROS. You have heard him swear downright he was. 34

CEL. 'Was' is not 'is': besides, the oath of a lover is no stronger than the word of a tapster; they are both the confirmers of false reckonings. He attends here in the forest on the duke your father. 39

ROS. I met the duke yesterday and had much question with him. He asked me of what parentage I was; I told him, of as good as he; so he laughed and let me go. But what talk we of fathers, when there is such a man as Orlando? 45

CEL. O! that's a brave man. He writes brave verses, speaks brave words, swears brave oaths, and breaks them bravely, quite traverse, athwart the heart of his lover; as a puny tilter, that spurs his horse but on one side, breaks his staff like a noble goose. But all's brave that youth mounts and folly guides. Who comes here? 53

Enter CORIN.

COR. Mistress and master, you have oft inquir'd

After the shepherd that complain'd of love,
Who you saw sitting by me on the turf,
Praising the proud disdainful shepherdess
That was his mistress.

CEL. Well, and what of him?

COR. If you will see a pageant truly play'd, 59

Between the pale complexion of true love
And the red glow of scorn and proud disdain,
Go hence a little, and I shall conduct you,
If you will mark it.ROS. O! come, let us remove:
The sight of lovers feedeth those in love.Bring us unto this sight, and you shall say I'll prove a busy actor in their play. 66*Exeunt.*

SCENE V

Another Part of the Forest.Enter SILVIUS and PHEBE.

SIL. Sweet Phebe, do not scorn me; do not, Phebe:

Say that you love me not, but say not so
In bitterness. The common executioner, Whose heart the accustom'd sight of death makes hard,Falls not the axe upon the humbled neck 5
But first begs pardon: will you sterner be
Than he that dies and lives by bloody drops?*Enter ROSALIND, CELIA, and CORIN, behind.*PHE. I would not be thy executioner:
I fly thee, for I would not injure thee. 9Thou tell'st me there is murder in mine eye:
'Tis pretty, sure, and very probable,
That eyes, that are the frail'st and softest things,Who shut their coward gates on atomies,
Should be call'd tyrants, butchers, murderers! 14Now I do frown on thee with all my heart;
And if mine eyes can wound, now let them kill thee;Now counterfeit to swoon; why now fall
down;

Or, if thou canst not, O! for shame, for shame,

Lie not, to say mine eyes are murderers.

Now show the wound mine eye hath made in thee: 20

Scratch thee but with a pin, and there remains

Some scar of it; lean but upon a rush,

The cicatrice and capable impressure

Thy palm some moment keeps; but now mine eyes,

Which I have darted at thee, hurt thee not,

Nor, I am sure, there is no force in eyes 26

That can do hurt.

SIL. O dear Phebe,

If ever, as that ever may be near,

You meet in some fresh cheek the power of fancy,

Then shall you know the wounds invisible 30

That love's keen arrows make.

PHE. But till that time

Come not thou near me; and when that time comes,

Afflict me with thy mocks, pity me not;

As till that time I shall not pity thee.

Ros. And why, I pray you? Who might be your mother, 35

That you insult, exult, and all at once, Over the wretched? What though you have no beauty—

As, by my faith, I see no more in you

Than without candle may go dark to bed—

Must you be therefore proud and pitiless? 40

Why, what means this? Why do you look on me?

I see no more in you than in the ordinary Of nature's sale-work. 'Od's my little life!

I think she means to tangle my eyes too.

No, faith, proud mistress, hope not after it: 45

'T is not your inky brows, your black silk hair,

Your bugle eyeballs, nor your cheek of cream,

That can entame my spirits to your worship.

You foolish shepherd, wherefore do you follow her, 40

Like foggy south puffing with wind and rain?

You are a thousand times a properer man

Than she a woman: 't is such fools as you

That make the world full of ill-favour'd children:

'T is not her glass, but you, that fatters her;

And out of you she sees herself more proper

Than any of her lineaments can show her. 56

But, mistress, know yourself: down on your knees,

And thank heaven, fasting, for a good man's love:

For I must tell you friendly in your ear,

Sell when you can; you are not for all markets. 60

Cry the man mercy; love him; take his offer:

Foul is most foul, being foul to be a scoffer.

So take her to thee, shepherd. Fare you well.

PHE. Sweet youth, I pray you, chide a year together:

I had rather hear you chide than this man woo. 65

Ros. He's fallen in love with your foulness, and she'll fall in love with my anger.

If it be so, as fast as she answers thee with frowning looks, I'll sauce her with bitter words.

Why look you so upon me? 70

PHE. For no ill will I bear you.

Ros. I pray you, do not fall in love with me,

For I am falsier than vows made in wine:

Besides, I like you not. If you will know my house,

'T is at the tuft of olives here hard by, 75

Will you go, sister? Shepherd, ply her hard.

Come, sister. Shepherdess, look on him better,

And be not proud: though all the world could see,

None could be so abus'd in sight as he.

Come, to our flock. 80

Exeunt ROSALIND, CELIA, and CORIN.

PHE. Dead shepherd, now I find thy saw of might:

'Who ever lov'd that lov'd not at first sight'

SIL. Sweet Phebe,—

PHE. Ha! what say'st thou, Silvius?

SIL. Sweet Phebe, pity me.

PHE. Why, I am sorry for thee, gentle Silvius. 85

SIL. Wherever sorrow is, relief would be:

If you do sorrow at my grief in love,

By giving love your sorrow and my grief

Were both extermin'd.

PHE. Thou hast my love: is not that neighbourly? 90

SIL. I would have you.

PHE. Why, that were covetousness.

Silvius, the time was that I hated thee,

And yet it is not that I bear thee love:

But since that thou canst talk of love so well,
Thy company, which erst was irksome to me,
I will endure, and I'll employ thee too; 96
But do not look for further recompense
Than thine own gladness that thou art employ'd.

SIL. So holy and so perfect is my love,
And I in such a poverty of grace, 100
That I shall think it a most plenteous crop
To glean the broken ears after the man
That the main harvest reaps: loose now and
then

A scatter'd smile, and that I'll live upon.

PHE. Know'st thou the youth that spoke to me erewhile? 105

SIL. Not very well, but I have met him
oft;

And he hath bought the cottage and the bounds

That the old carlot once was master of.

PHE. Think not I love him, though I ask for him.

'T is but a peevish boy; yet he talks well; 110
But what care I for words? yet words do well
When he that speaks them pleases those that hear.

It is a pretty youth: not very pretty:
But, sure, he's proud; and yet his pride becomes him:

He'll make a proper man: the best thing in
him 115

Is his complexion; and faster than his tongue
Did make offence his eye did heal it up.

He is not very tall; yet for his years he's tall:
His leg is but so so; and yet 't is well:

There was a pretty redness in his lip, 120
A little ripier and more lusty red

Than that mix'd in his cheek; 't was just the difference

Betwixt the constant red and mingled damask.

There be some women, Silvius, had they mark'd him

In parcels as I did, would have gone near 125
To fall in love with him; but, for my part,

I love him not nor hate him not; and yet
I have more cause to hate him than to love

him:
For what had he to do to chide at me?

He said mine eyes were black and my hair
black; 130

And, now I am remember'd, scorn'd at me.
I marvel why I answer'd not again:

But that's all one; omittance is no quittance.

I'll write to him a very taunting letter,
And thou shalt bear it: wilt thou, Silvius? 135
SIL. Phebe, with all my heart.

PHE. I'll write it straight;
The matter's in my head and in my heart:
I will be bitter with him and passing short.
Go with me, Silvius. Exeunt

ACT IV

SCENE I

The Forest of Arden.

Enter ROSALIND, CELIA, and JAGUES.

JAG. I prithee, pretty youth, let me be better acquainted with thee.

Ros. They say you are a melancholy
fellow.

JAG. I am so; I do love it better than laughing. 6

Ros. Those that are in extremity of either are abominable fellows, and betray themselves to every modern censure worse than drunkards.

JAG. Why, 't is good to be sad and say
nothing. 12

Ros. Why then, 't is good to be a post.

JAG. I have neither the scholar's melancholy, which is emulation; nor the musician's, which is fantastical; nor the courtier's, which is proud; nor the soldier's, which is ambitious; nor the lawyer's, which is politic; nor the lady's, which is nice; nor the lover's, which is all these: but it is a melancholy of mine own, compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and indeed the sundry contemplation of my travels, in which my often rumination wraps me in a most humorous sadness. 25

Ros. A traveller! By my faith, you have great reason to be sad. I fear you have sold your own lands to see other men's;
then, to have seen much and to have nothing, is to have rich eyes and poor hands. 30

JAG. Yes, I have gained my experience.

Ros. And your experience makes you sad: I had rather have a fool to make me merry than experience to make me sad;
and to travel for it too! 35

Enter ORLANDO.

ORL. Good day and happiness, dear Rosalind!

JAC. Nay then, God be wi' you, and you talk in blank verse. Exit.

ROS. Farewell, Monsieur Traveller: look you lisp and wear strange suits, disable all the benefits of your own country, be out of love with your nativity, and almost chide God for making you that countenance you are; or I will scarce think you have swam in a gondola. Why, how now, Orlando! where have you been all this while? You a lover! An you serve me such another trick, never come in my sight more. 48

ORL. My fair Rosalind, I come within an hour of my promise.

ROS. Break an hour's promise in love! He that will divide a minute into a thousand parts, and break but a part of the thousandth part of a minute in the affairs of love, it may be said of him that Cupid hath clapped him o' the shoulder, but I'll warrant him heart-whole. 57

ORL. Pardon me, dear Rosalind.

ROS. Nay, an you be so tardy, come no more in my sight: I had as lief be wooed of a snail.

ORL. Of a snail? 62

ROS. Ay, of a snail; for though he comes slowly, he carries his house on his head; a better jointure, I think, than you make a woman: besides, he brings his destiny with him.

ORL. What's that? 68

ROS. Why, horns; which such as you are fain to be beholding to your wives for: but he comes armed in his fortune and prevents the slander of his wife.

ORL. Virtue is no horn-maker; and my Rosalind is virtuous.

ROS. And I am your Rosalind. 75

CEL. It pleases him to call you so; but he hath a Rosalind of a better leer than you.

ROS. Come, woo me, woo me; for now I am in a holiday humour, and like enough to consent. What would you say to me now, an I were your very very Rosalind? 81

ORL. I would kiss before I spoke.

ROS. Nay, you were better speak first, and when you were gravelled for lack of matter, you might take occasion to kiss. Very good orators, when they are out, they will spit; and for lovers lacking—God warn us!—matter, the cleanliest shift is to kiss.

ORL. How if the kiss be denied? 89

ROS. Then she puts you to entreaty, and there begins new matter.

ORL. Who could be out, being before his beloved mistress?

ROS. Marry, that should you, if I were your mistress, or I should think my honesty ranker than my wit. 96

ORL. What, of my suit?

ROS. Not out of your apparel, and yet out of your suit. Am not I your Rosalind?

ORL. I take some joy to say you are, because I would be talking of her. 101

ROS. Well, in her person I say I will not have you.

ORL. Then in mine own person I die.

ROS. No, faith, die by attorney. The poor world is almost six thousand years old, and in all this time there was not any man died in his own person, videlicet, in a love-cause. Troilus had his brains dashed out with a Grecian club; yet he did what he could to die before, and he is one of the patterns of love. Leander, he would have lived many a fair year, though Hero had turned nun, if it had not been for a hot midsummer-night; for, good youth, he went but forth to wash him in the Hellespont, and being taken with the cramp was drowned; and the foolish coroners of that age found it was 'Hero of Sestos.' But these are all lies: men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love. 121

ORL. I would not have my right Rosalind of this mind, for, I protest, her frown might kill me.

ROS. By this hand, it will not kill a fly. But come, now I will be your Rosalind in a more coming-on disposition, and ask me what you will, I will grant it. 128

ORL. Then love me, Rosalind.

ROS. Yes, faith, will I; Fridays and Saturdays and all.

ORL. And wilt thou have me?

ROS. Ay, and twenty such.

ORL. What sayest thou?

ROS. Are you not good? 135

ORL. I hope so.

ROS. Why then, can one desire too much of a good thing? Come, sister, you shall be the priest and marry us. Give me your hand, Orlando. What do you say, sister?

ORL. Pray thee, marry us. 141

CEL. I cannot say the words.

Ros. You must begin, 'Will you, Orlando,—'

CEL. Go to. Will you, Orlando, have to wife this Rosalind? 146

ORL. I will.

Ros. Ay, but when?

ORL. Why now; as fast as she can marry us. 150

Ros. Then you must say, 'I take thee, Rosalind, for wife.'

ORL. I take thee, Rosalind, for wife.

Ros. I might ask you for your commission; but I do take thee, Orlando, for my husband: there's a girl goes before the priest; and certainly a woman's thought runs before her actions. 158

ORL. So do all thoughts; they are winged.

Ros. Now tell me how long you would have her after you have possessed her.

ORL. For ever and a day. 163

Ros. Say 'a day,' without the 'ever.' No, no, Orlando; men are April when they woo, December when they wed: maids are May when they are maids, but the sky changes when they are wives. I will be more jealous of thee than a Barbary cock-pigeon over his hen; more clamorous than a parrot against rain; more new-fangled than an ape; more giddy in my desires than a monkey: I will weep for nothing, like Diana in the fountain, and I will do that when you are disposed to be merry; I will laugh like a hyen, and that when thou art inclined to sleep. 177

ORL. But will my Rosalind do so?

Ros. By my life, she will do as I do.

ORL. O! but she is wise.

Ros. Or else she could not have the wit to do this: the wiser, the waywarder. Make the doors upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement; shut that, and 't will out at the key-hole; stop that, 't will fly with the smoke out at the chimney. 186

ORL. A man that had a wife with such a wit, he might say, 'Wit, whither wilt?'

Ros. Nay, you might keep that check for it till you met your wife's wit going to your neighbour's bed. 191

ORL. And what wit could wit have to excuse that?

Ros. Marry, to say she came to seek you there. You shall never take her without her answer, unless you take her without her tongue. O! that woman that cannot make her fault her husband's occasion, let her never nurse her child herself, for she will breed it like a fool. 200

ORL. For these two hours, Rosalind, I will leave thee.

Ros. Alas! dear love. I cannot lack thee two hours.

ORL. I must attend the duke at dinner: by two o'clock I will be with thee again. 206

Ros. Ay, go your ways, go your ways; I knew what you would prove; my friends told me as much, and I thought no less: that flattering tongue of yours won me: 't is but one cast away, and so, come, death! Two o'clock is your hour? 212

ORL. Ay, sweet Rosalind.

Ros. By my troth, and in good earnest, and so God mend me, and by all pretty oaths that are not dangerous, if you break one jot of your promise or come one minute behind your hour, I will think you the most pathetic break-promise, and the most hollow lover, and the most unworthy of her you call Rosalind, that may be chosen out of the gross band of the unfaithful. Therefore beware my censure, and keep your promise. 224

ORL. With no less religion than if thou wert indeed my Rosalind: so, adieu.

Ros. Well, Time is the old justice that examines all such offenders, and let Time try. Adieu. Exit ORLANDO. 229

CEL. You have simply misused our sex in your love-prate: we must have your doublet and hose plucked over your head, and show the world what the bird hath done to her own nest. 234

Ros. O coz, coz, coz, my pretty little coz, that thou didst know how many fathom deep I am in love! But it cannot be sounded: my affection hath an unknown bottom, like the bay of Portugal. 239

CEL. Or rather, bottomless; that as fast as you pour affection in, it runs out.

Ros. No; that same wicked bastard of Venus that was begot of thought, conceived of spleen, and born of madness, that blind rascally boy that abuses every one's eyes because his own are out, let him be judge how deep I am in love. I'll tell thee, Aliena, I cannot be out of the sight of Orlando: I'll go find a shadow and sigh till he come. 249

CEL. And I'll sleep. Exeunt.

SCENE II

Another Part of the Forest.Enter JAQUES, Lords, and Foresters.

JAQ. Which is he that killed the deer?

FIRST LORD. Sir, it was I.

JAQ. Let's present him to the duke, like a Roman conqueror; and it would do well to set the deer's horns upon his head for a branch of victory. Have you no song, forester, for this purpose? 7

FORESTER. Yes, sir.

JAQ. Sing it: 't is no matter how it be in tune so it make noise enough. 10

FOR.

What shall he have that kill'd the deer?

His leather skin and horns to wear.

Then sing him home.

The rest shall bear this burthen.

Take thou no scorn to wear the horn; 15

It was a crest ere thou wast born:

Thy father's father wore it,

And thy father bore it:

The horn, the horn, the lusty horn

Is not a thing to laugh to scorn. 20

Exeunt.

SCENE III

Another Part of the Forest.Enter ROSALIND and CELIA.

ROS. How say you now? Is it not past two o'clock? and here much Orlando!

CEL. I warrant you, with pure love and troubled brain, he hath ta'en his bow and arrows, and is gone forth to sleep. Look, who comes here. 6

Enter SILVIUS.

SIL. My errand is to you, fair youth.
My gentle Phebe bid me give you this:
I know not the contents; but, as I guess
By the stern brow and waspish action 10
Which she did use as she was writing of it,
It bears an angry tenour: pardon me;
I am but as a guiltless messenger.

Ros. Patience herself would startle at this letter, 14
And play the swaggerer: bear this, bear all.
She says I am not fair; that I lack manners;
She calls me proud, and that she could not love me

Were man as rare as phoenix. 'Od's my will!
Her love is not the hare that I do hunt:
Why writes she so to me? Well, shepherd,
well, 20

This is a letter of your own device.

SIL. No, I protest, I know not the contents: Phebe did write it.

Ros. Come, come, you are a fool,
And turn'd into the extremity of love.
I saw her hand: she has a leathern hand, 25
A freestone colour'd hand: I verily did think That her old gloves were on, but 't was her
hands;

She has a housewife's hand; but that's no
matter:

I say she never did invent this letter;
This is a man's invention, and his hand. 30

SIL. Sure, it is hers.

Ros. Why, 't is a boisterous and a cruel style,

A style for challengers; why, she defies me,
Like Turk to Christian: woman's gentle
brain

Could not drop forth such giant-rude invention, 35

Such Ethiop words, blacker in their effect Than in their countenance. Will you hear the letter?

SIL. So please you, for I never heard it
yet;

Yet heard too much of Phebe's cruelty.

Ros. She Phebes me. Mark how the tyrant writes. 40

Art thou god to shepherd turn'd,
That a maiden's heart hath burn'd?

Can a woman rail thus?

SIL. Call you this railing?

Ros.

Why, thy godhead laid apart, 45
Warr'st thou with a woman's heart?

Did you ever hear such railing?

Whiles the eye of man did woo me,
That could do no vengeance to me.

Meaning me a beast. 50

If this scorn of your bright eyne
Have power to raise such love in mine
Alack! in me what strange effect
Would they work in mild aspect.
Whiles you chid me, I did love; 55
How then might your prayers move!

He that brings this love to thee
 Little knows this love in me:
 And by him seal up thy mind;
 Whether that thy youth and kind 60
 Will the faithful offer take
 Of me and all that I can make;
 Or else by him my love deny,
 And then I'll study how to die.

SIL. Call you this chiding? 65
 CEL. Alas, poor shepherd!

ROS. Do you pity him? no; he deserves no pity. Wilt thou love such a woman?
 What, to make thee an instrument and play false strains upon thee! not to be endured!
 Well, go your way to her, for I see love hath made thee a tame snake, and say this to her:
 that if she love me, I charge her to love thee;
 if she will not, I will never have her unless thou entreat for her. If you be a true lover, hence, and not a word, for here comes more company.

Exit SILVIUS. 77

Enter OLIVER.

OLI. Good morrow, fair ones. Pray you,
 if you know,
 Where in the purlieus of this forest stands
 A sheepcote fenc'd about with olive-trees? 80

CEL. West of this place, down in the neighbour bottom:

The rank of osiers by the murmuring stream Left on your right hand brings you to the
 place.

But at this hour the house doth keep itself;
 There's none within.

OLI. If that an eye may profit by a
 tongue, 85

Then should I know you by description;
 Such garments and such years: 'The boy is
 fair,

Of female favour, and bestows himself
 Like a ripe forester: the woman low,
 And browner than her brother.' Are not
 you 90

The owner of the house I did inquire for?

CEL. It is no boast, being ask'd, to say we are.

OLI. Orlando doth commend him to you
 both,

And to that youth he calls his Rosalind
 He sends this bloody napkin. Are you he?

ROS. I am: what must we understand by
 this? 96

OLI. Some of my shame; if you will know of me

What man I am, and how, and why, and where

This handkercher was stain'd.

CEL. I pray you, tell it.

OLI. When last the young Orlando parted
 from you 100

He left a promise to return again

Within an hour; and pacing through the forest,

Chewing the food of sweet and bitter fancy,
 Lo! what befell; he threw his eye aside,

And mark what object did present itself: 105
 Under an oak, whose boughs were moss'd with age,

And high top bald with dry antiquity,
 A wretched ragged man, o'ergrown with

hair,
 Lay sleeping on his back: about his neck

A green and gilded snake had wreath'd itself,
 Who with her head nimble in threats ap-

proach'd 111

The opening of his mouth; but suddenly,
 Seeing Orlando, it unlink'd itself,

And with indented glides did slip away
 Into a bush; under which bush's shade 115

A lioness, with udders all drawn dry,
 Lay couching, head on ground, with catlike

watch,
 When that the sleeping man should stir;

for 't is
 The royal disposition of that beast 119

To prey on nothing that doth seem as dead:
 This seen, Orlando did approach the man,

And found it was his brother, his elder
 brother.

CEL. O! I have heard him speak of that same brother;

And he did render him the most unnatural
 That liv'd 'mongst men.

OLI. And well he might so do,
 For well I know he was unnatural. 126

ROS. But, to Orlando: did he leave him
 there,

Food to the suck'd and hungry lioness?

OLI. Twice did he turn his back and pur-pos'd so;

But kindness, nobler ever than revenge, 130
 And nature, stronger than his just occasion,

Made him give battle to the lioness,
 Who quickly fell before him: in which hur-

tlung

From miserable slumber I awak'd.

CEL. Are you his brother?

ROS. Was it you he rescu'd?

CEL. Was 't you that did so oft contrive to kill him? 136

OLI. 'T was I; but 't is not I. I do not
shame

To tell you what I was, since my conversion
So sweetly tastes, being the thing I am.

Ros. But, for the bloody napkin?

OLI. By and by. 140

When from the first to last, betwixt us two,
Tears our recountments had most kindly bath'd,

As how I came into that desert place:—

In brief, he led me to the gentle duke,
Who gave me fresh array and entertainment,
Committing me unto my brother's love; 146
Who led me instantly unto his cave,
There stripp'd himself; and here, upon his
arm,

The lioness had torn some flesh away,
Which all this while had bled; and now he fainted, 150

And cried, in fainting, upon Rosalind.
Brief, I recover'd him, bound up his wound;
And, after some small space, being strong at
heart,

He sent me hither, stranger as I am,
To tell this story, that you might excuse 155
His broken promise; and to give this nap-
kin,

Dy'd in his blood, unto the shepherd youth
That he in sport doth call his Rosalind.

ROSALIND swoons.

CEL. Why, how now, Ganymede! sweet
Ganymede!

OLI. Many will swoon when they do look on blood. 160

CEL. There is more in it. Cousin
Ganymede!

OLI. Look, he recovers.

Ros. I would I were at home.

CEL. We'll lead you thither.

I pray you, will you take him by the arm?

OLI. Be of good cheer, youth. You a man! You lack a man's heart. 165

Ros. I do so, I confess it. Ah, sirrah! a body would think this was well counterfeited.
I pray you, tell your brother how well I counterfeited. Heigh-ho! 170

OLI. This was not counterfeit: there is too great testimony in your complexion that it was a passion of earnest.

Ros. Counterfeit, I assure you.

OLI. Well then, take a good heart and counterfeit to be a man. 176

Ros. So I do; but, i' faith, I should have been a woman by right.

CEL. Come; you look paler and paler:
pray you, draw homewards. Good sir, go
with us. 181

OLI. That will I, for I must bear answer
back

How you excuse my brother, Rosalind.

Ros. I shall devise something. But, I pray you, commend my counterfeiting to him. Will you go? Exeunt. 187

ACT V

SCENE I

The Forest of Arden.

Enter TOUCHSTONE and AUDREY.

TOUCH. We shall find a time, Audrey:
patience, gentle Audrey.

AUD. Faith, the priest was good enough, for all the old gentleman's saying. 4

TOUCH. A most wicked Sir Oliver, Audrey; a most vile Martext. But, Audrey, there is a youth here in the forest lays claim to you.

AUD. Ay, I know who 't is: he hath no interest in me in the world. Here comes the man you mean. 11

Enter WILLIAM.

TOUCH. It is meat and drink to me to see a clown. By my troth, we that have good wits have much to answer for: we shall be flouting; we cannot hold. 15

WILL. Good even, Audrey.

AUD. God ye good even, William.

WILL. And good even to you, sir.

TOUCH. Good even, gentle friend. Cover thy head, cover thy head; nay, prithee, be covered. How old are you, friend? 21

WILL. Five-and-twenty, sir.

TOUCH. A ripe age. Is thy name William?

WILL. William, sir.

TOUCH. A fair name. Wast born i' the forest here? 27

WILL. Ay, sir, I thank God.

TOUCH. 'Thank God!' a good answer.
Art rich?

WILL. Faith, sir, so so.

TOUCH. 'So so,' is good, very good, very excellent good: and yet it is not; it is but so so. Art thou wise?

WILL. Ay, sir, I have a pretty wit.

TOUCH. Why, thou sayest well. I do now remember a saying, 'The fool doth think he is wise, but the wise man knows himself to be a fool.' The heathen philosopher, when he had a desire to eat a grape, would open his lips when he put it into his mouth; meaning thereby that grapes were made to eat and lips to open. You do love this maid?

WILL. I do, sir. 44

TOUCH. Give me your hand. Art thou learned?

WILL. No, sir.

TOUCH. Then learn this of me: to have, is to have; for it is a figure in rhetoric, that drink, being poured out of a cup into a glass, by filling the one doth empty the other; for all your writers do consent that ipse is he: now, you are not ipse, for I am he. 53

WILL. Which he, sir?

TOUCH. He, sir, that must marry this woman. Therefore, you clown, abandon—which is in the vulgar, leave—the society,—which in the boorish is, company,—of this female,—which in the common is, woman; which together is, abandon the society of this female, or, clown, thou perishest; or, to thy better understanding, diest; or, to wit, I kill thee, make thee away, translate thy life unto death, thy liberty into bondage. I will deal in poison with thee, or in bastinado, or in steel; I will bandy with thee in faction; I will o'er-run thee with policy; I will kill thee a hundred and fifty ways: therefore tremble, and depart. 69

AUD. Do, good William.

WILL. God rest you merry, sir. Exit.

Enter CORIN.

COR. Our master and mistress seeks you: come, away, away!

TOUCH. Trip, Audrey! trip, Audrey! I attend, I attend. Exeunt. 75

SCENE II

Another Part of the Forest.

Enter ORLANDO and OLIVER.

ORL. Is 't possible that on so little acquaintance you should like her? that but seeing, you should love her? and loving, woo? and wooing, she should grant? and will you persevere to enjoy her? 5

OLI. Neither call the giddiness of it in question, the poverty of her, the small acquaintance, my sudden wooing, nor her sudden consenting; but say with me, I love Aliena; say with her, that she loves me; consent with both, that we may enjoy each other: it shall be to your good; for my father's house and all the revenue that was old Sir Rowland's will I estate upon you, and here live and die a shepherd. 15

ORL. You have my consent. Let your wedding be to-morrow: thither will I invite the duke and all's contented followers. Go you and prepare Aliena; for look you, here comes my Rosalind. 20

Enter ROSALIND.

Ros. God save you, brother.

OLI. And you, fair sister. Exit

Ros. O! my dear Orlando, how it grieves me to see thee wear thy heart in a scarf.

ORL. It is my arm. 25

Ros. I thought thy heart had been wounded with the claws of a lion.

ORL. Wounded it is, but with the eyes of a lady.

Ros. Did your brother tell you how I counterfeited to swoon when he showed me your handkercher? 32

ORL. Ay! and greater wonders than that.

Ros. O! I know where you are. Nay, 't is true: there was never any thing so sudden but the fight of two rams, and Cæsar's thrasonical brag of 'I came, saw, and overcame': for your brother and my sister ne sooner met but they looked; no sooner looked but they loved; no sooner loved but they sighed; no sooner sighed but they asked one another the reason; no sooner knew the reason but they sought the remedy: and in these degrees have they made a pair of stairs to marriage which they will climb incontinent, or else be incontinent before marriage. They are in the very wrath of love, and they will together: clubs cannot part them. 48

ORL. They shall be married to-morrow, and I will bid the duke to the nuptial. But, O! how bitter a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes. By so much the more shall I to-morrow be at the height of heart-heaviness, by how much I shall think my brother happy in having what he wishes for. 56

ROS. Why then, to-morrow I cannot serve your turn for Rosalind?

ORL. I can live no longer by thinking.

ROS. I will weary you then no longer with idle talking. Know of me then, for now I speak to some purpose, that I know you are a gentleman of good conceit. I speak not this that you should bear a good opinion of my knowledge, insomuch I say I know you are; neither do I labour for a greater esteem than may in some little measure draw a belief from you, to do yourself good, and not to grace me. Believe then, if you please, that I can do strange things. I have, since I was three year old, conversed with a magician, most profound in his art and yet not damnable. If you do love Rosalind so near the heart as your gesture cries it out, when your brother marries Aliena, shall you marry her. I know into what straits of fortune she is driven; and it is not impossible to me, if it appear not inconvenient to you, to set her before your eyes to-morrow, human as she is, and without any danger. 80

ORL. Speakest thou in sober meanings?

ROS. By my life, I do; which I tender dearly, though I say I am a magician. Therefore, put you in your best array; bid your friends; for if you will be married to-morrow, you shall; and to Rosalind, if you will. Look, here comes a lover of mine, and a lover of hers. 88

Enter SILVIUS and PHEBE.

PHE. Youth, you have done me much ungentleness,

To show the letter that I write to you.

ROS. I care not if I have: it is my study To seem spiteful and ungentle to you. You are there follow'd by a faithful shepherd: Look upon him, love him; he worships you.

PHE. Good shepherd, tell this youth what 't is to love. 95

SIL. It is to be all made of sighs and tears; And so am I for Phebe.

PHE. And I for Ganymede.

ORL. And I for Rosalind.

ROS. And I for no woman. 100

SIL. It is to be all made of faith and service;

And so am I for Phebe.

PHE. And I for Ganymede.

ORL. And I for Rosalind.

ROS. And I for no woman. 105

SIL. It is to be all made of fantasy, All made of passion, and all made of wishes; All adoration, duty, and observance; All humbleness, all patience, and impatience: All purity, all trial, all obeisance; 110

And so am I for Phebe.

PHE. And so am I for Ganymede.

ORL. And so am I for Rosalind.

ROS. And so am I for no woman.

PHE. If this be so, why blame you me to love you? 115

SIL. If this be so, why blame you me to love you?

ORL. If this be so, why blame you me to love you?

ROS. Who do you speak to, 'Why blame you me to love you?'

ORL. To her that is not here, nor doth not hear. 119

ROS. Pray you, no more of this: 't is like the howling of Irish wolves against the moon. [To SILVIUS.] I will help you, if I can. [To PHEBE.] I would love you, if I could. To-morrow meet me all together. [To PHEBE.] I will marry you, if ever I marry woman, and I'll be married to-morrow. [To ORLANDO.] I will satisfy you, if ever I satisfied man, and you shall be married to-morrow. [To SILVIUS.] I will content you, if what pleases you contents you, and you shall be married to-morrow. [To ORLANDO.] As you love Rosalind, meet; [To SILVIUS.] As you love Phebe, meet; and as I love no woman, I'll meet. So fare you well; I have left you commands. 135

SIL. I'll not fail, if I live.

PHE. Nor I.

ORL. Nor I.

Exeunt.

SCENE III

Another Part of the Forest.

Enter TOUCHSTONE and AUDREY.

TOUCH. To-morrow is the joyful day, Audrey; to-morrow will we be married.

AUD. I do desire it with all my heart, and I hope it is no dishonest desire to desire to be a woman of the world. Here comes two of the banished duke's pages. 6

Enter two Pages.

FIRST PAGE. Well met, honest gentleman.

TOUCH. By my troth, well met. Come, sit, sit, and a song. 10

SECOND PAGE. We are for you: sit i' the middle.

FIRST PAGE. Shall we clap into 't roundly, without hawking or spitting, or saying we are hoarse, which are the only prologues to a bad voice? 16

SECOND PAGE. I' faith, i' faith; and both in a tune, like two gipsies on a horse.

It was a lover and his lass,

With a hey, and a ho and a hey nonino, 20
That o'er the green corn-field did pass,

In the spring time, the only pretty ring time,
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding;
Sweet lovers love the spring.

Between the acres of the rye, 25

With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
These pretty country folks would lie,

In the spring time, the only pretty ring time,
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding;
Sweet lovers love the spring. 30

This carol they began that hour,

With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
How that a life was but a flower

In the spring time, the only pretty ring time,
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding; 35
Sweet lovers love the spring.

And therefore take the present time,

With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
For love is crowned with the prime

In the spring time, the only pretty ring time, 40
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding;
Sweet lovers love the spring.

TOUCH. Truly, young gentlemen, though there was no great matter in the ditty, yet the note was very untuneable. 45

FIRST PAGE. You are deceived, sir: we kept time; we lost not our time.

TOUCH. By my troth, yes; I count it but time lost to hear such a foolish song. God be wi' you; and God mend your voices! Come, Audrey. Exeunt. 51

SCENE IV

Another Part of the Forest.

Enter DUKE Senior, AMIENS, JAQUES, ORLANDO, OLIVER, and CELIA.

DUKE S. Dost thou believe, Orlando, that the boy Can do all this that he hath promised?

ORL. I sometimes do believe, and sometimes do not; As those that fear they hope, and know they fear.

Enter ROSALIND, SILVIUS, and PHEBE.

Ros. Patience once more, whiles our compact is urg'd. 5

You say, if I bring in your Rosalind, You will bestow her on Orlando here?

DUKE S. That would I, had I kingdoms to give with her.

Ros. And you say you will have her, when I bring her?

ORL. That would I, were I of all kingdoms king. 10

Ros. You say you'll marry me, if I be willing?

PHE. That will I, should I die the hour after.

Ros. But if you do refuse to marry me, You'll give yourself to this most faithful shepherd?

PHE. So is the bargain. 15

Ros. You say, that you'll have Phebe, if she will?

SIL. Though to have her and death were both one thing.

Ros. I have promised to make all this matter even.

Keep you your word, O duke, to give your daughter;

You yours, Orlando, to receive his daughter; Keep you your word, Phebe, that you'll marry me,

Or else, refusing me, to wed this shepherd; Keep your word, Silvius, that you'll marry her,

If she refuse me: and from hence I go, To make these doubts all even. 25

Exeunt ROSALIND and CELIA.

DUKE S. I do remember in this shepherd boy

Some lively touches of my daughter's favour.

ORL. My lord, the first time that I ever saw him,

Methought he was a brother to your daughter;

But, my good lord, this boy is forest-born, 30
And hath been tutor'd in the rudiments
Of many desperate studies by his uncle,
Whom he reports to be a great magician,
Obscured in the circle of this forest. 34

Enter TOUCHSTONE and AUDREY.

JAQ. There is, sure, another flood toward,
and these couples are coming to the ark.
Here comes a pair of very strange beasts,
which in all tongues are called fools.

TOUCH. Salutation and greeting to you
all! 40

JAQ. Good my lord, bid him welcome.
This is the motley-minded gentleman that I have so often met in the forest: he hath been a courtier, he swears. 44

TOUCH. If any man doubt that, let him put me to my purgation. I have trod a measure; I have flattered a lady; I have been politic with my friend, smooth with mine enemy; I have undone three tailors;
I have had four quarrels, and like to have fought one. 51

JAQ. And how was that ta'en up?

TOUCH. Faith, we met, and found the quarrel was upon the seventh cause.

JAQ. How seventh cause? Good my lord, like this fellow. 56

DUKE S. I like him very well.

TOUCH. God 'ield you, sir; I desire you of the like. I press in here, sir, amongst the the rest of the country copulatives, to swear and to forswear, according as marriage binds and blood breaks. A poor virgin, sir, an ill-favoured thing, sir, but mine own: a poor humour of mine, sir, to take that that no man else will. Rich honesty dwells like a miser, sir, in a poor house, as your pearl in your foul oyster. 67

DUKE S. By my faith, he is very swift and sententious.

TOUCH. According to the fool's bolt, sir, and such dulcet diseases.

JAQ. But, for the seventh cause; how did you find the quarrel on the seventh cause? 73

TOUCH. Upon a lie seven times removed:
—bear your body more seeming, Audrey:— as thus, sir. I did dislike the cut of a certain courtier's beard: he sent me word, if I said his beard was not cut well, he was in the mind it was: this is called the 'retort courteous.' If I sent him word again it was not well cut, he would send me word he cut it to please himself: this is called the 'quip modest.' If again, it was not well cut, he disabled my judgment: this is called the 'reply churlish.' If again, it was not well cut, he would answer, I spake not true: this is called the 'reproof valiant.' If again, it was not well cut, he would say, I lie: this is called the 'countercheck quarrelsome':

and so to the 'lie circumstantial,' and the
'lie direct.' 91

JAQ. And how oft did you say his beard was not well cut?

TOUCH. I durst go no further than the 'lie circumstantial,' nor he durst not give me the 'lie direct'; and so we measured swords and parted. 97

JAQ. Can you nominate in order now the degrees of the lie?

TOUCH. O sir, we quarrel in print; by the book, as you have books for good manners:
I will name you the degrees. The first, the 'retort courteous'; the second, the 'quip modest'; the third, the 'reply churlish'; the fourth, the 'reproof valiant'; the fifth, the 'countercheck quarrelsome'; the sixth, the 'lie with circumstance'; the seventh, the 'lie direct.' All these you may avoid but the 'lie direct'; and you may avoid that too, with an 'if.' I knew when seven justices could not take up a quarrel; but when the parties were met themselves, one of them thought but of an 'if,' and 'if you said so, then I said so'; and they shook hands and swore brothers. Your 'if' is the only peacemaker; much virtue in 'if.' 116

JAQ. Is not this a rare fellow, my lord?
he's as good at any thing, and yet a fool.

DUKE S. He uses his folly like a stalking-horse, and under the presentation of that he shoots his wit. 121

Enter HYMEN, leading ROSALIND in woman's clothes, and CELIA.

Still Music.

HYM.

Then is there mirth in heaven,
When earthly things made even Atone together.

Good duke, receive thy daughter; 125
Hymen, from heaven brought her;

Yea, brought her hither,
That thou might'st join her hand with his,
Whose heart within her bosom is.

ROS. [To DUKE S.] To you I give myself, for I am yours. 130

[To ORLANDO.] To you I give myself, for I am yours.

DUKE S. If there be truth in sight, you are my daughter.

ORL. If there be truth in sight, you are my Rosalind.

PHE. If sight and shape be true,
Why then, my love adieu! 135

ROS. [To DUKE S.] I'll have no father,
if you be not he:

[To ORLANDO.] I'll have no husband, if you be not he:

[To PHEBE.] Nor ne'er wed woman, if you be not she.

Hym.

Peace, ho! I bar confusion:
'T is I must make conclusion 140

Of these most strange events:
Here's great that must take hands

To join in Hymen's bands,
If truth holds true contents.

You and you no cross shall part: 145
You and you are heart in heart:

You to his love must accord,
Or have a woman to your lord:

You and you are sure together, 150
As the winter to foul weather.

Whiles a wedlock-hymn we sing,
Feed yourselves with questioning,

That reason wonder may diminish,
How thus we met, and these things finish.

SONG

Wedding is great Juno's crown: 155
O blessed bond of board and bed!

'T is Hymen peoples every town;
High wedlock then be honoured.

Honour, high honour, and renown,
To Hymen, god of every town! 160

DUKE S. O my dear niece! welcome thou art to me:

Even daughter, welcome in no less degree.

PHE. I will not eat my word, now thou art mine;

Thy faith my fancy to thee doth combine.

Enter JACQUES DE BOYS.

JAC. DE. B. Let me have audience for a word or two: 165

I am the second son of old Sir Rowland,
That bring these tidings to this fair assembly.

Duke Frederick, hearing how that every
day

Men of great worth resorted to this forest, Address'd a mighty power, which were on foot 170

In his own conduct, purposely to take
His brother here and put him to the sword:

And to the skirts of this wild wood he came,

Where, meeting with an old religious man,
After some question with him, was converted
Both from his enterprise and from the world;
His crown bequeathing to his banish'd
brother, 177

And all their lands restor'd to them again
That were with him exil'd. This to be true,
I do engage my life.

DUKE S. Welcome, young man;
Thou offer'st fairly to thy brothers' wedding:
To one, his lands withheld; and to the other,
A land itself at large, a potent dukedom.

First, in this forest, let us do those ends 184
That here were well begun and well begot;

And after, every of this happy number
That have endur'd shrewd days and nights
with us,

Shall share the good of our returned fortune,
According to the measure of their states.

Meantime, forget this new-fall'n dignity, 190
And fall into our rustic revelry.

Play, music! and you brides and bridegrooms
all,

With measure heap'd in joy, to the measures
fall.

JAC. Sir, by your patience. If I heard you rightly, 195

The duke hath put on a religious life,
And thrown into neglect the pompous court?

JAC. DE B. He hath.

JAC. To him will I: out of these conver-tites

There is much matter to be heard and learn'd. 200

[To DUKE S.] You to your former honour I bequeath;

Your patience and your virtue well deserve
it:

[To ORLANDO.] You to a love that your true faith doth merit:

[To OLIVER.] You to your land, and love,
and great allies:

[To SILVIUS.] You to a long and well-deserved bed: 205

[To TOUCHSTONE.] And you to wrangling;
for thy loving voyage

Is but for two months' victual'd. So, to your pleasures:

I am for other than for dancing measures.
DUKE S. Stay, Jaques, stay.

JAC. To see no pastime, I: what you would have 210

I'll stay to know at your abandon'd cave.
Exit.

DUKE S. Proceed, proceed: we will begin these rites,
As we do trust they'll end, in true delights.

A dance.
Exeunt.

EPILOGUE

Spoken by ROSALIND

It is not the fashion to see the lady the epilogue; but it is no more unhandsome than to see the lord the prologue. If it be true that good wine needs no bush, 't is true that a good play needs no epilogue; yet to good wine they do use good bushes, and good plays prove the better by the help of good epilogues. What a case am I in then, that am neither a good epilogue, nor cannot insinuate with you in the behalf of a good play! I am not furnished like a beggar, therefore to beg will not become me: my way is to conjure you; and I'll begin with the women. I charge you, O women! for the love you bear to men, to like as much of this play as please you: and I charge you, O men! for the love you bear to women, as I perceive by your simpering none of you hates them, that between you and the women the play may please. If I were a woman I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleased me, complexions that liked me, and breaths that I defied not; and I am sure, as many as have good beards, or good faces, or sweet breaths, will, for my kind offer, when I make curtsy, bid me farewell.

ACT I

Enter PHILINTE and ALCESTE.

PHILINTE. What is the matter? What ails you?

ALCESTE [seated]. Leave me, I pray.

PHILINTE. But, once more, tell me what strange whim . . .

ALCESTE. Leave me, I tell you; get out of my sight.

PHILINTE. But you might at least listen to people without growing angry.

ALCESTE. I choose to grow angry, and I do not choose to listen.

PHILINTE. I do not understand you in these abrupt moods; although we are friends, I am the first . . .

ALCESTE [rising quickly]. I, your friend? Lay not that flattering unction to your soul. I have until now professed to be so; but after what I have just seen of you, I tell you candidly that I am such no longer; I have no wish to occupy a place in a corrupt heart.

PHILINTE. I am then very much to be blamed from your point of view, Alceste?

ALCESTE. To be blamed? You ought to die from very shame; there is no excuse for such behaviour, and every man of honour must be disgusted at it. I see you almost stifle a man with attentions, show him the most ardent affection, and overwhelm him with protestations, offers, and vows of friendship. Your ebullitions of tenderness know no bounds; and when I ask you who that man is, you can scarcely tell me his name; your feelings for him, the moment you have turned your back, suddenly cool; you speak of him most indifferently to me. Zounds! I call it unworthy, base, and infamous, so far to lower one's self as to act contrary to one's own feelings; if, by some mischance, I had done such a thing, I should hang myself at once out of sheer vexation.

PHILINTE. I do not see that it is a hanging matter at all; and I beg of you not to think it amiss if I ask you to show me some mercy, for I shall not hang myself, if it be all the same to you.

ALCESTE. That is a sorry joke.

PHILINTE. Then seriously, what would you have people do?

ALCESTE. I would have people be sincere, and like men of honour, speak no word that comes not from the heart.

PHILINTE. When a man comes and embraces you warmly, you must pay him back in his own coin, respond as best you can to his show of feeling, and return offer for offer, 15 vow for vow.

ALCESTE. Not so. I cannot bear so base a method, which your fashionable people generally affect; there is nothing I detest so much as the contortions of these 20 great time-and-lip servers, these affable dispensers of meaningless embraces, these obliging utterers of empty words who view every one in civilities, and treat the man of worth and the fop alike. What good does 25
it do if a man heaps endearments on you, vows that he is your friend, that he believes in you, is full of zeal for you, esteems and loves you, and lauds you to the skies, when he rushes to do the same to the first rascal- 30
lion he meets? No, no; no heart with the least self-respect cares for esteem so prostituted; he will hardly relish it, even when openly expressed, when he finds that he shares it with the whole universe. Prefer- 35
ence must be based on esteem, and to esteem every one is to esteem no one. Since you abandon yourself to the vices of the times, zounds! you are not the man for me. I decline this over-complaisant kindness, 40 which uses no discrimination. I like to be distinguished; and, to cut the matter short, the friend of all mankind is no friend of mine.

PHILINTE. But when we are of the world, 45
we must conform to the outward civilities which custom demands.

ALCESTE. I deny it. We ought to punish pitilessly that shameful pretence of friendly intercourse. I like a man to be 50 a man, and to show on all occasions the bottom of his heart in his discourse. Let that be the thing to speak, and never let our feelings be hidden beneath vain compliments.

PHILINTE. There are many cases in which plain speaking would become ridiculous, and could hardly be tolerated. With all due allowance for your unbending honesty, it is as well to conceal the feelings 5 sometimes. Would it be right or decent to tell thousands of people what we think of them? And when we meet with some one whom we hate or who displeases us, must we tell him so openly?

ALCESTE. Yes.

PHILINTE. What! Would you tell old Emilia that it ill becomes her to set up for a beauty at her age, and that the paint she 15 uses disgusts everyone?

ALCESTE. Undoubtedly.

PHILINTE. Or Dorilas that he is a bore, and that there is no one at court who is not sick of hearing him boast of his courage and the lustre of his house?

ALCESTE. Decidedly so.

PHILINTE. You are jesting.

ALCESTE. I am not jesting at all, and I would not spare any one in that respect. It offends my eyes too much. Whether at Court or in town, I behold nothing but what provokes my spleen. I become quite melancholy and deeply grieved to see men behave to each other as they do. Everywhere 25
I find nothing but base flattery, injustice, self-interest, deceit, roguery. I cannot bear it any longer; I am furious; and my intention is to break with all mankind.

PHILINTE. This philosophical spleen is somewhat too savage. I cannot but laugh to see you in these gloomy fits, and fancy that I perceive in us two, brought up together, the two brothers described in The School for Husbands, who . . .

ALCESTE. Good Heavens! Drop your insipid comparisons.

PHILINTE. Nay, seriously, leave off these vagaries. The world will not alter for all your meddling. And as plain speaking has such charms for you, I shall tell you frankly that this complaint of yours is as good as a play, wherever you go, and that all those invectives against the manners of the age make you a laughing stock to many people.

ALCESTE. So much the better! Zounds! So much the better! That is just what I want. It is a very good sign, and I rejoice at it. All men are so odious to me that I should be sorry to appear rational in their eyes.

PHILINTE. But do you wish harm to all mankind?

ALCESTE. Yes; I have conceived a terrible hatred for them.

PHILINTE. Shall all poor mortals, without exception, be included in this aversion? There are some, even in the age in which we live . . .

ALCESTE. No, they are all alike; and I hate all men: some, because they are wicked and mischievous; others because they lend themselves to the wicked, and have not that healthy contempt with which vice ought to inspire all virtuous minds. You can see how unjustly and excessively complacent people are to that bare-faced scoundrel with whom I am at law. You may plainly perceive the traitor through his mask; he is well known everywhere in his true colours; his rolling eyes and his honeyed tones impose only on those who do not know him. People are aware that this low-bred fellow, who deserves to be pilloried, has, by the dirtiest jobs, made his way in the world; and that the splendid position he has acquired makes merit repine and virtue blush. Yet whatever dishonourable epithets may be launched against him everywhere, nobody defends his wretched honour. Call him a rogue, an infamous wretch, a confounded scoundrel if you like, all the world will say "yea," and no one contradicts you. But for all that, his bowing and scraping are welcome everywhere; he is received, smiled upon, and wriggles himself into all kinds of society; and, if any appointment is to be secured by intriguing, he will carry the day over a man of the greatest worth. Zounds! these are mortal stabs to me, to see vice parleyed with; and sometimes I feel suddenly inclined to fly into a wilderness far from the approach of men.

PHILINTE. Great Heaven! Let us torment ourselves a little less about the vices of our age, and be a little more lenient to human nature. Let us not scrutinize it with the utmost severity, but look with some indulgence at its failings. In society, we need virtue to be more pliable. If we are too wise, we may be equally to blame. Good sense avoids all extremes, and requires us to be soberly rational. This unbending and virtuous stiffness of ancient times shocks too much the ordinary customs of our own; it requires too great perfection from us mortals;

we must yield to the times without being too stubborn; it is the height of folly to busy ourselves in correcting the world. I, as well as you, notice a hundred things every day which might be better managed, differently enacted; but whatever I may discover at any moment, people do not see me in a rage like you. I take men quietly just as they are; I accustom my mind to bear with what they do; and I believe that at Court, as well as in the city, my phlegm is as philosophical as your bile.

ALCESTE. But this phlegm, good sir, you who reason so well, could it not be disturbed by anything? And if perchance a friend should betray you, if he forms a subtle plot to get hold of what is yours, if people should try to spread evil reports about you; would you tamely submit to all this without flying into a rage?

PHILINTE. Ay, I look upon all these faults of which you complain as vices inseparably connected with human nature; in short, my mind is no more shocked at seeing a man a rogue, unjust, or selfish, than at seeing vultures eager for prey, mischievous apes, or fury-lashed wolves.

ALCESTE. What! I should see myself deceived, torn to pieces, robbed, without being . . . Zounds! I shall say no more about it; all this reasoning is beside the point!

PHILINTE. Upon my word, you would do well to keep silence. Rail a little less at your opponent, and attend a little more to your suit.

ALCESTE. That I shall not do; that is settled long ago.

PHILINTE. But whom then do you expect to solicit for you?

ALCESTE. Whom? Reason, my just right, equity.

PHILINTE. Shall you not pay a visit to any of the judges?

ALCESTE. No. Is my cause unjust or dubious?

PHILINTE. I am agreed on that; but you know what harm intrigues do, and . . .

ALCESTE. No. I am resolved not to stir a step. I am either right or wrong.

PHILINTE. Do not trust to that.

ALCESTE. I shall not budge an inch.

PHILINTE. Your opponent is powerful, and by his underhand work, may induce . . .

ALCESTE. It does not matter.

PHILINTE. You will make a mistake.

ALCESTE. Be it so. I wish to see the end of it.

PHILINTE. But . . .

ALCESTE. I shall have the satisfaction of losing my suit.

PHILINTE. But after all . . .

ALCESTE. I shall see by this trial whether men have sufficient impudence, are wicked, villainous, and perverse enough to do me this injustice in the face of the whole world.

PHILINTE. What a strange fellow!

ALCESTE. I could wish, were it to cost me ever so much, that, for the fun of the thing, I lost my case.

PHILINTE. But people will really laugh at you, Alceste, if they hear you go on in this fashion.

ALCESTE. So much the worse for those who will.

PHILINTE. But this rectitude, which you exact so carefully in every case, this absolute integrity in which you intrench yourself, do you perceive it in the lady you love? As for me, I am astonished that, appearing to be at war with the whole human race, you yet, notwithstanding everything that can render it odious to you, have found aught to charm your eyes. And what surprises me still more, is the strange choice your heart has made. The sincere Éliante has a liking for you, the prude Arsinoé looks with favour upon you, yet your heart does not respond to their passion; whilst you wear the chains of Célimène, who sports with you, and whose coquettish humour and malicious wit seems to accord so well with the manner of the times. How comes it that, hating these things as mortally as you do, you endure so much of them in that lady? Are they no longer faults in so sweet a charmer? Do not you perceive them, or if you do, do you excuse them?

ALCESTE. Not so. The love I feel for this young widow does not make me blind to her faults, and, notwithstanding the great passion with which she has inspired me, I am the first to see, as well as to condemn, them. But for all this, do what I will, I confess my weakness, she has the art of pleasing me. In vain I see her faults; I may even blame them; in spite of all, she makes me love her. Her charms conquer everything, and, no doubt, my sincere love will purify her heart from the vices of our times.

PHILINTE. If you accomplish this, it will be no small task. Do you believe yourself beloved by her?

ALCESTE. Yes, certainly! I should not love her at all, did I not think so.

PHILINTE. But if her love for you is so apparent, how comes it that your rivals cause you so much uneasiness?

ALCESTE. It is because a heart, deeply smitten, claims all to itself; I come here only with the intention of telling her what, on this subject, my feelings dictate.

PHILINTE. Had I but to choose, her cousin Éliante would have all my love. Her heart, which values yours, is stable and sincere; and this more compatible choice would have suited you better.

ALCESTE. It is true; my good sense tells me so every day; but good sense does not always rule love.

PHILINTE. Well, I fear much for your affections; and the hope which you cherish may perhaps . . .

Enter ORONTE.

ORONTE [to ALCESTE]. I have been informed yonder that Éliante and Célimène have gone out to make some purchases. But as I heard that you were here, I came to tell you, most sincerely, that I have conceived the greatest regard for you, and that, for a long time, this regard has inspired me with the most ardent wish to be reckoned among your friends. Yes; I like to do homage to merit; and I am most anxious that a bond of friendship should unite us. I suppose that a zealous friend, and of my standing, is not altogether to be rejected. [All this time ALCESTE has been musing, and seems not to be aware that ORONTE is addressing him. He looks up only when ORONTE says to him]—It is to you, if you please, that this speech is addressed.

ALCESTE. To me, sir?

ORONTE. To you. Is it in any way offensive to you?

ALCESTE. Not in the least. But my surprise is very great; and I did not expect that honour.

ORONTE. The regard in which I hold you ought not to astonish you, and you can claim it from the whole world.

ALCESTE. Sir . . .

ORONTE. Our whole kingdom contains nothing above the dazzling merit which people discover in you.

ALCESTE. Sir . . .

ORONTE. Yes; for my part, I prefer you to the most important in it.

ALCESTE. Sir . . .

ORONTE. May Heaven strike me dead, if I lie! And, to convince you, on this very spot, of my feelings, allow me, sir, to embrace you with all my heart, and to solicit a place in your friendship. Your hand, if you please. Will you promise me your friendship?

ALCESTE. Sir . . .

ORONTE. What! You refuse me?

ALCESTE. Sir, you do me too much honour; but friendship is a sacred thing, and to lavish it on every occasion is surely to profane it. Judgment and choice should preside at such a compact; we ought to know more of each other before engaging ourselves; and it may happen that our dispositions are such that we may both of us repent of our bargain.

ORONTE. Upon my word, that is wisely said; and I esteem you all the more for it. Let us therefore leave it to time to form such a pleasing bond; but, meanwhile I am entirely at your disposal. If you have any business at Court, every one knows how well I stand with the King; I have his private ear; and, upon my word, he treats me in everything with the utmost intimacy. In short, I am yours in every emergency; and, as you are a man of brilliant parts, and to inaugurate our charming amity, I come to read you a sonnet which I made a little while ago, and to find out whether it be good enough for publicity.

ALCESTE. I am not fit, sir, to decide such a matter. You will therefore excuse me.

ORONTE. Why so?

ALCESTE. I have the failing of being a little more sincere in those things than is necessary.

ORONTE. The very thing I ask; and I should have reason to complain, if, in laying myself open to you that you might give me your frank opinion, you should deceive me, and disguise anything from me.

ALCESTE. If that be the case, sir, I am perfectly willing.

ORONTE. Sonnet . . . It is a sonnet . . . Hope . . . It is to a lady who flattered my passion with some hope. Hope . . . They are not long, pompous verses, but mild, tender, and melting little lines [At every one of these interruptions he looks at ALCESTE.]

ALCESTE. We shall see.

ORONTE. Hope . . . I do not know whether the style will strike you as sufficiently clear and easy, and whether you will approve of my choice of words.

ALCESTE. We shall soon see, sir.

ORONTE. Besides, you must know that I was only a quarter of an hour in composing it.

ALCESTE. Let us hear, sir; the time signifies nothing.

ORONTE [reads].

Hope, it is true, oft gives relief,
Rocks for a while our tedious pain,
But what a poor advantage, Phillis,
When nought remains, and all is gone!

PHILINTE. I am already charmed with this little bit.

ALCESTE [softly to PHILINTE]. What! Do you mean to tell me that you like this stuff?

ORONTE.

You once showed some complaisance,
But less would have sufficed,
You should not take that trouble
To give me nought but hope.

PHILINTE. In what pretty terms these thoughts are put!

ALCESTE. How now! You vile flatterer, you praise this rubbish!

ORONTE.

If I must wait eternally,
My passion, driven to extremes,
Will fly to death.
Your tender cares cannot prevent this,
Fair Phillis, aye we're in despair,
When we must hope for ever.

PHILINTE. The conclusion is pretty, amorous, admirable.

ALCESTE [softly, and aside to PHILINTE]. A plague on the conclusion! I wish you had concluded to break your nose, you poisoner to the devil!

PHILINTE. I never heard verses more skillfully turned.

ALCESTE [softly, and aside]. Zounds! . . .

ORONTE [to PHILINTE]. You flatter me; and you are under the impression perhaps . . .

PHILINTE. No, I am not flattering at all.

ALCESTE [softly, and aside]. What else are you doing, you wretch?

ORONTE [to ALCESTE]. But for you, you know our agreement. Speak to me, I pray, in all sincerity.

ALCESTE. These matters, sir, are always more or less delicate, and every one is fond of being praised for his wit. But I was saying one day to a certain person, who shall be nameless, when he showed me some of his verses, that a gentleman ought at all times to exercise a great control over that itch for writing which sometimes attacks him, and should keep a tight rein over the strong propensity which he has to display such amusements; and that, in the frequent anxiety to show his productions, he is frequently exposed to act a very foolish part.

ORONTE. Do you wish to convey to me by this that I am wrong in desiring . . .

ALCESTE. I do not say that exactly. But I told him that writing without warmth becomes a bore; that there needs no other weakness to disgrace a man; that, even if people, on the other hand, had many good qualities, we view them from their worst sides.

ORONTE. Do you find anything to object to in my sonnet?

ALCESTE. I do not say that. But, to keep him from writing, I set before his eyes how, in our days, that desire had spoiled a great many very worthy people.

ORONTE. Do I write badly? Am I like them in any way?

ALCESTE. I do not say that. But, in short, I said to him, "What pressing need is there for you to rhyme, and what the deuce drives you into print? If we can pardon the sending into the world of a badly-written book, it will only be in those unfortunate men who write for their livelihood. Believe me, resist your temptations, keep these effusions from the public, and do not, how much you may be asked, forfeit the reputation which you enjoy at Court of being a man of sense and a gentleman and take, from the hands of a greedy printer, the reputation of a ridiculous and wretched author." That is what I tried to make him understand.

ORONTE. This is all well and good, and I seem to understand you. But I should like to know what there is in my sonnet to . . .

ALCESTE. Candidly, you had better put it in your closet. You have been following bad models, and your expressions are not at all natural. Pray what is—Rocks for a while our tedious pain? And what, When nought remains, and all is gone? What, You should not take that trouble to give me nought but hope? And what, Phillis, aye we're in despair when we must hope for ever? This figurative style, that people are so vain of, is beside all good taste and truth; it is only a play upon words, sheer affectation, and it is not thus that nature speaks. The wretched taste of the age is what I dislike in this. Our forefathers, unpolished as they were, had a much better one; and I value all that is admired now-a-days far less than an old song which I am going to repeat to you:

Had our great monarch granted me
His Paris large and fair;
And I straightway must quit for aye
The love of my true dear;
Then would I say, King Hal, I pray,
Take back your Paris fair,
I love much mo my dear, I trow,
I love much mo my dear.

This versification is not rich, and the style is antiquated; but do you not see that it is far better than all those trumpery trifles against which good sense revolts, and that in this, passion speaks from the heart?

Had our great monarch granted me
His Paris large and fair;
And I straightway must quit for aye
The love of my true dear;
Then would I say, King Hal, I pray,
Take back your Paris fair,
I love much mo my dear, I trow,
I love much mo my dear.

This is what a really loving heart would say. [TO PHILINTE, who is laughing.] Yes, master wag, in spite of all your wit, I care more for this than for all the florid pomp and the tinsel which everybody is admiring now-a-days.

ORONTE. And I, I maintain that my verses are very good.

ALCESTE. Doubtless you have your reasons for thinking them so; but you will allow me to have mine, which, with your permission, will remain independent.

ORONTE. It is enough for me that others prize them.

ALCESTE. That is because they know how to dissemble, which I do not.

ORONTE. Do you really believe that you have such a great share of wit?

ALCESTE. If I praised your verses, I should have more.

ORONTE. I shall do very well without your approbation.

ALCESTE. You will have to do without it, if it be all the same.

ORONTE. I should like much to see you compose some on the same subject, just to have a sample of your style.

ALCESTE. I might, perchance, make some as bad; but I should take good care not to show them to any one.

ORONTE. You are mighty positive; and this great sufficiency . . .

ALCESTE. Pray, seek some one else to flatter you, and not me.

ORONTE. But, my little sir, drop this haughty tone.

ALCESTE. In truth, my big sir, I shall do as I like.

PHILINTE [coming between them]. Stop, gentlemen! That is carrying the matter too far. Cease, I pray.

ORONTE. Ah! I am wrong, I confess; and I leave the field to you. I am your servant, sir, most heartily.

ALCESTE. And I, sir, am your most humble servant.

Exit ORONTE.

PHILINTE. Well! you see. By being too sincere, you have got a nice affair on your hands. I saw that Oronte, in order to be flattered . . .

ALCESTE. Do not talk to me.

PHILINTE. But . . .

ALCESTE. No more society for me.

PHILINTE. Is it too much . . .

ALCESTE. Leave me alone.

PHILINTE. If I . . .

ALCESTE. Not another word.

PHILINTE. But what . . .

ALCESTE. I will hear no more.

PHILINTE. But . . .

ALCESTE. Again?

PHILINTE. People insult . . .

ALCESTE. Ah! Zounds! this is too much. Do not dog my steps.

PHILINTE. You are making fun of me; I shall not leave you.

ACT II

Enter ALCESTE and CÉLIMÈNE.

ALCESTE. Will you have me speak candidly to you, madam? Well, then, I am very much dissatisfied with your behaviour. I am very angry when I think of it; and I perceive that we shall have to break with each other. Yes; I should only deceive you were I to speak otherwise. Sooner or later a rupture is unavoidable; and if I were to promise the contrary a thousand times, I should not be able to bear this any longer.

CÉLIMÈNE. Oh, I see! It is to quarrel with me, that you wished to conduct me home?

ALCESTE. I do not quarrel. But your disposition, madam, is too ready to give any first comer an entrance into your heart. Too many admirers beset you; and my temper cannot put up with that.

CÉLIMÈNE. Am I to blame for having too many admirers? Can I prevent people from thinking me amiable? And am I to take a stick to drive them away, when they endeavour by tender means to visit me?

ALCESTE. No, madam, there is no need for a stick, but only a heart less yielding and less melting at their love-rites. I am aware that your good looks accompany you, go where you will; but your reception retains those whom your eyes attract; and that gentleness, accorded to those who surrender their arms, finishes on their hearts the sway which your charms began. The too agreeable expectation which you offer them increases their assiduities towards you; and your complacency, a little less extended, would drive away the great crowd of so many admirers. But, tell me, at least, madam, by what good fortune Clitandre has the happiness of pleasing you so mightily? Upon what basis of merit and sublime virtue do you ground the honour of your regard for him? Is it by the long nail on his little finger that he has acquired the esteem which you display for him? Are you, like all the rest of the fashionable world, fascinated by the dazzling merit of his fair wig? Do his great rolls make you love him? Do his many ribbons charm you? Is it by the attraction of his great German breeches that he has conquered your heart, whilst at the same time he pretended to be your slave? Or have his manner of smiling, and his falsetto voice, found out the secret of moving your feelings?

CÉLIMÈNE. How unjustly you take umbrage at him! Do not you know why I countenance him; and that he has promised to interest all his friends in my lawsuit?

ALCESTE. Lose your lawsuit, madam, with patience, and do not countenance a rival whom I detest.

CÉLIMÈNE. But you are growing jealous of the whole world.

ALCESTE. It is because the whole world is so kindly received by you.

CÉLIMÈNE. That is the very thing to calm your frightened mind, because my good will is diffused over all: you would have more reason to be offended if you saw me entirely occupied with one.

ALCESTE. But as for me, whom you accuse of too much jealousy, what have I more than any of them, madam, pray?

CÉLIMÈNE. The happiness of knowing that you are beloved.

ALCESTE. And what grounds has my love-sick heart for believing it?

CÉLIMÈNE. I think that, as I have taken the trouble to tell you so, such an avowal ought to satisfy you.

ALCESTE. But who will assure me that you may not, at the same time, say as much to everybody else perhaps?

CÉLIMÈNE. Certainly, for a lover, this is a pretty amorous speech, and you make me out a very nice lady. Well! To remove such a suspicion, I retract this moment everything I have said; and no one but yourself shall for the future impose upon you. Will that satisfy you?

ALCESTE. Zounds! Why do I love you so! Ah! If ever I get heart-whole out of your hands, I shall bless Heaven for that rare good fortune. I make no secret of it; I do all that is possible to tear this unfortunate attachment from my heart; but hitherto my greatest efforts have been of no avail; and it is for my sins that I love you thus.

CÉLIMÈNE. It is very true that your affection for me is unequalled.

ALCESTE. As for that, I can challenge the whole world. My love for you cannot be conceived; and never, madam, has any man loved as I do.

CÉLIMÈNE. Your method, however, is entirely new, for you love people only to quarrel with them; it is in peevish expression alone that your feelings vent themselves; no one ever saw such a grumbling swain.

ALCESTE. But it lies with you alone to dissipate this ill-humour. For mercy's sake, let us make an end of all these bickerings, deal openly with each other, and try to put a stop . . .

Enter BASQUE.

CÉLIMÈNE. What is the matter?

BASQUE. Acaste is below.

CÉLIMÈNE. Very well! Bid him come up.

Exit BASQUE.

ALCESTE. What! Can one never have a little private conversation with you? You are always ready to receive company; and you cannot, for a single instant, make up your mind to be "not at home."

CÉLIMÈNE. Do you wish me to quarrel with Acaste?

ALCESTE. You have such regard for people, which I by no means like.

CÉLIMÈNE. He is a man never to forgive me, if he knew that his presence would annoy me.

ALCESTE. And what is that to you, to inconvenience yourself so . . .

CÉLIMÈNE. But, good Heaven! The amity of such as he is of importance; they are a kind of people who, I do not know how, have acquired the right to be heard at Court. They take their part in every conversation; they can do you no good, but they may do you harm; and, whatever support one may find elsewhere, it will never do to be on bad terms with these very noisy gentry.

ALCESTE. In short, whatever people may say or do, you always find reasons to bear with every one; and your very careful judgment . . .

Enter BASQUE.

BASQUE. Clitandre is here too, madam.

ALCESTE. Exactly so. [Wishes to go.]

CÉLIMÈNE. Where are you running to?

ALCESTE. I am going.

CÉLIMÈNE. Stay.

ALCESTE. For what?

CÉLIMÈNE. Stay.

ALCESTE. I cannot.

CÉLIMÈNE. I wish it.

ALCESTE. I will not. These conversations only weary me; and it is too bad of you to wish me to endure them.

CÉLIMÈNE. I wish it, I wish it.

ALCESTE. No, it is impossible.

CÉLIMÈNE. Very well, then; go, begone; you can do as you like.

Enter ÉLIANTE, PHILINTE, ACASTE, and CLITANDRE.

ÉLIANTE [to CÉLIMÈNE]. Here are the two marquises coming up with us. Has anyone told you?

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes. [To BASQUE.] Place chairs for everyone. [BASQUE places chairs, and goes out.] [To ALCESTE.] You are not gone?

ALCESTE. No; but I am determined, madam, to have you make up your mind either for them or for me.

CÉLIMÈNE. Hold your tongue.

ALCESTE. This very day you shall explain yourself.

CÉLIMÈNE. You are losing your senses.

ALCESTE. Not at all. You shall declare yourself.

CÉLIMÈNE. Indeed!

ALCESTE. You must take your stand.

CÉLIMÈNE. You are jesting, I believe.

ALCESTE. Not so. But you must choose. I have been too patient.

CLITANDRE. Egad! I have just come from the Louvre, where Cléonte, at the levee, made himself very ridiculous. Has he not some friend who could charitably enlighten him upon his manners?

CÉLIMÈNE. Truth to say, he compromises himself very much in society; everywhere he carries himself with an air that is noticed at first sight, and when after a short absence you meet him again, he is still more absurd than ever.

ACASTE. Egad! Talk of absurd people, just now, one of the most tedious ones was annoying me. That reasoner, Damon, kept me, if you please, for a full hour in the broiling sun, away from from my Sedan chair.

CÉLIMÈNE. He is a strange talker, and one who always finds the means of telling you nothing with a great flow of words. There is no sense at all in his tittle-tattle, and all that we hear is but noise.

ÉLIANTE [to PHILINTE]. This beginning is not bad; and the conversation takes a sufficiently agreeable turn against our neighbours.

CLITANDRE. Timante, too, madam, is another original.

CÉLIMÈNE. He is a complete mystery from top to toe, who throws upon you, in passing, a bewildered glance, and who, without having anything to do, is always busy. Whatever he utters is accompanied with grimaces; he quite oppresses people by his ceremonies. To interrupt a conversation, he has always a secret to whisper to you, and that secret turns out to be nothing. Of the merest molehill he makes a mountain, and whispers everything in your ear, even to a "good-day."

ACASTE. And GERALDE, madam?

CÉLIMÈNE. That tiresome story-teller! He never comes down from his nobleman's pedestal; he continually mixes with the best society, and never quotes any one of minor rank than a Duke, Prince, or Princess. Rank is his hobby, and his conversation is of nothing but horses, carriages, and dogs. He thee's and thou's persons of the highest standing, and the word Sir is quite obsolete with him.

CLITANDRE. It is said that he is on the best of terms with BÉLISE.

CÉLIMÈNE. Poor silly woman, and the dreariest company! When she comes to visit me, I suffer martyrdom; one has to rack one's brain perpetually to find out what to say to her; and the impossibility of her expressing her thoughts allows the conversation to drop every minute. In vain you try to overcome her stupid silence by the assistance of the most commonplace topics; even the fine weather, the rain, the heat and the cold are subjects, which, with her, are soon exhausted. Yet for all that, her calls, unbearable enough, are prolonged to an insufferable length; and you may consult the clock, or yawn twenty times, but she stirs no more than a log of wood.

ACASTE. What think you of Adraste?

CÉLIMÈNE. Oh! What excessive pride!

He is a man positively puffed out with conceit. His self-importance is never satisfied with the Court, against which he inveighs daily; and whenever an office, a place, or a living is bestowed on another, he is sure to think himself unjustly treated.

CLITANDRE. But young Cléon, whom the most respectable people go to see, what say you of him?

CÉLIMÈNE. That it is to his cook he owes his distinction, and to his table that people pay visits.

ÉLIANTE. He takes pains to provide the most dainty dishes.

CÉLIMÈNE. True; but I should be very glad if he would not dish up himself. His foolish person is a very bad dish, which, to my thinking, spoils every entertainment he gives.

PHILINTE. His uncle Damis is very much esteemed; what say you to him, madam?

CÉLIMÈNE. He is one of my friends.

PHILINTE. I think him a perfect gentleman, and sensible enough.

CÉLIMÈNE. True; but he pretends to too much wit, which annoys me. He is always upon stilts, and, in all his conversations, one sees him labouring to say smart things. Since he took it into his head to be clever, he is so difficult to please that nothing suits his taste. He must needs find mistakes in everything that one writes, and thinks that to bestow praise does not become a wit, that to find fault shows learning, that only fools admire and laugh, and that, by not approving of anything in the works of our time, he is superior to all other people. Even in conversations he finds something to cavil at, the subjects are too trivial for his condescension; and, with arms crossed on his breast, he looks down from the height of his intellect with pity on what everyone says.

ACASTE. Drat it! His very picture.

CLITANDRE [to CÉLIMÈNE]. You have an admirable knack of portraying people to the life.

ALCESTE. Capital, go on, my fine courtly friends. You spare no one, and everyone will have his turn. Nevertheless, let but any one of those persons appear, and we shall see you rush to meet him, offer him your hand, and, with a flattering kiss, give weight to your protestations of being his servant.

CLITANDRE. Why this to us? If what is said offends you, the reproach must be addressed to this lady.

ALCESTE. No, gadzooks! It concerns you; for your assenting smiles draw from her wit all these slanderous remarks. Her satirical vein is incessantly recruited by the culpable incense of your flattery; and her mind would find fewer charms in raillery, if she discovered that no one applauded her. Thus it is that to flatterers we ought everywhere to impute the vices which are sown among mankind.

PHILINTE. But why do you take so great an interest in those people, for you would condemn the very things that are blamed in them?

CÉLIMÈNE. And is not this gentleman bound to contradict? Would you have him subscribe to the general opinion; and must he not everywhere display the spirit of contradiction with which Heaven has endowed him? Other people's sentiments can never please him. He always supports a contrary idea, and he would think himself too much of the common herd, were he observed to be of any one's opinion but his own. The honour of gainsaying has so many charms for him that he very often takes up the cudgels against himself; he combats his own sentiments as soon as he hears them from other folks' lips.

ALCESTE. In short, madam, the laughers are on your side; and you may launch your satire against me.

PHILINTE. But it is very true, too, that you always take up arms against everything that is said; and, that your avowed spleen cannot bear people to be praised or blamed.

ALCESTE. 'Sdeath! spleen against mankind is always seasonable, because they are never in the right, and I see that, in all their dealings, they either praise impertinently, or censure rashly.

CÉLIMÈNE. But . . .

ALCESTE. No, madam, no, though I were to die for it, you have pastimes which I cannot tolerate; and people are very wrong to nourish in your heart this great attachment to the very faults which they blame in you.

CLITANDRE. As for myself, I do not know; but I openly acknowledge that hitherto I have thought this lady faultless.

ACASTE. I see that she is endowed with charms and attractions; but the faults which she has have not struck me.

ALCESTE. So much the more have they struck me; and far from appearing blind, she knows that I take care to reproach her with them. The more we love any one, the less we ought to flatter her. True love shows itself by overlooking nothing; and, were I a lady, I should banish all those mean-spirited lovers who submit to all my sentiments and whose mild complacencies every moment offer up incense to my vagaries.

CÉLIMÈNE. In short, if hearts were ruled by you, we ought, to love well, to relinquish all tenderness and make it the highest aim of perfect attachment to rail heartily at the persons we love.

ÉLIANTE. Love, generally speaking, is little apt to put up with these decrees, and lovers are always observed to extol their choice. Their passion never sees aught to blame in it; and in the beloved all things become loveable. They think their faults perfections, and invent sweet terms to call them by. The pale one vies with the jessamine in fairness; another, dark enough to frighten people, becomes an adorable brunette; the lean one has a good shape and is lithe; the stout one has a portly and majestic bearing; the slattern, who has few charms, passes under the name of a careless beauty; the giantess seems a very goddess in their sight; the dwarf is an epitome of all the wonders of Heaven; the proud one has a soul worthy of a diadem; the artful brims with wit; the silly one is very good-natured; the chatterbox is good-tempered; and the silent one modest and reticent. Thus a passionate swain loves even the very faults of her of whom he is enamoured.

ALCESTE. And I maintain that . . .

CÉLIMÈNE. Let us drop the subject, and take a turn or two in the gallery. What! Are you going, gentlemen?

CLITANDRE and ACASTE. No, no, madam.

ALCESTE. The fear of their departure troubles you very much. Go when you like, gentlemen; but I tell you beforehand that I shall not leave until you leave.

ACASTE. Unless it inconveniences this lady, I have nothing to call me elsewhere the whole day.

CLITANDRE. I, provided I am present

when the King retires, have no other matter to call me away.

CÉLIMÈNE [to ALCESTE]. You only joke, I fancy.

ALCESTE. Not at all. We shall soon see whether it is me of whom you wish to get rid.

Enter BASQUE.

BASQUE [to ALCESTE]. There is a man down stairs, sir, who wishes to speak to you on business which cannot be postponed.

ALCESTE. Tell him that I have no such urgent business.

BASQUE. He wears a jacket with large plaited skirts embroidered with gold.

CÉLIMÈNE [to ALCESTE]. Go and see who it is, or else let him come in. Exit BASQUE.

Enter a Guard of the Maréchaussée.

ALCESTE [going to meet the guard]. What may be your pleasure? Come in, sir.

GUARD. I would have a few words privately with you, sir.

ALCESTE. You may speak aloud, sir, so as to let me know.

GUARD. The Marshals of France, whose commands I bear, hereby summon you to appear before them immediately, sir.

ALCESTE. Who? Me, sir?

GUARD. You, sir!

ALCESTE. And for what?

PHILINTE [to ALCESTE]. It is this ridiculous affair between you and Oronte.

CÉLIMÈNE [to PHILINTE]. What do you mean?

PHILINTE. Oronte and he have been insulting each other just now about some trifling verses which he did not like; and the Marshals wish to nip the affair in the bud.

ALCESTE. Well, I shall never basely submit.

PHILINTE. But you must obey the summons: come, get ready.

ALCESTE. How will they settle this between us? Will the edict of these gentlemen oblige me to approve of the verses which are the cause of our quarrel? I will not retract what I have said; I think them abominable.

PHILINTE. But with a little milder tone...

ALCESTE. I will not abate one jot; the verses are execrable.

PHILINTE. You ought to show a more accommodating spirit. Come along.

ALCESTE. I shall go, but nothing shall induce me to retract.

PHILINTE. Go and show yourself.

ALCESTE. Unless an express order from the King himself commands me to approve of the verses which cause all this trouble, I shall ever maintain, egad, that they are bad, and that a fellow deserves hanging for making them. [To CLITANDRE and ACASTE who are laughing.] Hang it! gentlemen, I did not think I was so amusing.

CÉLIMÈNE. Go quickly whither you are wanted.

ALCESTE. I am going, madam, but shall come back here to finish our discussion.

ACT III

Enter CLITANDRE and ACASTE.

CLITANDRE. My dear marquis, you appear mightily pleased with yourself; everything amuses you, and nothing discomposes you. But really and truly, think you, without flattering yourself, that you have good reasons for appearing so joyful?

ACASTE. Egad, I do not find, on looking at myself, any matter to be sorrowful about. I am wealthy, I am young, and am descended from a family which, with some appearance of truth, may be called noble; and I think that, by the rank which my lineage confers upon me, there are very few offices to which I might not aspire. As for courage, which we ought especially to value, it is well known—this without vanity—that I do not lack it; and people have seen me carry on an affair of honour in a manner sufficiently vigorous and brisk. As for wit, I have some, no doubt; and as for good taste, I judge and reason upon everything without study; at “first nights,” of which I am very fond, I take my place as a critic upon the stage, to give my opinion as a judge, to applaud, and to point out the best passages by repeated bravoës; I carry myself well, and am good-looking, have particularly fine teeth and a good figure. I believe, without flattering myself, that, as for dressing in good taste, very few will dispute the palm with me. I find myself treated with every possible consideration, very much beloved by the fair sex; and I stand very well with the King. With all that, I think, dear marquis, that one might be satisfied with oneself anywhere.

CLITANDRE. True. But, finding so many easy conquests elsewhere, why come you here to utter fruitless sighs?

ACASTE. I? Zounds! I have neither the wish nor the disposition to put up with the indifference of any woman. I leave it to awkward and ordinary people to burn constantly for cruel fair maidens, to languish at their feet, and to bear with their severities, to invoke the aid of sighs and tears, and to endeavour, by long and persistent assiduities, to obtain what is denied to their little merit. Men of my stamp, marquis, are not made to love on trust and be at all the expenses themselves. Be the merit of the fair ever so great, I think, thank Heaven, that we have our value as well as they; that it is not reasonable to enthrall a heart like mine without its costing them anything; and that, to weigh everything in a just scale, the advances should be, at least, reciprocal.

CLITANDRE. Then you think that you are right enough here, marquis?

ACASTE. I have some reason, marquis, to think so.

CLITANDRE. Believe me, divest yourself of this great mistake: you flatter yourself, dear friend, and are altogether self-deceived.

ACASTE. It is true. I flatter myself, and am, in fact, altogether, self-deceived.

CLITANDRE. But what causes you to judge your happiness to be complete?

ACASTE. I flatter myself.

CLITANDRE. Upon what do you ground your belief?

ACASTE. I am altogether self-deceived.

CLITANDRE. Have you any sure proofs?

ACASTE. I am mistaken, I tell you.

CLITANDRE. Has Célimène made you any secret avowal of her inclinations?

ACASTE. No, I am very badly treated by her.

CLITANDRE. Answer me, I pray.

ACASTE. I meet with nothing but rebuffs.

CLITANDRE. A truce to your raillery; and tell me what hope she has held out to you.

ACASTE. I am the rejected, and you are the lucky one. She has a great aversion to me, and one of these days I shall have to hang myself.

CLITANDRE. Nonsense. Shall we two, marquis, to adjust our love affairs, make a compact together? Whenever one of us shall be able to show a certain proof of having the greater share in Célimène's heart, the other shall leave the field free to the supposed conqueror, and by that means rid him of an obstinate rival.

ACASTE. Egad! You please me with these words, and I agree to that from the bottom of my heart. But hush.

Enter CÉLIMÈNE.

CÉLIMÈNE. What! here still?

CLITANDRE. Love, madam, detains us.

CÉLIMÈNE. I hear a carriage below. Do you know whose it is?

CLITANDRE. No.

Enter BASQUE.

BASQUE. Arsinoé, madam, is coming up to see you.

CÉLIMÈNE. What does the woman want with me?

BASQUE. Éliante is down stairs talking to her.

CÉLIMÈNE. What is she thinking about, and what brings her here?

ACASTE. She has everywhere the reputation of being a consummate prude, and her fervent zeal . . . Exit BASQUE.

CÉLIMÈNE. Psha, downright humbug. In her inmost soul she is as worldly as any; and her every nerve is strained to hook some one, without being successful, however. She can only look with envious eyes on the accepted lovers of others; and in her wretched condition, forsaken by all, she is forever railing against the blindness of the age. She endeavours to hide the dreadful isolation of her home under a false cloak of prudishness; and to save the credit of her feeble charms, she brands as criminal the power which they lack. Yet a swain would not come at all amiss to the lady; and she has even a tender hankering after Alceste. Every attention that he pays me she looks upon as a theft committed by me and as an insult to her attractions; and her jealous spite, which she can hardly hide, breaks out against me at every opportunity, and in an underhand manner. In short, I never saw anything so stupid. She is impertinent to the last degree . . .

Enter BASQUE, showing in ARSINOÉ.

CÉLIMÈNE. Ah! what happy chance brings you here, madam? I was really growing uneasy about you. Exit BASQUE.

ARSINOÉ. I have come to give you some advice as a matter of duty.

CÉLIMÈNE. How very glad I am to see you!

Exeunt CLITANDRE and ACASTE, laughing.

ARSINOÉ. They could not have left at a more convenient time.

CÉLIMÈNE. Shall we sit down?

ARSINOÉ. It is not necessary. Friendship, madam, must especially show itself in matters which may be of consequence to us; and as there are none of greater importance than honour and decorum, I come to prove to you, by an advice which closely touches your reputation, the friendship which I feel for you. Yesterday I was with some people of rare virtue, where the conversation turned upon you; and there, your conduct, which is causing some stir, was unfortunately, madam, far from being commended. That crowd of people, whose visits you permit, your gallantry and the noise it makes, were criticised rather more freely and more severely than I could have wished. You can easily imagine whose part I took. I did all I could to defend you. I exonerated you, and vouched for the purity of your heart, and the honesty of your intentions. But you know there are things in life, which one cannot well defend, although one may have the greatest wish to do so; and I was at last obliged to confess that the way in which you lived did you some harm; that, in the eyes of the world, it had a doubtful look; that there was no story so ill-natured as not to be everywhere told about it; and that, if you liked, your behaviour might give less cause for censure. Not that I believe that decency is in any way outraged. Heaven forbid that I should harbour such a thought! But the world is very ready to give credit to the faintest shadow of a crime, and it is not enough to live blameless one's self. Madam, I believe you to be too sensible not to take in good part this useful counsel, and not to ascribe it only to the inner promptings of an affection that feels an interest in your welfare.

CÉLIMÈNE. Madam, I have a great many thanks to return you. Such counsel lays me under an obligation; and, far from taking it amiss, I intend this very moment to repay the favour by giving you an advice which also touches your reputation closely; and as

I see you prove yourself my friend by acquainting me with the stories that are current of me, I shall follow so nice an example by informing you what is said of you. In a house the other day, where I paid a visit, I met some people of exemplary merit, who, while talking of the proper duties of a well spent life, turned the topic of the conversation upon you, madam. There your prudishness and your too fervent zeal were not at all cited as a good example. This affectation of a grave demeanour, your eternal conversations on wisdom and honour, your mincings and mouthings at the slightest shadows of indecency, which an innocent though ambiguous word may convey, that lofty esteem in which you hold yourself, and those pitying glances which you cast upon all, your frequent lectures and your acrid censures on things which are pure and harmless; all this, if I may speak frankly to you, madam, was blamed unanimously. What is the good, said they, of this modest mien and this prudent exterior, which is belied by all the rest? She says her prayers with the utmost exactness; but she beats her servants and pays them no wages. She displays great fervour in every place of devotion; but she paints and wishes to appear handsome. She covers the nudities in her pictures; but loves the reality. As for me, I undertook your defence against everyone, and positively assured them that it was nothing but scandal; but the general opinion went against me, as they came to the conclusion that you would do well to concern yourself less about the actions of others, and take a little more pains with your own; that one ought to look a long time at one's self before thinking of condemning other people; that when we wish to correct others, we ought to add the weight of a blameless life; and that even then, it would be better to leave it to those whom Heaven has ordained for the task. Madam, I also believe you to be too sensible not to take in good part this useful counsel, and not to ascribe it only to the inner promptings of an affection that feels an interest in your welfare.

ARSINOÉ. To whatever we may be exposed when we reprove, I did not expect this retort, madam, and, by its very sting, I see how my sincere advice has hurt your feelings.

CÉLIMÈNE. On the contrary, madam; and, if we were reasonable, these mutual counsels would become customary. If honestly made use of, they would to a great extent destroy the excellent opinion people have of themselves. It depends entirely on you whether we shall continue this trustworthy practice with equal zeal, and whether we shall take great care to tell each other, between ourselves, what we hear, you of me, I of you.

ARSINOÉ. Ah! Madam, I can hear nothing said of you. It is in me that people find so much to reprove.

CÉLIMÈNE. Madam, it is easy, I believe, to blame or praise everything; and everyone may be right, according to his age and taste. There is a time for gallantry, there is one, also, for prudishness. One may out of policy take to it, when youthful attractions have faded away. It sometimes serves to hide vexatious ravages of time. I do not say that I shall not follow your example, one of these days. Those things come with old age; but twenty, as everyone well knows, is not an age to play the prude.

ARSINOÉ. You certainly pride yourself upon a very small advantage, and you boast terribly of your age. Whatever difference there may be between your years and mine, there is no occasion to make such a tremendous fuss about it; and I am at a loss to know, madam, why you should become so angry, and what makes you goad me in this manner.

CÉLIMÈNE. And I, madam, am at an equal loss to know why one hears you inveigh so bitterly against me everywhere. Must I always suffer for your vexations? Can I help it if people refuse to pay you any attentions? If men will fall in love with me, and will persist in offering me each day those attentions of which your heart would wish to see me deprived, I cannot alter it, and it is not my fault. I leave you the field free, and do not prevent you from having charms to attract people.

ARSINOÉ. Alas! And do you think that I would trouble myself about this crowd of lovers of which you are so vain, and that it is not very easy to judge at what price they may be attracted now-a-days? Do you wish to make it be believed, that, judging by what is going on, your merit alone attracts this crowd; that their affection for you is strictly honest, and that it is for nothing but your virtue that they all pay you their court? People are not blinded by those empty pretences; the world is not duped in that way; and I see many ladies who are capable of inspiring a tender feeling, yet who do not succeed in attracting a crowd of beaux: from that fact we may draw our conclusion that those conquests are not altogether made without some great advances; that no one cares to sigh for us, for our handsome looks only; and that the attentions bestowed on us are generally dearly bought. Do not, therefore, pull yourself up with vain-glory about the trifling advantages of a poor victory; and moderate slightly the pride on your good looks, instead of looking down upon people on account of them. If I were at all envious about your conquests, I dare say that I might manage like other people; be under no restraint, and thus show plainly that one may have lovers when one wishes for them.

CÉLIMÈNE. Do have some then, madam, and let us see you try it; endeavour to please by this extraordinary secret; and without . . .

ARSINOÉ. Let us break off this conversation, madam, it might excite too much both your temper and mine; and I would have already taken my leave, had I not been obliged to wait for my carriage.

CÉLIMÈNE. Please stay as long as you like, and do not hurry yourself on that account, madam. But instead of wearying you any longer with my presence, I am going to give you some more pleasant company. This gentleman, who comes very opportunely, will better supply my place in entertaining you.

Enter ALCESTE.

CÉLIMÈNE. Alceste, I have to write a few lines which I cannot well delay. Please to stay with this lady; she will all the more easily excuse my rudeness.

Exit CÉLIMÈNE.

ARSINOÉ. You see, I am left here to entertain you, until my coach comes round. She could have devised no more charming treat for me than such a conversation. Indeed, people of exceptional merit attract the esteem and love of every one; and yours has undoubtedly some secret charm which makes me feel interested in all your doings. I could wish that the Court with a real regard to your merits would do more justice to your deserts. You have reason to complain; and it vexes me to see that day by day nothing is done for you.

ALCESTE. For me, madam? And by what right could I pretend to anything? What service have I rendered to the State? Pray, what have I done, so brilliant in itself, to complain of the Court doing nothing for me?

ARSINOÉ. Not everyone whom the State delights to honour has rendered signal services; there must be an opportunity as well as the power; and the abilities which you allow us to perceive ought . . .

ALCESTE. For Heaven's sake, let us have no more of my abilities, I pray. What would you have the Court do? It would have enough to do, and have its hands full, to discover the merits of people.

ARSINOÉ. Sterling merit discovers itself. A great deal is made of yours in certain places; and let me tell you that, not later than yesterday, you were highly spoken of in two distinguished circles, by people of very great standing.

ALCESTE. As for that, madam, everyone is praised now-a-days, and very little discrimination is shown in our times. Everything is equally endowed with great merit, so that it is no longer an honour to be lauded. Praises abound, they throw them at one's head; and even my valet is put in the gazette.

ARSINOÉ. As for me, I could wish that, to bring yourself into greater notice, some place at Court might tempt you. If you will only give me a hint that you seriously think about it, a great many engines might be set in motion to serve you; and I know some people whom I could employ for you and who would manage the matter smoothly enough.

ALCESTE. And what should I do when I got there, madam? My disposition rather prompts me to keep away from it. Heaven, when ushering me into the world, did not give me a mind suited for the atmosphere of a Court. I have not the qualifications necessary for success, nor for making my fortune there. To be open and candid is my chief talent; I possess not the art of deceiving people in conversation; and he who has the gift of concealing his thoughts, ought not to stay long in those places. When not at Court, one has not, doubtless, that standing, and the advantage of those honourable titles which it bestows now-a-days; but, on the other hand, one has not the vexation of 5 playing the silly fool. One has not to bear a thousand galling rebuffs; one is not, as it were, forced to praise the verses of Mister so-and-so, to laud Madam such and such, and to put up with the whims of some ingenious 10 marquises.

ARSINOÉ. Since you wish it, let us drop the subject of the Court: but I cannot help grieving for your amours; and, to tell you my opinions candidly on that head, I could 15 heartily wish your affections better bestowed. You certainly deserve a much happier fate, for she who has fascinated you is unworthy of you.

ALCESTE. But in saying so, madam, re- 20 member, I pray, that this lady is your friend.

ARSINOÉ. True. But really my conscience revolts at the thought of suffering any longer the wrong that is done to you. The position in which I see you afflicts my very 25 soul, and I caution you that your affections are betrayed.

ALCESTE. This is certainly showing me a deal of good feeling, madam, and such information is very welcome to a lover. 30

ARSINOÉ. Yes, for all Célimène is my friend, I do not hesitate to call her unworthy of possessing the heart of a man of honour; and hers only pretends to respond to yours.

ALCESTE. That is very possible, madam, 35 one cannot look into the heart: but your charitable feelings might well have refrained from awakening such a suspicion as mine.

ARSINOÉ. Nothing is easier than to say 40 no more about it, if you do not wish to be undeceived.

ALCESTE. Just so. But whatever may be openly said on this subject is not half so annoying as hints throw out; and I for one 45 would prefer to be plainly told that only which could be clearly proved.

ARSINOÉ. Very well! That is sufficient; I can fully enlighten you upon the subject. I will have you believe nothing but what your 50 own eyes see. Only have the kindness to escort me as far as my house and I will give you undeniable proof of the faithlessness of your fair one's heart; if, after that, you can find charms in anyone else, we will perhaps find you some consolation.

ACT IV

Enter ÉLIANTE and PHILINTE.

PHILINTE. No, never have I seen so obstinate a mind, nor a reconciliation more difficult to effect. In vain was Alceste tried on all sides; he would still maintain his opinion: and never, I believe, has a more curious dispute engaged the attention of those gentlemen. "No, gentlemen," exclaimed he, "I will not retract, and I shall agree with you on every point, except on this one. At what is Oronte offended? And with what does he reproach me? Does it reflect upon his honour that he cannot write well? What is my opinion to him, which he has altogether wrongly construed? One may be a perfect gentleman, and write bad verses; those things have nothing to do with honour. I take him to be a gallant man in every way; a man of standing, of merit, and courage, anything you like, but he is a wretched author. I shall praise, if you wish, his mode of living, his lavishness, his skill in riding, in fencing, in dancing; but as to praising his verses, I am his humble servant; and if one has not the gift of composing better, one ought to leave off rhyming altogether, unless condemned to it on forfeit of one's life." In short, all the modification they could with difficulty obtain from him, was to say, in what he thought a much gentler tone, "I am sorry, sir, to be so difficult to please; and out of regard to you, I could wish, with all my heart, to have found your sonnet a little better." And they compelled them to settle this dispute quickly with an embrace.

ÉLIANTE. He is very eccentric in his doings; but I must confess that I think a great deal of him; and the candour upon which he prides himself has something noble and heroic in it. It is a rare virtue now-a-days, and I, for one, should not be sorry to meet with it everywhere.

PHILINTE. As for me, the more I see of him, the more I am amazed at that passion to which his whole heart is given up. I cannot conceive how, with a disposition like his, he has taken it into his head to love at all; and still less can I understand how your cousin happens to be the person to whom his feelings are inclined.

ÉLIANTE. That shows that love is not always produced by compatibility of temper; and in this case, all the pretty theories of gentle sympathies are belied.

PHILINTE. But do you think him beloved in return, to judge from what we see?

ÉLIANTE. That is a point not easily decided. How can we judge whether it be true she loves? Her own heart is not so very sure of what it feels. It sometimes loves, without being quite aware of it, and at other times thinks it does, without the least grounds.

PHILINTE. I think that our friend will have more trouble with this cousin of yours than he imagines; and to tell you the truth, if he were of my mind, he would bestow his affections elsewhere; and by a better choice, we should see him, madam, profit by the kind feelings which your heart evinces for him.

ÉLIANTE. As for me, I do not mince matters, and I think that in such cases we ought to act with sincerity. I do not run counter to his tender feelings; on the contrary, I feel interested in them; and, if it depended only on me, I would unite him to the object of his love. But if, as it may happen in love affairs, his affections should receive a check, and if Célimène should respond to the love of any one else, I could easily be prevailed upon to listen to his addresses, and I should have no repugnance whatever to them on account of their rebuff elsewhere.

PHILINTE. Nor do I, from my side, oppose myself, madam, to the tender feelings which you entertain for him; and he himself, if he wished, could inform you what I have taken care to say to him on that score. But if, by the union of those two, you should be prevented from accepting his attentions, all mine would endeavour to gain that great favour which your kind feelings offer to him. I should be only too happy, madam, to have them transferred to me, if his heart could not respond to yours.

ÉLIANTE. You are in the humour to jest, Philinte.

PHILINTE. Not so, madam, I am speaking my inmost feelings. I only wait the opportune moment to offer myself openly and am wishing most anxiously to hurry its advent.

Enter ALCESTE.

ALCESTE. Ah, madam! Obtain me justice for an offence which triumphs over all my constancy.

ÉLIANTE. What ails you? What disturbs you?

ALCESTE. This much ails me, that it is death to me to think of it; and the upheaving of all creation would less overwhelm me than this accident. It is all over with me . . . My love . . . I cannot speak.

ÉLIANTE. Just endeavour to be composed.

ALCESTE. Oh, just Heaven; can the odious vices of the basest minds be joined to such beauty?

ÉLIANTE. But, once more, what can have . . .

ALCESTE. Alas! All is ruined! I am! I am betrayed! I am stricken to death. Célimène . . . would you credit it! Célimène deceives me and is faithless.

ÉLIANTE. Have you just grounds for believing so?

PHILINTE. Perhaps it is a suspicion, rashly conceived; and your jealous temper often harbours fancies . . .

ALCESTE. Ah! 'Sdeath, please to mind your own business, sir. [To ÉLIANTE.] Her treachery is but too certain, for I have in my pocket a letter in her own handwriting. Yes, madam, a letter, intended for Oronte, has placed before my eyes my disgrace and her shame; Oronte, whose addresses I believed she avoided, and whom, of all my rivals, I feared the least.

PHILINTE. A letter may deceive by appearance, and is sometimes not so culpable as may be thought.

ALCESTE. Once more, sir, leave me alone, if you please, and trouble yourself only about your own concerns.

ÉLIANTE. You should moderate your passion; and the insult . . .

ALCESTE. You must be left to do that, madam; it is to you that my heart has recourse to-day to free itself from this goading pain. Avenge me on an ungrateful and perfidious relative who basely deceives such constant tenderness. Avenge me for an act that ought to fill you with horror.

ÉLIANTE. I avenge you? How?

ALCESTE. By accepting my heart. Take it, madam, instead of the false one; it is in this way that I can avenge myself upon her; and I shall punish her by the sincere attachment, and the profound love, the respectful cares, the eager devotions, the ceaseless attentions which this heart will henceforth offer up at your shrine.

ÉLIANTE. I certainly sympathize with you in your sufferings and do not despise your proffered heart; but the wrong done may not be so great as you think, and you might wish to forego this desire for revenge. When the injury proceeds from a beloved object, we form many designs which we never execute; we may find as powerful a reason as we like to break off the connection, the guilty charmer is soon again innocent; all the harm we wish her quickly vanishes, and we know what a lover's anger means.

ALCESTE. No, no, madam, no. The offence is too cruel; there will be no relenting, and I have done with her. Nothing shall change the resolution I have taken, and I should hate myself for ever loving her again. Here she comes. My anger increases at her approach. I shall taunt her with her black guilt, completely put her to the blush, and, after that, bring you a heart wholly freed from her deceitful attractions.

Exeunt ÉLIANTE and PHILINTE.

Enter CÉLIMÈNE.

ALCESTE [aside]. Grant, Heaven, that I may control my temper.

CÉLIMÈNE [aside]. Ah! [To ALCESTE.] What is all this trouble I see you in, and what means those long-drawn sighs, and those black looks which you cast at me?

ALCESTE. That all the wickedness of which a heart is capable is not to be compared to your perfidy; that neither fate, hell, nor Heaven in its wrath, ever produced anything so wicked as you are.

CÉLIMÈNE. These are certainly pretty compliments, which I admire very much.

ALCESTE. Do not jest. This is no time for laughing. Blush rather, you have cause to do so; and I have undeniable proofs of your treachery. This is what the agitations of my mind prognosticated; it was not without cause that my love took alarm; by these frequent suspicions, which were hateful to you, I was trying to discover the misfortune which my eyes have beheld; and in spite of all your care and your skill in dissembling, my star foretold me what I had to fear. But do not imagine that I will bear unavenged this slight of being insulted. I know that we have no command over our inclinations, that love will everywhere spring up spontaneously, that there is no entering a heart by force, and that every soul is free to name its conqueror: I should thus have no reason to complain if you had spoken to me without dissembling, and rejected my advances from the very beginning; my heart would then have been justified in blaming fortune alone. But to see my love encouraged by a deceitful avowal on your part is an action so treacherous and perfidious that it cannot meet with too great a punishment and I can allow my resentment to do anything. Yes, yes; after such an outrage, fear everything; I am no longer myself, I am mad with rage. My senses, struck by the deadly blow with which you kill me, are no longer governed by reason; I give way to the outbursts of a just wrath and am no longer responsible for what I may do.

CÉLIMÈNE. Whence comes, I pray, such a passion? Speak! Have you lost your senses?

ALCESTE. Yes, yes, I lost them when, to my misfortune, I beheld you, and thus took the poison which kills me, and when I thought to meet with some sincerity in those treacherous charms that bewitched me.

CÉLIMÈNE. Of what treachery have you to complain?

ALCESTE. Ah! How double-faced she is! How well she knows how to dissemble! But I am fully prepared with the means of driving her to extremities. Cast your eyes here and recognize your writing. This picked-up note is sufficient to confound you, and such proof cannot easily be refuted.

CÉLIMÈNE. And this is the cause of your perturbation of spirits?

ALCESTE. You do not blush on beholding this writing!

CÉLIMÈNE. And why should I blush?

ALCESTE. What! You add boldness to craft! Will you disown this note because it bears no name?

CÉLIMÈNE. Why should I disown it, since I wrote it.

ALCESTE. And you can look at it without becoming confused at the crime of which its style accuses you!

CÉLIMÈNE. You are, in truth, a very eccentric man.

ALCESTE. What! you thus out-brave this convincing proof! And the contents so full of tenderness for Oronte, need have nothing in them to outrage me, or to shame you?

CÉLIMÈNE. Oronte! Who told you that this letter is for him?

ALCESTE. The people who put it into my hands this day. But I will even suppose that it is for some one else. Has my heart any less cause to complain of yours? Will you, in fact, be less guilty toward me?

CÉLIMÈNE. But if it is a woman to whom this letter is addressed, how can it hurt you, or what is there culpable in it?

ALCESTE. Hem! The prevarication is ingenious, and the excuse excellent. I must own that I did not expect this turn; and nothing but that was wanting to convince me. Do you dare to have recourse to such palpable tricks? Do you think people entirely destitute of common sense? Come, let us see a little by what subterfuge, with what air, you will support so palpable a falsehood; and how you can apply to a woman every word of this note which evinces so much tenderness! Reconcile, if you can, to hide your deceit, what I am about to read.

CÉLIMÈNE. It does not suit me to do so. I think it ridiculous that you should take so much upon yourself, and tell me to my face what you have the daring to say to me!

ALCESTE. No, no, without flying into a rage, take a little trouble to explain these terms.

CÉLIMÈNE. No, I shall do nothing of the kind, and it matters very little to me what you think upon the subject.

ALCESTE. I pray you, show me, and I shall be satisfied, if this letter can be explained as meant for a woman.

CÉLIMÈNE. Not at all. It is for Oronte; and I will have you believe it. I accept all his attentions gladly; I admire what he says, I like him, and I shall agree to whatever you please. Do as you like, and act as you think proper; let nothing hinder you and do not harass me any longer.

ALCESTE [aside]. Heavens! can anything more cruel be conceived, and was ever heart treated like mine? What! I am justly angry with her, I come to complain, and I am quarreled with instead! My grief and my suspicions are excited to the utmost, I am allowed to believe everything, she boasts of everything; and yet, my heart is still sufficiently mean not to be able to break the bonds that hold it fast, and not to arm itself with a generous contempt for the ungrateful object of which it is too much enamoured. [To CÉLIMÈNE]. Perfidious woman, you know well how to take advantage of my great weakness, and to employ for your own purpose that excessive, astonishing, and fatal love which your treacherous looks have inspired! Defend yourself at least from this crime that overwhelms me, and stop pretending to be guilty. Show me, if you can, that this letter is innocent; my affection will even consent to assist you. At any rate, endeavour to appear faithful, and I shall strive to believe you such.

CÉLIMÈNE. Bah, you are mad with your jealous frenzies and do not deserve the love which I have for you. I should much like to know what could compel me to stoop for you to the baseness of dissembling; and why, if my heart were disposed towards another, I should not say so candidly. What! Does the kind assurance of my sentiments toward you not defend me sufficiently against all your suspicions? Ought they to possess any weight at all with such a guarantee? Is it not insulting me even to listen to them? And since it is with the utmost difficulty that we can resolve to confess our love, since the strict honour of our sex, hostile to our passion, strongly opposes such a confession, ought a lover who sees such an obstacle overcome for his sake, doubt with impunity our avowal? And is he not greatly to blame in not assuring himself of the truth of that which is never said but after a severe struggle with himself? Begone! Such suspicions deserve my anger, and you are not worthy of being cared for. I am silly, and am vexed at my own simplicity in still preserving the least kindness for you. I ought to place my affections elsewhere, and give you a just cause for complaint.

ALCESTE. Ah! You traitress! Mine is a strange infatuation for you; those tender expressions are, no doubt, meant only to deceive me. But it matters little, I must submit to my fate; my very soul is wrapt up in you; I will see to the bitter end how your heart will act towards me, and whether it will be black enough to deceive me.

CÉLIMÈNE. No, you do not love me as you ought to love.

ALCESTE. Indeed! Nothing is to be compared to my exceeding love; and, in its eagerness to show itself to the whole world, it goes even so far as to form wishes against you. Yes, I could wish that no one thought you handsome, that you were reduced to a miserable existence; that Heaven, at your birth, had bestowed upon you nothing; that you had no rank, no nobility, no wealth, so that I might openly proffer my heart, and thus make amends to you for the injustice of such a lot; and that, this very day, I might have the joy and the glory of seeing you owe everything to my love.

CÉLIMÈNE. This is wishing me well in a strange way! Heaven grant that you may never have occasion . . . But here comes Monsieur Dubois curiously decked out.

Enter DUBOIS.

ALCESTE. What means this strange attire, and that frightened look? What ails you?

DUBOIS. Sir . . .

ALCESTE. Well?

DUBOIS. The most mysterious event.

ALCESTE. What is it?

DUBOIS. Our affairs are turning out badly, sir.

ALCESTE. What?

DUBOIS. Shall I speak out?

ALCESTE. Yes, do, and quickly.

DUBOIS. Is there no one there?

ALCESTE. Curse your trifling! Will you speak?

DUBOIS. Sir, we must beat a retreat.

ALCESTE. What do you mean?

DUBOIS. We must steal away from this quietly.

ALCESTE. And why?

DUBOIS. I tell you that we must leave this place.

ALCESTE. The reason?

DUBOIS. You must go, sir, without staying to take leave.

ALCESTE. But what is the meaning of this strain?

DUBOIS. The meaning is, sir, that you must make yourself scarce.

ALCESTE. I shall knock you on the head to a certainty, booby, if you do not explain yourself more clearly.

DUBOIS. A fellow, sir, with a black dress, and as black a look, got as far as the kitchen to leave a paper with us, scribbled over in such a fashion that old Nick himself could not have read it. It is about your law-suit, I make no doubt; but the very devil, I believe, could not make head nor tail of it.

ALCESTE. Well, what then? What has the paper to do with the going away of which you speak, you scoundrel?

DUBOIS. I must tell you, sir, that, about an hour afterwards, a gentleman who often calls, came to ask for you quite eagerly, and not finding you at home, quietly told me, knowing how attached I am to you, to let you know . . . Stop a moment; what the deuce is his name?

ALCESTE. Never mind his name, you scoundrel, and tell me what he told you.

DUBOIS. He is one of your friends, in short, that is sufficient. He told me that for your very life you must get away from this, and that you are threatened with arrest.

ALCESTE. But how! Has he not specified anything?

DUBOIS. No. He asked me for ink and paper, and has sent you a line from which you can, I think, fathom the mystery!

ALCESTE. Hand it over then.

CÉLIMÈNE. What can all this mean?

ALCESTE. I do not know; but I am anxious to be informed. Have you almost done, devil take you?

DUBOIS [after having fumbled for some time for the note]. After all, sir, I have left it on your table.

ALCESTE. I do not know what keeps me from . . .

CÉLIMÈNE. Do not put yourself in a passion, but go and unravel this perplexing business.

ALCESTE. It seems that fate, whatever I may do, has sworn to prevent my having a conversation with you. But, to get the better of her, allow me to see you again, madam before the end of the day.

ACT V

Enter ALCESTE and PHILINTE.

ALCESTE. I tell you, my mind is made up about it.

PHILINTE. But, whatever this blow may be, does it compel you . . .

ALCESTE. You may talk and argue till doomsday if you like, nothing can avert me from what I have said. The age we live in is too perverse, and I am determined to withdraw altogether from intercourse with the world. What! When honour, probity, decency, and the laws are all against my adversary; when the equity of my claim is everywhere cried up; when my mind is at rest as to the justice of my cause, I meanwhile see myself betrayed by its issue! What! I have got justice on my side, and I lose my case! A wretch, whose scandalous history is well known, comes off triumphant by the blackest falsehood! All good faith yields to his treachery! He finds the means of being in the right, whilst cutting my throat! The weight of his dissimulation, so full of cunning, overthrows the right and turns the scales of justice! He obtains even a decree of court to crown his villainy. And, not content with the wrong he is doing me, there is abroad in society an abominable book, of which the very reading is to be condemned, a book that deserves the utmost severity, and of which the scoundrel has the impudence to proclaim me the author. Upon this, Oronte is observed to mutter, and tries wickedly to support the imposture! He, who holds an honourable position at Court, to whom I have done nothing except having been sincere and candid, who came to ask me in spite of myself of my opinion of some of his verses; and because I treat him honestly, and will not betray either him or truth, he assists in overwhelming me with a trumped-up crime. Behold him now my greatest enemy! And I shall never obtain his sincere forgiveness, because I did not think that his sonnet was good! 'Sdeath! to think that mankind is made thus! The thirst for fame induces them to do such things! This is the good faith, the virtuous zeal, the justice and the honour to be found amongst them! Let us begone; it is too much to endure the vexations they are devising; let us get out of this wood, this cut-throat hole; and since men behave towards each other like real wolves, wretches, you shall never see me again as long as I live.

PHILINTE. I think you are acting somewhat hastily; and the harm done is not so great as you would make it out. Whatever your adversary dares to impute to you has not had the effect of causing you to be arrested. We see his false reports defeating themselves, and this action is likely to hurt him much more than you.

ALCESTE. Him? he does not mind the scandal of such tricks as these. He has a license to be an arrant knave; and this event, far from damaging his position, will obtain him a still better standing to-morrow.

PHILINTE. In short, it is certain that little notice has been taken of the report which his malice spread against you; from that side you have already nothing to fear; and as for your law-suit, of which you certainly have reason to complain, it is easy for you to bring the trial on afresh, and against this decision . . .

ALCESTE. No, I shall leave it as it is. Whatever cruel wrong this verdict may inflict, I shall take particular care not to have it set aside. We see too plainly how right is maltreated in it, and I wish to go down to posterity as a signal proof, as a notorious testimony of the wickedness of the men of our age. It may indeed cost me twenty thousand francs, but at the cost of twenty thousand francs I shall have the right of railing against the iniquity of human nature, and of nourishing an undying hatred of it.

PHILINTE. But after all . . .

ALCESTE. But after all, your pains are thrown away. What can you, sir, say upon this head? Would you have the assurance to wish, to my face, to excuse the villainy of all that is happening?

PHILINTE. No, I agree with you in all that you say. Everything goes by intrigue, and by pure influence. It is only trickery which carries the day in our time, and men ought to act differently. But is their want of equity a reason for wishing to withdraw from their society? All human failings give us, in life, the means of exercising our philosophy. It is the best employment for virtue; and if probity reigned everywhere, if all hearts were candid, just, and tractable, most of our virtues would be useless to us, inasmuch as their functions are to bear, without annoyance, the injustice of others in our good cause; and just in the same way as a heart full of virtue . . .

ALCESTE. I know that you are a most fluent speaker, sir; that you always abound in fine arguments; but you are wasting your time, and all your fine speeches. Reason tells me to retire for my own good. I cannot command my tongue sufficiently; I cannot answer for what I might say, and should very probably get myself into a hundred scrapes. Allow me, without any more words, to wait for C  lim  ne. She must consent to the plan that brings me here. I shall see whether her heart has any love for me; and this very hour will prove it to me.

PHILINTE. Let us go upstairs to   liante and wait her coming.

ALCESTE. No, my mind is too harassed. You go and see her, and leave me in this little dark corner with my black care.

PHILINTE. That is strange company to leave you in; I will induce   liante to come down.

Exit.

Enter C  LIM  NE and ORONTE.

ORONTE. Yes, madam, it remains for you to consider whether, by ties so dear, you will make me wholly yours; I must be absolutely certain of your affection: a lover dislikes to be held in suspense upon such a subject. If the ardour of my affection has been able to move your feelings, you ought not to hesitate to let me see it; and the proof, after all, which I ask of you is not to allow Alceste to wait upon you any longer; to sacrifice him to my love, and, in short, to banish him from your house this very day.

C  LIM  NE. But why are you so incensed against him; you, whom I have so often heard speak of his merits?

ORONTE. There is no need, madam, of these explanations; the question is, what are your feelings? Please to choose between the one or the other; my resolution depends entirely upon yours.

ALCESTE [coming out of his corner]. Yes, this gentleman is right, madam, you must make a choice; and his request agrees perfectly with mine. I am equally eager, and the same anxiety brings me here. My love requires a sure proof. Things cannot go on any longer in this way, and the moment has arrived for explaining your feelings.

ORONTE. I have no wish, sir, in any way to disturb, by an untimely affection, your good fortune.

ALCESTE. And I have no wish, sir, jealous or not jealous, to share aught in her heart with you.

ORONTE. If she prefers your affection to mine . . .

ALCESTE. If she has the slightest inclination towards you . . .

ORONTE. I swear henceforth not to pretend to it again.

ALCESTE. I peremptorily swear never to see her again.

ORONTE. Madam, it remains with you now to speak openly.

ALCESTE. Madam, you can explain yourself fearlessly.

ORONTE. You have simply to tell us where your feelings are engaged.

ALCESTE. You may simply finish the matter, by choosing between us two.

ORONTE. What! You seem to be at a loss to make such a choice.

ALCESTE. What! Your heart still wavers and appears uncertain!

C  LIM  NE. Good Heavens, how out of place is this persistence, and how very unreasonable you both show yourselves! It is not that I do not know whom to prefer, nor is it my heart that wavers. It is not at all in doubt between you two; and nothing could be more quickly accomplished than the choice of my affections. But to tell the truth, I feel too confused to pronounce such an avowal before you: I think that disobliging words ought not to be spoken in people's presence; that a heart can give sufficient proof of its attachment without going so far as to break with everyone; and gentler intimations suffice to inform a lover of the ill success of his suit.

ORONTE. No, no, I do not fear a frank avowal; for my part I consent to it.

ALCESTE. And I demand it; it is just its very publicity that I claim, and I do not wish you to spare my feelings in the least. Your great study has always been to keep friends with everyone; but no more trifling, no more uncertainty. You must explain yourself clearly, or I shall take your refusal as a verdict; I shall know, for my part, how to interpret your silence, and shall consider it as a confirmation of the worst.

ORONTE. I owe you many thanks, sir, for this wrath, and I say in every respect as you do.

CÉLIMÈNE. How you weary me with such a whim! Is there any justice in what you ask? And have I not told you what motive prevents me? I will be judged by Éliante, who is just coming.

Enter ÉLIANTE and PHILINTE.

CÉLIMÈNE. Good cousin, I am being persecuted here by people who have concerted to do so. They both demand, with the same warmth, that I should declare whom my heart has chosen, and that, by a decision which I must give before their very faces, I should forbid one of them to tease me any more with his attentions. Say, has ever such a thing been done?

ÉLIANTE. Pray, do not consult me upon such a matter. You may perhaps address yourself to a wrong person, for I am decidedly for people who speak their minds.

ORONTE. Madam, it is useless for you to decline.

ALCESTE. All your evasions here will be badly supported.

ORONTE. You must speak, you must, and no longer waver.

ALCESTE. You need do no more than remain silent.

ORONTE. I desire but one word to end our discussions.

ALCESTE. To me your silence will convey as much as speech.

Enter ARSINOË, ACASTE, and CLITANDRE.

ACASTE [to CÉLIMÈNE]. We have both come, by your leave, madam, to clear up a certain little matter with you.

CLITANDRE [to ORONTE and ALCESTE]. Your presence happens fortunately, gentlemen; for this affair concerns you also.

ARSINOË [to CÉLIMÈNE]. No doubt you are surprised at seeing me here, madam; but these gentlemen are the cause of my intrusion. They both came to see me, and complained of a proceeding which I could not have credited. I have too high an opinion of your kindness of heart ever to believe you capable of such a crime; my eyes even have refused to give credence to their strongest proofs, and in my friendship, forgetting trivial disagreements, I have been induced to accompany them here, to hear you refute this slander.

ACASTE. Yes, madam, let us see, with composure, how you will manage to bear this out. This letter has been written by you, to Clitandre.

CLITANDRE. And this tender epistle you have addressed to Acaste.

ACASTE [to ORONTE and ALCESTE]. This writing is not altogether unknown to you, gentlemen, and I have no doubt that her kindness has before now made you familiar with her hand. But this is well worth the trouble of reading.

You are a strange man to condemn my liveliness of spirits, and to reproach me that I am never so merry as when I am not with you. Nothing could be more unjust; and if you do not come very soon to ask my pardon for this offence, I shall never forgive you as long as I live. Our great hulking booby of a Viscount . . .

He ought to have been here.

Our great hulking booby of a Viscount, with whom you begin your complaints, is a man who would not at all suit me; and ever since I watched him for full three-quarters of an hour spitting in a well to make circles in the water, I never could have a good opinion of him. As for the little Marquis that is I, ladies and gentlemen, be it said without the slightest vanity, . . .

as for the little Marquis, who held my hand yesterday for a long while, I think that there is nothing so diminutive as his whole person, and his sole merit consists in his cloak and sword. As to the man with the green shoulder knot . . .

[To ALCESTE.] It is your turn now, sir.

As to the man with the green shoulder knot, he amuses me sometimes with his bluntness and his splenetic behaviour; but there are hundreds of times when I think him the greatest bore in the world. Respecting the man with the big waistcoat . . .

[To ORONTE.] This is your share.

Respecting the man with the big waistcoat, who has thought fit to set up as a wit, and wishes to be an author in spite of everyone, I cannot even take the trouble to listen to what he says; and his prose bores me just as much as his poetry. Take it for granted that I do not always enjoy myself so much as you think; and that I wish for you, more than I care to say, amongst all the entertainments to which I am dragged; and that the presence of those we love is an excellent relish to our pleasures.

CLITANDRE. Now for me.

Your Clitandre, whom you mention to me, and who has always such a quantity of soft expressions at his command, is the last man for whom I could feel any affection. He must be crazed in persuading himself that I love him; and you are so too in believing that I do not love you. You had better change your fancies for his, and come and see me as often as you can, to help me in bearing the annoyance of being pestered by him.

This shows the model of a lovely character, madam; and I need not tell you what to call it. It is enough. We shall, both of us, show this admirable sketch of your heart 15 everywhere and to everybody.

Exit.

ACASTE. I might also say something, and the subject is tempting; but I deem you beneath my anger; and I will show you that little marquises can find worthier hearts than yours to console themselves with.

Exit.

ORONTE. What! Am I to be pulled to pieces in this fashion, after all that you have written to me? And does your heart, with all its semblance of love, plight its faith to all mankind by turns! Bah, I have been too great a dupe, but I shall be so no longer. You have done me a service in showing yourself in your true colours. I am the richer by a heart which you thus restore to me, and I find my revenge in your loss. [To ALCESTE.] Sir, I shall no longer be an obstacle to your flame, and you may settle matters with this lady as soon as you please.

Exit.

ARSINOÉ [to CÉLIMÈNE]. This is certainly one of the basest actions which I have ever seen; I can no longer be silent, and I feel quite upset. Has any one ever seen the like of it? I do not concern myself much in the affairs of other people, but this gentleman [pointing to ALCESTE], who has staked the whole of his happiness on you, an honourable and deserving man like this, who worshipped you to madness, ought he to have been . . .

ALCESTE. Leave me, I pray you, madam, to manage my own affairs; and do not trouble yourself unnecessarily. In vain do I see you espouse my quarrel. I am unable to repay you for this great zeal; and if ever I intended to avenge myself by choosing some one else, it would not be you whom I should select.

ARSINOÉ. And do you imagine, sir, that I ever harboured such a thought, and that I am so very anxious to secure you? You must be very vain, indeed, to flatter yourself with such an idea. Célimène's leavings are a commodity of which no one needs be so very much enamoured. Pray, undeceive yourself, and do not carry matters with so high a hand. People like me are not for such as you. You will do much better to remain dangling after her skirts, and I long to see so beautiful a match.

Exit.

ALCESTE [to CÉLIMÈNE]. Well! I have held my tongue, notwithstanding all I have seen, and I have let everyone have his say before me. Have I controlled myself long enough? And will you now allow me . . .

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes, you may say what you like; you are justified when you complain, and you may reproach me with anything you please. I confess that I am in the wrong; and overwhelmed by confusion, I do not seek by any idle excuse to palliate my fault. The anger of the others I have despised; but I admit my guilt toward you. No doubt your resentment is just; I know how culpable I must appear to you, that everything speaks of my treachery to you, and that, in short, you have cause to hate me. Do so, I consent to it.

ALCESTE. But can I do so, you traitress? Can I thus get the better of all my tenderness for you? And although I wish to hate you with all my soul, shall I find a heart quite ready to obey me. [To ÉLIANTE and PHILINTE.] You see what an unworthy passion can do, and I call you both as witnesses of my infatuation. Nor, truth to say, is this all, and you will see me carry it out to the bitter end, to show you that it is wrong to call us wise. [To CÉLIMÈNE.] Yes, perfidious creature, I am willing to forget your crimes. I can find, in my own heart, an excuse for all your doings and hide them under the name of a weakness into which the vices of the age betrayed your youth, provided your heart will second the design which I have formed of avoiding all human creatures, and that you are determined to follow me without delay into the solitude in which I have made a vow to pass my days. It is by this only, that, in everyone's opinion, you can repair the harm done by your letters, and that, after the scandal which every noble heart must abhor, it may still be possible for me to love you.

CÉLIMÈNE. What! I renounce the world before I grow old, and bury myself in your wilderness!

ALCESTE. If your affection responds to mine, what need the rest of the world signify to you? Am I not sufficient for you?

CÉLIMÈNE. Solitude is frightful to a widow of twenty. I do not feel my mind sufficiently grand and strong to resolve to adopt such a plan. If the gift of my hand can satisfy your wishes, I might be induced to tie such bonds; and marriage . . .

ALCESTE. No. My heart loathes you now, and this refusal alone effects more than all the rest. As you are not disposed, in those sweet ties, to find all in all in me, as I would find all in all in you, begone; I refuse your offer, and this much-felt outrage frees me for ever from your unworthy toils.

Exit CÉLIMÈNE.

ALCESTE [to ÉLIANTE]. Madam, your beauty is adorned by a hundred virtues; and I never saw anything in you but what was sincere. For a long while I thought very highly of you; but allow me to esteem you thus for ever, and suffer my heart in its various troubles not to offer itself for the honour of your acceptance. I feel too unworthy, and begin to perceive that Heaven did not intend me for the marriage bond; that the homage of only the remainder of a heart unworthy of you would be below your merit, and that in short . . .

ÉLIANTE. You may pursue this thought. I am not at all embarrassed with my hand; and here is your friend, who, without giving me much trouble, might possibly accept it if I asked him.

PHILINTE. Ah! Madam, I ask for nothing better than that honour, and I could sacrifice my life and soul for it.

ALCESTE. May you, to taste true contentment, preserve for ever these feelings towards each other! Deceived on all sides, overwhelmed with injustice, I will fly from an abyss where vice is triumphant, and seek out some small secluded nook on earth, where one may enjoy the freedom of being an honest man.

PHILINTE. Come, madam, let us leave nothing untried to deter him from the design on which his heart is set.

ACT I

SCENE I

A street in Bath.

Coachman crosses the stage; enter FAG, looking after him.

FAG. What! Thomas! sure 'tis he?—What! Thomas! Thomas!

COACHMAN. Hey!—Odds life! Mr. FAG!—give us your hand, my old fellow-servant.

FAG. Excuse my glove, Thomas.—I'm devilish glad to see you, my lad. Why, my prince of charioteers, you look as hearty!—but who the deuce thought of seeing you in Bath!

COACHMAN. Sure, Master, Madam Julia, Harry, Mrs. Kate, and the postilion be all come.

FAG. Indeed!

COACHMAN. Aye, Master thought another fit of the gout was coming to make him a visit; so he'd a mind to gi't the slip, and whip! we were all off at an hour's warning.

FAG. Aye, aye, hasty in everything or it would not be Sir Anthony Absolute!

COACHMAN. But tell us, Mr. Fag, how does young Master? Odd! Sir Anthony will stare to see the captain here!

FAG. I do not serve Captain Absolute now.

COACHMAN. Why, sure!

FAG. At present I am employed by Ensign Beverley.

COACHMAN. I doubt, Mr. Fag, you ha'n't changed for the better.

FAG. I have not changed, Thomas.

COACHMAN. No! Why, didn't you say you had left young Master?

FAG. No.—Well, honest Thomas, I must puzzle you no farther:—briefly then—Captain Absolute and Ensign Beverley are one and the same person.

COACHMAN. The devil they are!

FAG. So it is indeed, Thomas; and the ensign half of my Master being on guard at present—the captain has nothing to do with me.

COACHMAN. So, so!—What, this is some freak, I warrant!—Do tell us, Mr. Fag, the meaning o't—you know I ha' trusted you.

FAG. You'll be secret, Thomas?

COACHMAN. As a coach-horse.

FAG. Why, then, the cause of all this is—Love,—Love, Thomas, who (as you may get read to you) has been a masquerade ever since the days of Jupiter.

COACHMAN. Aye, aye;—I guessed there was a lady in the case.—But pray, why does your Master pass only for ensign?—now if he had shammed general indeed—

FAG. Ah! Thomas, there lies the mystery o' the matter. Hark'ee, Thomas, my Master is in love with a lady of a very singular taste: a lady who likes him better as a half-pay ensign than if she knew he was son and heir to Sir Anthony Absolute, a baronet with three thousand a year.

COACHMAN. That is an odd taste indeed!—But has she got the stuff, Mr. Fag? Is she rich, hey?

FAG. Rich!—Why, I believe she owns half the stocks! Z—ds! Thomas, she could pay the national debt as easy as I could my washerwoman! She has a lapdog that eats out of gold,—she feeds her parrot with small pearls,—and all her thread-papers are made of bank-notes!

COACHMAN. Bravo! faith!—Odd! I warrant she has a set of thousands at least;—but does she draw kindly with the captain?

FAG. As fond as pigeons.

COACHMAN. May one hear her name?

FAG. Miss Lydia Languish.—But there is an old tough aunt in the way—though, by-the-by, she has never seen my Master—for he got acquainted with Miss while on a visit in Gloucestershire.

COACHMAN. Well—I wish they were once harnessed together in matrimony.—But pray, Mr. Fag, what kind of a place is this Bath?—I ha' heard a deal of it—here's a mort o' merry-making, hey?

FAG. Pretty well, Thomas, pretty well—'tis a good lounge. Though at present we are, like other great assemblies, divided into parties—High-roomians and Low-roomians; however, for my part, I have resolved to stand neuter, and so I told Bob Brush at our last committee.

COACHMAN. But what do the folks do here?

FAG. Oh! there are little amusements enough; in the morning we go to the pump-room (though neither my Master nor I drink the waters); after breakfast we saunter on the parades or play a game at billiards; at night we dance. But d—n the place, I'm tired of it; their regular hours stupefy me—not a fiddle nor a card after eleven!—However, Mr. Faulkland's gentlemen and I keep it up a little in private parties. I'll introduce you there, Thomas—you'll like him much.

COACHMAN. Sure I know Mr. Du-Peigne—you know his Master is to marry Madam Julia.

FAG. I had forgot.—But, Thomas, you must polish a little—indeed you must.—Here now—this wig! What the devil do you do with a wig, Thomas?—None of the London whips of any degree of ton wear wigs now.

COACHMAN. More's the pity! more's the pity, I say.—Odds life! when I heard how the lawyers and doctors had took to their own hair, I thought how 'twould go next.—Odd rabbit it! when the fashion had got foot on the Bar, I guessed 'twould wount to the Box!—but 'tis all out of character, believe me, Mr. Fag; and look'ee, I'll never gi' up mine—the lawyers and doctors may do as they will.

FAG. Well, Thomas, we'll not quarrel about that.

COACHMAN. Why, bless you, the gentlemen of they professions ben't all of a mind—for in our village now tho'ff Jack Gauge, the exciseman, has ta'en to his carrots, there's a little Dick the farrier swears he'll never forsake his bob, tho' all the college should appear with their own heads!

FAG. Indeed! well said, Dick!—But hold—mark! mark! Thomas.

COACHMAN. Zooks! 'tis the captain.—Is that the lady with him?

FAG. No! no! that is Madam Lucy, my Master's mistress's maid. They lodge at that house—but I must after him to tell him the news.

COACHMAN. Odd! he's giving her money!—Well, Mr. Fag—

FAG. Good-bye, Thomas. I have an appointment in Gydes' Porch this evening at eight; meet me there, and we'll make a little party.

Exeunt severally.

SCENE II

A dressing-room in Mrs. MALAPROP'S lodgings.

LYDIA sitting on a sofa, with a book in her hand. LUCY, as just returned from a message.

LUCY. Indeed, ma'am, I transferred half the town in search of it! I don't believe there's a circulating library in Bath I ha'n't been at.

LYDIA. And could not you get The Reward of Constancy?

LUCY. No, indeed, ma'am.

LYDIA. Nor The Fatal Connection?

LUCY. No, indeed, ma'am.

LYDIA. Nor The Mistakes of the Heart?

LUCY. Ma'am, as ill luck would have it, Mr. Bull said Miss Sukey Saunter had just fetched it away.

LYDIA. Heigh-ho! Did you inquire for The Delicate Distress?

LUCY. Or, The Memoirs of Lady Woodford? Yes, indeed, ma'am. I asked everywhere for it; and I might have brought it from Mr. Frederick's, but Lady Slattern Lounger, who had just sent it home, had so soiled and dog's-eared it, it wa'n't fit for a Christian to read.

LYDIA. Heigh-ho! Yes, I always know when Lady Slattern has been before me. She has a most observing thumb and I believe cherishes her nails for the convenience of making marginal notes.—Well, child, what have you brought me?

LUCY. Oh! here, ma'am.—[Taking books from under her cloak, and from her pockets] This is The Gordian Knot,—and this Peregrine Pickle. Here are The Tears of Sensibility and Humphrey Clinker. This is The Memoirs of a Lady of Quality, written by herself, and here the second volume of The Sentimental Journey.

LYDIA. Heigh-ho!—What are those books by the glass?

LUCY. The great one is only The Whole Duty of Man, where I press a few blonds, ma'am.

LYDIA. Very well—give me the sal volatile.

LUCY. Is it in a blue cover, ma'am?

LYDIA. My smelling-bottle, you simpleton!

LUCY. Oh, the drops!—here, ma'am.

LYDIA. No note, Lucy?

LUCY. No, indeed, ma'am—but I have seen a certain person—

LYDIA. What, my Beverley!—Well, Lucy?

LUCY. O ma'am, he looks so desponding and melancholic!

LYDIA. Hold! Lucy—here's someone coming—quick! see who it is. Exit LUCY.—Surely I heard my cousin Julia's voice.

Re-enter LUCY.

LUCY. Lud! ma'am, here is Miss Melville.

LYDIA. Is it possible!—

Enter JULIA.

My dearest Julia, how delighted am I!—[Embrace] How unexpected was this happiness!

JULIA. True, Lydia—and our pleasure is the greater.—But what has been the matter?—you were denied to me at first!

LYDIA. Ah, Julia, I have a thousand things to tell you! But first inform me what has conjured you to Bath—is Sir Anthony here?

JULIA. He is—we are arrived within this hour—and I suppose he will be here to wait on Mrs. Malaprop as soon as he is dressed.

LYDIA. Then before we are interrupted, let me impart to you some of my distress! I know your gentle nature will sympathize with me, tho' your prudence may condemn me! My letters have informed you of my whole connection with Beverley, but I have lost him, Julia! My aunt has discovered our intercourse by a note she intercepted and has confined me ever since! Yet, would you believe it? she has fallen absolutely in love with a tall Irish baronet she met one night since we have been here, at Lady Macshuffle's rout.

JULIA. You jest, Lydia!

LYDIA. No, upon my word.—She absolutely carries on a kind of correspondence with him, under a feigned name though, till she chooses to be known to him;—but it is a Delia or a Gelia, I assure you.

JULIA. Then, surely, she is now more indulgent to her niece.

LYDIA. Quite the contrary. Since she has discovered her own frailty, she is become more suspicious of mine.—Then I must inform you of another plague! That odious Acres is to be in Bath to-day; so that I protest I shall be teased out of all spirits!

JULIA. Come, come, Lydia, hope the best—Sir Anthony shall use his interest with Mrs. Malaprop.

LYDIA. But you have not heard the worst. Unfortunately I had quarrelled with my poor Beverley just before my aunt made the discovery, and I have not seen him since to make it up.

JULIA. What was his offence?

LYDIA. Nothing at all! But, I don't know how it was, as often as we had been together, we had never had a quarrel! And somehow I was afraid he would never give me an opportunity.—So, last Thursday, I wrote a letter to myself, to inform myself that Beverley was at that time paying his addresses to another woman. I signed it your Friend unknown, showed it to Beverley, charged him with his falsehood, put myself in a violent passion, and vowed I'd never see him more.

JULIA. And you let him depart so, and have not seen him since?

LYDIA. 'Twas the next day my aunt found the matter out. I intended only to have teased him three days and a half, and now I've lost him forever.

JULIA. If he is as deserving and sincere as you have represented him to me, he will never give you up so. Yet consider, Lydia, you tell me he is but an ensign, and you have thirty thousand pounds!

LYDIA. But you know I lose most of my fortune if I marry without my aunt's consent till of age, and that is what I have determined to do ever since I knew the penalty. Nor could I love the man who would wish to wait a day for the alternative.

JULIA. Nay, this is caprice!

LYDIA. What, does Julia tax me with caprice?—I thought her lover Faulkland had injured her to it.

JULIA. I do not love even his faults.

LYDIA. But apropos—you have sent to him, I suppose?

JULIA. Not yet, upon my word—nor has he the least idea of my being in Bath.—Sir Anthony's resolution was so sudden I could not inform him of it.

LYDIA. Well, Julia, you are your own mistress (though under the protection of Sir Anthony); yet have you, for this long year, been the slave to the caprice, the whim, the jealousy of this ungrateful Faulkland, who will ever delay assuming the right of a husband while you suffer him to be equally imperious as a lover.

JULIA. Nay, you are wrong entirely. We were contracted before my father's death.—That, and some consequent embarrassments, have delayed what I know to be my Faulkland's most ardent wish.—He is too generous to trifle on such a point—and for his character, you wrong him there, too.—No, Lydia, he is too proud, too noble to be jealous; if he is captious, 'tis without dissembling; if fretful, without rudeness.—Unused to the foppery of love, he is negligent of the little duties expected from a lover—but being unhackneyed in the passion, his love is ardent and sincere; and as it engrosses his whole soul, he expects every thought and emotion of his mistress to move in unison with his.—Yet, though his pride calls for this full return—his humility makes him undervalue those qualities in him which should entitle him to it; and not feeling why he should be loved to the degree he wishes, he still suspects that he is not loved enough.—This temper, I must own, has cost me many unhappy hours, but I have learned to think myself his debtor for those imperfections which arise from the ardor of his love.

LYDIA. Well, I cannot blame you for defending him.—But tell me candidly, Julia, had he never saved your life, do you think you should have been attached to him as you are?—Believe me, the rude blast that over-set your boat was a prosperous gale of love to him.

JULIA. Gratitude may have strengthened my attachment to Mr. Faulkland, but I loved him before he had preserved me; yet surely that alone were an obligation sufficient.

LYDIA. Obligation!—why, a water spaniel would have done as much!—Well, I should never think of giving my heart to a man because he could swim!

JULIA. Come, Lydia, you are too inconsiderate.

LYDIA. Nay, I do but jest—What's here?

Enter LUCY in a hurry.

LUCY. O ma'am, here is Sir Anthony Absolute just come home with your aunt.

LYDIA. They'll not come here.—Lucy, do you watch. Exit LUCY.

JULIA. Yet I must go.—Sir Anthony does not know I am here, and if we meet, he'll detain me to show me the town. I'll take another opportunity of paying my respects to Mrs. Malaprop, when she shall treat me as long as she chooses with her select words so ingeniously misapplied, without being mispronounced.

Re-enter LUCY.

LUCY. O lud! ma'am, they are both coming upstairs.

LYDIA. Well, I'll not detain you, coz.—Adieu, my dear Julia; I'm sure you are in haste to send to Faulkland.—There—through my room you'll find another stair-case.

JULIA. Adieu! [Embrace]. Exit JULIA.

LYDIA. Here, my dear Lucy, hide these books. Quick, quick!—Fling Peregrine Pickle under the toilet—throw Roderick Random into the closet—put The Innocent Adultery into The Whole Duty of Man—thrust Lord Aimsworth under the sofa—cram Ovid behind the bolster—there—put The Man of Feeling into your pocket—so, so—now lay Mrs. Chapone in sight, and leave Fordyce's Sermons open on the table.

LUCY. Oh, burn it, ma'am! the hair-dresser has torn away as far as Proper Pride.

LYDIA. Never mind—open at Sobriety.—Fling me Lord Chesterfield's Letters.—Now for 'em! Exit LUCY.

Enter MRS. MALAPROP, and SIR ANTHONY ABSOLUTE.

MRS. MALAPROP. There, Sir Anthony, there sits the deliberate simpleton who wants to disgrace her family and lavish herself on a fellow not worth a shilling.

LYDIA. Madam, I thought you once—

MRS. MALAPROP. You thought, miss!—I don't know any business you have to think at all—thought does not become a young woman; the point we would request of you is that you will promise to forget this fellow—to illiterate him, I say, quite from your memory.

LYDIA. Ah, madam! our memories are independent of our wills. It is not so easy to forget.

MRS. MALAPROP. But I say it is, miss; there is nothing on earth so easy as to forget if a person chooses to set about it.—I'm sure I have as much forgot your poor dear uncle as if he had never existed—and I thought it my duty so to do; and let me tell you, Lydia, these violent memories don't become a young woman.

SIR ANTHONY. Why, sure she won't pretend to remember what she's ordered not!—aye, this comes of her reading!

LYDIA. What crime, madam, have I committed, to be treated thus?

MRS. MALAPROP. Now don't attempt to extirpate yourself from the matter; you know I have proof controvertible of it.—But tell me, will you promise to do as you're bid?—Will you take a husband of your friends' choosing?

LYDIA. Madam, I tell you plainly that had I no preference for anyone else, the choice you have made would be my aversion.

MRS. MALAPROP. What business have you, miss, with preference and aversion? They don't become a young woman; and you ought to know that as both always wear off, 'tis safest in matrimony to begin with a little aversion. I am sure I hated your poor dear uncle before marriage as if he'd been a black-a-moor—and yet, miss, you are sensible what a wife I made!—and when it pleased Heaven to release me from him, 'tis unknown what tears I shed!—But suppose we were going to give you another choice, will you promise us to give up this Beverley?

LYDIA. Could I belie my thoughts so far as to give that promise, my actions would certainly as far belie my words.

MRS. MALAPROP. Take yourself to your room.—You are fit company for nothing but your own ill-humors.

LYDIA. Willingly, ma'am — I cannot change for the worse.

Exit LYDIA.

MRS. MALAPROP. There's a little intricate hussy for you!

SIR ANTHONY. It is not to be wondered at, ma'am,—all this is the natural consequence of teaching girls to read. Had I a thousand daughters, by heavens! I'd as soon have them taught the black art as their alphabet!

MRS. MALAPROP. Nay, nay, Sir Anthony, you are an absolute misanthropy.

SIR ANTHONY. In my way hither, Mrs. Malaprop, I observed your niece's maid coming forth from a circulating library!—She had a book in each hand—they were half-bound volumes with marbled covers!—From that moment I guessed how full of duty I should see her mistress!

MRS. MALAPROP. Those are vile places, indeed!

SIR ANTHONY. Madam, a circulating library in a town is, as an evergreen tree, of diabolical knowledge!—It blossoms through the year!—And depend on it, Mrs. Malaprop, that they who are so fond of handling the leaves, will long for the fruit at last.

MRS. MALAPROP. Well, but Sir Anthony, your wife, Lady Absolute, was fond of books.

SIR ANTHONY. Aye—and injury sufficient they were to her, madam—but were I to choose another helpmate, the extent of her erudition should consist in her knowing her simple letters, without their mischievous combinations;—and the summit of her science be—her ability to count as far as twenty.—The first, Mrs. Malaprop, would enable her to work A. A. upon my linen;—and the latter would be quite sufficient to prevent her giving me a shirt No. 1, and a stock No. 2.

MRS. MALAPROP. Fie, fie, Sir Anthony! you surely speak laconically!

SIR ANTHONY. Why, Mrs. Malaprop, in moderation now, what would you have a woman know?

MRS. MALAPROP. Observe me, Sir Anthony. I would by no means wish a daughter of mine to be a progeny of learning; I don't think so much learning becomes a young woman. For instance, I would never let her meddle with Greek, or Hebrew, or Algebra, or simony, or fluxions, or paradoxes, or such inflammatory branches of learning—neither would it be necessary for her to handle any of your mathematical, astronomical, diabolical instruments.—But, Sir Anthony, I would send her, at nine years old, to a boarding-school in order to learn a little ingenuity and artifice. Then, sir, she should have a supercilious knowledge in accounts;—and as she grew up, I would have her instructed in geometry, that she might know something of the contagious countries;—but above all, Sir Anthony, she should be mistress of orthodoxy, that she might not misspell and mispronounce words so shamefully as girls usually do; and likewise that she might reprehend the true meaning of what she is saying.—This, Sir Anthony, is what I would have a woman know;—and I don't think there is a superstitious article in it.

SIR ANTHONY. Well, well, Mrs. Malaprop, I will dispute the point no further with you, though I must confess that you are a truly moderate and polite arguer, for almost every third word you say is on my side of the question.—But, Mrs. Malaprop, to the more important point in debate—you say you have no objection to my proposal?

MRS. MALAPROP. None, I assure you.—I am under no positive engagement with Mr. Acres, and as Lydia is so obstinate against him, perhaps your son may have better success.

SIR ANTHONY. Well, madam,—I will write for the boy directly.—He knows not a syllable of this yet, though I have for some time had the proposal in my head. He is at present with his regiment.

MRS. MALAPROP. We have never seen your son, Sir Anthony; but I hope no objection on his side.

SIR ANTHONY. Objection!—let him object if he dare!—No, no, Mrs. Malaprop, Jack knows that the least demur puts me in a frenzy directly. My process was always very simple—in their younger days, 'twas “Jack do this”;—if he demurred, I knocked him down—and if he grumbled at that, I always sent him out of the room.

MRS. MALAPROP. Aye, and the properest way, o' my conscience!—nothing is so conciliating to young people as severity.—Well, Sir Anthony, I shall give Mr. Acres his discharge, and prepare Lydia to receive your son's invocations;—and I hope you will represent her to the Captain as an object not altogether illegible.

SIR ANTHONY. Madam, I will handle the subject prudently.—Well, I must leave you; and let me beg you, Mrs. Malaprop, to enforce this matter roundly to the girl.—Take my advice—keep a tight hand; if she rejects this proposal, clap her under lock and key; and if you were just to let the servants forget to bring her dinner for three or four days, you can't conceive how she'd come about.

Exit SIR ANTHONY.

MRS. MALAPROP. Well, at any rate I shall be glad to get her from under my intuition.—She has somehow discovered my partiality for Sir Lucius O'Trigger—sure, Lucy can't have betrayed me!—No, the girl is such a simpleton I should have made her confess it.—[Calls] Lucy!—Lucy!—Had she been one of your artificial ones, I should never have trusted her.

feit my malevolence forever:—and your being a simpleton shall be no excuse for your locality.

Exit MRS. MALAPROP.

LUCY. Ha! ha! ha!—So, my dear simplicity, let me give you a little respite.—[Altering her manner] Let girls in my station be as fond as they please of appearing expert and knowing in their trusts;—commend me to a mask of silliness, and a pair of sharp eyes for my own interest under it!—Let me see to what account I have turned my simplicity lately.—[Looks at a paper] For “abetting Miss Lydia Languish in a design of running away with an ensign!—in money, sundry times, twelve pound twelve; gowns, five; hats, ruffles, caps, etc., etc., numberless!—From the said ensign, within this last month, six guineas and a half.”—About a quarter's pay!—Item, “from Mrs. Malaprop, for betraying the young people to her”—when I found matters were likely to be discovered—“two guineas, and a black paduasoy.”—Item, “from Mr. Acres, for carrying divers letters”—which I never delivered—“two guineas and a pair of buckles.”—Item, “from Sir Lucius O'Trigger, three crowns, two gold pocket-pieces, and a silver snuff-box!”—Well done, simplicity!—Yet I was forced to make my Hibernian believe that he was corresponding, not with the Aunt, but with the Niece; for though not over rich, I found he had too much pride and delicacy to sacrifice the feelings of a gentleman to the necessities of his fortune.

Exit.

35

Enter LUCY.

LUCY. Did you call, ma'am?

MRS. MALAPROP. Yes, girl.—Did you see Sir Lucius while you was out?

LUCY. No, indeed, ma'am, not a glimpse of him.

MRS. MALAPROP. You are sure, Lucy, that you never mentioned—

LUCY. O Gemini! I'd sooner cut my tongue out.

MRS. MALAPROP. Well, don't let your simplicity be imposed on.

LUCY. No, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. So! come to me presently, and I'll give you another letter to Sir Lucius;—but mind, Lucy—if ever you betray what you are entrusted with—(unless it be other people's secrets to me) you for-

ACT II

SCENE I

CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE's lodgings.

CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE and FAG.

FAG. Sir, while I was there, Sir Anthony came in. I told him you had sent me to inquire after his health, and to know if he was at leisure to see you.

ABSOLUTE. And what did he say on hearing I was at Bath?

FAG. Sir, in my life I never saw an elderly gentleman more astonished! He started back two or three paces, rapped out a dozen interjectory oaths, and asked what the devil had brought you here!

ABSOLUTE. Well, sir, and what did you say?

FAG. Oh, I lied, sir—I forget the precise lie; but you may depend on 't, he got no truth from me. Yet, with submission, for fear of blunders in future, I should be glad to fix what has brought us to Bath, in order that we may lie a little consistently. Sir Anthony's servants were curious, sir, very curious indeed.

ABSOLUTE. You have said nothing to them—?

FAG. Oh, not a word, sir,—not a word! Mr. Thomas, indeed, the coachman (whom I take to be the discreetest of whips)—

ABSOLUTE. 'Sdeath!—you rascal! you have not trusted him!

FAG. Oh, no, sir—no—no—not a syllable, upon my veracity!—He was, indeed, a little inquisitive; but I was sly, sir—devilish sly! “My Master” (said I), “honest Thomas” (you know, sir, one says honest to one's inferiors), “is come to Bath to recruit.”—Yes, sir, I said to recruit—and whether for men, money, or constitution, you know, sir, is nothing to him, nor anyone else.

ABSOLUTE. Well, recruit will do—let it be so.

FAG. Oh, sir, recruit will do surprisingly—indeed, to give the thing an air, I told Thomas that your honor had already enlisted five disbanded chairmen, seven minority waiters, and thirteen billiard-markers.

ABSOLUTE. You blockhead, never say more than is necessary.

FAG. I beg pardon, sir—I beg pardon.—But, with submission, a lie is nothing unless one supports it. Sir, whenever I draw on my invention for a good current lie, I always forge indorsements as well as the bill.

ABSOLUTE. Well, take care you don't hurt your credit by offering too much security.—Is Mr. Faulkland returned?

FAG. He is above, sir, changing his dress.

ABSOLUTE. Can you tell whether he has been informed of Sir Anthony's and Miss Melville's arrival?

FAG. I fancy not, sir; he has seen no one since he came in but his gentleman who was with him at Bristol.—I think, sir, I hear Mr. Faulkland coming down—

ABSOLUTE. Go, tell him I am here.

FAG. Yes, sir.—[Going] I beg pardon, sir, but should Sir Anthony call, you will do me the favor to remember that we are recruiting, if you please.

ABSOLUTE. Well, well.

FAG. And, in tenderness to my character, if your honour could bring in the chairmen and waiters, I shall esteem it as an obligation; for though I never scruple a lie to serve my master, yet it hurts one's conscience to be found out. Exit.

ABSOLUTE. Now for my whimsical friend—if he does not know that his mistress is here, I'll tease him a little before I tell him—

Enter FAULKLAND.

—Faulkland, you're welcome to Bath again; you are punctual in your return.

FAULKLAND. Yes; I had nothing to detain me when I had finished the business I went on. Well, what news since I left you? How stand matters between you and Lydia?

ABSOLUTE. Faith, much as they were. I have not seen her since our quarrel; however, I expect to be recalled every hour.

FAULKLAND. Why don't you persuade her to go off with you at once?

ABSOLUTE. What, and lose two-thirds of her fortune? You forget that, my friend.—No, no, I could have brought her to that long ago.

FAULKLAND. Nay, then, you trifle too long—if you are sure of her, propose to the aunt in your own character, and write to Sir Anthony for his consent.

ABSOLUTE. Softly, softly; for though I am convinced my little Lydia would elope with me as Ensign Beverley, yet am I by no means certain that she would take me with the impeding of our friends' consent, a regular humdrum wedding, and a reversion of a good fortune on my side. No, no; I must prepare her gradually for the discovery and make myself necessary to her before I risk it.—Well, but Faulkland, you'll dine with us to-day at the hotel?

FAULKLAND. Indeed, I cannot; I am not in spirits to be of such a party.

ABSOLUTE. By heavens! I shall forswear your company. You are the most teasing, captious, incorrigible lover!—Do love like a man!

FAULKLAND. I own I am unfit for company.

ABSOLUTE. Am not I a lover; aye, and a romantic one too? Yet do I carry everywhere with me such a confounded farrago of doubts, fears, hopes, wishes, and all the flimsy furniture of a country miss's brain!

FAULKLAND. Ah! Jack, your heart and soul are not, like mine, fixed immutably on one only object.—You throw for a large stake, but losing—you could stake, and throw again;—but I have set my sum of happiness on this cast, and not to succeed were to be stripped of all.

ABSOLUTE. But, for Heaven's sake! what grounds for apprehension can your whimsical brain conjure up at present? Has Julia missed writing this last post? or was her last too tender, or too cool; or too grave, or too gay; or—

FAULKLAND. Nay, nay, Jack.

ABSOLUTE. Why, her love—her honor—her prudence, you cannot doubt.

FAULKLAND. O! upon my soul, I never have;—but what grounds for apprehension, did you say? Heavens! are there not a thousand! I fear for her spirits—her health—her life.—My absence may fret her; her anxiety for my return, her fears for me, may oppress her gentle temper. And for her health—does not every hour bring me cause to be alarmed? If it rains, some shower may even then have chilled her delicate frame!—If the wind be keen, some rude blast may have affected her! The heat of noon, the dews of the evening, may endanger the life of her for whom only I value mine. O Jack! when delicate and feeling souls are separated, there is not a feature in the sky, not a movement of the elements, not an aspiration of the breeze, but hints some cause for a lover's apprehension!

ABSOLUTE. Aye, but we may choose whether we will take the hint or no.—Well then, Faulkland, if you were convinced that Julia was well and in spirits, you would be entirely content.

FAULKLAND. I should be happy beyond measure—I'm anxious only for that.

ABSOLUTE. Then to cure your anxiety at once—Miss Melville is in perfect health, and is at this moment in Bath.

FAULKLAND. Nay, Jack—don't trifle with me.

ABSOLUTE. She is arrived here with my father within this hour.

FAULKLAND. Can you be serious?

ABSOLUTE. I thought you knew Sir Anthony better than to be surprised at a sudden whim of this kind.—Seriously, then, it is as I tell you—upon my honor.

FAULKLAND. My dear friend!—[Calls] Hollo, Du-Peigne! my hat!—My dear Jack—now nothing on earth can give me a moment's uneasiness.

Enter FAG.

FAG. Sir, Mr. Acres just arrived is below.

ABSOLUTE. Stay, Faulkland; this Acres lives within a mile of Sir Anthony, and he shall tell you how your mistress has been ever since you left her.—Fag, show the gentleman up.

Exit FAG.

FAULKLAND. What, is he much acquainted in the family?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, very intimate. I insist on your not going; besides, his character will divert you.

FAULKLAND. Well, I should like to ask him a few questions.

ABSOLUTE. He is likewise a rival of mine—that is of my other self's, for he does not think his friend Captain Absolute ever saw the lady in question;—and it is ridiculous enough to hear him complain to me of one Beverley, a concealed skulking rival, who—

FAULKLAND. Hush!—He's here.

Enter ACRES.

ACRES. Hah! my dear friend, noble captain, and honest Jack, how do'st thou? just arrived, faith, as you see.—Sir, your humble servant. Warm work on the roads, Jack!—Odds whips and wheels! I've travelled like a comet, with a tail of dust all the way as long as the Mall.

ABSOLUTE. Ah! Bob, you are indeed an eccentric planet, but we know your attraction hither.—Give me leave to introduce Mr. Faulkland to you; Mr. Faulkland, Mr. Acres.

ACRES. Sir, I am most heartily glad to see you: sir, I solicit your connections.—Hey, Jack—what, this is Mr. Faulkland, who—

ABSOLUTE. Aye, Bob, Miss Melville's Mr. Faulkland.

ACRES. Odd so! she and your father can be but just arrived before me—I suppose you have seen them.—Ah! Mr. Faulkland, you are indeed a happy man, FAULKLAND. I have not seen Miss Melville yet, sir.—I hope she enjoyed full health and spirits in Devonshire?

ACRES. Never knew her better in my life,

sir,—never better. Odds blushes and blooms! she has been as healthy as the German Spa.

FAULKLAND. Indeed!—I did hear that she had been a little indisposed.

ACRES. False, false, sir—only said to vex you; quite the reverse, I assure you.

FAULKLAND. There, Jack, you see she has the advantage of me; I had almost fretted myself ill.

ABSOLUTE. Now are you angry with your mistress for not having been sick?

FAULKLAND. No, no, you misunderstand me;—yet surely a little trifling indisposition is not an unnatural consequence of absence from those we love.—Nor confess—isn't there something unkind in this violent, robust, unfeeling health?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, it was very unkind of her to be well in your absence, to be sure!

ACRES. Good apartments, Jack.

FAULKLAND. Well, sir, but you were saying that Miss Melville has been so exceedingly well—what then, she has been merry and gay I suppose?—Always in spirits—hey?

ACRES. Merry? Odds crickets! she has been the belle and spirit of the company wherever she has been—so lively and entertaining! so full of wit and humor!

FAULKLAND. There, Jack, there.—Oh, by my soul! there is an innate levity in woman that nothing can overcome.—What! happy and I away!

ABSOLUTE. Have done. How foolish this is! just now you were only apprehensive for your mistress' spirits.

FAULKLAND. Why, Jack, have I been the joy and spirit of the company?

ABSOLUTE. No, indeed, you have not.

FAULKLAND. Have I been lively and entertaining?

ABSOLUTE. Oh! upon my word, I acquit you.

FAULKLAND. Have I been full of wit and humor?

ABSOLUTE. No, faith, to do you justice, you have been confounded stupid, indeed.

ACRES. What's the matter with the gentleman?

ABSOLUTE. He is only expressing his great satisfaction at hearing that Julia has been so well and happy—that's all—hey, Faulkland?

FAULKLAND. Oh! I am rejoiced to hear it—yes, yes, she has a happy disposition!

ACRES. That she has, indeed—then she is so accomplished—so sweet a voice—so expert at her harpsichord—such a mistress of flat and sharp, squallante, rumblante, and quiverante!—There was this time month—Odds minnuns and crotchets! how she did chirrup at Mrs. Piano's concert!

FAULKLAND. There again, what say you to this? you see she has been all mirth and song—not a thought of me!

ABSOLUTE. Pho! man, is not music the food of love?

FAULKLAND. Well, well, it may be so.—Pray, Mr. —, what's his d—d name?—Do you remember what songs Miss Melville sung?

ACRES. Not I, indeed.

ABSOLUTE. Stay, now, they were some pretty melancholy, purling-stream airs, I warrant. Perhaps you may recollect;—did she sing, When absent from my Soul's Delight?

ACRES. No, that wa'n't it.

ABSOLUTE. Or Go, gentle Gales? [Sings] "Go, gentle gales!"

ACRES. O no! nothing like it. Odds slips! now I recollect one of them—[Sings] "My heart's my own, my will is free."

FAULKLAND. Fool! fool that I am to fix all my happiness upon such a trifle! 'Sdeath! to make herself the pipe and ballad-monger of a circle! to soothe her light heart with catches and glees!—What can you say to this, sir?

ABSOLUTE. Why, that I should be glad to hear my mistress had been so merry, sir.

FAULKLAND. Nay, nay, I'm not sorry that she has been happy—no, no, I am glad of that—I would not have had her sad or sick;—yet surely a sympathetic heart would have shown itself even in the choice of a song—she might have been temperately healthy and somehow, plaintively gay.—But she has been dancing too, I doubt not!

ACRES. What does the gentleman say about dancing?

ABSOLUTE. He says the lady we speak of dances as well as she sings.

ACRES. Aye, truly, does she!—There was at our last race ball—

FAULKLAND. Hell and the devil!—There!—there—I told you so! I told you so! Oh!

she thrives in my absence!—Dancing! But her whole feelings have been in opposition with mine!—I have been anxious, silent, pensive, sedentary—my days have been hours of care, my nights of watchfulness.—She has been all health! spirit! laugh! song! dance!—Oh! d—n'd, d—n'd levity!

ABSOLUTE. For Heaven's sake, Faulkland, don't expose yourself so!—Suppose she has danced, what then?—does not the ceremony of society often oblige—

FAULKLAND. Well, well, I'll contain myself—perhaps, as you say—for form's sake.—What, Mr. Acres, you were praising Miss Melville's manner of dancing a minuet—

ACRES. Oh, I dare insure her for that—but what I was going to speak of was her country-dancing. Odds swimings! she has such an air with her!

FAULKLAND. Now, disappointment on her!—Defend this, Absolute; why don't you defend this?—Country-dances! jigs and reels—am I to blame now? A minuet I could have forgiven—I should not have minded that—I say, I should not have regarded a minuet—but country-dances!—Z—ds! had she made one in a cotillion—I believe I could have forgiven even that.—But to be monkeyed for a night!—to run the gauntlet thro' a string of amorous, palming puppies!—to show paces like a managed filly!—O Jack, there never can be but one man in the world whom a truly modest and delicate woman ought to pair with in a country-dance; and, even then, the rest of the couples should be her great-uncles and aunts!

ABSOLUTE. Aye, to be sure!—grandfathers and grandmothers!

FAULKLAND. If there be but one vicious mind in the set, 'twill spread like a contagion—the action of their pulse beats to the lascivious movement of the jig—their quivering, warm-breathed sighs impregnate the very air—the atmosphere becomes electrical to love, and each amorous spark darts thro' every link of the chain!—I must leave you—I own I am somewhat flurried—and that confounded booby has perceived it. [Going]

ABSOLUTE. Aye, aye, you are in a hurry to throw yourself at Julia's feet.

FAULKLAND. [Going] I'm not in a humor to be trifled with—I shall see her only to upbraid her.

ABSOLUTE. Nay, but stay, Faulkland, and thank Mr. Acres for his good news.

FAULKLAND. D—n his news! Exit.

ABSOLUTE. Ha! ha! ha! poor Faulkland five minutes since, "nothing on earth could give him a moment's uneasiness!"

ACRES. The gentleman wa'n't angry at my praising his mistress, was he?

ABSOLUTE. A little jealous, I believe, Bob.

ACRES. You don't say so? Ha! ha! jealous of me—that's a good joke.

ABSOLUTE. There's nothing strange in that, Bob; let me tell you, that sprightly grace and insinuating manner of yours will do some mischief among the girls here.

ACRES. Ah! you joke—ha! ha! mischief?—ha! ha! But you know I am not my own property; my dear Lydia has forestalled me.

She could never abate me in the country, because I used to dress so badly—but odds frogs and tambours! I shan't take matters so here, now ancient Madam has no voice in it—I'll make my old clothes know who's master. I shall straightway cashier the hunting-frock—and render, my leather breeches incapable. My hair has been in training some time.

ABSOLUTE. Indeed!

ACRES. Aye—and tho'ff the side curls are a little restive, my hind-part takes to it very kindly.

ABSOLUTE. Oh, you'll polish, I doubt not.

ACRES. Absolutely I propose so—then if I can find out this Ensign Beverley, odds triggers and flints! I'll make him know the difference o't.

ABSOLUTE. Spoke like a man! But pray, Bob, I observe you have got an odd kind of a new method of swearing—

ACRES. Ha! ha! you've taken notice of it—'tis genteel, isn't it?—I didn't invent it myself though; but a commander in our militia—a great scholar, I assure you—says that there is no meaning in the common oaths, and that nothing but their antiquity makes them respectable; because, he says, the ancients would never stick to an oath or two, but would say, "By Jove!" or "By Bacchus!" or "By Mars!" or "By Venus!" or "By Pallas," according to the sentiment—so that to swear with propriety, says my little Major, the 'oath should be an echo to the sense'; and this we call the "oath referential," or "sentimental swearing"—ha! ha! ha! 'tis genteel, isn't it?

ABSOLUTE. Very genteel, and very new, indeed—and I dare say will supplant all other figures of imprecation.

ACRES. Aye, aye, the best terms will grow obsolete.—D—ns have had their day.

Enter FAG.

FAG. Sir, there is a gentleman below desires to see you.—Shall I show him into the parlor?

ABSOLUTE. Aye—you may.

ACRES. Well, I must be gone—

ABSOLUTE. Stay; who is it, FAG?

FAG. Your father, sir.

ABSOLUTE. You puppy, why didn't you show him up directly?

Exit FAG.

ACRES. You have business with Sir Anthony.—I expect a message from Mrs. Malaprop at my lodgings. I have sent also to my dear friend, Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Adieu, Jack! we must meet at night. Odds bottles and glasses! you shall give me a dozen bumpers to little Lydia.

ABSOLUTE. That I will with all my heart.

Exit ACRES.

Now for a parental lecture! I hope he has heard nothing of the business that has brought me here—I wish the gout had held him fast in Devonshire, with all my soul!

Enter SIR ANTHONY.

ABSOLUTE. Sir, I am delighted to see you here and looking so well! your sudden arrival at Bath made me apprehensive for your health.

SIR ANTHONY. Very apprehensive, I dare say, Jack.—What, you are recruiting here, hey?

ABSOLUTE. Yes, sir, I am on duty.

SIR ANTHONY. Well, Jack, I am glad to see you, tho' I did not expect it, for I was going to write to you on a little matter of business.—Jack, I have been considering that I grow old and infirm, and shall probably not trouble you long.

ABSOLUTE. Pardon me, sir, I never saw you look more strong and hearty, and I pray frequently that you may continue so.

SIR ANTHONY. I hope your prayers may be heard, with all my heart. Well, then,

Jack, I have been considering that I am so strong and hearty, I may continue to plague you a long time. Now Jack, I am sensible that the income of your commission and what I have hitherto allowed you is but a small pittance for a lad of your spirit.

ABSOLUTE. Sir, you are very good.

SIR ANTHONY. And it is my wish, while yet I live, to have my boy make some figure in the world.—I have resolved, therefore, to fix you at once in a noble independence.

ABSOLUTE. Sir, your kindness overpowers me—such generosity makes the gratitude of reason more lively than the sensations even of filial affection.

SIR ANTHONY. I am glad you are so sensible of my attention—and you shall be master of a large estate in a few weeks.

ABSOLUTE. Let my future life, sir, speak my gratitude; I cannot express the sense I have of your munificence.—Yet, sir, I presume you would not wish me to quit the army?

SIR ANTHONY. Oh, that shall be as your wife chooses.

ABSOLUTE. My wife, sir!

SIR ANTHONY. Aye, aye, settle that between you—settle that between you.

ABSOLUTE. A wife, sir, did you say?

SIR ANTHONY. Aye, a wife.—Why, did not I mention her before?

ABSOLUTE. Not a word of it, sir.

SIR ANTHONY. Odd so!—I mus'n't forget her tho'.—Yes, Jack, the independence I was talking of is by a marriage—the fortune is saddled with a wife; but I suppose that makes no difference.

ABSOLUTE. Sir! sir!—you amaze me!

SIR ANTHONY. Why, what the d—l's the matter with the fool? Just now you were all gratitude and duty.

ABSOLUTE. I was, sir—you talked to me of independence and a fortune, but not a word of a wife.

SIR ANTHONY. Why—what difference does that make? Odds life, sir! if you have the estate, you must take it with the live stock on it, as it stands.

ABSOLUTE. If my happiness is to be the price, I must beg leave to decline the purchase.—Pray, sir, who is the lady?

SIR ANTHONY. What's that to you, sir?—Come, give me your promise to love and to marry her directly.

ABSOLUTE. Sure, sir, this is not very reasonable, to summon my affections for a lady I know nothing of!

SIR ANTHONY. I am sure, sir, 'tis more unreasonable in you to object to a lady you know nothing of.

ABSOLUTE. Then, sir, I must tell you plainly that my inclinations are fixed on another.

SIR ANTHONY. They are, are they? Well that's lucky—because you will have more merit in your obedience to me.

ABSOLUTE. Sir, my heart is engaged to an angel.

SIR ANTHONY. Then pray, let it send an excuse. It is very sorry—but business prevents its waiting on her.

ABSOLUTE. But my vows are pledged to her.

SIR ANTHONY. Let her foreclose, Jack—let her foreclose; they are not worth redeeming. Besides, you have the angel's vows in exchange, I suppose; so there can be no loss there.

ABSOLUTE. You must excuse me, sir, if I tell you once for all that in this point I cannot obey you.

SIR ANTHONY. Hark'ee, Jack.—I have heard you for some time with patience—I have been cool—quite cool; but take care—you know I am compliance itself—when I am not thwarted;—no one more easily led—when I have my own way;—but don't put me in a frenzy.

ABSOLUTE. Sir, I must repeat—in this I cannot obey you.

SIR ANTHONY. Now d—n me! if ever I call you Jack again while I live!

ABSOLUTE. Nay, sir, but hear me.

SIR ANTHONY. Sir, I won't hear a word—not a word! not one word! So give me your promise by a nod—and I'll tell you what, Jack—I mean, you dog!—if you don't, by—

ABSOLUTE. What, sir, promise to link myself to some mass of ugliness? to—

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! sirrah! the lady shall be as ugly as I choose: she shall have a hump on each shoulder; she shall be as crooked as the Crescent; her one eye shall roll like the Bull's in Cox's Museum, she shall have a skin like a mummy, and the beard of a Jew—she shall be all this, sirrah!—yet I'll make you ogle her all day, and sit up all night to write sonnets on her beauty.

ABSOLUTE. This is reason and moderation, indeed!

SIR ANTHONY. None of your sneering, puppy! no grinning, jackanapes!

ABSOLUTE. Indeed, sir, I never was in a worse humor for mirth in my life.

SIR ANTHONY. 'Tis false, sir! I know you are laughing in your sleeve; I know you will grin when I am gone, sirrah!

ABSOLUTE. Sir, I hope I know my duty better.

SIR ANTHONY. None of your passion, sir! none of your violence, if you please!—It won't do with me, I promise you.

ABSOLUTE. Indeed, sir, I never was cooler in my life.

SIR ANTHONY. 'Tis a confounded lie!—I know you are in a passion in your heart; I know you are, you hypocritical young dog! but it won't do.

ABSOLUTE. Nay, sir, upon my word.

SIR ANTHONY. So you will fly out! Can't you be cool, like me? What the devil good can passion do?—passion is of no service, you impudent, insolent, overbearing reprobate!—There, you sneer again! don't provoke me!—but you rely upon the mildness of my temper—you do, you dog! you play upon the weakness of my disposition!—Yet take care—the patience of a saint may be overcome at last!—But mark! I give you six hours and a half to consider of this: if you then agree, without any condition, to do everything on earth that I choose, why—confound you! I may in time forgive you.—If not, z—ds! don't enter the same hemisphere with me! don't dare to breathe the same air, or use the same light with me; but get an atmosphere and a sun of your own! I'll strip you of your commission; I'll lodge a five-and-threepence in the hands of trustees, and you shall live on the interest.—I'll disown you, I'll disinherit you, I'll unget you! and d—n me, if ever I call you Jack again!

Exit SIR ANTHONY.

ABSOLUTE, solus.

ABSOLUTE. Mild, gentle, considerate father—I kiss your hands!—What a tender method of giving his opinion in these matters Sir Anthony has! I dare not trust him with the truth.—I wonder what old, wealthy hag it is that he wants to bestow on me!—Yet he married himself for love, and was in his youth a bold intriguer and a gay companion!

Enter FAG.

FAG. Assuredly, sir, our father is wrath to a degree; he comes down stairs eight or ten steps at a time—muttering, growling, and thumping the bannisters all the way. I and the cook's dog stand bowing at the door—rap! he gives me a stroke on the head with his cane, bids me carry that to my master, then kicking the poor Turnspit into the area, d—ns us all, for a puppy triumvirate!—Upon my credit, sir, were I in your place and found my father such very bad company, I should certainly drop his acquaintance.

ABSOLUTE. Cease your impertinence, sir, at present.—Did you come in for nothing more?—Stand out of the way!

Pushes him aside, and exit.

FAG, solus.

FAG. Soh! Sir Anthony trims my master; he is afraid to reply to his father—then vents his spleen on poor Fag!—When one is vexed by one person, to revenge one's self on another who happens to come in the way, is the vilest injustice! Ah! it shows the worst temper—the basest—

Enter Errand-Boy.

BOY. Mr. Fag! Mr. Fag! your master calls you.

FAG. Well, you little dirty puppy, you need not bawl so!—The meanest disposition! the—

BOY. Quick, quick, Mr. Fag!

FAG. Quick! quick! you impudent jack-anapes! Am I to be commanded by you too? you little, impertinent, insolent, kitchen-bred—

Exit, kicking and beating him.

SCENE II

The North Parade.

Enter LUCY.

LUCY. So—I shall have another rival to add to my mistress's list—Captain Absolute. However, I shall not enter his name till my purse has received notice in form. Poor Acres is dismissed!—Well, I have done him a last friendly office, in letting him know that Beverley was here before him.—Sir Lucius is generally more punctual when he expects to hear from his “dear Dalia,” as he calls her; I wonder he's not here!—I have a little scruple of conscience from this deceit, tho' I should not be paid so well if my hero knew that Delia was near fifty, and her own mistress.—I could not have thought he would have been so nice, when there's a golden egg in the case, as to care whether he has it from a pullet or an old hen.

Enter SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

SIR LUCIUS. Hah! my little ambadress!—upon my conscience, I have been looking for you; I have been on the South Parade this half hour.

LUCY. [Speaking simply] O gemini! and I have been waiting for your worship here on the North.

SIR LUCIUS. Faith!—maybe that was the reason we did not meet; and it is very comical too, how you could go out and I not see you—for I was only taking a nap at the Parade Coffee-house, and I chose the window on purpose that I might not miss you.

LUCY. My stars! Now I'd wager a sixpence I went by while you were asleep.

SIR LUCIUS. Sure enough it must have been so—and I never dreamt it was so late, till I waked. Well, but my little girl, have you got nothing for me?

LUCY. Yes, but I have; I've got a letter for you in my pocket.

SIR LUCIUS. Oh, faith! I guessed you weren't come empty-handed.—Well—let me see what the dear creature says.

LUCY. There, Sir Lucius.

Gives him a letter.

SIR LUCIUS. [Reads] “Sir—there is often a sudden incentive impulse in love, that has a greater induction than years of domestic combination; such was the commotion I felt at the first superfluous view of Sir Lucius O'Trigger.”—Very pretty, upon my word.—“As my motive is interested, you may be assured my love shall never be miscellaneous.” Very well.

“Female punctuation forbids me to say more; yet let me add that it will give me joy infallible to find Sir Lucius worthy the last criterion of my affections. Yours, while meretricious.—Delia.” Upon my conscience! Lucy, your lady is a great mistress of language.—Faith, she's quite the queen of the dictionary!—for the devil a word dares refuse coming at her call—though one would think it was quite out of hearing.

LUCY. Aye, sir, a lady of her experience—

SIR LUCIUS. Experience! what, at seventeen?

LUCY. Oh, true, sir—but then she reads so—my stars! how she will read off-hand!

SIR LUCIUS. Faith, she must be very deep read to write this way—tho' she is rather an arbitrary writer too; for here are a great many poor words pressed into the service of this note that would get their habeas corpus from any court in christendom.—However, when affection guides the pen, Lucy, he must be a brute who finds fault with the style.

LUCY. Ah! Sir Lucius, if you were to hear how she talks of you!

SIR LUCIUS. Oh, tell her I'll make her the best husband in the world, and Lady O'Trigger into the bargain!—But we must get the old gentleman's consent—and do everything fairly.

LUCY. Nay, Sir Lucius, I thought you wa'n't rich enough to be so nice.

SIR LUCIUS. Upon my word, young woman, you have hit it!—I am so poor that I can't afford to do a dirty action.—If I did not want money, I'd steal your mistress and her fortune with a great deal of pleasure.—However, my pretty girl, [Gives her money] here's a little something to buy you a ribband; and meet me in the evening and I'll give you an answer to this. So, hussy, [Kisses her] take a kiss beforehand to put you in mind.

LUCY. O lud! Sir Lucius—I never seed such a gemman! My lady won't like you if you're so impudent.

SIR LUCIUS. Faith, she will, Lucy!—That same—pho! what's the name of it?—modesty—is a quality in a lover more praised by the women than liked; so, if your mistress asks you whether Sir Lucius ever gave you a kiss, tell her fifty—my dear.

LUCY. What, would you have me tell her a lie?

SIR LUCIUS. [Approaches her] Ah, then, you baggage! I'll make it a truth presently.

LUCY. For shame now; here is someone coming.

SIR LUCIUS. Oh, faith, I'll quiet your conscience!

Sees FAG.—Exit, humming a tune.

Enter FAG.

FAG. So, so, ma'am! I humbly beg pardon.

LUCY. O lud! now, Mr. Fag, you flurry one so.

FAG. Come, come, Lucy, here's no one by—so a little less simplicity, with a grain of two more sincerity, if you please.—You play false with us, madam.—I saw you give the baronet a letter.—My master shall know this—and if he don't call him out, I will.

LUCY. Ha! ha! ha! you gentlemen's gentlemen are so hasty.—That letter was from Mrs. Malaprop, simpleton.—She is taken with Sir Lucius's address.

FAG. What tastes some people have!—Why, I suppose I have walked by her window an hundred times.—But what says our young lady? any message to my master?

LUCY. Sad news, Mr. Fag.—A worse rival than Acres! Sir Anthony Absolute has proposed his son.

FAG. What, Captain Absolute?

LUCY. Even so—I overheard it all.

FAG. Ha! ha! ha! very good, faith! Good-bye, Lucy, I must away with this news.

LUCY. Well—you may laugh—but it is true, I assure you.—[Going] But—Mr. Fag—tell your master not to be cast down by this.

FAG. Oh, he'll be so disconsolate!

LUCY. And charge him not to think of quarrelling with young Absolute.

FAG. Never fear!—never fear!

LUCY. Be sure—bid him keep up his spirits.

FAG. We will—we will.

Exeunt severally.

ACT III

SCENE I

The North Parade.

Enter ABSOLUTE.

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis just as Fag told me, indeed.—Whimsical enough, faith! My father wants to force me to marry the very girl I am plotting to run away with!—He must not know of my connection with her yet a while.—He has too summary a method of proceeding in these matters, and Lydia shall not yet lose her hopes of an elopement.—However, I'll read my recantation instantly.—My conversion is something sudden, indeed, but I can assure him it is very sincere. So, so!—here he comes. He looks plaguy gruff.

Steps aside.

Enter SIR ANTHONY.

SIR ANTHONY. No, I'll die sooner than forgive him—Die, did I say? I'll live these fifty years to plague him.—At our last meeting his impudence had almost put me out of temper—an obstinate, passionate, self-willed boy!—Who can he take after? This is my return for getting him before all his brothers and sisters!—for putting him at twelve years old into a marching regiment and allowing him fifty pounds a year, beside his pay, ever since!—But I have done with him; he's anybody's son, for me.—I never will see him more, never—never—never—never!

ABSOLUTE. [Approaching] Now for a penitential face.

SIR ANTHONY. Fellow, get out of my way!

ABSOLUTE. Sir, you see a penitent before you.

SIR ANTHONY. I see an impudent scoundrel before me.

ABSOLUTE. A sincere penitent.—I am come, sir, to acknowledge my error and to submit entirely to your will.

SIR ANTHONY. What's that?

ABSOLUTE. I have been revolving and reflecting and considering on your past goodness and kindness and condescension to me.

SIR ANTHONY. Well, sir?

ABSOLUTE. I have been likewise weighing and balancing what you were pleased to mention concerning duty and obedience and authority.

SIR ANTHONY. Well, puppy?

ABSOLUTE. Why then, sir, the result of my reflections is—a resolution to sacrifice every inclination of my own to your satisfaction.

SIR ANTHONY. Why, now you talk sense—absolute sense. I never heard anything more sensible in my life.—Confound you; you shall be Jack again!

ABSOLUTE. I am happy in the appellation.

SIR ANTHONY. Why, then, Jack, my dear Jack, I will now inform you—who the lady really is. Nothing but your passion and violence, you silly fellow, prevented my telling you at first. Prepare, Jack, for wonder and rapture—prepare!—What think you of Miss Lydia Languish?

ABSOLUTE. Languish! What, the Languishes of Worcestershire?

SIR ANTHONY. Worcestershire? No. Did you never meet Mrs. Malaprop and her niece, Miss Languish, who came into our country just before you were last ordered to your regiment?

ABSOLUTE. Malaprop! Languish! I don't remember ever to have heard the names before. Yet, stay—I think I do recollect something.—Languish! Languish! She squints, don't she?—a little, red-haired girl?

SIR ANTHONY. Squints?—A red-haired girl!—Z—ds! no.

ABSOLUTE. Then I must have forgot; it can't be the same person.

SIR ANTHONY. Jack! Jack! what think you of blooming, love-breathing seventeen?

ABSOLUTE. As to that, sir, I am quite indifferent.—If I can please you in the matter, 'tis all I desire.

SIR ANTHONY. Nay, but Jack, such eyes—such eyes! so innocently wild! so bashfully irresolute! not a glance but speaks and kindles some thought of love! Then, Jack, her cheeks—her cheeks, Jack! so deeply blushing at the insinuations of her tell-tale eyes! Then, Jack, her lips!—O Jack, lips smiling at their own discretion; and if not smiling, more sweetly pouting, more lovely in sullenness.

ABSOLUTE. That's she, indeed.—Well done, old gentleman.

SIR ANTHONY. Then, Jack, her neck!—O Jack! Jack!

ABSOLUTE. And which is to be mine, sir—the niece or the aunt?

SIR ANTHONY. Why, you unfeeling, insensible puppy, I despise you! When I was of your age, such a description would have made me fly like a rocket! The aunt, indeed! Odds life! when I ran away with your mother, I would not have touched anything old or ugly to gain an empire.

ABSOLUTE. Not to please your father, sir? SIR ANTHONY. To please my father! z—ds! not to please—Oh, my father—odd so!—yes—yes; if my father, indeed, had desired—that's quite another matter. Tho'

he wa'n't the indulgent father that I am, Jack.

ABSOLUTE. I dare say not, sir.

SIR ANTHONY. But, Jack, you are not sorry to find your mistress is so beautiful?

ABSOLUTE. Sir, I repeat it; if I please you in this affair, 'tis all I desire. Not that I think a woman the worse for being handsome; but, sir, if you please to recollect, you before hinted something about a hump or two, one eye, and a few more graces of that kind—now, without being very nice, I own I should rather choose a wife of mine to have the usual number of limbs, and a limited quantity of back: and tho' one eye may be very agreeable, yet as the prejudice has always run in favor of two, I would not wish to affect a singularity in that article.

SIR ANTHONY. What a phlegmatic sot it is! Why, sirrah, you're an anchorite!—a vile, insensible stock. You a soldier?—you're a walking block, fit only to dust the company's regimentals on!—Odds life! I've a great mind to marry the girl myself!

ABSOLUTE. I am entirely at your disposal, sir. If you should think of addressing Miss Languish yourself, I suppose you would have me marry the aunt; or, if you should change your mind, and take the old lady—'tis the same to me—I'll marry the niece.

SIR ANTHONY. Upon my word, Jack, thou'rt either a very great hypocrite, or—but come, I know your indifference on such a subject must be all a lie—I'm sure it must!—Come, now—d—n your demure face!—come, confess, Jack—you have been lying, ha'n't you! You have been lying, hey?—I'll never forgive you if you ha'n't.—So now; own, my dear Jack, you have been playing the hypocrite—hey? I'll never forgive you if you ha'n't been lying and playing the hypocrite.

ABSOLUTE. I'm sorry, sir, that the respect and duty which I bear to you should be so mistaken.

SIR ANTHONY. Hang your respect and duty! But come along with me; I'll write a note to Mrs. Malaprop, and you shall visit the lady directly.

ABSOLUTE. Where does she lodge, sir?

SIR ANTHONY. What a dull question! Only on the Grove here.

ABSOLUTE. Oh! then I can call on her in my way to the coffee-house.

SIR ANTHONY. In your way to the coffee-house! You'll set your heart down in your way to the coffee-house, hey? Ah! you leaden-nerved, wooden-hearted dolt! But come along, you shall see her directly; her eyes shall be the Promethean torch to you—come along! I'll never forgive you if you don't come back stark mad with rapture and impatience—if you don't, egad, I'll marry the girl myself!

Exeunt.

SCENE II

JULIA's dressing-room.

FAULKLAND, solus.

FAULKLAND. They told me Julia would return directly; wonder she is not yet come!—How mean does this captious, unsatisfied temper of mine appear to my cooler judgment! Yet I know not that I indulge it in any other point; but on this one subject, and to this one object, whom I think I love beyond my life, I am ever ungenerously fretful and madly capricious! I am conscious of it—yet I cannot correct myself! What tender, honest joy sparkled in her eyes when we met! How delicate was the warmth of her expressions!—I was ashamed to appear less happy—though I had come resolved to wear a face of coolness and upbraiding. Sir Anthony's presence prevented my proposed expostulations; yet I must be satisfied that she has not been so very happy in my absence. She is coming! Yes, I know the nimbleness of her tread when she thinks her impatient Faulkland counts the moments of her stay.

Enter JULIA.

JULIA. I had not hoped to see you again so soon.

FAULKLAND. Could I, Julia, be contented with my first welcome—restrained as we were by the presence of a third person?

JULIA. O Faulkland, when your kindness can make me thus happy, let me not think that I discovered more coolness in your first salutation than my long-hoarded joy could have presaged.

FAULKLAND. 'Twas but your fancy, Julia I was rejoiced to see you—to see you in such health. Sure I had no cause for coldness!

JULIA. Nay then, I see you have taken something ill. You must not conceal from me what it is.

FAULKLAND. Well, then—shall I own to you—but you will despise me, Julia—nay, I despise myself for it.—Yet I will own that my joy at hearing of your health and arrival here, by your neighbor Acres, was somewhat damped by his dwelling much on the high spirits you had enjoyed in Devonshire—on your mirth—your singing—dancing, and I know not what! For such is my temper, Julia, that I should regard every mirthful moment in your absence as a treason to constancy. The mutual tear that steals down the cheek of parting lovers is a compact that no smile shall live there till they meet again.

JULIA. Must I never cease to tax my Faulkland with this teasing, minute caprice? Can the idle reports of a silly boor weigh in your breast against my tried affection?

FAULKLAND. They have no weight with me, Julia—No, no! I am happy if you have been so—yet only say that you did not sing with mirth—say that you thought of Faulkland in the dance.

JULIA. I never can be happy in your absence.—If I wear a countenance of content, it is to show that my mind holds no doubt of my Faulkland's truth. If I seemed sad, it were to make malice triumph and say that I had fixed my heart on one who left me to lament his roving and my own credulity.—Believe me, Faulkland, I mean not to upbraid you when I say that I have often dressed sorrow in smiles, lest my friends should guess whose unkindness had caused my tears.

FAULKLAND. You were ever all goodness to me. Oh, I am a brute when I but admit a doubt of your true constancy!

JULIA. If ever, without such cause from you as I will not suppose possible, you find my affections veering but a point, may I become a proverbial scoff for levity and base ingratitude.

FAULKLAND. Ah! Julia, that last word is grating to me. I would I had no title to your gratitude! Search your heart, Julia; perhaps what you have mistaken for love, is but the warm effusion of a too thankful

JULIA. For what quality must I love you?

FAULKLAND. For no quality! To regard me for any quality of mind or understanding, were only to esteem me. And for person—I have often wished myself deformed, to be convinced that I owed no obligation there for any part of your affection.

JULIA. Where Nature has bestowed a show of nice attention in the features of a man, he should laugh at it, as misplaced. I have seen men who in this vain article perhaps might rank above you, but my heart has never asked my eyes if it were so or not.

FAULKLAND. Now this is not well from you, Julia—I despise person in a man; yet if you loved me as I wish, though I were an Ethiop, you'd think none so fair.

JULIA. I see you are determined to be unkind! The contract which my poor father bound us in gives you more than a lover's privilege.

FAULKLAND. Again, Julia, you raise ideas that feed and justify my doubts. I would not have been more free—no, I am proud of my restraint. Yet—yet—perhaps your high respect alone for this solemn compact has fettered your inclinations, which else had made worthier choice. How shall I be sure, had you remained unbound in thought and promise, that I should still have been the object of your persevering love?

JULIA. Then, try me now. Let us be free as strangers as to what is past; my heart will not feel more liberty!

FAULKLAND. There now! So hasty, Julia? so anxious to be free? If your love for me were fixed and ardent, you would not lose your hold, even tho' I wished it!

JULIA. Oh, you torture me to the heart! I cannot bear it.

FAULKLAND. I do not mean to distress you. If I loved you less, I should never give you an uneasy moment.—But hear me! All my fretful doubts arise from this—Women are not used to weigh and separate the motives of their affections. The cold dictates of prudence, gratitude, or filial duty may sometimes be mistaken for the pleadings of the heart. I would not boast—yet let me say that I have neither age, person, or character, to found dislike on; my fortune, such as few ladies could be charged with indiscretion in the match. O Julia! when Love receives such countenance from Prudence, nice minds will be suspicious of its birth.

JULIA. I know not whether your insinuations would tend; as they seem pressing to insult me, I will spare you the regret of having done so.—I have given you no cause for this!

Exit in tears.

FAULKLAND. In tears! Stay, Julia—stay but for a moment!—The door is fastened!—Julia!—my soul—but for one moment!—I hear her sobbing!—'Sdeath! what a brute am I to use her thus! Yet stay! Aye—she is coming now;—how little resolution there is in woman!—how a few soft words can turn them!—No, faith,—she is not coming either!—Why, Julia—my love—say but that you forgive me—come but to tell me that.—Now this is being too resentful. Stay! she is coming too—I thought she would—no steadiness in anything! her going away must have been a mere trick then—she sha'n't see that I was hurt by it.—I'll affect indifference—[Hums a tune; then listens] No, z—ds! she's not coming!—nor don't intend it, I suppose.—This is not steadiness, but obstinacy!—Yet I deserve it. What, after so long an absence to quarrel with her tenderness?—'twas barbarous and unmanly!—I should be ashamed to see her now.—I'll wait till her just resentment is abated—and when I distress her so again, may I lose her forever! and be linked instead to some antique virago, whose gnawing passions and long-hoarded spleen shall make me curse my folly half the day and all the night.

Exit.

SCENE III

MRS. MALAPROP'S lodgings.

MRS. MALAPROP and CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

MRS. MALAPROP. Your being Sir Anthony's son, captain, would itself be a sufficient accommodation, but from the ingenuity of your appearance I am convinced you deserve the character here given of you.

ABSOLUTE. Permit me to say, madam, that as I never yet have had the pleasure of seeing Miss Languish, my principal inducement in this affair at present is the honor of being allied to Mrs. Malaprop, of whose intellectual accomplishments, elegant manners, and unaffected learning, no tongue is so silent.

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir, you do me infinite honor! I beg, captain, you'll be seated.—[He obeys] Ah! few gentlemen, now-a-days, know how to value the ineffectual qualities in a woman!—few think how a little knowledge becomes a gentlewoman. Men have no sense now but for the worthless flower—beauty!

ABSOLUTE. It is but too true, indeed, ma'am; yet I fear our ladies should share the blame—they think our admiration of beauty so great, that knowledge in them would be superfluous. Thus, like garden-trees, they seldom show fruits till time has robbed them of the more specious blossom.—Few, like Mrs. Malaprop and the orange-tree, are rich in both at once!

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir, you overpower me with good-breeding.—He is the very pineapple of politeness!—You are not ignorant, captain, that this giddy girl has somehow contrived to fix her affections on a beggarly, strolling, eavesdropping ensign, whom none of us have seen and nobody knows anything of?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, I have heard the silly affair before.—I'm not at all prejudiced against her on that account.

MRS. MALAPROP. You are very good and very considerate, captain. I am sure I have done everything in my power since I exploded the affair; long ago I laid my positive conjunction on her, never to think on the fellow again.—I have since laid Sir Anthony's preposition before her; but, I am sorry to say, she seems resolved to decline every particle that I enjoin her.

ABSOLUTE. It must be very distressing, indeed, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. It gives me the hydrostatics to such a degree!—I thought she had persisted from corresponding with him, but behold! this very day I have interceded another letter from the fellow! I believe I have it in my pocket.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] The devil! my last note.

MRS. MALAPROP. Aye, here it is.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Aye, my note indeed!—Oh, the little traitress Lucy!

MRS. MALAPROP. There; perhaps you may know the writing. [Gives him the letter].

ABSOLUTE. I think I have seen the hand before—yes, I certainly must have seen this hand before—

MRS. MALAPROP. Nay, but read it, captain.

ABSOLUTE. [Reads] "My soul's idol, my adored Lydia!"—Very tender, indeed!

MRS. MALAPROP. Tender! aye, and profane too, o' my conscience.

ABSOLUTE. "I am excessively alarmed at the intelligence you send me, the more so as my new rival!"—

MRS. MALAPROP. That's you, sir.

ABSOLUTE. "Has universally the character of being an accomplished gentleman, and a man of honor."—Well, that's handsome enough.

MRS. MALAPROP. Oh, the fellow has some design in writing so.

ABSOLUTE. That he had, I'll answer for him, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. But go on, sir—you'll see presently.

ABSOLUTE. "As for the old weather-beaten she-dragon who guards you"—Who can he mean by that?

MRS. MALAPROP. Me, sir!—me!—he means me there—what do you think now?—but go on a little further.

ABSOLUTE. Impudent scoundrel!—"it shall go hard but I will elude her vigilance, as I am told that the same ridiculous vanity which makes her dress up her coarse features and deck her dull chat with hard words which she don't understand!"—

MRS. MALAPROP. There, sir! an attack upon my language! what do you think of that?—an aspersion upon my parts of speech! Was ever such a brute! save if I reprehend anything in this world, it is the use of my oracular tongue and a nice derangement of epitaphs!

ABSOLUTE. He deserves to be hanged and quartered! let me see—"same ridiculous vanity!"—

MRS. MALAPROP. You need not read it again, sir.

ABSOLUTE. I beg pardon, ma'am—"does also lay her open to the grossest deceptions from flattery and pretended admiration"—an impudent coxcomb!—"so that I have a scheme to see you shortly with the old harri-dan's consent, and even to make her a go-between in our interviews."—Was ever such assurance!

MRS. MALAPROP. Did you ever hear anything like it?—he'll elude my vigilance, will he?—Yes, yes! ha! ha! he's very likely to enter these floors;—we'll try who can plot best!

ABSOLUTE. Ha! ha! ha! a conceited puppy; ha! ha! ha!—Well, but Mrs. Malaprop, as the girl seems so infatuated by this fellow, suppose you were to wink at her corresponding with him for a little time—let her even plot an elopement with him; then do you connive at her escape—while I, just in the nick, will have the fellow laid by the heels, and fairly contrive to carry her off in his stead.

MRS. MALAPROP. I am delighted with the scheme; never was anything better perpetrated!

ABSOLUTE. But, pray, could not I see the lady for a few minutes now?—I should like to try her temper a little.

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, I don't know—I doubt she is not prepared for a first visit of this kind. There is a decorum in these matters.

ABSOLUTE. O Lord! she won't mind me—only tell her Beverley—

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir!

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Gently, good tongue.

MRS. MALAPROP. What did you say of Beverley?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, I was going to propose that you should tell her, by way of jest, that it was Beverley who was below! she'd come down fast enough then—ha! ha! ha!

MRS. MALAPROP. 'Twould be a trick she well deserves; besides, you know the fellow tells her he'll get my consent to see her—ha! ha! Let him if he can, I say again: [Calling] Lydia, come down here!—He'll make me a "go-between in their interviews!"—ha! ha! ha!—Come down, I say, Lydia!—I don't wonder at your laughing, ha! ha! ha!—his impudence is truly ridiculous.

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis very ridiculous, upon my soul, ma'am, ha! ha! ha!

MRS. MALAPROP. The little hussy won't hear. Well, I'll go and tell her at once who it is—she shall know that Captain Absolute is come to wait on her. And I'll make her behave as becomes a young woman.

ABSOLUTE. As you please, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. For the present, captain, your servant. Ah! you've not done laughing yet, I see—"elude my vigilance"; yes, yes; ha! ha! ha! Exit.

ABSOLUTE. Ha! ha! ha! one would think now that I might throw off all disguise at once and seize my prize with security; but such is Lydia's caprice that to undeceive were probably to lose her. I'll see whether she knows me.

Walks aside, and seems engaged in looking at the pictures. 5

Enter LYDIA.

LYDIA. What a scene am I now to go thro'! surely nothing can be more dreadful 10 than to be obliged to listen to the loathsome addresses of a stranger to one's heart. I have heard of girls, persecuted as I am, who have appealed in behalf of their favored lover to the generosity of his rival; suppose I were 15 to try it.—There stands the hated rival—an officer too!—but oh, how unlike my Beverley! I wonder he don't begin—truly he seems a very negligent wooer!—Quite at his ease, upon my word!—I'll speak first.—Mr. 20 Absolute.

ABSOLUTE. [Turns round] Madam.

LYDIA. O heav'ns!—Beverley!

ABSOLUTE. Hush!—hush, my life! softly! be not surprised!

LYDIA. I am so astonished! and so terrified! and so overjoyed!—for heav'n's sake! how came you here?

ABSOLUTE. Briefly, I have deceived your aunt—I was informed that my new rival 30 was to visit here this evening, and contriving to have him kept away have passed myself on her for Captain Absolute.

LYDIA. Oh, charming! And she really takes you for young Absolute?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, she's convinced of it.

LYDIA. Ha! ha! ha! I can't forbear laughing to think how her sagacity is overreached!

ABSOLUTE. But we trifle with our precious moments—such another opportunity may 40 not occur; then let me conjure my kind, my condescending angel, to fix the time when I may rescue her from undeserved persecution and with a licensed warmth plead for my reward.

LYDIA. Will you then, Beverley, consent to forfeit that portion of my paltry wealth—that burden on the wings of love?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, come to me, rich only thus—in loveliness! Bring no portion to me 50 but thy love—'twill be generous in you, Lydia,—for well you know it is the only dower your poor Beverley can repay.

LYDIA. [Aside] How persuasive are his words!—how charming will poverty be with him!

ABSOLUTE. Ah! my soul, what a life will we then live! Love shall be our idol and support! we will worship him with a monastic strictness, abjuring all worldly toys, to center every thought and action there.—Proud of calamity, we will enjoy the wreck of wealth, while the surrounding gloom of adversity shall make the flame of our pure love show doubly bright. By heav'ns! I would fling all goods of fortune from me with a prodigal hand, to enjoy the scene where I might clasp my Lydia to my bosom and say, 5 The world affords no smile to me—but here—[Embracing her].—[Aside] If she holds out now, the devil is in it!

LYDIA. [Aside] Now could I fly with him to the Antipodes! but my persecution is not yet come to a crisis.

Re-enter MRS. MALAPROP, listening.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] I am impatient 25 to know how the little hussy deports herself.

ABSOLUTE. So pensive, Lydia!—is then your warmth abated?

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] Warmth abated!—so!—she has been in a passion, I 30 suppose.

LYDIA. No—nor ever can while I have life.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] An ill-tempered little devil! She'll be in a passion all her 35 life—will she?

LYDIA. Think not the idle threats of my ridiculous aunt can ever have any weight with me.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] Very dutiful, upon my word!

LYDIA. Let her choice be Captain Absolute, but Beverley is mine.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] I am astonished at her assurance!—to his face—this 45 to his face!

ABSOLUTE. [Kneeling] Thus then let me enforce my suit.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Aside] Aye, poor young man!—down on his knees, entreating for pity! I can contain no longer.—Why, hussy! hussy!—I have overheard you.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Oh, confound her vigilance!

MRS. MALAPROP. Captain Absolute,—I know not how to apologize for her shocking rudeness.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] So! all's safe, I find.—I have hopes, madam, that time will bring the young lady—

MRS. MALAPROP. Oh, there's nothing to be hoped for from her! she's as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of Nile.

LYDIA. Nay, madam, what do you charge me with now?

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, thou unblushing rebel—didn't you tell this gentleman to his face that you loved another better?—didn't you say you never would be his?

LYDIA. No, madam—I did not.

MRS. MALAPROP. Good heav'ns! what assurance!—Lydia, Lydia, you ought to know that lying don't become a young woman!—Didn't you boast that Beverley, that stroller Beverley, possessed your heart?—Tell me that, I say.

LYDIA. 'Tis true, ma'am, and none but Beverley—

MRS. MALAPROP. Hold, hold, Assurance!—you shall not be so rude.

ABSOLUTE. Nay, pray, Mrs. Malaprop, don't stop the young lady's speech; she's very welcome to talk thus—it does not hurt me in the least, I assure you.

MRS. MALAPROP. You are too good, cap-³⁰tain—too amiably patient—but come with me, miss.—Let us see you again soon, captain—remember what we have fixed.

ABSOLUTE. I shall, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. Come, take a graceful³⁵ leave of the gentleman.

LYDIA. May every blessing wait on my Beverley, my loved Bev—

MRS. MALAPROP. Hussy! I'll choke the word in your throat!—come along—come⁴⁰ along.

Exeunt severally, CAPTIAN ABSOLUTE kissing his hand to LYDIA, MRS. MALAPROP stopping her from speaking.

SCENE IV

ACRES' lodgings.

Enter ACRES and DAVID, ACRES as just dressed.

ACRES. Indeed, David—do you think I become it so?

DAVID. You are quite another creature, believe me, master, by the mass! an' we've any luck, we shall see the Devon monkey-rony in all the print-shops in Bath!

ACRES. Dress does make a difference, David.

⁵ DAVID. 'Tis all in all, I think.—Difference! why, an' you were to go now to Clod Hall, I am certain the old lady wouldn't know you. Master Butler wouldn't believe his own eyes, and Mrs. Pickle would cry, ¹⁰ "Lard presarve me!" our dairy-maid would come giggling to the door, and I warrant Dolly Tester, your honor's favorite, would blush like my waistcoat.—Oons! I'll hold a gallon, there an't a dog in the house but ¹⁵ would bark, and I question whether Phillis would wag a hair of her tail!

ACRES. Aye, David, there's nothing like polishing.

DAVID. So I says of your honor's boots; but the boy never heeds me!

ACRES. But, David, has Mr. De-la-Grace been here? I must rub up my balancing and chasing and boring.

DAVID. I'll call again, sir.

²⁵ ACRES. Do—and see if there are any letters for me at the post-office.

DAVID. I will.—By the mass, I can't help looking at your head!—if I hadn't been by at the cooking, I wish I may die if I should have known the dish again myself. Exit.

ACRES. [Comes forward, practising a dancing-step] Sink, slide—coupee.—Confound the first inventors of cotillions! say I—they are as bad as algebra to us country gentlemen.—I can walk a minuett easy enough when I'm forced!—and I have been accounted a good stick in a country-dance.—Odds jigs and tabors! I never valued your cross-over two couple—figure in—right and left—and I'd foot it with e'er a captain in the county!—but these outlandish heathen allemandes and cotillions are quite beyond me!—I shall never prosper at 'em, that's sure; mine are true-born English legs—they ⁴⁵ don't understand their curst French lingo!—their pas this, and pas that, and pas t'other!—d—n me! my feet don't like to be called paws! no, 'tis certain I have most antigallican toes!

Enter SERVANT.

SERVANT. Here is Sir Lucius O'Trigger to wait on you, sir.

ACRES. Show him in.

Enter SIR LUCIUS.

SIR LUCIUS. Mr. Acres, I am delighted to embrace you.

ACRES. My dear Sir Lucius, I kiss your hands.

SIR LUCIUS. Pray, my friend, what has brought you so suddenly to Bath?

ACRES. Faith! I have followed Cupid's jack-a-lantern, and find myself in a quagmire at last.—In short, I have been very illused, Sir Lucius.—I don't choose to mention names, but look on me as on a very illused gentleman.

SIR LUCIUS. Pray, what is the case?—I ask no names.

ACRES. Mark me, Sir Lucius, I falls as deep as need be in love with a young lady—her friends take my part—I follow her to Bath—send word of my arrival, and receive answer that the lady is to be otherwise disposed of.—This, Sir Lucius, I call being ill-used.

SIR LUCIUS. Very ill, upon my conscience.—Pray, can you divine the cause of it?

ACRES. Why, there's the matter; she has another lover, one Beverley, who, I am told, is now in Bath.—Odds slanders and lies! he must be at the bottom of it.

SIR LUCIUS. A rival in the case, is there?—and you think he has supplanted you unfairly?

ACRES. Unfairly?—to be sure he has. He never could have done it fairly.

SIR LUCIUS. Then, sure you know what is to be done!

ACRES. Not I, upon my soul!

SIR LUCIUS. We wear no swords here, but you understand me.

ACRES. What! fight him?

SIR LUCIUS. Aye, to be sure; what can I mean else?

ACRES. But he has given me no provocation.

SIR LUCIUS. Now, I think he has given you the greatest provocation in the world.—Can a man commit a more heinous offence against another than to fall in love with the same woman? Oh, by my soul! it is the most unpardonable breach of friendship.

ACRES. Breach of friendship! aye, aye; but I have no acquaintance with this man. I never saw him in my life.

SIR LUCIUS. That's no argument at all—he has the less right then to take such a liberty.

ACRES. 'Gad, that's true—I grow full of anger, Sir Lucius!—I fire apace! Odds hilts and blades! I find a man may have a deal of valor in him and not know it! But couldn't I contrive to have a little right of my side?

SIR LUCIUS. What the d—I signifies right, when your honour is concerned? Do you think Achilles, or my little Alexander the Great, ever inquired where the right lay? No, by my soul, they drew their broadswords and left the lazy sons of peace to settle the justice of it.

ACRES. Your words are a grenadier's march to my heart! I believe courage must be catching!—I certainly do feel a kind of valor rising, as it were—a kind of courage, as I may say.—Odds flints, pans, and triggers! I'll challenge him directly.

SIR LUCIUS. Ah, my little friend, if we had Blunderbuss Hall here, I could show you a range of ancestry in the O'Trigger line that would furnish the New Room—every one of whom had killed his man!—For though the mansion-house and dirty acres have slipt through my fingers, I thank God our honor and the family pictures are as fresh as ever.

ACRES. O Sir Lucius! I have had ancestors too!—every man of 'em colonel or captain in the militia!—Odds balls and barrels! say no more—I'm braced for it—my nerves are become catgut! my sinews wire! and my heart pinchbeck! The thunder of your words has soured the milk of human kindness in my breast:—Z—ds! as the man in the play says, "I could do such deeds!"

SIR LUCIUS. Come, come, there must be no passion at all in the case—these things should always be done civilly.

ACRES. I must be in a passion, Sir Lucius—I must be in a rage.—Dear Sir Lucius, let me be in a rage, if you love me. Come, here's pen and paper. [Sits down to write] I would the ink were red!—Indite, I say, indite!—How shall I begin? Odds bullets and blades! I'll write a good bold hand, how—ever.

SIR LUCIUS. Pray compose yourself.

ACRES. Come—now shall I begin with an oath? Do, Sir Lucius, let me begin with a "damme."

SIR LUCIUS. Pho! pho! do the thing decently, and like a Christian. Begin now—"Sir"—

ACRES. That's too civil by half.

SIR LUCIUS. "To prevent the confusion ⁵ that might arise."

ACRES. Well—

SIR LUCIUS. "From our both addressing the same lady,"

ACRES. Aye, there's the reason—"same ¹⁰ lady"—Well?

SIR LUCIUS. "I shall expect the honor of your company."

ACRES. Z—ds! I'm not asking him to dinner.

SIR LUCIUS. Pray, be easy.

ACRES. Well then, "honor of your company."

SIR LUCIUS. "To settle our pretensions."

ACRES. Well.

SIR LUCIUS. Let me see—aye, King's-Mead-Fields will do—"in King's-Mead-Fields."

ACRES. So; that's done. Well, I'll fold it up presently; my own crest—a hand and dagger—shall be the seal.

SIR LUCIUS. You see now this little explanation will put a stop at once to all confusion or misunderstanding that might arise between you.

ACRES. Aye, we fight to prevent any misunderstanding.

SIR LUCIUS. Now, I'll leave you to fix your own time.—Take my advice, and you'll decide it this evening if you can; then let the worst come of it, 'twill be off your mind to-morrow.

ACRES. Very true.

SIR LUCIUS. So I shall see nothing more of you, unless it be by letter, till the evening. ⁴⁰—I would do myself the honor to carry your message; but, to tell you a secret, I believe I shall have just such another affair on my own hands. There is a gay captain here who put a jest on me lately at the expense of my country, and I only want to fall in with the gentleman to call him out.

ACRES. By my valor, I should like to see you fight first! Odds life! I should like to see you kill him, if it was only to get a little lesson.

SIR LUCIUS. I shall be very proud of instructing you.—Well for the present—but remember now, when you meet your antagonist, do everything in a mild and agreeable manner.—Let your courage be as keen, but at the same time as polished as your sword.

Exeunt severally.

ACT IV

SCENE I

ACRES' lodgings.

ACRES and DAVID.

DAVID. Then, by the mass, sir! I would do no such thing—ne'er a Sir Lucius O'Trigger in the kingdom should make me fight ¹⁵ when I wa'n't so minded. Oons! what will the old lady say when she hears o't?

ACRES. Ah! David, if you had heard Sir Lucius!—Odds sparks and flames! he would have roused your valor.

²⁰ DAVID. Not he, indeed. I hates such bloodthirsty cormorants. Look'ee, master; if you'd wanted a bout at boxing, quarter-staff, or short-staff, I should never be the man to bid you cry off; but for your curst sharps and snaps, I never knew any good come of 'em.

ACRES. But my honor, David—my honor! I must be very careful of my honor.

³⁰ DAVID. Aye, by the mass! and I would be very careful of it; and I think in return my honor couldn't do less than to be very careful of me.

ACRES. Odds blades, David, no gentleman will ever risk the loss of his honor!

³⁵ DAVID. I say then, it would be but civil in honor never to risk the loss of the gentleman.—Look'ee, master, this Honor seems to me to be a marvellous false friend—aye, truly, a very courtier-like servant. Put the case, I was a gentleman (which, thank God, no one can say of me); well, my honor makes me quarrel with another gentleman of my acquaintance.—So we fight. (Pleasant enough that!) Boh! —I kill him!—(the more's my luck!). Now, pray who gets the profit of it?—why, my honor. But put the case that he kills me!—by the mass! I go to the worms and my honor whips over to my enemy.

ACRES. No, David—in that case, odds crowns and laurels! your honor follows you to the grave.

DAVID. Now, that's just the place where I could make a shift to do without it.

ACRES. Z—ds! David, you're a coward!—It doesn't become my valor to listen to you.—What, shall I disgrace my ancestors?—Think of that, David—think what it would be to disgrace my ancestors!

DAVID. Under favor, the surest way of not disgracing them is to keep as long as you can out of their company. Look'ee now, master; to go to them in such haste—with an ounce of lead in your brains—I should think might as well be let alone. Our ancestors are very good kind of folks, but they are the last people I should choose to have a visiting acquaintance with.

ACRES. But, David, now, you don't think there is such very, very, very great danger, hey?—Odds life, people often fight without any mischief done!

DAVID. By the mass, I think 'tis ten to one against you!—Oons! here to meet some lion-headed fellow, I warrant, with his d—n'd double-barrelled swords, and cut-and-thrust pistols! Lord bless us! it makes me tremble to think o't—Those be such desperate, bloody-minded weapons! Well, I never could abide 'em!—from a child I never could fancy 'em!—I suppose there an't so merciess a beast in the world as your loaded pistol!

ACRES. Z—ds! I won't be afraid! Odds fire and fury! you shan't make me afraid.—Here is the challenge, and I have sent for my dear friend Jack Absolute to carry it for me.

DAVID. Aye, i' the name of mischief, let him be the messenger.—For my part, I wouldn't lend a hand to it for the best horse in your stable. By the mass! it don't look like another letter! It is, as I may say, a designing and malicious-looking letter! and I warrant smells of gunpowder like a soldier's pouch!—Oons! I wouldn't swear it mayn't go off!

ACRES. Out, you poltroon! you ha'n't the valor of a grasshopper.

DAVID. Well, I say no more—'twill be sad news, to be sure, at Clod Hall!—but I ha' done. How Phillis will howl when she hears of it!—Aye, poor bitch, she little thinks what shooting her master's going after! And I warrant old Crop, who has carried your honor, field and road, these ten years, will curse the hour he was born.

Whimpering.

ACRES. It won't do, David—I am determined to fight—so get along, you coward, while I'm in the mind.

Enter Servant.

SERVANT. Captain Absolute, sir.

ACRES. Oh! show him up. Exit Servant.

DAVID. Well, Heaven send we be all alive this time to-morrow.

ACRES. What's that!—Don't provoke me, David!

DAVID. Good-bye, master.

Whimpering.

ACRES. Get along, you cowardly, dastardly, croaking raven!

Exit DAVID.

Enter CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

ABSOLUTE. What's the matter, Bob?

ACRES. A vile, sheep-hearted blockhead! If I hadn't the valor of St. George and the dragon to boot—

ABSOLUTE. But what did you want with me, Bob?

ACRES. Oh!—there—

Gives him the challenge.

ABSOLUTE. "To Ensign Beverley."—[Aside] So—what's going on now?—[Aloud] Well, what's this?

ACRES. A challenge!

ABSOLUTE. Indeed! Why, you won't fight him, will you, Bob?

ACRES. Egad, but I will, Jack. Sir Lucius has wrought me to it. He has left me full of rage—and I'll fight this evening, that so much good passion mayn't be wasted.

ABSOLUTE. But what have I to do with this?

ACRES. Why, as I think you know something of this fellow, I want you to find him out for me and give him this mortal defiance.

ABSOLUTE. Well, give it to me, and trust me he gets it.

ACRES. Thank you, my dear friend, my dear Jack; but it is giving you a great deal of trouble.

ABSOLUTE. Not in the least—I beg you won't mention it. No trouble in the world, I assure you.

ACRES. You are very kind.—What it is to have a friend! You couldn't be my second, could you, Jack?

ABSOLUTE. Why no, Bob—not in this affair—it would not be quite so proper.

ACRES. Well, then, I must fix on my friend Sir Lucius. I shall have your good wishes, however, Jack?

ABSOLUTE. Whenever he meets you, believe me.

Enter Servant.

SERVANT. Sir Anthony Absolute is below, inquiring for the captain.

ABSOLUTE. I'll come instantly.—[Going] Well, my little hero, success attend you.

ACRES. Stay—stay, Jack.—If Beverley should ask you what kind of a man your friend Acres is, do tell him I am a devil of a fellow—will you, Jack?

ABSOLUTE. To be sure I shall. I'll say you are a determined dog—hey, Bob?

ACRES. Aye, do, do—and if that frightens him, egad, perhaps he mayn't come. So tell him I generally kill a man a week; will you, Jack?

ABSOLUTE. I will, I will; I'll say you are called in the country "Fighting Bob."

ACRES. Right—right—'tis all to prevent mischief; for I don't want to take his life if I clear my honor.

ABSOLUTE. No!—that's very kind of you.

ACRES. Why, you don't wish me to kill him—do you, Jack?

ABSOLUTE. No, upon my soul, I do not. [Going] But "a devil of a fellow," hey?

ACRES. True, true;—but stay—stay Jack! You may add, that you never saw me in such a rage before—a most devouring rage!

ABSOLUTE. I will, I will.

ACRES. Remember, Jack—a determined dog!

ABSOLUTE. Aye, aye—"Fighting Bob!"
Exeunt severally.

SCENE II

MRS. MALAPROP'S lodgings.

MRS. MALAPROP and LYDIA.

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, thou perverse one!—tell me what you can object to him! Isn't he a handsome man?—tell me that. A genteel man? a pretty figure of a man?

LYDIA. [Aside] She little thinks whom she is praising!—So is Beverley, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. No caparisons, miss, if you please. Caparisons don't become a young woman. No! Captain Absolute is indeed a fine gentleman!

LYDIA. [Aside] Aye, the Captain Absolute you have seen.

MRS. MALAPROP. Then he's so well bred—so full of alacrity and adulation!—and has so much to say for himself—in such good language, too! His physiognomy so grammatical! Then, his presence is so noble! I protest, when I saw him, I thought of what Hamlet says in the play:—"Hesperian curls—the front of Job himself!—An eye, like March, to threaten at command!—A station, like Harry Mercury, new—" Something about kissing—on a hill—however, the similitude struck me directly.

LYDIA. [Aside] How enraged she'll be presently when she discovers her mistake!

Enter Servant.

SERVANT. Sir Anthony and Captain Absolute are below, ma'am.

MRS. MALAPROP. Show them up here.—
Exit Servant.

Now, Lydia, I insist on your behaving as becomes a young woman. Show your good breeding, at least, though you have forgot your duty.

LYDIA. Madam, I have told you my resolution; I shall not only give him no encouragement, but I won't even speak to or look at him.

Flings herself into a chair, with her face from the door.

Enter SIR ANTHONY and ABSOLUTE.

SIR ANTHONY. Here we are, Mrs. Malaprop—come to mitigate the frowns of unrelenting beauty,—and difficulty enough I had to bring this fellow.—I don't know what's the matter, but if I hadn't held him by force, he'd have given me the slip.

MRS. MALAPROP. You have infinite trouble, Sir Anthony, in the affair. I am ashamed for the cause! [Aside to her] Lydia, Lydia! rise, I beseech you!—pay your respects!

SIR ANTHONY. I hope, madam, that Miss Languish has reflected on the worth of this gentleman and the regard due to her aunt's choice and my alliance.—[Aside to him] Now, Jack, speak to her!

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] What the d—! shall I do! [Apart] You see, sir, she won't even look at me whilst you are here. I knew she wouldn't! I told you so. Let me entreat you, sir, to leave us together!

ABSOLUTE seems to expostulate with his father.

LYDIA. [Aside] I wonder I ha'n't heard my aunt exclaim yet! sure, she can't have looked at him!—Perhaps their regimentals are alike and she is something blind.

SIR ANTHONY. I say, sir, I won't stir a foot yet!

MRS. MALAPROP. I am sorry to say, Sir Anthony, that my affluence over my niece is very small.—[Aside to her] Turn round, Lydia; I blush for you!

SIR ANTHONY. May I not flatter myself that Miss Languish will assign what cause of dislike she can have to my son?—[Aside to him] Why don't you begin, Jack?—Speak, you puppy—speak!

MRS. MALAPROP. It is impossible, Sir Anthony, she can have any. She will not say she has.—[Aside to her] Answer, hussy! why don't you answer?

SIR ANTHONY. Then, madam, I trust that a childish and hasty predilection will be no bar to Jack's happiness.—[Aside to him] Z—ds! sirrah! why don't you speak?

LYDIA. [Aside] I think my lover seems as little inclined to conversation as myself.—How strangely blind my aunt is!

ABSOLUTE. Hem! hem! madam—hem!—[ABSOLUTE attempts to speak, then returns to SIR ANTHONY] Faith! sir, I am so confounded!—and—so—so—confused!—I told you I should be so, sir—I knew it.—The—the—tremor of my passion entirely takes away my presence of mind.

SIR ANTHONY. But it don't take away your voice, fool, does it?—Go up, and speak to her directly!

ABSOLUTE makes signs to MRS. MALAPROP to leave them together.

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir Anthony, shall we leave them together?—[Aside to her] Ah! you stubborn little vixen!

SIR ANTHONY. Not yet, ma'am, not yet!—[Aside to him] What the d—l are you at? unlock your jaws, sirrah, or—

ABSOLUTE draws near LYDIA.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Now Heav'n send she may be too sullen to look round!—I must disguise my voice.—[Speaks in a low, hoarse tone] Will not Miss Languish lend an ear to the mild accents of true love? Will not—

SIR ANTHONY. [Apart] What the d—l ails the fellow? why don't you speak out?—not stand croaking like a frog in a quinsy!

ABSOLUTE. The—the—excess of my awe, and my—my—modesty quite choke me!

SIR ANTHONY. Ah! your modesty again!—I'll tell you what, Jack, if you don't speak out directly, and glibly too, I shall be in such a rage!—Mrs. Malaprop, I wish the lady would favour us with something more than a side-front.

MRS. MALAPROP seems to chide LYDIA.

ABSOLUTE. So!—all will out, I see!—[Goes up to LYDIA, speaks softly] Be not surprised, my Lydia; suppress all surprise at present.

LYDIA. [Aside] Heav'ns! 'tis Beverley's voice! Sure he can't have imposed on Sir Anthony too!—[Looks round by degrees, then starts up] Is this possible!—my Beverley!—how can this be?—my Beverley?

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Ah! 'tis all over.

SIR ANTHONY. Beverley!—the devil!—Beverley!—What can the girl mean?—This is my son, Jack Absolute.

MRS. MALAPROP. For shame, hussy! for shame! your head runs so on that fellow that you have him always in your eyes! Beg Captain Absolute's pardon directly.

LYDIA. I see no Captain Absolute, but my loved Beverley!

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! the girl's mad!—her brain's turned by reading.

MRS. MALAPROP. O' my conscience, I believe so!—What do you mean by Beverley, hussy? You saw Captain Absolute before to-day; there he is—your husband that shall be.

LYDIA. With all my soul, ma'am—when I refuse my Beverley—

SIR ANTHONY. Oh! she's as mad as Bedlam!—or has this fellow been playing us a rogue's trick?—Come here, sirrah; who the d—l are you?

ABSOLUTE. Faith, sir, I am not quite clear myself; but I'll endeavor to recollect.

SIR ANTHONY. Are you my son or not?—answer for your mother, you dog, if you won't for me.

MRS. MALAPROP. Aye, sir, who are you?—O mercy! I begin to suspect!—

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] Ye Powers of impudence, befriend me! Sir Anthony, most assuredly I am your wife's son; and that I sincerely believe myself to be yours also, I hope my duty has always shown.—Mrs. Malaprop, I am your most respectful admirer and shall be proud to add affectionate nephew.⁵—I need not tell my Lydia that she sees her faithful Beverley who, knowing the singular generosity of her temper, assumed that name and a station which has proved a test of the most disinterested love, which he now¹⁰ hopes to enjoy in a more elevated character.

LYDIA. [Sullenly] So—there will be no elopement after all!

SIR ANTHONY. Upon my soul, Jack, thou art a very impudent fellow! To do you¹⁵ justice, I think I never saw a piece of more consummate assurance!

ABSOLUTE. Oh, you flatter me, sir—you compliment—'tis my modesty, you know, sir—my modesty that has stood in my way.²⁰

SIR ANTHONY. Well, I am glad you are not the dull, insensible varlet you pretended to be, however!—I'm glad you have made a fool of your father, you dog—I am. So this was your penitence, your duty and obedience!²⁵—I thought it was d—n'd sudden!—"You never heard their names before," not you!—"What Languishes of Worcestershire," hey?—"if you could please me in the affair, 'twas all you desired!"—Ah! you dissembling³⁰ villain!—What! [Pointing to LYDIA] "She squints, don't she?—a little red-haired girl!"—hey?—Why, you hypocritical young rascal!—I wonder you a'n't ashamed to hold up your head!

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis with difficulty, sir.—I am confused—very much confused, as you must perceive.

MRS. MALAPROP. O lud! Sir Anthony!—a new light breaks in upon me!—hey!⁴⁰—how! what! Captain, did you write the letters then?—What—I am to thank you for the elegant compilation of "an old weather-beaten she-dragon"—hey?—O mercy!—was it you that reflected on my parts of speech?⁴⁵

ABSOLUTE. Dear sir! my modesty will be overpowered at last if you don't assist me. — I shall certainly not be able to stand it!

SIR ANTHONY. Come, come, Mrs. Malaprop, we must forget and forgive;—odds⁵⁰ what a sudden that I could find in my heart to be so good-humored! and so gallant!—hey, Mrs. Malaprop?

MRS. MALAPROP. Well, Sir Anthony, since you desire it, we will not anticipate the past;—so mind, young people—our retrospection will now be all to the future.

SIR ANTHONY. Come, we must leave them together; Mrs. Malaprop, they long to fly into each other's arms, I warrant!—Jack, isn't the cheek as I said, hey?—and the eye, you dog?—and the lip—hey? Come, Mrs. Malaprop, we'll not disturb their tenderness—theirs is the time of life for happiness!—[Sings] "Youth's the season made for joy"—hey!—Odds life! I'm in such spirits,—I don't know what I couldn't do!—Permit me, ma'am—[Gives his hand to MRS. MALAPROP. Sings] Tol-de-rol—'gad, I should like a little fooling myself—Tol-de-rol! de-rol.

Exit singing, and handing MRS. MALAPROP.

LYDIA sits sullenly in her chair.

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] So much thought bodes me no good.—So grave, Lydia?

LYDIA. Sir!

ABSOLUTE. [Aside] So!—egad! I thought as much!—that d—n'd monosyllable has froze me!—What, Lydia, now that we are as happy in our friends' consent, as in our mutual vows—

LYDIA. [Peevishly] Friends' consent indeed!

ABSOLUTE. Come, come, we must lay aside some of our romance—a little wealth and comfort may be endured, after all. And for your fortune, the lawyers shall make such settlements as—

LYDIA. Lawyers! I hate lawyers!

ABSOLUTE. Nay then, we will not wait for their lingering forms, but instantly procure the licence, and—

LYDIA. The licence!—I hate licence!

ABSOLUTE. O my love! be not so unkind!—[Kneeling] Thus let me intreat—

LYDIA. Pshaw!—what signifies kneeling when you know I must have you?

ABSOLUTE. [Rising] Nay, madam, there shall be no constraint upon your inclinations, I promise you.—If I have lost your heart—I resign the rest.—[Aside] 'Gad, I must try what a little spirit will do.

LYDIA. [Rising] Then, sir, let me tell you, the interest you had there was acquired by a mean, unmanly imposition, and deserves the punishment of fraud.—What, you have been treating me like a child!—humoring my romance! and laughing; I suppose, at your success!

ABSOLUTE. You wrong me, Lydia, you wrong me—only hear—

LYDIA. So, while I fondly imagined we were deceiving my relations, and flattered myself that I should outwit and incense them all—[Walking about in heat] behold! my hopes are to be crushed at once, by my aunt's consent and approbation—and I am myself the only dupe at last!

ABSOLUTE. Nay, but hear me—

LYDIA. No, sir, you could not think that such paltry artifices could please me when the mask was thrown off! But I suppose since your tricks have made you secure of my fortune, you are little solicitous about my affections.—But here, sir, here is the picture—Beverley's picture! [Taking a miniature from her bosom] which I have worn night and day, in spite of threats and entreaties!—There, sir; [Flings it to him] and be assured I throw the original from my heart as easily!

ABSOLUTE. Nay, nay, ma'am, we will not differ as to that.—Here [Taking out a picture], here is Miss Lydia Languish.—What a difference!—aye, there is the heav'nly, assenting smile that first gave soul and spirit to my hopes!—those are the lips which sealed a vow, as yet scarce dry in Cupid's calendar! and there the half resentful blush, that would have checked the ardor of my thanks!—Well, all that's past—all over indeed!—There, madam—in beauty, that copy is not equal to you, but in my mind its merit over the original, in being still the same, is such—that—I cannot find in my heart to part with it. [Puts it up again].

LYDIA. [Softening] 'Tis your own doing, sir—I, I, I suppose you are perfectly satisfied.

ABSOLUTE. Oh, most certainly—sure, now this is much better than being in love!—ha! ha! ha!—there's some spirit in this!—What signifies breaking some scores of solemn promises—half an hundred vows, under one's hand, with the marks of a dozen or two angels to witness—all that's of no consequence, you know. To be sure, people will say, "That miss didn't know her own mind"—but never mind that.—Or, perhaps, they may be ill-natured enough to hint that the gentleman grew tired of the lady and forsook her—but don't let that fret you.

LYDIA. There is no bearing his insolence.
Bursts into tears.

5 Enter MRS. MALAPROP and SIR ANTHONY.

MRS. MALAPROP. [Entering] Come, we must interrupt your billing and cooing a while.

LYDIA. [Sobbing] This is worse than your treachery and deceit, you base ingrate!

SIR ANTHONY. What the devil's the matter now?—Z—ds! Mrs. Malaprop, this is the oddest billing and cooing I ever heard!—but what the deuce is the meaning of it?—I am quite astonished!

ABSOLUTE. Ask the lady, sir.

MRS. MALAPROP. O mercy!—I'm quite analyzed for my part!—Why, Lydia, what is the reason of this?

LYDIA. Ask the gentleman, ma'am.

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! I shall be in a frenzy!—Why, Jack, you scoundrel, you are not come out to be any one else, are you?

25 MRS. MALAPROP. Aye, sir—there's no more trick, is there?—you are not like Cereberus—three gentlemen at once, are you?

ABSOLUTE. You'll not let me speak.—I say the lady can account for this much better than I can.

LYDIA. Ma'am, you once commanded me never to think of Beverley again. There is the man—I now obey you; for from this moment I renounce him forever

Exit LYDIA.

MRS. MALAPROP. O mercy! and miracles! what a turn here is—Why sure, captain, you haven't behaved disrespectfully to my niece?

SIR ANTHONY. Ha! ha! ha!—ha! ha! ha!—now I see it. Ha! ha! ha!—now I see it—you have been too lively, Jack.

ABSOLUTE. Nay, sir, upon my word—

SIR ANTHONY. Come, no lying, Jack—I'm sure 'twas so.

MRS. MALAPROP. O lud! Sir Anthony!—O fie, captain!

ABSOLUTE. Upon my soul, ma'am—

SIR ANTHONY. Come, no excuse, Jack; why, your father, you rogue, was so before you!—the blood of the Absolutes was always impatient.—Ha! ha! ha! poor little Lydia! why, you've frightened her, you dog, you have.

ABSOLUTE. By all that's good, sir—

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! say no more, I tell you. Mrs. Malaprop shall make your peace. You must make his peace, Mrs. Malaprop; you must tell her 'tis Jack's way tell her 'tis all our ways—it runs in the blood of our family! Come, get on, Jack. Ha! ha! ha!—Mrs. Malaprop—a young villain!

Pushing him out.

MRS. MALAPROP. O! Sir Anthony!—O fie, captain!

Exeunt severally.

SCENE III

The North Parade.

Enter SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

SIR LUCIUS. I wonder where this Captain Absolute hides himself! Upon my conscience, these officers are always in one's way in love affairs!—I remember I might have married Lady Dorothy Carmine if it had not been for a little rogue of a major, who ran away with her before she could get a sight of me! And I wonder too what it is the ladies can see in them to be so fond of them—unless it be a touch of the old serpent in 'em, that makes the little creatures be caught, like vipers, with a bit of red cloth. Hah! isn't this the captain coming?—faith it is!—There is a probability of succeeding about that fellow, that is mighty provoking! Who the devil is he talking to?

Steps aside.

Enter CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

ABSOLUTE. To what fine purpose I have been plotting! a noble reward for all my schemes, upon my soul!—a little gipsy!—I did not think her romance could have made her so d—ned absurd either. 'Sdeath, I never was in a worse humor in my life!—I could cut my own throat or any other person's with the greatest pleasure in the world!

SIR LUCIUS. [Aside] Oh, faith! I'm in the luck of it. I never could have found him in a sweeter temper for my purpose—to be sure, I'm just come in the nick! Now to enter into conversation with him, and so quarrel genteelly. [SIR LUCIUS goes up to ABSOLUTE] With regard to that matter, captain, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with you.

ABSOLUTE. Upon my word, then, you must be a very subtle disputant—because, sir, I happened just then to be giving no opinion at all.

SIR LUCIUS. That's no reason. For give me leave to tell you, a man may think an untruth as well as speak one.

ABSOLUTE. Very true, sir, but if a man never utters his thoughts, I should think they might stand a chance of escaping controversy.

SIR LUCIUS. Then, sir, you differ in opinion with me, which amounts to the same thing.

ABSOLUTE. Hark'ee, Sir Lucius: if I had not before known you to be a gentleman, upon my soul, I should not have discovered it at this interview; for what you can drive at, unless you mean to quarrel with me, I cannot conceive!

SIR LUCIUS. I humbly thank you, sir, for the quickness of your apprehension—[Bowing] You have named the very thing I would be at.

ABSOLUTE. Very well, sir; I shall certainly not balk your inclinations.—But I should be glad you would please to explain your motives.

SIR LUCIUS. Pray, sir, be easy—the quarrel is a very pretty quarrel as it stands—we should only spoil it by trying to explain it.—However, your memory is very short, or you could not have forgot an affront you passed on me within this week. So no more, but name your time and place.

ABSOLUTE. Well, sir, since you are so bent on it, the sooner the better; let it be this evening—here, by the Spring Gardens.—We shall scarcely be interrupted.

SIR LUCIUS. Faith! that same interruption in affairs of this nature shows very great ill-breeding. I don't know what's the reason, but in England, if a thing of this kind gets wind, people make such a pother that a gentleman can never fight in peace and quietness. However, if it's the same to you, captain, I should take it as a particular kindness if you'd let us meet in King's-Mead-Fields, as a little business will call me there about six o'clock and I may dispatch both matters at once.

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis the same to me exactly. A little after six, then, we will discuss this matter more seriously.

SIR LUCIUS. If you please, sir; there will be very pretty small-sword light, tho' it won't do for a long shot. So that matter's settled and my mind's at ease! Exit.

Enter FAULKLAND meeting ABSOLUTE.

ABSOLUTE. Well met—I was going to look for you. O Faulkland! all the demons of spite and disappointment have conspired against me! I'm so vexed that if I had not the prospect of a resource in being knocked o' the head by and by, I should scarce have spirits to tell you the cause.

FAULKLAND. What can you mean?—Has Lydia changed her mind?—I should have thought her duty and inclination would now have pointed to the same object.

ABSOLUTE. Aye, just as the eyes do of a person who squints. When her love-eye was fixed on me, t'other—her eye of duty—was finely obliqued. But when duty bid her point that the same way, off t'other turned on a swivel and secured its retreat with a frown!

FAULKLAND. But what's the resource you—

ABSOLUTE. Oh, to wind up the whole, a good-natured Irishman here has—[Mimicking SIR LUCIUS] begged leave to have the pleasure of cutting my throat—and I mean to indulge him—that's all.

FAULKLAND. Prithee, be serious!

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis fact, upon my soul! Sir Lucius O'Trigger—you know him by sight—for some affront, which I am sure I never intended, has obliged me to meet him this evening at six o'clock. 'Tis on that account I wished to see you—you must go with me.

FAULKLAND. Nay, there must be some mistake, sure.—Sir Lucius shall explain himself—and I dare say matters may be accommodated. But this evening did you say? I wish it had been any other time.

ABSOLUTE. Why? there will be light enough; there will (as Sir Lucius says) "be very pretty small-sword light, tho' it won't do for a long shot." Confound his long shots!

FAULKLAND. But I am myself a good deal ruffled by a difference I have had with Julia—my vile, tormenting temper has made me treat her so cruelly that I shall not be myself till we are reconciled.

ABSOLUTE. By heav'ns, Faulkland, you don't deserve her!

Enter Servant, gives FAULKLAND a letter.

FAULKLAND. Oh, Jack! this is from Julia! I dread to open it—I fear it may be to take a last leave—perhaps to bid me return her letters—and restore—Oh, how I suffer for my folly!

ABSOLUTE. Here, let me see.—[Takes the letter and opens it.] Aye, a final sentence, indeed!—'tis all over with you, faith!

FAULKLAND. Nay, Jack, don't keep me in suspense!

ABSOLUTE. Hear then—"As I am convinced that my dear Faulkland's own reflections have already upbraided him for his last unkindness to me, I will not add a word on the subject. I wish to speak with you as soon as possible. Yours ever and truly, Julia." There's stubbornness and resentment for you!—[Gives him the letter.] Why, man, you don't seem one whit happier at this!

FAULKLAND. Oh, yes, I am; but—but—

ABSOLUTE. Confound your *but*s.—You never hear anything that would make another man bless himself, but you immediately d—n it with a but.

FAULKLAND. Now, Jack, as you are my friend, own honestly; don't you think there is something forward—something indelicate in this haste to forgive? Women should never sue for reconciliation; that should always come from us. They should retain their coldness till wooed to kindness; and their pardon, like their love, should "not unsought be won."

ABSOLUTE. I have not patience to listen to you—thou'rt incorrigible! so say no more on the subject. I must go to settle a few matters. Let me see you before six—remember—at my lodgings.—A poor industrious devil like me, who have toiled and drudged and plotted to gain my ends, and am at last disappointed by other people's folly—may in pity be allowed to swear and grumble a little;—but a captious sceptic in love—a slave to fretfulness and whim—who has no difficulties but of his own creating—is a subject more fit for ridicule than compassion!

Exit ABSOLUTE.

FAULKLAND. I feel his reproaches!—yet I would not change this too exquisite nicety for the gross content with which he tramples on the thorns of love.—His engaging me in this duel has started an idea in my head which I will instantly pursue.—I'll use it as the touchstone of Julia's sincerity and disinterestedness. If her love prove pure and sterling ore, my name will rest on it with honor! and once I've stamped it there, I lay aside my doubts forever. But if the dross of selfishness, the alloy of pride predominate, 'twill be best to leave her as a toy for some less cautious fool to sigh for!

Exit FAULKLAND.

ACT V

SCENE I

JULIA's dressing-room.

JULIA, sola.

JULIA. How this message has alarmed me! What dreadful accident can he mean? why such charge to be alone?—O Faulkland!—how many unhappy moments!—how many tears, have you cost me!

Enter FAULKLAND, muffled up in a riding-coat.

JULIA. What means this?—why this caution, Faulkland?

FAULKLAND. Alas! Julia, I am come to take a long farewell.

JULIA. Heav'ns! what do you mean?

FAULKLAND. You see before you a wretch whose life is forfeited. Nay, start not!—the infirmity of my temper has drawn all this misery on me.—I left you fretful and passionate—an untoward accident drew me into a quarrel—the event is, that I must fly this kingdom instantly. O Julia, had I been so fortunate as to have called you mine entirely before this mischance had fallen on me, I should not so deeply dread my banishment!—But no more of that—your heart and promise were given to one happy in friends, character, and station! They are not bound to wait upon a solitary, guilty exile.

JULIA. My soul is oppressed with sorrow at the nature of your misfortune. Had these adverse circumstances arisen from a less fatal cause, I should have felt strong comfort in the thought that I could now chase from your bosom every doubt of the warm sincerity of my love.—My heart has long known no other guardian—I now entrust my person to your honor—we will fly together. When safe from pursuit, my father's will may be fulfilled—and I receive a legal claim to be the partner of your sorrows and tenderest comforter. Then on the bosom of your wedded Julia, you may lull your keen regret to slumbering, while virtuous love, with a cherub's hand, shall smoothe the brow of upbraiding thought, and pluck the thorn from compunction.

FAULKLAND. O Julia, I am bankrupt in gratitude! but the time is so pressing, it calls on you for so hasty a resolution.—Would you not wish some hours to weigh the advantages you forego, and what little compensation poor Faulkland can make you beside his solitary love?

JULIA. I ask not a moment. No, Faulkland, I have loved you for yourself; and if I now, more than ever, prize the solemn engagement which so long has pledged us to each other, it is because it leaves no room for hard aspersions on my fate and puts the seal of duty to an act of love.—But let us not linger!—Perhaps this delay—

FAULKLAND. 'Twill be better I should not venture out again till dark.—Yet am I grieved to think what numberless distresses will press heavy on your gentle disposition!

JULIA. Perhaps your fortune may be forfeited by this unhappy act.—I know not whether 'tis so, but sure that alone can never make us unhappy. The little I have will be sufficient to support us; and exile never should be splendid.

FAULKLAND. Aye, but in such an abject state of life, my wounded pride perhaps may increase the natural fretfulness of my temper till I become a rude, morose companion, beyond your patience to endure. Perhaps the recollection of a deed my conscience cannot justify, may haunt me in such gloomy and unsocial fits that I shall hate the tenderness that would relieve me, break from your arms, and quarrel with your fondness!

JULIA. If your thoughts should assume so unhappy a bent, you will the more want some mild and affectionate spirit to watch over and console you—one who, by bearing your infirmities with gentleness and resignation, may teach you so to bear the evils of your fortune.

FAULKLAND. O Julia, I have proved you to the quick! and with this useless device I throw away all my doubts. How shall I plead to be forgiven this last unworthy effect of my restless, unsatisfied disposition?

JULIA. Has no such disaster happened as you related?

FAULKLAND. I am ashamed to own that 'twas all pretended; yet in pity, Julia, do not kill me with resenting a fault which never can be repeated; but sealing, this once, my pardon, let me to-morrow, in the face of Heaven, receive my future guide and mistress and expiate my past folly by years of tender adoration.

JULIA. Hold, Faulkland!—that you are free from a crime which I before feared to name, Heaven knows how sincerely I rejoice!—These are tears of thankfulness for that! But that your cruel doubts should have urged you to an imposition that has wrung my heart, gives me now a pang more keen than I can express.

FAULKLAND. By heav'n's, Julia—

JULIA. Yet hear me.—My father loved you, Faulkland! and you preserved the life that tender parent gave me; in his presence I pledged my hand—joyfully pledged it—where before I had given my heart. When, soon after, I lost that parent, it seemed to me that Providence had, in Faulkland, shown me whither to transfer, without a pause, my grateful duty as well as my affection; hence I have been content to bear from you what pride and delicacy would have forbid me from another. I will not upbraid you by repeating how you have trifled with my sincerity—

FAULKLAND. I confess it all! yet hear—

JULIA. After such a year of trial, I might have flattered myself that I should not have been insulted with a new probation of my sincerity as cruel as unnecessary—a trick of such a nature, as to show me plainly that when I thought you loved me best, you even then regarded me as a mean dissembler—an artful, prudent hypocrite.

FAULKLAND. Never! never!

JULIA. I now see it is not in your nature to be content or confident in love. With this conviction, I never will be yours. While I had hopes that my persevering attention and unapproaching kindness might in time reform your temper, I should have been happy to have gained a dearer influence over you; but I will not furnish you with a licensed power to keep alive an incorrigible fault, at the expense of one who never would contend with you.

FAULKLAND. Nay, but Julia—by my soul and honor, if after this—

JULIA. But one word more.—As my faith has once been given to you, I never will barter it with another.—I shall pray for your happiness with the truest sincerity, and the dearest blessing I can ask of Heaven to send you will be to charm you from that unhappy temper which alone has prevented the performance of our solemn engagement.—All I request of you is, that you will yourself reflect upon this infirmity, and when you number up the many true delights it has deprived you of, let it not be your least regret, that it lost you the love of one who would have followed you in beggary through the world!

Exit.

FAULKLAND. She's gone — forever! — There was an awful resolution in her manner that riveted me to my place.—O fool!—dolt—barbarian! Cursed as I am with more imperfections than my fellow-wretches, kind Fortune sent a heaven-gifted cherub to my aid, and, like a ruffian, I have driven her from my side!—I must now haste to my appointment. Well my mind is tuned for such a scene. I shall wish only to become a principal in it, and reverse the tale my cursed folly put me upon forging here.—O Love—tormenter—fiend!—whose influence, like the moon's, acting on men of dull souls, makes idiots of them, but meeting subtler spirits, betrays their course, and urges sensibility to madness!

Exit.

Enter Maid and LYDIA.

MAID. My mistress, ma'am, I know, was here just now—perhaps she is only in the next room.

Exit Maid.

LYDIA. Heigh ho! Though he has used me so, this fellow runs strangely in my head. I believe one lecture from my grave cousin will make me recall him.

Enter JULIA.

LYDIA. O Julia, I have come to you with such an appetite for consolation.—Lud! child, what's the matter with you? You have been crying!—I'll be hanged, if that Faulkland has not been tormenting you.

JULIA. You mistake the cause of my uneasiness. Something has flurried me a little—nothing that you can guess at.—[Aside] I would not accuse Faulkland to a sister!

LYDIA. Ah! whatever vexations you may have, I can assure you mine surpass them. You know who Beverley proves to be?

JULIA. I will now own to you, Lydia, that Mr. Faulkland had before informed me of the whole affair. Had young Absolute been the person you took him for, I should not have accepted your confidence on the subject without a serious endeavor to counteract your caprice.

LYDIA. So! then I see I have been deceived by every one! But I don't care—I'll never have him.

JULIA. Nay, Lydia—

LYDIA. Why, is it not provoking, when I thought we were coming to the prettiest 15 distress imaginable, to find myself made a mere Smithfield bargain of at last? There had I projected one of the most sentimental elopements—so becoming a disguise—so amiable a ladder of ropes!—conscious moon 20—four horses—Scotch parson—with such surprise to Mrs. Malaprop—and such paragraphs in the newspapers!—Oh, I shall die with disappointment!

JULIA. I don't wonder at it!

LYDIA. Now—sad reverse!—what have I to expect but, after a deal of flimsy preparation with a bishop's license and my aunt's blessing, to go simpering up to the altar; or perhaps be cried three times in a country- 30 church, and have an unmannerly, fat clerk ask the consent of every butcher in the parish to join John Absolute and Lydia Languish, spinster! Oh, that I should live to hear myself called spinster!

JULIA. Melancholy, indeed!

LYDIA. How mortifying, to remember the dear delicious shifts I used to be put to, to gain half a minute's conversation with this fellow!—How often have I stole forth, 40 in the coldest night in January, and found him in the garden, stuck like a dripping statue! There would he kneel to me in the snow, and sneeze and cough so pathetically—he shivering with cold, and I with appre- 45 hension! And while the freezing blast numbed our joints, how warmly would he press me to pity his flame, and glow with mutual ardor!—Ah, Julia, that was something like being in love.

JULIA. If I were in spirits, Lydia, I should chide you only by laughing heartily at you; but it suits more the situation of my mind at present earnestly to entreat you not to let a man who loves you with sincerity suffer that unhappiness from your caprice, which I know too well caprice can inflict.

LYDIA. O lud! what has brought my aunt here?

Enter Mrs. MALAPROP, FAG, and DAVID.

MRS. MALAPROP. So! so! here's fine work!—here's fine suicide, paracide, and salivation going on in the fields! and Sir Anthony not to be found to prevent the antistrophe!

JULIA. For Heaven's sake, madam, what's the meaning of this?

MRS. MALAPROP. That gentleman can tell you—'twas he enveloped the affair to me.

LYDIA. [To FAG] Do, sir, will you inform us?

FAG. Ma'am, I should hold myself very deficient in every requisite that forms the man of breeding if I delayed a moment to give all the information in my power to a lady so deeply interested in the affair as you are.

LYDIA. But quick!—quick, sir!

FAG. True, ma'am, as you say, one should be quick in divulging matters of this nature; for should we be tedious, perhaps while we are flourishing on the subject two or three lives may be lost!

LYDIA. O patience! do, ma'am, for Heaven's sake! tell us what is the matter.

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, murder's the matter! slaughter's the matter! killing's the matter!—but he can tell you the perpen- 35 diculars.

LYDIA. Then, prithee, sir, be brief.

FAG. Why, then, ma'am, as to murder—I cannot take upon me to say; and as to slaughter or man-slaughter, that will be as the jury finds it.

LYDIA. But who, sir—who are engaged in this?

FAG. Faith, ma'am, one is a young gentleman whom I should be very sorry anything was to happen to—a very pretty behaved gentleman! We have lived much together, and always on terms.

LYDIA. But who is this?—who? who? 50 who?

FAG. My master, ma'am—my master—I speak of my master.

LYDIA. Heavens! What, Captain Absolute.

MRS. MALAPROP. Oh, to be sure, you are frightened now!

JULIA. But who are with him, sir?

FAG. As to the rest, ma'am, his gentleman can inform you better than I.

JULIA. [To DAVID] Do speak, friend.

DAVID. Look'ee, my lady—by the mass! there's mischief going on. Folks don't use to meet for amusement with firearms, firelocks, fire-engines, fire-screens, fire-office, and the devil knows what other crackers beside!—This, my lady, I say, has an angry savor.

JULIA. But who is there beside Captain Absolute, friend?

DAVID. My poor master—under favor for mentioning him first. You know me, my lady—I am David—and my master of course is, or was, Squire Acres.—Then comes Squire Faulkland.

JULIA. Do, ma'am, let us instantly endeavor to prevent mischief.

MRS. MALAPROP. O fie! it would be very inelegant in us; we should only participate things.

DAVID. Ah! do, Mrs. Aunt, save a few lives—they are desperately given, believe me.—Above all, there is that bloodthirsty Philistine, Sir Lucius O'Trigger.

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir Lucius O'Trigger? O mercy! have they drawn poor little dear Sir Lucius into the scrape?—Why, how you stand, girl! you have no more feeling than one of the Derbyshire putrifactions!

LYDIA. What are we to do, madam?

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, fly with the utmost felicity, to be sure, to prevent mischief!—Here, friend, you can show us the place?

FAG. If you please, ma'am, I will conduct you.—David, do you look for Sir Anthony.

Exit DAVID.

MRS. MALAPROP. Come, girls! this gentleman will exhort us.—Come, sir, you're our envoy—lead the way, and we'll precede.

FAG. Not a step before the ladies, for the world!

MRS. MALAPROP. You're sure you know the spot?

FAG. I think I can find it, ma'am; and one good thing is, we shall hear the report of the pistols as we draw near, so we can't well miss them;—never fear, ma'am, never fear.

Exeunt, he talking.

SCENE II

South Parade.

Enter ABSOLUTE, putting his sword under his great-coat.

ABSOLUTE. A sword seen in the streets of Bath would raise as great an alarm as a mad-dog.—How provoking this is in Faulkland!—never punctual! I shall be obliged to go without him at last.—Oh, the devil! here's Sir Anthony! How shall I escape him? Muffles up his face, and takes a circle to go off.

Enter SIR ANTHONY.

SIR ANTHONY. How one may be deceived at a little distance! Only that I see he don't know me, I could have sworn that was Jack!—Hey! 'Gad's life! it is.—Why, Jack, you dog!—what are you afraid of? Hey—sure I'm right.—Why Jack, Jack Absolute!

Goes up to him.

ABSOLUTE. Really, sir, you have the advantage of me. I don't remember ever to have had the honor—my name is Saunderson, at your service.

SIR ANTHONY. Sir, I beg your pardon—I took you—hey!—why, z—ds! it is—Stay—[Looks up to his face] So, so—your humble servant, Mr. Saunderson! Why, you scoundrel, what tricks are you after now?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, a joke, sir, a joke! I came here on purpose to look for you, sir.

SIR ANTHONY. You did! well, I am glad you were so lucky. But what are you muffled up so for?—what's this for?—hey?

ABSOLUTE. 'Tis cool, sir, isn't it?—rather chilly somehow.—But I shall be late—I have a particular engagement.

SIR ANTHONY. Stay!—Why, I thought you were looking for me!—Pray, Jack, where is't you are going?

ABSOLUTE. Going, sir?

SIR ANTHONY. Aye, where are you going?

ABSOLUTE. Where am I going?

SIR ANTHONY. You unmannerly puppy!

ABSOLUTE. I was going, sir, to—to—to—to Lydia—sir, to Lydia—to make matters up if I could—and I was looking for you, sir, to—to—

SIR ANTHONY. To go with you, I suppose—Well, come along.

ABSOLUTE. Oh! z—ds! no, sir, not for the world!—I wished to meet with you, sir,—to—to—to—You find it cool, I'm sure, sir—you'd better not stay out.

SIR ANTHONY. Cool!—not at all.—Well, Jack—and what will you say to Lydia?

ABSOLUTE. Oh, sir, beg her pardon, humor her—promise and vow; but I detain you, sir,—consider the cold air on your gout.

SIR ANTHONY. Oh, not at all!—not at all! I'm in no hurry.—Ah! Jack, you youngsters, when once you are wounded here.—[Putting his hand to ABSOLUTE's breast] Hey! what the deuce have you got here?

ABSOLUTE. Nothing, sir—nothing.

SIR ANTHONY. What's this?—here's some thing d—d hard.

ABSOLUTE. Oh, trinkets, sir! trinkets!—a bauble for Lydia.

SIR ANTHONY. Nay, let me see your taste.—[Pulls his coat open; the sword falls] Trinkets! a bauble for Lydia!—z—ds! sirrah, you are not going to cut her throat, are you?

ABSOLUTE. Ha! ha! ha!—I thought it would divert you, sir, tho' I didn't mean to tell you till afterwards.

SIR ANTHONY. You didn't?—Yes, this is a very diverting trinket, truly!

ABSOLUTE. Sir, I'll explain to you.—You know, sir, Lydia is romantic—dev'lish romantic, and very absurd of course. Now, sir, I intend, if she refuses to forgive me, to unsheathe this sword, and swear I'll fall upon its point, and expire at her feet!

SIR ANTHONY. Fall upon fiddlestick's end!—why, I suppose it is the very thing that would please her.—Get along, you fool!

ABSOLUTE. Well, sir, you shall hear of my success—you shall hear.—“O Lydia!—forgive me, or this pointed steel”—says I.

SIR ANTHONY. “O booby! stab away and welcome”—says she.—Get along! and d—n your trinkets!

Exit ABSOLUTE.

Enter DAVID, running.

DAVID. Stop him! stop him! Murder! Thief! Fire!—Stop, fire! Stop, fire!—O Sir Anthony—call! call! bid 'em stop! Murder! Fire!

SIR ANTHONY. Fire! Murder!—Where?

DAVID. Oons! he's out of sight, and I'm out of breath for my part. O Sir Anthony, why didn't you stop him? why didn't you stop him?

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! the fellow's mad!—Stop whom? stop Jack?

DAVID. Aye, the captain, sir!—there's murder and slaughter—

SIR ANTHONY. Murder!

DAVID. Aye, please you, Sir Anthony, there's all kinds of murder, all sorts of slaughter to be seen in the fields; there's fighting going on, sir—bloody sword-and-gun fighting.

SIR ANTHONY. Who are going to fight, dunce?

DAVID. Everybody that I know of, Sir Anthony—everybody is going to fight; my poor master, Sir Lucius O'Trigger, your son, the captain—

SIR ANTHONY. Oh, the dog! I see his tricks.—Do you know the place?

DAVID. King's-Mead-Fields.

SIR ANTHONY. You know the way?

DAVID. Not an inch; but I'll call the mayor—aldermen—constables—churchwardens—and beadles; we can't be too many to part them.

SIR ANTHONY. Come along—give me your shoulder! we'll get assistance as we go—the lying villain!—Well, I shall be in such a frenzy!—So—this was the history of his d—d trinkets! I'll bauble him!

Exeunt.

SCENE III

King's-Mead-Fields.

Enter SIR LUCIUS and ACRES, with pistols.

ACRES. By my valor! then, Sir Lucius, forty yards is a good distance. Odds levels and aims!—I say it is a good distance.

SIR LUCIUS. Is it for muskets or small field-pieces? Upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, you must leave those things to me.—Stay now—I'll show you.—[Measures paces along the stage] There now, that is a very pretty distance—a pretty gentleman's distance.

ACRES. Z—ds! we might as well fight in a sentry-box! I tell you, Sir Lucius, the farther he is off, the cooler I shall take my aim.

SIR LUCIUS. Faith! then I suppose you would aim at him best of all if he was out of sight!

ACRES. No, Sir Lucius; but I should think forty, or eight and thirty yards—

SIR LUCIUS. Pho! pho! nonsense! three or four feet between the mouths of your pistols is as good as a mile.

ACRES. Odds bullets, no!—by my valor! there is no merit in killing him so near. Do, my dear Sir Lucius, let me bring him down at a long shot!—a long shot, Sir Lucius, if you love me!

SIR LUCIUS. Well—the gentleman's friend and I must settle that.—But tell me now, Mr. Acres; in case of an accident, is there any little will or commission I could execute for you?

ACRES. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius, but I don't understand—

SIR LUCIUS. Why, you may think there's no being shot at without a little risk—and if an unlucky bullet should carry a quietus 15 with it—I say it will be no time then to be bothering you about family matters.

ACRES. A quietus!

SIR LUCIUS. For instance, now—if that should be the case—would you choose to be 20 pickled and sent home?—or would it be the same to you to lie here in the Abbey? I'm told there is very snug lying in the Abbey.

ACRES. Pickled!—Snug lying in the Abbey! —Odds tremors! Sir Lucius, don't talk so! 25

SIR LUCIUS. I suppose, Mr. Acres, you never were engaged in an affair of this kind before?

ACRES. No, Sir Lucius, never before.

SIR LUCIUS. Ah! that's a pity!—there's 30 nothing like being used to a thing. Pray now, how would you receive the gentleman's shot?

ACRES. Odds files!—I've practised that —there, Sir Lucius—there. [Puts himself in an 35 attitude] A side-front, hey? Odd! I'll make myself small enough; I'll stand edgeways.

SIR LUCIUS. Now—you're quite out—for if you stand so when I take my aim—
Levelling at him. 40

ACRES. Z—ds! Sir Lucius—are you sure it is not cocked?

SIR LUCIUS. Never fear.

ACRES. But—but—you don't know—it may go off of its own head! 45

SIR LUCIUS. Pho! be easy.—Well, now if I hit you in the body, my bullet has a double chance—for if it misses a vital part of your right side—'twill be very hard if it don't succeed on the left!

ACRES. A vital part! Oh, my poor vitals!

SIR LUCIUS. But, there—fix yourself so [Placing him] Let him see the broad-side of your full front—there!—now a ball or two may pass clear through your body, and never do any harm at all.

ACRES. Clear through me!—a ball or two 5 clear through me!

SIR LUCIUS. Aye—may they—and it is much the genteelst attitude into the bargain.

ACRES. Look'ee! Sir Lucius—I'd just 10 as lieve be shot in an awkward posture as a genteel one; so, by my valor! I will stand edge-ways.

SIR LUCIUS. [Looking at his watch] Sure they don't mean to disappoint us—Hah?—no, faith—I think I see them coming.

ACRES. Hey!—what!—coming?—

SIR LUCIUS. Aye.—Who are those yonder getting over the stile?

ACRES. There are two of them, indeed! —Well, let them come—hey, Sir Lucius?—we—we—we—we—won't run.

SIR LUCIUS. Run!

ACRES. No—I say—we won't run, by my valor!

SIR LUCIUS. What the devil's the matter with you?

ACRES. Nothing — nothing — my dear friend—my dear Sir Lucius—but I—I—I don't feel quite so bold, somehow, as I did.

SIR LUCIUS. O fie!—consider your honor.

ACRES. Aye—true—my honor. Do, Sir Lucius, hedge in a word or two every now and then about my honor.

SIR LUCIUS. [Looking] Well, here they're coming.

ACRES. Sir Lucius—if I wa'n't with you, I should almost think I was afraid.—If my valor should leave me!—Valor will come and go.

SIR LUCIUS. Then pray keep it fast while you have it.

ACRES. Sir Lucius—I doubt it is going—yes—my valor is certainly going!—it is sneaking off!—I feel it oozing out as it were 45 at the palms of my hands!

SIR LUCIUS. Your honor—your honor!—Here they are.

ACRES. O mercy!—now—that I were safe at Clod-Hall! or could be shot before I 50 was aware!

Enter FAULKLAND and ABSOLUTE.

SIR LUCIUS. Gentlemen, your most obedient. —Hah!—what —Captain Absolute?—

So, I suppose, sir, you are come here, just like myself—to do a kind office, first for your friend—then to proceed to business on your own account.

ACRES. What, Jack!—my dear Jack!—5 my dear friend!

ABSOLUTE. Hark'ee, Bob, Beverley's at hand.

SIR LUCIUS. Well, Mr. Acres—I don't blame your saluting the gentleman civilly.—10 So, Mr. Beverley, [To FAULKLAND] if you'll choose your weapons, the captain and I will measure the ground.

FAULKLAND. My weapons, sir!

ACRES. Odds life! Sir Lucius, I'm not 15 going to fight Mr. Faulkland; these are my particular friends.

SIR LUCIUS. What, sir, did you not come here to fight Mr. Acres?

FAULKLAND. Not I, upon my word, sir. 20

SIR LUCIUS. Well, now, that's mighty provoking! But I hope, Mr. Faulkland, as there are three of us come on purpose for the game, you won't be so cantankerous as to spoil the party by sitting out.

ABSOLUTE. O pray, Faulkland, fight to oblige Sir Lucius.

FAULKLAND. Nay, if Mr. Acres is so bent on the matter—

ACRES. No, no, Mr. Faulkland; I'll bear 30 my disappointment like a Christian.—Look'ee, Sir Lucius, there's no occasion at all for me to fight; and if it is the same to you, I'd as lieve let it alone.

SIR LUCIUS. Observe me, Mr. Acres.—I 35 must not be trifled with. You have certainly challenged somebody, and you came here to fight him. Now, if that gentleman is willing to represent him, I can't see, for my soul, why it isn't just the same thing.

ACRES. Z—ds,—Sir Lucius—I tell you, 'tis one Beverley I've challenged—a fellow, you see, that dare not show his face! If he were here, I'd make him give up his pretensions directly!

ABSOLUTE. Hold, Bob—let me set you right; there is no such man as Beverley in the case.—The person who assumed that name is before you; and as his pretensions are the same in both characters, he is ready 50 to support them in whatever way you please.

SIR LUCIUS. Well, this is lucky.—Now you have an opportunity—

ACRES. What, quarrel with my dear friend, Jack Absolute?—not if he were fifty Beverleys! Z—ds! Sir Lucius, you would not have me be so unnatural.

SIR LUCIUS. Upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, your valor has oozed away with a vengeance!

ACRES. Not in the least! Odds backs and abettors! I'll be your second with all my heart—and if you should get a quietus, you may command me entirely. I'll get you a "snug lying" in the "Abbey here"; or "pickle" you, and send you over to Blunderbuss Hall, or any of the kind, with the greatest pleasure.

SIR LUCIUS. Pho! pho! you are little better than a coward.

ACRES. Mind, gentlemen, he calls me a coward; coward was the word, by my valor!

SIR LUCIUS. Well, sir?

ACRES. Look'ee, Sir Lucius; 'tisn't that I mind the word coward—coward may be said in joke. But if you had called me a poltroon, odds daggers and balls—

SIR LUCIUS. Well, sir?

25 ACRES.—I should have thought you a very ill-bred man.

SIR LUCIUS. Pho! you are beneath my notice.

ABSOLUTE. Nay, Sir Lucius, you can't have a better second than my friend Acres.—He is a most "determined dog"—called in the country "Fighting Bob."—He generally "kills a man a week"—don't you, Bob?

ACRES. Aye—at home!

SIR LUCIUS. Well, then, captain, 'tis we must begin; so come out, my little counsellor —[Draws his sword] and ask the gentleman whether he will resign the lady without forcing you to proceed against him.

40 ABSOLUTE. Come on then, sir [Draws]; since you won't let it be an amicable suit, here's my reply.

Enter Sir ANTHONY, DAVID, and the Women.

45 DAVID. Knock 'em all down, sweet Sir Anthony; knock down my master in particular, and bind his hands over to their good behavior.

SIR ANTHONY. Put up, Jack, put up, or I shall be in a frenzy.—How came you in a duel, sir?

ABSOLUTE. Faith, sir, that gentleman can tell you better than I; 'twas he called on me, and you know, sir, I serve his Majesty.

SIR ANTHONY. Here's a pretty fellow: I catch him going to cut a man's throat, and he tells me he serves his Majesty!—Z—ds sirrah, then how durst you draw the King's sword against one of his subjects?

ABSOLUTE. Sir! I tell you, that gentleman called me out without explaining his reasons.

SIR ANTHONY. 'Gad!—Sir, how came you to call my son out without explaining your reasons!

SIR LUCIUS. Your son, sir, insulted me in a manner which my honor could not brook.

SIR ANTHONY. Z—ds! Jack, how durst you insult the gentleman in a manner which his honor could not brook?

MRS. MALAPROP. Come, come, let's have no honor before ladies.—Captain Absolute, come here; how could you intimidate us so?—Here's Lydia has been terrified to death so you.

ABSOLUTE. For fear I should be killed or escape, ma'am?

MRS. MALAPROP. Nay, no delusions to the past—Lydia is convinced; speak, child.

SIR LUCIUS. With your leave, ma'am, I must put in a word here. I believe I could interpret the young lady's silence—Now mark—

LYDIA. What is it you mean, sir?

SIR LUCIUS. Come, come, Delia, we must be serious now—this is no time for trifling.

LYDIA. 'Tis true, sir; and your reproof bids me offer this gentleman my hand and solicit the return of his affections.

ABSOLUTE. Oh, my little angel, say you so?—Sir Lucius, I perceive there must be some mistake here; with regard to the affront which you affirm I have given you—I can only say that it could not have been intentional. And as you must be convinced that I should not fear to support a real injury—you shall now see that I am not ashamed to atone for an inadvertency. I ask your pardon. But for this lady, while honored with her approbation, I will support my claim against any man whatever.

SIR ANTHONY. Well said, Jack, and I'll stand by you, my boy.

ACRES. Mind, I give up all my claim—I make no pretensions to anything in the world; and if I can't get a wife without fighting for her, by my valor! I'll live a bachelor.

SIR LUCIUS. Captain, give me your hand —an affront handsomely acknowledged becomes an obligation; and as for the lady, if she chooses to deny her own handwriting here—

Takes out letters.

MRS. MALAPROP. Oh, he will dissolve my mystery!—Sir Lucius, perhaps there's some mistake; perhaps I can illuminate—

SIR LUCIUS. Pray, old gentlewoman, don't interfere where you have no business.

—Miss Languish, are you my Delia, or not?

LYDIA. Indeed, Sir Lucius, I am not.

LYDIA and ABSOLUTE walk aside.

MRS. MALAPROP. Sir Lucius O'Trigger—ungrateful as you are, I own the soft impeachment—pardon my blushes, I am Delia.

SIR LUCIUS. You Delia—pho! pho! be easy.

MRS. MALAPROP. Why, thou barbarous Vandyke—those letters are mine. When you are more sensible of my benignity, perhaps I may be brought to encourage your addresses.

SIR LUCIUS. Mrs. Malaprop, I am extremely sensible of your condescension, and whether you or Lucy have put this trick on me, I am equally beholden to you. And to show you I'm not ungrateful, Captain Absolute, since you have taken that lady from me, I'll give you my Delia into the bargain.

ABSOLUTE. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius; but here's our friend, fighting Bob, unprovided for.

SIR LUCIUS. Hah! little Valor! here, will you make your fortune?

ACRES. Odds wrinkles! no!—But give us your hand, Sir Lucius, forget and forgive; but if ever I give you a chance of pickling me again, say Bob Acres is a dunce, that's all.

SIR ANTHONY. Come, Mrs. Malaprop, don't be cast down—you are in your bloom yet.

MRS. MALAPROP. O Sir Anthony—men are all barbarians.

All retire but JULIA and FAULKLAND.

JULIA. [Aside] He seems dejected and unhappy—not sullen; there was some foundation, however, for the tale he told me. O woman! how true should be your judgment, when your resolution is so weak!

FAULKLAND. Julia!—How can I sue for what I so little deserve? I dare not presume—yet Hope is the child of Penitence.

JULIA. Oh! Faulkland, you have not been more faulty in your unkind treatment of me than I am now in wanting inclination to resent it. As my heart honestly bids me place my weakness to the account of love, I should be ungenerous not to admit the same plea for yours.

FAULKLAND. Now I shall be blest indeed!

SIR ANTHONY comes forward.

SIR ANTHONY. What's going on here?—So you have been quarrelling too, I warrant. Come, Julia, I never interfered before, but let me have a hand in the matter at last.—All the faults I have ever seen in my friend Faulkland seemed to proceed from what he calls the delicacy and warmth of his affection for you.—There, marry him directly, Julia; you'll find he'll mend surprisingly!

The rest come forward.

SIR LUCIUS. Come, now, I hope there is no dissatisfied person but what is content; for as I have been disappointed myself, it will be very hard if I have not the satisfaction of seeing other people succeed better.

ACRES. You are right, Sir Lucius.—So, Jack, I wish you joy.—Mr. Faulkland the same.—Ladies, come now; to show you I'm neither vexed nor angry, odds tabors and pipes! I'll order the fiddles in half an hour to the New Rooms—and I insist on your all meeting me there.

SIR ANTHONY. 'Gad! sir, I like your spirit; and at night we single lads will drink a health to the young couples and a husband to Mrs Malaprop.

FAULKLAND. Our partners are stolen from us, Jack—I hope to be congratulated by each other—yours for having checked in time the errors of an ill-directed imagination, which might have betrayed an innocent heart; and mine, for having, by her gentleness and candor, reformed the unhappy temper of one who by it made wretched whom he loved most and tortured the heart he ought to have adored.

ABSOLUTE. Well, Jack, we have both tasted the bitters, as well as the sweets of love—with this difference only, that you always prepared the bitter cup for yourself, while I—

LYDIA. Was always obliged to me for it—hey, Mr. Modesty?—But come, no more of that—our happiness is now as unalloyed as general.

JULIA. Then let us study to preserve it so, and while Hope pictures to us a flattering scene of future bliss, let us deny its pencil those colors which are too bright to be lasting.—When hearts deserving happiness would unite their fortunes, Virtue would crown them with an unfading garland of modest, hurtless flowers; but ill-judging Passion will force the gaudier rose into the wreath, whose thorn offends them when its leaves are dropped!

Exeunt Omnes.

THE SCENES OF THE PLAY

ACT I.—Algernon Moncrieff's Flat in Half-Moon Street, W.

ACT II.—The Garden at the Manor House, Woolton

ACT III.—Drawing-Room of the Manor House, Woolton

TIME.—The Present

PLACE.—London

ACT I

SCENE.—Morning-room in ALGERNON's flat in Half-Moon Street. The room is luxuriously and artistically furnished. The sound of a piano is heard in the adjoining room.

[LANE is arranging afternoon tea on the table, and after the music has ceased, ALGERNON enters.]

ALGERNON. Did you hear what I was playing, Lane?

LANE. I didn't think it polite to listen, sir.

ALGERNON. I'm sorry for that, for your sake. I don't play accurately—anyone can play accurately—but I play with wonderful expression. As far as the piano is concerned, sentiment is my forte. I keep science for Life.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGERNON. And, speaking of the science of Life, have you got the cucumber sandwiches cut for Lady Bracknell?

LANE. Yes, sir. [Hands them on a salver.]

ALGERNON [inspects them, takes two, and sits down on the sofa]. Oh! . . . by the way, Lane, I see from your book that on Thursday night, when Lord Shoreman and Mr. Worthing were dining with me, eight bottles of champagne are entered as having been consumed.

LANE. Yes, sir; eight bottles and a pint.

ALGERNON. Why is it that at a bachelor's establishment the servants invariably drink the champagne? I ask merely for information.

LANE. I attribute it to the superior quality of the wine, sir. I have often observed that in married households the champagne is rarely of a first-rate brand.

ALGERNON. Good Heavens! Is marriage so demoralizing as that?

LANE. I believe it is a very pleasant state, sir. I have had very little experience of it myself up to the present. I have only been married once. That was in consequence of a misunderstanding between myself and a young woman.

ALGERNON [languidly]. I don't know that I am much interested in your family life, Lane.

LANE. No, sir; it is not a very interesting subject. I never think of it myself.

ALGERNON. Very natural, I am sure. That will do, Lane, thank you.

LANE. Thank you, sir. [LANE goes out.]

ALGERNON. Lane's views on marriage seem somewhat lax. Really, if the lower orders don't set us a good example, what on earth is the use of them? They seem, as a class, to have absolutely no sense of moral responsibility.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Mr. Ernest Worthing.

Enter JACK. LANE goes out.

ALGERNON. How are you, my dear Ernest? What brings you up to town?

JACK. Oh, pleasure, pleasure! What else should bring one anywhere? Eating as usual, I see, Algy!

ALGERNON [stiffly]. I believe it is customary in good society to take some slight refreshment at five o'clock. Where have you been since last Thursday?

JACK [sitting down on the sofa]. In the country.

ALGERNON. What on earth do you do there?

JACK [pulling off his gloves]. When one is in town one amuses oneself. When one is in the country one amuses other people. It is excessively boring.

ALGERNON. And who are the people you amuse?

JACK [airily]. Oh, neighbours, neighbours.

ALGERNON. Got nice neighbours in your part of Shropshire?

JACK. Perfectly horrid! Never speak to one of them.

ALGERNON. How immensely you must amuse them! [Goes over and takes sandwich.] By the way, Shropshire is your county, is it not?

JACK. Eh? Shropshire? Yes, of course. Hallo! Why all these cups? Why cucumber sandwiches? Why such reckless extravagance in one so young? Who is coming to tea?

ALGERNON. Oh! merely Aunt Augusta and Gwendolen.

JACK. How perfectly delightful!

ALGERNON. Yes, that is all very well; but I am afraid Aunt Augusta won't quite approve of your being here.

JACK. May I ask why?

ALGERNON. My dear fellow, the way you flirt with Gwendolen is perfectly disgraceful. It is almost as bad as the way Gwendolen flirts with you.

JACK. I am in love with Gwendolen. I have come up to town expressly to propose to her.

ALGERNON. I thought you had come up for pleasure? . . . I call that business.

JACK. How utterly unromantic you are!

ALGERNON. I really don't see anything romantic in proposing. It is very romantic to be in love. But there is nothing romantic about a definite proposal. Why, one may be accepted. One usually is, I believe. Then the excitement is all over. The very essence of romance is uncertainty. If ever I get married, I'll certainly try to forget the fact.

JACK. I have no doubt about that, dear Algy. The Divorce Court was specially invented for people whose memories are so curiously constituted.

ALGERNON. Oh! there is no use speculating on that subject. Divorces are made in Heaven—[Jack puts out his hand to take a sandwich. ALGERNON at once interferes.] Please don't touch the cucumber sandwiches. They are ordered specially for Aunt Augusta. [Takes one and eats it.]

JACK. Well, you have been eating them all the time.

ALGERNON. That is quite a different matter. She is my aunt. [Takes plate from below.] Have some bread and butter. The bread and butter is for Gwendolen. Gwendolen is devoted to bread and butter.

JACK [advancing to table and helping himself]. And very good bread and butter it is, too.

ALGERNON. Well, my dear fellow, you need not eat as if you were going to eat it all. You behave as if you were married to her already. You are not married to her already, and I don't think you ever will be.

JACK. Why on earth do you say that?

ALGERNON. Well, in the first place girls never marry the men they flirt with. Girls don't think it right.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense!

ALGERNON. It isn't. It is a great truth. It accounts for the extraordinary number of bachelors that one sees all over the place. In the second place, I don't give my consent.

JACK. Your consent!

ALGERNON. My dear fellow, Gwendolen is my first cousin. And before I allow you to marry her, you will have to clear up the whole question of Cecily. [Rings bell.]

JACK. Cecily! What on earth do you mean? What do you mean, Algy, by Cecily? I don't know anyone of the name of Cecily.

Enter LANE.

ALGERNON. Bring me that cigarette case Mr. Worthing left in the smoking-room the last time he dined here.

LANE. Yes, sir. [LANE goes out.]

JACK. Do you mean to say you have had my cigarette case all this time? I wish to goodness you had let me know. I have been writing frantic letters to Scotland Yard about it. I was very nearly offering a large reward.

ALGERNON. Well, I wish you would offer one. I happen to be more than usually hard up.

JACK. There is no good offering a large reward now that the thing is found.

Enter LANE with the cigarette case on a salver.
ALGERNON takes it at once. LANE goes out.

ALGERNON. I think that is rather mean of you, Ernest, I must say. [Opens case and examines it.] However, it makes no matter, for, now that I look at the inscription, I find that the thing isn't yours after all.

JACK. Of course it's mine. [Moving to him.] You have seen me with it a hundred times, and you have no right whatsoever to read what is written inside. It is a very ungentlemanly thing to read a private cigarette case.

ALGERNON. Oh! it is absurd to have a hard-and-fast rule about what one should read and what one shouldn't. More than half of modern culture depends on what one shouldn't read.

JACK. I am quite aware of the fact, and I don't propose to discuss modern culture. It isn't the sort of thing one should talk of in private. I simply want my cigarette case back.

ALGERNON. Yes; but this isn't your cigarette case. This cigarette case is a present from someone of the name of Cecily, and you said you didn't know anyone of that name.

JACK. Well, if you want to know, Cecily happens to be my aunt.

ALGERNON. Your aunt!

JACK. Yes. Charming old lady she is, too. Lives at Tunbridge Wells. Just give it back to me, Algy.

ALGERNON [retreating to back of sofa]. But why does she call herself little Cecily if she is your aunt and lives at Tunbridge Wells? [Reading.] "From little Cecily with her fondest love."

JACK [moving to sofa and kneeling upon it]. My dear fellow, what on earth is there in that? Some aunts are tall, some aunts are not tall. That is a matter that surely an aunt may be allowed to decide for herself

You seem to think that every aunt should be exactly like your aunt! That is absurd! For Heaven's sake give me back my cigarette case. [Follows ERNEST round the room.]

ALGERNON. Yes. But why does your aunt call you her uncle? "From little Cecily, with her fondest love to her dear Uncle Jack." There is no objection, I admit, to an aunt being a small aunt, but why an aunt, no matter what her size may be, should call her own nephew her uncle, I can't quite make out. Besides, your name isn't Jack at all; it is Ernest.

JACK. It isn't Ernest; it's Jack.

ALGERNON. You have always told me it was Ernest. I have introduced you to everyone as Ernest. You answer to the name of Ernest. You look as if your name was Ernest. You are the most earnest looking person I ever saw in my life. It is perfectly absurd your saying that your name isn't Ernest. It's on your cards. Here is one of them. [Taking it from case.] "Mr. Ernest Worthing, B 4, The Albany." I'll keep this as a proof your name is Ernest if ever you attempt to deny it to me, or to Gwendolen, or to anyone else. [Puts the card in his pocket.]

JACK. Well, my name is Ernest in town and Jack in the country, and the cigarette case was given to me in the country.

ALGERNON. Yes, but that does not account for the fact that your small Aunt Cecily, who lives at Tunbridge Wells, calls you her dear uncle. Come, old boy, you had much better have the thing out at once.

JACK. My dear Algy, you talk exactly as if you were a dentist. It is very vulgar to talk like a dentist when one isn't a dentist. It produces a false impression.

ALGERNON. Well, that is exactly what dentists always do. Now, go on! Tell me the whole thing. I may mention that I have always suspected you of being a confirmed and secret Bunburyist; and I am quite sure of it now.

JACK. Bunburyist? What on earth do you mean by a Bunburyist?

ALGERNON. I'll reveal to you the meaning of that incomparable expression as soon as you are kind enough to inform me why you are Ernest in town and Jack in the country.

JACK. Well, produce my cigarette case first.

ALGERNON. Here it is. [Hands cigarette case.] Now produce your explanation, and pray make it improbable. [Sits on sofa.]

JACK. My dear fellow, there is nothing improbable about my explanation at all. In fact it's perfectly ordinary. Old Mr. Thomas Cardew, who adopted me when I was a little boy, made me in his will guardian to his grand-daughter, Miss Cecily Cardew. Cecily, who addresses me as her uncle from motives of respect that you could not possibly appreciate, lives at my place in the country under the charge of her admirable governess, Miss Prism.

ALGERNON. Where is that place in the country, by the way?

JACK. That is nothing to you, dear boy. You are not going to be invited. . . . I may tell you candidly that the place is not in Shropshire.

ALGERNON. I suspected that, my dear fellow! I have Bunburied all over Shropshire on two separate occasions. Now, go on. Why are you Ernest in town and Jack in the country?

JACK. My dear Algy, I don't know whether you will be able to understand my real motives. You are hardly serious enough. When one is placed in the position of guardian, one has to adopt a very high moral tone on all subjects. It's one's duty to do so. And as a high moral tone can hardly be said to conduce very much to either one's health or one's happiness, in order to get up to town I have always pretended to have a younger brother of the name of Ernest, who lives in the Albany, and gets into the most dreadful scrapes. That, my dear Algy, is the whole truth pure and simple.

ALGERNON. The truth is rarely pure and never simple. Modern life would be very tedious if it were either, and modern literature a complete impossibility!

JACK. That wouldn't be at all a bad thing.

ALGERNON. Literary criticism is not your forte, my dear fellow. Don't try it. You should leave that to people who haven't been at a University. They do it so well in the daily papers. What you really are is a Bunburyist. I was quite right in saying you were a Bunburyist. You are one of the most advanced Bunburyists I know.

JACK. What on earth do you mean?

ALGERNON. You have invented a very useful younger brother called Ernest, in order that you may be able to come up to town as often as you like. I have invented an invaluable permanent invalid called Bunbury, in order that I may be able to go down into the country whenever I choose. Bunbury is perfectly invaluable. If it wasn't for Bunbury's extraordinary bad health, for instance, I wouldn't be able to dine with you at Willis's to-night, for I have been really engaged to Aunt Augusta for more than a week.

JACK. I haven't asked you to dine with me anywhere to-night.

ALGERNON. I know. You are absolutely careless about sending out invitations. It is very foolish of you. Nothing annoys people so much as not receiving invitations.

JACK. You had much better dine with your Aunt Augusta.

ALGERNON. I haven't the smallest intention of doing anything of the kind. To begin with, I dined there on Monday, and once a week is quite enough to dine with one's own relatives. In the second place, whenever I do dine there I am always treated as a member of the family, and sent down with either no woman at all, or two. In the third place, I know perfectly well whom she will place me next to, to-night. She will place me next Mary Farquhar, who always flirts with her own husband across the dinner-table. That is not very pleasant. Indeed, it is not even decent . . . and that sort of thing is enormously on the increase. The amount of women in London who flirt with their own husbands is perfectly scandalous. It looks so bad. It is simply washing one's clean linen in public. Besides, now that I know you to be a confirmed Bunburyist I naturally want to talk to you about Bunburying. I want to tell you the rules.

JACK. I'm not a Bunburyist at all. If Gwendolen accepts me, I am going to kill my brother, indeed I think I'll kill him in any case. Cecily is a little too much interested in him. It is rather a bore. So I am going to get rid of Ernest. And I strongly advise you to do the same with Mr. . . . with your invalid friend who has the absurd name.

ALGERNON. Nothing will induce me to part with Bunbury, and if you ever get married, which seems to me extremely problematic, you will be very glad to know Bunbury. A man who marries without knowing Bunbury has a very tedious time of it.

JACK. That is nonsense. If I marry a charming girl like Gwendolen, and she is the only girl I ever saw in my life that I would marry, I certainly won't want to know Bunbury.

ALGERNON. Then your wife will. You don't seem to realize, that in married life three is company and two is none.

JACK [sententiously]. That, my dear young friend, is the theory that the corrupt French Drama has been propounding for the last fifty years.

ALGERNON. Yes; and that the happy English home has proved in half the time.

JACK. For heaven's sake, don't try to be cynical. It's perfectly easy to be cynical.

ALGERNON. My dear fellow, it isn't easy to be anything now-a-days. There's such a lot of beastly competition about. [The sound of an electric bell is heard.] Ah! that must be Aunt Augusta. Only relatives, or creditors, ever ring in that Wagnerian manner. Now, if I get her out of the way for ten minutes, so that you can have an opportunity for proposing to Gwendolen, may I dine with you to-night at Willis's?

JACK. I suppose so, if you want to.

ALGERNON. Yes, but you must be serious about it. I hate people who are not serious about meals. It is so shallow of them.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Lady Bracknell and Miss Fairfax. [ALGERNON goes forward to meet them. Enter Lady BRACKNELL and GWENDOLEN.]

LADY BRACKNELL. Good afternoon, dear Algernon, I hope you are behaving very well.

ALGERNON. I'm feeling very well, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. That's not quite the same thing. In fact the two things rarely go together. [Sees JACK and bows to him with icy coldness.]

ALGERNON [to GWENDOLEN]. Dear me, you are smart!

GWENDOLEN. I am always smart! Aren't I, Mr. Worthing?

JACK. You're quite perfect, Miss Fairfax.

GWENDOLEN. Oh! I hope I am not that. It would leave no room for developments, and I intend to develop in many directions. [GWENDOLEN and JACK sit down together in the corner.]

LADY BRACKNELL. I'm sorry if we are a little late, Algernon, but I was obliged to call on dear Lady Harbury. I hadn't been there since her poor husband's death. I never saw a woman so altered; she looks quite twenty years younger. And now I'll have a cup of tea, and one of those nice cucumber sandwiches you promised me.

ALGERNON. Certainly, Aunt Augusta. [Goes over to tea-table.]

LADY BRACKNELL. Won't you come and sit here, Gwendolen?

GWENDOLEN. Thanks, mamma, I'm quite comfortable where I am.

ALGERNON [picking up empty plate in horror.] Good heavens! Lane! Why are there no cucumber sandwiches? I ordered them specially.

LANE [gravely]. There were no cucumbers in the market this morning, sir. I went down twice.

ALGERNON. No cucumbers!

LANE. No, sir. Not even for ready money.

ALGERNON. That will do, Lane, thank you.

LANE. Thank you, sir. [Goes out.]

ALGERNON. I am greatly distressed, Aunt Augusta, about there being no cucumbers, not even for ready money.

LADY BRACKNELL. It really makes no matter, Algernon. I had some crumpets with Lady Harbury, who seems to me to be living entirely for pleasure now.

ALGERNON. I hear her hair has turned quite gold from grief.

LADY BRACKNELL. It certainly has changed its colour. From what cause I, of course, cannot say. [ALGERNON crosses and hands tea.] Thank you. I've quite a treat for you to-night, Algernon. I am going to send you down with Mary Farquhar. She is such a nice woman, and so attentive to her husband. It's delightful to watch them.

ALGERNON. I am afraid, Aunt Augusta, I shall have to give up the pleasure of dining with you to-night after all.

LADY BRACKNELL [frowning]. I hope not, Algernon. It would put my table completely out. Your uncle would have to dine upstairs. Fortunately he is accustomed to that.

ALGERNON. It is a great bore, and, I need hardly say, a terrible disappointment to me, but the fact is I have just had a telegram to say that my poor friend Bunbury is very ill again. [Exchanges glances with JACK.] They seem to think I should be with him.

LADY BRACKNELL. It is very strange. This Mr. Bunbury seems to suffer from curiously bad health.

ALGERNON. Yes; poor Bunbury is a dreadful invalid.

LADY BRACKNELL. Well, I must say, Algernon, that I think it is high time that Mr. Bunbury made up his mind whether he was going to live or to die. This shilly-shallying with the question is absurd. Nor do I in any way approve of the modern sympathy with invalids. I consider it morbid. Illness of any kind is hardly a thing to be encouraged in others. Health is the primary duty of life. I am always telling that to your poor uncle, but he never seems to take much notice . . . as far as any improvement in his ailments goes. I should be much obliged if you would ask Mr. Bunbury, from me, to be kind enough not to have a relapse on Saturday, for I rely on you to arrange my music for me. It is my last reception and one wants something that will encourage conversation, particularly at the end of the season when everyone has practically said whatever they had to say, which, in most cases, was probably not much.

ALGERNON. I'll speak to Bunbury, Aunt Augusta, if he is still conscious, and I think I can promise you he'll be all right by Saturday. You see, if one plays good music, people don't listen, and if one plays bad music people don't talk. But I'll run over the programme I've drawn out, if you will kindly come into the next room for a moment.

LADY BRACKNELL. Thank you, Algernon. It is very thoughtful of you. [Rising, and following ALGERNON.] I'm sure the programme will be delightful, after a few expurgations. French songs I cannot possibly allow. People always seem to think that they are improper, and either look shocked, which is vulgar, or laugh, which is worse. But German sounds a thoroughly respectable language, and indeed, I believe is so. Gwendolen, you will accompany me.

GWENDOLEN. Certainly, mamma. [LADY BRACKNELL and ALGERNON go into the music-room, GWENDOLEN remains behind.]

JACK. Charming day it has been, Miss Fairfax.

GWENDOLEN. Pray don't talk to me about the weather, Mr. Worthing. Whenever people talk to me about the weather, I always feel quite certain that they mean something else. And that makes me so nervous.

JACK. I do mean something else.

GWENDOLEN. I thought so. In fact, I am never wrong.

JACK. And I would like to be allowed to take advantage of Lady Bracknell's temporary absence . . .

GWENDOLEN. I would certainly advise you to do so. Mamma has a way of coming back suddenly into a room that I have often had to speak to her about.

JACK [nervously]. Miss Fairfax, ever since I met you I have admired you more than any girl . . . I have ever met since . . . 30 I met you.

GWENDOLEN. Yes, I am quite aware of the fact. And I often wish that in public, at any rate, you had been more demonstrative. For me you have always had an irresistible fascination. Even before I met you I was far from indifferent to you. [JACK looks at her in amazement.] We live, as I hope you know, Mr. Worthing, in an age of ideals. The fact is constantly mentioned in the more expensive monthly magazines, and has reached the provincial pulpits, I am told: and my ideal has always been to love some one of the name of Ernest. There is something in that name that inspires absolute confidence. The moment Algernon first mentioned to me that he had a friend called Ernest, I knew I was destined to love you.

JACK. You really love me, Gwendolen?

GWENDOLEN. Passionately!

JACK. Darling! You don't know how happy you've made me.

GWENDOLEN. My own Ernest!

JACK. But you don't really mean to say that you couldn't love me if my name wasn't Ernest?

GWENDOLEN. But your name is Ernest.

JACK. Yes, I know it is. But supposing it was something else? Do you mean to say you couldn't love me then?

GWENDOLEN [glibly]. Ah! that is clearly a metaphysical speculation, and like most metaphysical speculations has very little reference at all to the actual facts of real life, as we know them.

JACK. Personally, darling, to speak quite candidly, I don't much care about the name of Ernest . . . I don't think that name suits me at all.

GWENDOLEN. It suits you perfectly. It is a divine name. It has a music of its own. It produces vibrations.

JACK. Well really, Gwendolen, I must say that I think there are lots of other much nicer names. I think Jack, for instance, a charming name.

GWENDOLEN. Jack? . . . No, there is very little music in the name Jack, if any at all, indeed. It does not thrill. It produces absolutely no vibrations. . . . I have known several Jacks, and they all, without exception, were more than usually plain. Besides, Jack is a notorious domesticity for John! And I pity any woman who is married to a man called John. She would probably never be allowed to know the entrancing pleasure of a single moment's solitude. The only really safe name is Ernest.

JACK. Gwendolen, I must get christened at once—I mean we must get married at once. There is no time to be lost.

GWENDOLEN. Married, Mr. Worthing?

JACK [astounded]. Well . . . surely. You know that I love you, and you led me to believe, Miss Fairfax, that you were not absolutely indifferent to me.

GWENDOLEN. I adore you. But you haven't proposed to me yet. Nothing has been said at all about marriage. The subject has not even been touched on.

JACK. Well . . . may I propose to you now?

GWENDOLEN. I think it would be an admirable opportunity. And to spare you any possible disappointment, Mr. Worthing, I think it only fair to tell you quite frankly beforehand that I am fully determined to accept you.

JACK. Gwendolen!

GWENDOLEN. Yes, Mr. Worthing, what have you got to say to me?

JACK. You know what I have got to say to you.

GWENDOLEN. Yes, but you don't say it.

JACK. Gwendolen, will you marry me? [Goes on his knees.]

GWENDOLEN. Of course I will, darling. How long you have been about it! I am afraid you have had very little experience in how to propose.

JACK. My own one, I have never loved anyone in the world but you.

GWENDOLEN. Yes, but men often propose for practice. I know my brother Gerald does. All my girl-friends tell me so. What wonderfully blue eyes you have, Ernest! They are quite, quite blue. I hope you will always look at me just like that, especially when there are other people present.

Enter LADY BRACKNELL.

LADY BRACKNELL. Mr. Worthing! Rise, sir, from this semi-recumbent posture. It is most indecorous.

GWENDOLEN. Mamma! [He tries to rise; she restrains him.] I must beg you to retire. This is no place for you. Besides, Mr. Worthing has not quite finished yet.

LADY BRACKNELL. Finished what, may I ask?

GWENDOLEN. I am engaged to Mr. Worthing, mamma. [They rise together.]

LADY BRACKNELL. Pardon me, you are not engaged to anyone. When you do become engaged to some one, I, or you father, should his health permit him, will inform you of the fact. An engagement should come on a young girl as a surprise, pleasant or unpleasant, as the case may be. It is hardly a matter that she could be allowed to arrange for herself. . . . And now I have a few questions to put to you, Mr. Worthing. While I am making these inquiries, you, Gwendolen, will wait for me below in the carriage.

GWENDOLEN [reproachfully]. Mamma!

LADY BRACKNELL. In the carriage, Gwendolen! [GWENDOLEN goes to the door. She and JACK blow kisses to each other behind LADY BRACKNELL'S back. LADY BRACKNELL looks vaguely about as if she could not under- stand what the noise was. Finally turns round.] Gwendolen, the carriage!

GWENDOLEN. Yes, mamma. [Goes out, looking back at JACK.]

LADY BRACKNELL [sitting down]. You can take a seat, Mr. Worthing. [Looks in her pocket for note-book and pencil.]

JACK. Thank you, Lady Bracknell, I prefer standing.

LADY BRACKNELL [pencil and note-book in hand]. I feel bound to tell you that you are not down on my list of eligible young men, although I have the same list as the dear Duchess of Bolton has. We work together, in fact. However, I am quite ready to enter your name, should your answers be what a really affectionate mother requires. Do you smoke?

JACK. Well, yes, I must admit I smoke.

LADY BRACKNELL. I am glad to hear it. A man should always have an occupation of some kind. There are far too many idle men in London as it is. How old are you?

JACK. Twenty-nine.

LADY BRACKNELL. A very good age to be married at. I have always been of opinion that a man who desires to get married should know either everything or nothing. Which do you know?

JACK [after some hesitation]. I know nothing, Lady Bracknell.

LADY BRACKNELL. I am pleased to hear it. I do not approve of anything that tampers with natural ignorance. Ignorance is like a delicate exotic fruit; touch it and the bloom is gone. The whole theory of modern education is radically unsound. Fortunately in England, at any rate, education produces no effect whatsoever. If it did, it would prove a serious danger to the upper classes, and probably lead to acts of violence in Grosvenor Square. What is your income?

JACK. Between seven and eight thousand a year.

LADY BRACKNELL [makes a note in her book]. In land, or in investments?

JACK. In investments, chiefly.

LADY BRACKNELL. That is satisfactory. What between the duties expected of one during one's life-time, and the duties exacted from one after one's death, land has ceased to be either a profit or a pleasure. It gives one position, and prevents one from keeping it up. That's all that can be said about land.

JACK. I have a country house with some land, of course, attached to it, about fifteen hundred acres, I believe; but I don't depend on that for my real income. In fact, as far as I can make out, the poachers are the only people who make anything out of it.

LADY BRACKNELL. A country house! How many bedrooms? Well, that point can be cleared up afterwards. You have a town house, I hope? A girl with a simple, unspoiled nature, like Gwendolen, could hardly be expected to reside in the country.

JACK. Well, I own a house in Belgrave Square, but it is let by the year to Lady Bloxham. Of course, I can get it back whenever I like, at six months' notice.

LADY BRACKNELL. Lady Bloxham? I don't know her.

JACK. Oh, she goes about very little. She is a lady considerably advanced in years.

LADY BRACKNELL. Ah, now-a-days that is no guarantee of respectability of character. What number in Belgrave Square?

JACK. 149.

LADY BRACKNELL [shaking her head]. The unfashionable side. I thought there was something. However, that could easily be altered.

JACK. Do you mean the fashion, or the side?

LADY BRACKNELL [sternly]. Both, if necessary, I presume. What are your politics?

JACK. Well, I am afraid I really have none. I am a Liberal Unionist.

LADY BRACKNELL. Oh, they count as Tories. They dine with us. Or come in the evening, at any rate. Now to minor affairs. Are your parents living?

JACK. I have lost both my parents.

LADY BRACKNELL. Both? . . . That seems like carelessness. Who was your father? He was evidently a man of some wealth. Was he born in what the Radical papers call the purple of commerce, or did he rise from the ranks of the aristocracy?

JACK. I am afraid I really don't know. The fact is, Lady Bracknell, I said I had lost my parents. It would be nearer the truth to say that my parents seem to have lost me . . . I don't actually know who I am by birth. I was . . . well, I was found.

LADY BRACKNELL. Found!

JACK. The late Mr. Thomas Cardew, an old gentleman of a very charitable and kindly disposition, found me, and gave me the name of Worthing, because he happened to have a first-class ticket for Worthing in his pocket at the time. Worthing is a place in Sussex. It is a seaside resort.

LADY BRACKNELL. Where did the charitable gentleman who had a first-class ticket for this seaside resort find you?

JACK [gravely]. In a hand-bag.

LADY BRACKNELL. A hand-bag?

JACK [very seriously]. Yes, Lady Bracknell. I was in a hand-bag—a somewhat large, black leather hand-bag, with handles to it—an ordinary hand-bag in fact.

LADY BRACKNELL. In what locality did this Mr. James, or Thomas, Cardew come across this ordinary hand-bag?

JACK. In the cloak-room at Victoria Station. It was given to him in mistake for his own.

LADY BRACKNELL. The cloak-room at Victoria Station?

JACK. Yes. The Brighton line.

LADY BRACKNELL. The line is immaterial. Mr. Worthing, I confess I feel somewhat bewildered by what you have just told me. To be born, or at any rate bred, in a hand-bag, whether it had handles or not, seems to me to display a contempt for the ordinary decencies of family life that remind one of the worst excesses of the French Revolution. And I presume you know what that unfortunate movement led to? As for the particular locality in which the hand-bag was found, a cloak-room at a railway station might serve to conceal a social indiscretion—has probably, indeed, been used for that purpose before now—but it could hardly be regarded as an assured basis for a recognized position in good society.

JACK. May I ask you then what you would advise me to do? I need hardly say I would do anything in the world to ensure Gwendolen's happiness.

LADY BRACKNELL. I would strongly advise you, Mr. Worthing, to try and acquire some relations as soon as possible, and to make a definite effort to produce at any rate one parent, of either sex, before the season is quite over.

JACK. Well, I don't see how I could possibly manage to do that. I can produce the hand-bag at any moment. It is in my dressing-room at home. I really think that should satisfy you, Lady Bracknell.

LADY BRACKNELL. Me, sir! What has it to do with me? You can hardly imagine that I and Lord Bracknell would dream of allowing our only daughter—a girl brought up with the utmost care—to marry into a cloakroom, and form an alliance with a parcel? Good morning, Mr. Worthing! [LADY BRACKNELL sweeps out in majestic indignation.]

JACK. Good morning! [ALGERNON, from the other room, strikes up the Wedding March.

JACK looks perfectly furious, and goes to the door.] For goodness' sake, don't play that ghastly tune, Algy! How idiotic you are! [The music stops, and ALGERNON enters cheerily.]

ALGERNON. Didn't it go off all right, old boy? You don't mean to say Gwendolen refused you? I know it is a way she has. She is always refusing people. I think it is most ill-natured of her.

JACK. Oh, Gwendolen is as right as a trivet. As far as she is concerned, we are engaged. Her mother is perfectly unbearable. Never met such a Gorgon . . . I don't really know what a Gorgon is like, but I am quite sure that Lady Bracknell is one. In any case, she is a monster, without being a myth, which is rather unfair. . . . I beg your pardon, Algy, I suppose I shouldn't talk about your own aunt in that way before you.

ALGERNON. My dear boy, I love hearing my relations abused. It is the only thing that makes me put up with them at all. Relations are simply a tedious pack of people, who haven't got the remotest knowledge of how to live, nor the smallest instinct about when to die.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense!

ALGERNON. It isn't!

JACK. Well, I won't argue about the matter. You always want to argue about things.

ALGERNON. That is exactly what things were originally made for.

JACK. Upon my word, if I thought that, I'd shoot myself . . . [A pause.] You don't think there is any chance of Gwendolen becoming like her mother in about a hundred and fifty years, do you, Algy?

ALGERNON. All women become like their mothers. That is their tragedy. No man does. That's his.

JACK. Is that clever?

ALGERNON. It is perfectly phrased! and quite as true as any observation in civilized life should be.

JACK. I am sick to death of cleverness. Everybody is clever now-a-days. You can't go anywhere without meeting clever people. The thing has become an absolute public nuisance. I wish to goodness we had a few fools left.

ALGERNON. We have.

JACK. I should extremely like to meet them. What do they talk about?

ALGERNON. The fools? Oh! about the clever people, of course.

JACK. What fools!

ALGERNON. By the way, did you tell Gwendolen the truth about your being Ernest in town, and Jack in the country?

JACK [in a very patronising manner]. My dear fellow, the truth isn't quite the sort of thing one tells to a nice, sweet, refined girl. What extraordinary ideas you have about the way to behave to a woman!

ALGERNON. The only way to behave to a woman is to make love to her, if she is pretty, and to someone else if she is plain.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense.

ALGERNON. What about your brother? What about the profligate Ernest?

JACK. Oh, before the end of the week I shall have got rid of him. I'll say he died in Paris of apoplexy. Lots of people die of apoplexy, quite suddenly, don't they?

ALGERNON. Yes, but it's hereditary, my dear fellow. It's a sort of thing that runs in families. You had much better say a severe chill.

JACK. You are sure a severe chill isn't hereditary, or anything of that kind?

ALGERNON. Of course it isn't!

JACK. Very well, then. My poor brother Ernest is carried off suddenly in Paris, by a severe chill. That gets rid of him.

ALGERNON. But I thought you said that . . . Miss Cardew was a little too much interested in your poor brother Ernest? Won't she feel his loss a good deal?

JACK. Oh, that is all right. Cecily is not a silly, romantic girl, I am glad to say. She has got a capital appetite, goes for long walks, and pays no attention at all to her lessons.

ALGERNON. I would rather like to see Cecily.

JACK. I will take very good care you never do. She is excessively pretty, and she is only just eighteen.

ALGERNON. Have you told Gwendolen yet that you have an excessively pretty ward who is only just eighteen?

JACK. Oh! one doesn't blurt these things out to people. Cecily and Gwendolen are perfectly certain to be extremely great friends. I'll bet you anything you like that half an hour after they have met, they will be calling each other sister.

ALGERNON. Women only do that when they have called each other a lot of other things first. Now, my dear boy, if we want to get a good table at Willis's, we really must go and dress. Do you know it is nearly seven?

Jack [irritably]. Oh! it always is nearly seven.

ALGERNON. Well, I'm hungry.

JACK. I never knew you when you weren't.

ALGERNON. What shall we do after dinner? Go to a theatre?

JACK. Oh, no! I loathe listening.

ALGERNON. Well, let us go to the Club?

JACK. Oh, no! I hate talking.

ALGERNON. Well, we might trot round to the Empire at ten?

JACK. Oh, no! I can't bear looking at things. It is so silly.

ALGERNON. Well, what shall we do?

JACK. Nothing!

ALGERNON. It is awfully hard work doing nothing. However, I don't mind hard work where there is no definite object of any kind.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Miss Fairfax.

Enter GWENDOLEN. LANE goes out.

ALGERNON. Gwendolen, upon my word.

GWENDOLEN. Algy, kindly turn your back. I have something very particular to say to Mr. Worthing.

ALGERNON. Really, Gwendolen, I don't think I can allow this at all.

GWENDOLEN. Algy, you always adopt a strictly immoral attitude towards life. You are not quite old enough to do that. [ALGERNON retires to the fireplace.]

JACK. My own darling!

GWENDOLEN. Ernest, we may never be married. From the expression on mamma's face I fear we never shall. Few parents now-a-days pay any regard to what their children say to them. The old-fashioned respect for the young is fast dying out. Whatever influence I ever had over mamma, I lost at the age of three. But although she may prevent us from becoming man and wife, and I may marry someone else, and marry often, nothing that she can possibly do can alter my eternal devotion to you.

JACK. Dear Gwendolen.

GWENDOLEN. The story of your romantic origin, as related to me by mamma, with unpleasing comments, has naturally stirred the deeper fibres of my nature. Your Christian name has an irresistible fascination. The simplicity of your character makes you exquisitely incomprehensible to me. Your town address at the Albany I have. What is your address in the country?

JACK. The Manor House, Woolton, Hertfordshire.

ALGERNON, who has been carefully listening, smiles to himself, and writes the address on his shirt-cuff. Then picks up the Railway Guide.

GWENDOLEN. There is a good postal service, I suppose? It may be necessary to do something desperate. That, of course, will require serious consideration. I will communicate with you daily.

JACK. My own one!

GWENDOLEN. How long do you remain in town?

JACK. Till Monday.

GWENDOLEN. Good! Algy, you may turn round now.

ALGERNON. Thanks, I've turned round already.

GWENDOLEN. You may also ring the bell.

JACK. You will let me see you to your carriage, my own darling?

GWENDOLEN. Certainly.

JACK [to LANE, who now enters]. I will see Miss Fairfax out.

LANE. Yes, sir. [JACK and GWENDOLEN go off. LANE presents several letters on a salver to ALGERNON. It is to be surmised that they are bills, as ALGERNON, after looking at the envelopes, tears them up.]

ALGERNON. A glass of sherry, Lane.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGERNON. To-morrow, Lane, I'm going Bunburying.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGERNON. I shall probably not be back till Monday. You can put up my dress clothes, my smoking jacket, and all the Bunbury suits . . .

LANE. Yes, sir. [Handing sherry.]

ALGERNON. I hope to-morrow will be a fine day, Lane.

LANE. It never is, sir.

ALGERNON. Lane, you're a perfect pessimist.

LANE. I do my best to give satisfaction, sir.

Enter JACK. LANE goes off.

JACK. There's a sensible, intellectual girl! the only girl I ever cared for in my life. [ALGERNON is laughing immoderately.] What on earth are you so amused at?

ALGERNON. Oh, I'm a little anxious about poor Bunbury, that's all.

JACK. If you don't take care, your friend Bunbury will get you into a serious scrape some day.

ALGERNON. I love scrapes. They are the only things that are never serious.

JACK. Oh, that's nonsense, Algy. You never talk anything but nonsense.

ALGERNON. Nobody ever does. [JACK looks indignantly at him, and leaves the room.]

ALGERNON lights a cigarette, reads his shirt-cuff and smiles.]

ACT II

SCENE.—Garden at the Manor House. A flight of gray stone steps leads up to the house. The garden, an old-fashioned one, full of roses. Time of year, July. Basket chairs, and a table covered with books, are set under a large yew tree.

MISS PRISM discovered seated at the table.

CECILY is at the back, watering flowers.

MISS PRISM [calling]. Cecily, Cecily! Surely such a utilitarian occupation as the watering of flowers is rather Moulton's duty than yours? Especially at a moment when intellectual pleasures await you. Your German grammar is on the table. Pray open it at page fifteen. We will repeat yesterday's lesson.

CECILY [coming over very slowly]. But I don't like German. It isn't at all a becoming language. I know perfectly well that I look quite plain after my German lesson.

MISS PRISM. Child, you know how anxious your guardian is that you should improve yourself in every way. He laid particular stress on your German, as he was leaving for town yesterday. Indeed, he always lays stress on your German when he is leaving for town.

CECILY. Dear Uncle Jack is so very serious! Sometimes he is so serious that I think he cannot be quite well.

MISS PRISM [drawing herself up]. Your guardian enjoys the best of health, and his gravity of demeanour is especially to be commended in one so comparatively young as he is. I know no one who has a higher sense of duty and responsibility.

CECILY. I suppose that is why he often looks a little bored when we three are together.

MISS PRISM. Cecily! I am surprised at you. Mr. Worthing has many troubles in his life. Idle merriment and triviality would be out of place in his conversation. You must remember his constant anxiety about that unfortunate young man, his brother.

CECILY. I wish Uncle Jack would allow that unfortunate young man, his brother, to come down here sometimes. We might have a good influence over him, Miss Prism. I am sure you certainly would. You know German, and geology, and things of that kind influence a man very much. [CECILY begins to write in her diary.]

MISS PRISM [shaking her head]. I do not think that even I could produce any effect on a character that, according to his own brother's admission, is irretrievably weak and vacillating. Indeed, I am not sure that I would desire to reclaim him. I am not in favour of this modern mania for turning bad people into good people at a moment's notice. As a man sows, so let him reap. You must put away your diary, Cecily. I really don't see why you should keep a diary at all.

CECILY. I keep a diary in order to enter the wonderful secrets of my life. If I didn't write them down, I should probably forget all about them.

MISS PRISM. Memory, my dear Cecily, is the diary that we all carry about with us.

CECILY. Yes, but it usually chronicles the things that have never happened, and couldn't possibly have happened. I believe that Memory is responsible for nearly all the three-volume novels that Mudie sends us.

MISS PRISM. Do not speak slightly of the three-volume novel, Cecily. I wrote one myself in earlier days.

CECILY. Did you really, Miss Prism? How wonderfully clever you are! I hope it did not end happily? I don't like novels that end happily. They depress me so much.

MISS PRISM. The good ended happily, and the bad unhappily. That is what Fiction means.

CECILY. I suppose so. But it seems very unfair. And was your novel ever published?

MISS PRISM. Alas! no. The manuscript unfortunately was abandoned. I use the word in the sense of lost or mislaid. To your work, child, these speculations are profitless.

CECILY [smiling]. But I see dear Dr. Chasuble coming up through the garden.

MISS PRISM [rising and advancing]. Dr. Chasuble! This is indeed a pleasure.

Enter CANON CHASUBLE.

CHASUBLE. And how are we this morning? Miss Prism, you are, I trust, well?

CECILY. Miss Prism has just been complaining of a slight headache. I think it would do her so much good to have a short stroll with you in the park, Dr. Chasuble.

MISS PRISM. Cecily, I have not mentioned anything about a headache.

CECILY. No, dear Miss Prism, I know that, but I felt instinctively that you had a headache. Indeed I was thinking about that, and not about my German lesson, when the Rector came in.

CHASUBLE. I hope, Cecily, you are not inattentive.

CECILY. Oh, I am afraid I am.

CHASUBLE. That is strange. Were I fortunate enough to be Miss Prism's pupil, I would hang upon her lips. [MISS PRISM glares.] I spoke metaphorically. —My metaphor was drawn from bees. Ahem! Mr. Worthing, I suppose, has not returned from town yet?

MISS PRISM. We do not expect him till Monday afternoon.

CHASUBLE. Ah yes, he usually likes to spend his Sunday in London. He is not one of those whose sole aim is enjoyment, as, by all accounts, that unfortunate young man, his brother, seems to be. But I must not disturb Egeria and her pupil any longer.

MISS PRISM. Egeria? My name is Læticia, Doctor.

CHASUBLE [bowing]. A classical allusion merely, drawn from the Pagan authors. I shall see you both no doubt at Evensong.

MISS PRISM. I think, dear Doctor, I will have a stroll with you. I find I have a headache after all, and a walk might do it good.

CHASUBLE. With pleasure, Miss Prism, with pleasure. We might go as far as the schools and back.

MISS PRISM. That would be delightful. Cecily, you will read your Political Economy in my absence. The chapter on the Fall of the Rupee you may omit. It is somewhat too sensational. Even these metallic problems have their melodramatic side.

[Goes down the garden with DR. CHASUBLE.]

CECILY [picks up books and throws them back on table]. Horrid Political Economy! Horrid Geography! Horrid, horrid German!

Enter MERRIMAN with a card on a salver.

MERRIMAN. Mr. Ernest Worthing has just driven over from the station. He has brought his luggage with him.

CECILY [takes the card and reads it]. "Mr. Ernest Worthing, B 4, The Albany, W." Uncle Jack's brother! Did you tell him Mr. Worthing was in town?

MERRIMAN. Yes, Miss. He seemed very much disappointed. I mentioned that you and Miss Prism were in the garden. He said he was anxious to speak to you privately for a moment.

CECILY. Ask Mr. Ernest Worthing to come here. I suppose you had better talk to the housekeeper about a room for him.

MERRIMAN. Yes, Miss.

MERRIMAN goes off.

CECILY. I have never met any really wicked person before. I feel rather frightened. I am so afraid he will look just like everyone else.

Enter ALGERNON, very gay and debonair.

He does!

ALGERNON [raising his hat]. You are my little cousin Cecily, I'm sure.

CECILY. You are under some strange mistake. I am not little. In fact, I am more than usually tall for my age. [ALGERNON is rather taken aback.] But I am your cousin Cecily. You, I see from your card, are Uncle Jack's brother, my cousin Ernest, my wicked cousin Ernest.

ALGERNON. Oh! I am not really wicked at all, cousin Cecily. You mustn't think that I am wicked.

CECILY. If you are not, then you have certainly been deceiving us all in a very inexcusable manner. I hope you have not been leading a double life, pretending to be wicked and being really good all the time. That would be hypocrisy.

ALGERNON [looks at her in amazement]. Oh! of course I have been rather reckless.

CECILY. I am glad to hear it.

ALGERNON. In fact, now you mention the subject, I have been very bad in my own small way.

CECILY. I don't think you should be so proud of that, though I am sure it must have been very pleasant.

ALGERNON. It is much pleasanter being here with you.

CECILY. I can't understand how you are here at all. Uncle Jack won't be back till Monday afternoon.

ALGERNON. That is a great disappointment. I am obliged to go up by the first train on Monday morning. I have a business appointment that I am anxious . . . to miss.

CECILY. Couldn't you miss it anywhere but in London?

ALGERNON. No; the appointment is in London.

CECILY. Well, I know, of course, how important it is not to keep a business engagement, if one wants to retain any sense of the beauty of life, but still I think you had better wait till Uncle Jack arrives. I know he wants to speak to you about your emigrating.

ALGERNON. About my what?

CECILY. Your emigrating. He has gone up to buy your outfit.

ALGERNON. I certainly wouldn't let Jack buy my outfit. He has no taste in neckties at all.

CECILY. I don't think you will require neckties. Uncle Jack is sending you to Australia.

ALGERNON. Australia! I'd sooner die.

CECILY. Well, he said at dinner on Wednesday night, that you would have to choose between this world, the next world, and Australia.

ALGERNON. Oh, well! The accounts I have received of Australia and the next world, are not particularly encouraging. This world is good enough for me, cousin Cecily.

CECILY. Yes, but are you good enough for it?

ALGERNON. I'm afraid I'm not that. That is why I want you to reform me. You might make that your mission, if you don't mind, cousin Cecily.

CECILY. I'm afraid I've not time, this afternoon.

ALGERNON. Well, would you mind my reforming myself this afternoon?

CECILY. That is rather Quixotic of you. But I think you should try.

ALGERNON. I will. I feel better already.

CECILY. You are looking a little worse.

ALGERNON. That is because I am hungry.

CECILY. How thoughtless of me. I should have remembered that when one is going to lead an entirely new life, one requires regular and wholesome meals. Won't you come in?

ALGERNON. Thank you. Might I have a button-hole first? I never have any appetite unless I have a button-hole first.

CECILY. A Maréchal Niel? [Picks up scissors.]

ALGERNON. No, I'd sooner have a pink rose.

CECILY. Why? [Cuts a flower.]

ALGERNON. Because you are like a pink rose, cousin Cecily.

CECILY. I don't think it can be right for you to talk to me like that. Miss Prism never says such things to me.

ALGERNON. Then Miss Prism is a short-sighted old lady. [Cecily puts the rose in his button-hole.] You are the prettiest girl I ever saw.

CECILY. Miss Prism says that all good looks are a snare.

ALGERNON. They are a snare that every sensible man would like to be caught in.

CECILY. Oh! I don't think I would care to catch a sensible man. I shouldn't know what to talk to him about.

They pass into the house. MISS PRISM and DR. CHASUBLE return.

MISS PRISM. You are too much alone, dear Dr. Chasuble. You should get married. A misanthrope I can understand—a womanthrope, never!

CHASUBLE [with a scholar's shudder]. Believe me, I do not deserve so neologistic a phrase. The precept as well as the practice of the Primitive Church was distinctly against matrimony.

MISS PRISM [sententiously]. That is obviously the reason why the Primitive Church has not lasted up to the present day. And you do not seem to realize, dear Doctor, that by persistently remaining single, a man converts himself into a permanent public temptation. Men should be careful; this very celibacy leads weaker vessels astray.

CHASUBLE. But is a man not equally attractive when married?

MISS PRISM. No married man is ever attractive except to his wife.

CHASUBLE. And often, I've been told, not even to her.

MISS PRISM. That depends on the intellectual sympathies of the woman. Maturity can always be depended on. Ripeness can be trusted. Young women are green. [DR. CHASUBLE starts.] I spoke horticulturally. My metaphor was drawn from fruits. But where is Cecily?

CHASUBLE. Perhaps she followed us to the schools.

Enter JACK slowly from the back of the garden. He is dressed in the deepest mourning, with crape hatband and black gloves.

MISS PRISM. Mr. Worthing!

CHASUBLE. Mr. Worthing?

MISS PRISM. This is indeed a surprise. We did not look for you till Monday afternoon.

JACK [shakes MISS PRISM's hand in a tragic manner]. I have returned sooner than I expected. Dr. Chasuble, I hope you are well?

CHASUBLE. Dear Mr. Worthing, I trust this garb of woe does not betoken some terrible calamity?

JACK. My brother.

MISS PRISM. More shameful debts and extravagance?

CHASUBLE. Still leading his life of pleasure?

JACK [shaking his head]. Dead!

CHASUBLE. Your brother Ernest dead?

JACK. Quite dead.

MISS PRISM. What a lesson for him! I trust he will profit by it.

CHASUBLE. Mr. Worthing, I offer you my sincere condolence. You have at least the consolation of knowing that you were always the most generous and forgiving of brothers.

JACK. Poor Ernest! He had many faults, but it is a sad, sad blow.

CHASUBLE. Very sad indeed. Were you with him at the end?

JACK. No. He died abroad; in Paris, in fact. I had a telegram last night from the manager of the Grand Hotel.

CHASUBLE. Was the cause of death mentioned?

JACK. A severe chill, it seems.

MISS PRISM. As a man sows, so shall he reap.

CHASUBLE [raising his hand]. Charity, dear Miss Prism, charity! None of us are perfect. I myself am peculiarly susceptible to draughts. Will the interment take place here?

JACK. No. He seems to have expressed a desire to be buried in Paris.

CHASUBLE. In Paris! [Shakes his head]. I fear that hardly points to any very serious state of mind at the last. You would no doubt wish me to make some slight allusion to this tragic domestic affliction next Sunday. [JACK presses his hand convulsively.] My sermon on the meaning of the manna in the wilderness can be adapted to almost any occasion, joyful, or, as in the present case, distressing. [All sigh.] I have preached it at harvest celebrations, christenings, confirmations, on days of humiliation and festal days. The last time I delivered it, it was in the Cathedral, as a charity sermon on behalf of the Society for the Prevention of Discontentment among the Upper Orders. The Bishop, who was present, was much struck by some of the analogies I drew.

JACK. Ah, that reminds me, you mentioned christenings I think, Dr. Chasuble? I suppose you know how to christen all right? [DR. CHASUBLE looks astounded.] I mean, of course, you are continually christening, aren't you?

MISS PRISM. It is, I regret to say, one of the Rector's most constant duties in this parish. I have often spoken to the poorer classes on the subject. But they don't seem to know what thrift is.

CHASUBLE. But is there any particular infant in whom you are interested, Mr. Worthing? Your brother was, I believe, unmarried, was he not?

JACK. Oh, yes.

MISS PRISM [bitterly]. People who live entirely for pleasure usually are.

JACK. But it is not for any child, dear Doctor. I am very fond of children. No! the fact is, I would like to be christened myself, this afternoon, if you have nothing better to do.

CHASUBLE. But surely, Mr. Worthing, you have been christened already?

JACK. I don't remember anything about it.

CHASUBLE. But have you any grave doubts in the subject?

JACK. I certainly intend to have. Of course, I don't know if the thing would bother you in any way, or if you think I am a little too old now.

CHASUBLE. Not at all. The sprinkling, and, indeed, the immersion of adults is a perfectly canonical practice.

JACK. Immersion!

CHASUBLE. You need have no apprehensions. Sprinkling is all that is necessary, or indeed I think advisable. Our weather is so changeable. At what hour would you wish the ceremony performed?

JACK. Oh, I should trot around about five if that would suit you.

CHASUBLE. Perfectly, perfectly! In fact I have two similar ceremonies to perform at that time. A case of twins that occurred recently in one of the outlying cottages on your own estate. Poor Jenkins the carter, a most hard-working man.

JACK. Oh! I don't see much fun in being christened along with other babies. It would be childish. Would half-past five do?

CHASUBLE. Admirably! Admirably! [Takes out watch.] And now, dear Mr. Worthing, I will not intrude any longer into a house of sorrow. I would merely beg you not to be too much bowed down by grief. What seem to us bitter trials at the moment are often blessings in disguise.

MISS PRISM. This seems to me a blessing of an extremely obvious kind.

Enter CECILY from the house.

CECILY. Uncle Jack! Oh, I am pleased to see you back. But what horrid clothes you have on! Do go and change them.

MISS PRISM. Cecily!

CHASUBLE. My child! my child! [CECILY goes towards JACK; he kisses her brow in a melancholy manner.]

CECILY. What is the matter, Uncle Jack? Do look happy! You look as if you had a toothache and I have such a surprise for you. Who do you think is in the dining-room? Your brother!

JACK. Who?

CECILY. Your brother Ernest. He arrived about half an hour ago.

JACK. What nonsense! I haven't got a brother.

CECILY. Oh, don't say that. However badly he may have behaved to you in the past he is still your brother. You couldn't be so heartless as to disown him. I'll tell him to come out. And you will shake hands with him, won't you, Uncle Jack?

[Runs back into the house.]

CHASUBLE. These are very joyful tidings.

MISS PRISM. After we had all been resigned to his loss, his sudden return seems to me peculiarly distressing.

JACK. My brother is in the dining-room? I don't know what it all means. I think it is perfectly absurd.

Enter ALGERNON and CECILY hand in hand.

They come slowly up to JACK.

JACK. Good heavens! [Motions ALGERNON away.]

ALGERNON. Brother John, I have come down from town to tell you that I am very sorry for all the trouble I have given you, and that I intend to lead a better life in the future. [JACK glares at him and does not take his hand.]

CECILY. Uncle Jack, you are not going to refuse your own brother's hand?

JACK. Nothing will induce me to take his hand. I think his coming down here disgraceful. He knows perfectly well why.

CECILY. Uncle Jack, do be nice. There is some good in everyone. Ernest has just been telling me about his poor invalid friend, Mr. Bunbury, whom he goes to visit so often. And surely there must be much good in one who is kind to an invalid, and leaves the pleasures of London to sit by a bed of pain.

JACK. Oh, he has been talking about Bunbury, has he?

CECILY. Yes, he has told me all about poor Mr. Bunbury, and his terrible state of health.

JACK. Bunbury! Well, I won't have him talk to you about Bunbury or about anything else. It is enough to drive one perfectly frantic.

ALGERNON. Of course I admit that the faults were all on my side. But I must say that I think that Brother John's coldness to me is peculiarly painful. I expected a more enthusiastic welcome, especially considering it is the first time I have come here.

CECILY. Uncle Jack, if you don't shake hands with Ernest I will never forgive you.

JACK. Never forgive me?

CECILY. Never, never, never!

JACK. Well, this is the last time I shall ever do it. [Shakes hands with ALGERNON and glares.]

CHASUBLE. It's pleasant, is it not, to see so perfect a reconciliation? I think we might leave the two brothers together.

MISS PRISM. Cecily, you will come with us.

CECILY. Certainly, Miss Prism. My little task of reconciliation is over.

CHASUBLE. You have done a beautiful action to-day, dear child.

MISS PRISM. We must not be premature in our judgments.

CECILY. I feel very happy. [They all go off.]

JACK. You young scoundrel, Algy, you must get out of this place as soon as possible. I don't allow any Bunburying here.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRIMAN. I have put Mr. Ernest's things in the room next to yours, sir. I suppose that is all right?

JACK. What?

MERRIMAN. Mr. Ernest's luggage, sir. I have unpacked it and put it in the room next to your own.

JACK. His luggage?

MERRIMAN. Yes, sir. Three portmanteaus, a dressing-case, two hat-boxes, and a large luncheon-basket.

ALGERNON. I am afraid I can't stay more than a week this time.

JACK. Merriman, order the dog-cart at once. Mr. Ernest has been suddenly called back to town.

MERRIMAN. Yes, sir. [Goes back into the house.]

ALGERNON. What a fearful liar you are, Jack. I have not been called back to town at all.

JACK. Yes, you have.

ALGERNON. I haven't heard anyone calling me.

JACK. Your duty as a gentleman calls you back.

ALGERNON. My duty as a gentleman has never interfered with my pleasures in the smallest degree.

JACK. I can quite understand that.

ALGERNON. Well, Cecily is a darling.

JACK. You are not to talk of Miss Cardew like that. I don't like it.

ALGERNON. Well, I don't like your clothes. You look perfectly ridiculous in them. Why on earth don't you go up and change? It is perfectly childish to be in deep mourning for a man who is actually staying for a whole week with you in your house as a guest. I call it grotesque.

JACK. You are certainly not staying with me for a whole week as a guest or anything else. You have got to leave . . . by the four-five train.

ALGERNON. I certainly won't leave you so long as you are in mourning. It would be most unfriendly. If I were in mourning you would stay with me, I suppose. I should think it very unkind if you didn't.

JACK. Well, will you go if I change my clothes?

ALGERNON. Yes, if you are not too long.

I never saw anybody take so long to dress, and with such little result.

JACK. Well, at any rate, that is better than being always over-dressed as you are.

ALGERNON. If I am occasionally a little over-dressed, I make up for it by being always immensely over-educated.

JACK. Your vanity is ridiculous, your conduct an outrage, and your presence in my garden utterly absurd. However, you have got to catch the four-five, and I hope you will have a pleasant journey back to town. This Bunburying, as you call it, has not been a great success for you. [Goes into the house.]

ALGERNON. I think it has been a great success. I'm in love with Cecily, and that is everything. [Enter CECILY at the back of the garden. She picks up the can and begins to water the flowers.] But I must see her before I go, and make arrangements for another Bunbury. Ah, there she is.

CECILY. Oh, I merely came back to water the roses. I thought you were with Uncle Jack.

ALGERNON. He's gone to order the dog-cart for me.

CECILY. Oh, is he going to take you for a nice drive?

ALGERNON. He's going to send me away.

CECILY. Then have we got to part?

ALGERNON. I am afraid so. It's a very painful parting.

CECILY. It is always painful to part from people whom one has known for a very brief space of time. The absence of old friends one can endure with equanimity. But even a momentary separation from anyone to whom one has just been introduced is almost unbearable.

ALGERNON. Thank you.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRIMAN. The dog-cart is at the door, sir. [ALGERNON looks appealingly at CECILY.]

CECILY. It can wait, Merriman . . . for . . . five minutes.

MERRIMAN. Yes, miss.

Exit MERRIMAN.

ALGERNON. I hope, Cecily, I shall not offend you if I state quite frankly and openly that you seem to me to be in every way the visible personification of absolute perfection.

CECILY. I think your frankness does you great credit, Ernest. If you will allow me I will copy your remarks into my diary. [Goes over to table and begins writing in diary.]

ALGERNON. Do you really keep a diary? I'd give anything to look at it. May I?

CECILY. Oh, no. [Puts her hand over it.] You see, it is simply a very young girl's record of her own thoughts and impressions, and consequently meant for publication. When it appears in volume form I hope you will order a copy. But pray, Ernest, don't stop. I delight in taking down from dictation. I have reached "absolute perfection." You can go on. I am quite ready for more.

ALGERNON [somewhat taken aback]. Ahem! Ahem!

CECILY. Oh, don't cough, Ernest. When one is dictating one should speak fluently and not cough. Besides, I don't know how to spell a cough.

[Writes as ALGERNON speaks.]

ALGERNON [speaking very rapidly]. Cecily, ever since I first looked upon your wonderful and incomparable beauty, I have dared to love you wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly.

CECILY. I don't think that you should tell me that you love me wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly. Hopelessly doesn't seem to make much sense, does it?

ALGERNON. Cecily!

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRIMAN. The dog-cart is waiting, sir.

ALGERNON. Tell it to come round next week, at the same hour.

MERRIMAN [looks at CECILY, who makes no sign]. Yes, sir. [MERRIMAN retires.]

CECILY. Uncle Jack would be very much annoyed if he knew you were staying on till next week, at the same hour.

ALGERNON. Oh, I don't care about Jack. I don't care for anybody in the whole world but you. I love you, Cecily. You will marry me, won't you?

CECILY. You silly you! Of course. Why, we have been engaged for the last three months.

ALGERNON. For the last three months?

CECILY. Yes, it will be exactly three months on Thursday.

ALGERNON. But how did we become engaged?

CECILY. Well, ever since dear Uncle

Jack first confessed to us that he had a younger brother who was very wicked and bad, you of course have formed the chief topic of conversation between myself and Miss Prism. And of course a man who is much talked about is always very attractive. One feels there must be something in him after all. I daresay it was foolish of me, but I fell in love with you, Ernest.

ALGERNON. Darling! And when was the engagement actually settled?

CECILY. On the 4th of February last. Worn out by your entire ignorance of my existence, I determined to end the matter one way or the other, and after a long struggle with myself I accepted you under this dear old tree here. The next day I bought this little ring in your name, and this is the little bangle with the true lovers' knot I promised you always to wear.

ALGERNON. Did I give you this? It's very pretty, isn't it?

CECILY. Yes, you've wonderfully good taste, Ernest. It's the excuse I've always given for your leading such a bad life. And this is the box in which I keep all your dear letters. [Kneels at table, opens box, and produces letters tied up with blue ribbon.]

ALGERNON. My letters! But my own sweet Cecily, I have never written you any letters.

CECILY. You need hardly remind me of that, Ernest. I remember only too well that I was forced to write your letters for you. I wrote always three times a week, and sometimes oftener.

ALGERNON. Oh, do let me read them, Cecily?

CECILY. Oh, I couldn't possibly. They would make you far too conceited. [Replaces box.] The three you wrote me after I had broken off the engagement are so beautiful, and so badly spelled, that even now I can hardly read them without crying a little.

ALGERNON. But was our engagement ever broken off?

CECILY. Of course it was. On the 22nd of last March. You can see the entry if you like. [Shows diary.] "To-day I broke off my engagement with Ernest. I feel it is better to do so. The weather still continues charming."

ALGERNON. But why on earth did you break it off? What had I done? I had done nothing at all. Cecily, I am very much hurt indeed to hear you broke it off. Particularly when the weather was so charming.

CECILY. It would hardly have been a really serious engagement, if it hadn't been broken off at least once. But I forgave you before the week was out.

ALGERNON [crossing to her, and kneeling]. What a perfect angel you are, Cecily.

CECILY. You dear romantic boy. [He kisses her, she puts her fingers through his hair.] I hope your hair curls naturally, does it?

ALGERNON. Yes, darling, with a little help from others.

CECILY. I am so glad.

ALGERNON. You'll never break off our engagement again, Cecily?

CECILY. I don't think I could break it off now that I have actually met you. Besides, of course, there is the question of your name.

ALGERNON. Yes, of course. [Nervously.]

CECILY. You must not laugh at me, darling, but it had always been a girlish dream of mine to love some one whose name was Ernest. [ALGERNON rises, CECILY also.] There is something in that name that seems to inspire absolute confidence. I pity any poor married woman whose husband is not called Ernest.

ALGERNON. But, my dear child, do you mean to say you could not love me if I had some other name?

CECILY. But what name?

ALGERNON. Oh, any name you like—Algermon, for instance.

CECILY. But I don't like the name of Algermon.

ALGERNON. Well, my own dear, sweet, loving little darling, I really can't see why you should object to the name of Algermon. It is not at all a bad name. In fact, it is rather an aristocratic name. Half of the chaps who get into the Bankruptcy Court are called Algermon. But seriously, Cecily . . . [Moving to her] . . . if my name was Algy, couldn't you love me?

CECILY [rising]. I might respect you, Ernest, I might admire your character, but I fear that I should not be able to give you my undivided attention.

ALGERNON. Ahem! Cecily! [Picking up hat.] Your Rector here is, I suppose, thoroughly experienced in the practice of all the rites and ceremonials of the church?

CECILY. Oh, yes. Dr. Chasuble is a most learned man. He has never written a single book, so you can imagine how much he knows.

ALGERNON. I must see him at once on a most important christening—I mean on most important business.

CECILY. Oh!

ALGERNON. I sha'n't be away more than half an hour.

CECILY. Considering that we have been engaged since February the 14th, and that I only met you to-day for the first time, I think it is rather hard that you should leave me for so long a period as half an hour. Couldn't you make it twenty minutes?

ALGERNON. I'll be back in no time. [Kisses her and rushes down the garden.]

CECILY. What an impetuous boy he is. I like his hair so much. I must enter his proposal in my diary.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRIMAN. A Miss Fairfax has just called to see Mr. Worthing. On very important business, Miss Fairfax states.

CECILY. Isn't Mr. Worthing in his library?

MERRIMAN. Mr. Worthing went over in the direction of the Rectory some time ago.

CECILY. Pray ask the lady to come out here; Mr. Worthing is sure to be back soon. And you can bring tea.

MERRIMAN. Yes, miss. [Goes out.]

CECILY. Miss Fairfax! I suppose one of the many good elderly women who are associated with Uncle Jack in some of his philanthropic work in London. I don't quite like women who are interested in philanthropic work. I think it is so forward of them.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRIMAN. Miss Fairfax.

Enter GWENDOLEN.

Exit MERRIMAN.

CECILY [advancing to meet her]. Pray let me introduce myself to you. My name is Cecily Cardew.

GWENDOLEN. Cecily Cardew? [Moving to her and shaking hands.] What a very sweet name! Something tells me that we are going to be great friends. I like you already more than I can say. My first impressions of people are never wrong.

CECILY. How nice of you to like me so much after we have known each other such a comparatively short time. Pray sit down.

GWENDOLEN [still standing up.] I may call you Cecily, may I not?

CECILY. With pleasure!

GWENDOLEN. And you will always call me Gwendolen, won't you?

CECILY. If you wish.

GWENDOLEN. Then that is all quite settled, is it not?

CECILY. I hope so. [A pause. They both sit down together.]

GWENDOLEN. Perhaps this might be a favorable opportunity for my mentioning who I am. My father is Lord Bracknell. You have never heard of papa, I suppose?

CECILY. I don't think so.

GWENDOLEN. Outside the family circle, papa, I am glad to say, is entirely unknown. I think that is quite as it should be. The home seems to me to be the proper sphere for the man. And certainly once a man begins to neglect his domestic duties he becomes painfully effeminate, does he not? And I don't like that. It makes men so very attractive. Cecily, mamma, whose views on education are remarkably strict, has brought me up to be extremely short-sighted; it is part of her system; so do you mind my looking at you through my glasses?

CECILY. Oh, not at all, Gwendolen. I am very fond of being looked at.

GWENDOLEN [after examining CECILY carefully through a lorgnette.] You are here on a short visit, I suppose.

CECILY. Oh, no, I live here.

GWENDOLEN [severely.] Really? Your mother, no doubt, or some other female relative of advanced years, resides here also?

CECILY. Oh, no. I have no mother, nor, in fact, any relations.

GWENDOLEN. Indeed?

CECILY. My dear guardian, with the assistance of Miss Prism, has the arduous task of looking after me.

GWENDOLEN. Your guardian?

CECILY. Yes, I am Mr. Worthing's ward.

GWENDOLEN. Oh! It is strange he never mentioned to me that he had a ward. How secretive of him! He grows more interesting hourly. I am not sure, however, that the news inspires me with feelings of unmixed delight. [Rising and going to her.] I am very fond of you, Cecily; I have liked you ever since I met you. But I am bound to state that now that I know that you are Mr. Worthing's ward, I cannot help expressing a wish you were—well, just a little older than you seem to be—and not quite so very alluring in appearance. In fact, if I may speak candidly—

CECILY. Pray do! I think that whenever one has anything unpleasant to say, one should always be quite candid.

GWENDOLEN. Well, to speak with perfect candour, Cecily, I wish that you were fully forty-two, and more than usually plain for your age. Ernest has a strong upright nature. He is the very soul of truth and honour. Disloyalty would be as impossible to him as deception. But even men of the noblest possible moral character are extremely susceptible to the influence of the physical charms of others. Modern, no less than Ancient History, supplies us with many most painful examples of what I refer to. If it were not so, indeed, History would be quite unreadable.

CECILY. I beg your pardon, Gwendolen, did you say Ernest?

GWENDOLEN. Yes.

CECILY. Oh, but it is not Mr. Ernest Worthing who is my guardian. It is his brother—his elder brother.

GWENDOLEN. [Sitting down again.] Ernest never mentioned to me that he had a brother.

CECILY. I am sorry to say they have not been on good terms for a long time.

GWENDOLEN. Ah! that accounts for it. And now that I think of it I have never heard any man mention his brother. The subject seems distasteful to most men. Cecily, you have lifted a load from my mind. I was growing almost anxious. It would have been terrible if any cloud had come across a friendship like ours, would it not? Of course you are quite, quite sure that it is not Mr. Ernest Worthing who is your guardian?

CECILY. Quite sure. [A pause.] In fact, I am going to be his.

GWENDOLEN [enquiringly]. I beg your pardon?

CECILY [rather shy and confidingly]. Dearest Gwendolen, there is no reason why I should make a secret of it to you. Our little county newspaper is sure to chronicle the fact next week. Mr. Ernest Worthing and I are engaged to be married.

GWENDOLEN [quite politely, rising]. My darling Cecily, I think there must be some slight error. Mr. Ernest Worthing is engaged to me. The announcement will appear in the Morning Post on Saturday at the latest.

CECILY [very politely, rising]. I am afraid you must be under some misconception. Ernest proposed to me exactly ten minutes ago. [Shows diary.]

GWENDOLEN [examines diary through her lorgnette carefully]. It is certainly very curious, for he asked me to be his wife yesterday afternoon at 5.30. If you would care to verify the incident, pray do so. [Produces diary of her own.] I never travel without my diary. One should always have something sensational to read in the train. I am so sorry, dear Cecily, if it is any disappointment to you, but I am afraid I have the prior claim.

CECILY. It would distress me more than I can tell you, dear Gwendolen, if it caused you any mental or physical anguish, but I feel bound to point out that since Ernest proposed to you he clearly has changed his mind.

GWENDOLEN [meditatively]. If the poor fellow has been entrapped into any foolish promise I shall consider it my duty to rescue him at once, and with a firm hand.

CECILY [thoughtfully and sadly]. Whatever unfortunate entanglement my dear boy may have got into, I will never reproach him with it after we are married.

GWENDOLEN. Do you allude to me, Miss Cardew, as an entanglement? You are presumptuous. On an occasion of this kind it becomes more than a moral duty to speak one's mind. It becomes a pleasure.

CECILY. Do you suggest, Miss Fairfax, that I entrapped Ernest into an engagement? How dare you? This is no time for wearing the shallow mask of manners. When I see a spade I call it a spade.

GWENDOLEN [satirically]. I am glad to say that I have never seen a spade. It is obvious that our social spheres have been widely different.

Enter MERRIMAN, followed by the footman.

He carries a salver, tablecloth, and plate-stand. CECILY is about to retort. The presence of the servants exercises a restraining influence, under which both girls chafe.

MERRIMAN. Shall I lay tea here as usual, miss?

CECILY [sternly, in a calm voice]. Yes, as usual. [MERRIMAN begins to clear and lay cloth. A long pause. CECILY and GWENDOLEN glare at each other.]

GWENDOLEN. Are there many interesting walks in the vicinity, Miss Cardew?

CECILY. Oh, yes, a great many. From the top of one of the hills quite close one can see five counties.

GWENDOLEN. Five counties! I don't think I should like that. I hate crowds.

CECILY [sweetly]. I suppose that is why you live in town? [GWENDOLEN bites her lip, and beats her foot nervously with her parasol.]

GWENDOLEN [looking round]. Quite a well-kept garden this is, Miss Cardew.

CECILY. So glad you like it, Miss Fairfax.

GWENDOLEN. I had no idea there were any flowers in the country.

CECILY. Oh, flowers are as common here, Miss Fairfax, as people are in London.

GWENDOLEN. Personally, I cannot understand how anybody manages to exist in the country, if anybody who is anybody does. The country always bores me to death.

CECILY. Ah! This is what the newspapers call agricultural depression, is it not? I believe the aristocracy are suffering very much from it just at present. It is almost an epidemic amongst them, I have been told. May I offer you some tea, Miss Fairfax?

GWENDOLEN [with elaborate politeness]. Thank you. [Aside.] Detestable girl! But I require tea!

CECILY [sweetly]. Sugar?

GWENDOLEN [superciliously]. No, thank you. Sugar is not fashionable any more. [CECILY looks angrily at her, takes up the tongs and puts four lumps of sugar into the cup.]

CECILY [severely]. Cake or bread and butter?

GWENDOLEN [in a bored manner]. Bread and butter, please. Cake is rarely seen at the best houses nowadays.

CECILY [cuts a very large slice of cake, and puts it on the tray]. Hand that to Miss Fairfax. [MERRIMAN does so, and goes out with footman. GWENDOLEN drinks the tea and makes a grimace. Puts down cup at once, reaches out her hand to the bread and butter, looks at it, and finds it is cake. Rises in indignation.]

GWENDOLEN. You have filled my tea with lumps of sugar, and though I asked most distinctly for bread and butter, you have given me cake. I am known for the gentleness of my disposition, and the extraordinary sweetness of my nature, but I warn you, Miss Cardew, you may go too far.

CECILY [rising]. To save my poor, innocent, trusting boy from the machinations of any other girl there are no lengths to which I would not go.

GWENDOLEN. From the moment I saw you I distrusted you. I felt that you were false and deceitful. I am never deceived in such matters. My first impressions of people are invariably right.

CECILY. It seems to me, Miss Fairfax that I am trespassing on your valuable time. No doubt you have many other calls of a similar character to make in the neighbourhood.

Enter JACK.

GWENDOLEN [catching sight of him].

Ernest! My own Ernest!

JACK. Gwendolen! Darling! [Offers to kiss her.]

GWENDOLEN [drawing back]. A moment! May I ask if you are engaged to be married to this young lady? [Points to CECILY.]

JACK [laughing]. To dear little Cecily! Of course not! What could have put such an idea into your pretty little head?

GWENDOLEN. Thank you. You may. [Offers her cheek.]

CECILY [very sweetly]. I knew there must be some misunderstanding, Miss Fairfax. The gentleman whose arm is at present around your waist is my dear guardian, Mr. John Worthing.

GWENDOLEN. I beg your pardon?

CECILY. This is Uncle Jack.

GWENDOLEN [receding]. Jack! Oh!

Enter ALGERNON.

CECILY. Here is Ernest.

ALGERNON [goes straight over to CECILY without noticing anyone else]. My own love! [Offers to kiss her.]

CECILY [drawing back]. A moment, Ernest! May I ask you—are you engaged to be married to this young lady?

ALGERNON [looking round]. To what young lady? Good heavens! Gwendolen!

CECILY. Yes, to good heavens, Gwendolen, I mean to Gwendolen.

ALGERNON [laughing]. Of course not! What could have put such an idea into your pretty little head?

CECILY. Thank you. [Presents her cheek to be kissed.] You may. [ALGERNON kisses her.]

GWENDOLEN. I felt there was some slight error, Miss Cardew. The gentleman who is now embracing you is my cousin, Mr. Algernon Moncrieff.

CECILY [breaking away from ALGERNON]. Algernon Moncrieff! Oh! [The two girls move towards each other and put their arms round each other's waists as if for protection.]

CECILY. Are you called Algernon?

ALGERNON. I cannot deny it.

CECILY. Oh!

GWENDOLEN. Is your name really John?

JACK [standing rather proudly]. I could deny it if I liked. I could deny anything if I liked. But my name certainly is John. It has been John for years.

CECILY [to GWENDOLEN]. A gross deception has been practised on both of us.

GWENDOLEN. My poor wounded Cecily!

CECILY. My sweet, wronged Gwendolen.

GWENDOLEN [slowly and seriously]. You will call me sister, will you not? [They embrace.] JACK and ALGERNON groan and walk up and down.

CECILY [rather brightly]. There is just one question I would like to be allowed to ask my guardian.

GWENDOLEN. An admirable idea! Mr. Worthing, there is just one question I would like to be permitted to put to you. Where is your brother Ernest? We are both engaged to be married to your brother Ernest, so it is a matter of some importance to us to know where your brother Ernest is at present.

JACK [slowly and hesitatingly]. Gwendolen—Cecily—it is very painful for me to be forced to speak the truth. It is the first time in my life that I have ever been reduced to such a painful position, and I am really quite inexperienced in doing anything of the kind. However I will tell you quite frankly that I have no brother Ernest. I have no brother at all. I never had a brother in my life, and I certainly have not the smallest intention of ever having one in the future.

CECILY [surprised]. No brother at all?

JACK [cheerily]. None!

GWENDOLEN [severely]. Had you never a brother of any kind?

JACK [pleasantly]. Never. Not even of any kind.

GWENDOLEN. I am afraid it is quite clear, Cecily, that neither of us is engaged to be married to anyone.

CECILY. It is not a very pleasant position for a young girl suddenly to find herself in. Is it?

GWENDOLEN. Let us go into the house. They will hardly venture to come after us there.

CECILY. No, men are so cowardly, aren't they? [They retire into the house with scornful looks.]

JACK. This ghastly state of things is what you call Bunburying, I suppose?

ALGERNON. Yes, and a perfectly wonderful Bunbury it is. The most wonderful Bunbury I have ever had in my life.

JACK. Well, you've no right whatsoever to Bunbury here.

ALGERNON. That is absurd. One has a right to Bunbury anywhere one chooses. Every serious Bunburyist knows that.

JACK. Serious Bunburyist! Good heavens!

ALGERNON. Well, one must be serious about something, if one wants to have any amusement in life. I happen to be serious about Bunburying. What on earth you are serious about I haven't got the remotest idea. About everything, I should fancy. You have such an absolutely trivial nature.

JACK. Well, the only small satisfaction I have in the whole of this wretched business is that your friend Bunbury is quite exploded. You won't be able to run down to the country quite so often as you used to do, dear Algy. And a very good thing, too.

ALGERNON. Your brother is a little off colour, isn't he, dear Jack? You won't be able to disappear to London quite so frequently as your wicked custom was. And not a bad thing, either.

JACK. As for your conduct towards Miss Cardew, I must say that your taking in a sweet, simple, innocent girl like that is quite inexcusable. To say nothing of the fact that she is my ward.

ALGERNON. I can see no possible defence at all for your deceiving a brilliant, clever, thoroughly experienced young lady like Miss Fairfax. To say nothing of the fact that she is my cousin.

JACK. I wanted to be engaged to Gwendolen, that is all. I love her.

ALGERNON. Well, I simply wanted to be engaged to Cecily. I adore her.

JACK. There is certainly no chance of your marrying Miss Cardew.

ALGERNON. I don't think there is much likelihood, Jack, of you and Miss Fairfax being united.

JACK. Well, that is no business of yours.

ALGERNON. If it was my business, I wouldn't talk about it. [Begins to eat muffins.] It is very vulgar to talk about one's business. Only people like stock-brokers do that, and then merely at dinner parties.

JACK. How can you sit there, calmly eating muffins, when we are in this horrible trouble, I can't make out. You seem to me to be perfectly heartless.

ALGERNON. Well, I can't eat muffins in an agitated manner. The butter would probably get on my cuffs. One should always eat muffins quite calmly. It is the only way to eat them.

JACK. I say it's perfectly heartless your eating muffins at all, under the circumstances.

ALGERNON. When I am in trouble, eating is the only thing that consoles me. Indeed, when I am in really great trouble, as anyone who knows me intimately will tell you, I refuse everything except food and drink. At the present moment I am eating muffins because I am unhappy. Besides, I am particularly fond of muffins. [Rising.]

JACK [rising]. Well, that is no reason why you should eat them all in that greedy way. [Takes muffins from ALGERNON.]

ALGERNON. [Offering tea-cake.] I wish you would have tea-cake instead. I don't like tea-cake.

JACK. Good heavens! I suppose a man may eat his own muffins in his own garden.

ALGERNON. But you have just said it was perfectly heartless to eat muffins.

JACK. I said it was perfectly heartless of you, under the circumstances. That is a very different thing.

ALGERNON. That may be. But the muffins are the same. [He seizes the muffin dish from JACK.]

JACK. Algy, I wish to goodness you would go.

ALGERNON. You can't possibly ask me to go without having some dinner. It's absurd. I never go without my dinner. No one ever does, except vegetarians and people like that. Besides I have just made arrangements with Dr. Chasuble to be christened at a quarter to six under the name of Ernest.

JACK. My dear fellow, the sooner you give up that nonsense the better. I made arrangements this morning with Dr. Chasuble to be christened myself at 5.30, and I naturally will take the name of Ernest. Gwendolen would wish it. We can't both be christened Ernest. It's absurd. Besides, I have a perfect right to be christened if I like. There is no evidence at all that I ever have been christened by anybody. I should think it extremely probable I never was, and so does Dr. Chasuble. It is entirely different in your case. You have been christened already.

ALGERNON. Yes, but I have not been christened for years.

JACK. Yes, but you have been christened. That is the important thing.

ALGERNON. Quite so. So I know my constitution can stand it. If you are not quite sure about your ever having been christened, I must say I think it rather dangerous your venturing on it now. It might make you very unwell. You can hardly have forgotten that someone very closely connected with you was very nearly carried off this week in Paris by a severe chill.

JACK. Yes, but you said yourself that a severe chill was not hereditary.

ALGERNON. It usedn't to be, I know—but I daresay it is now. Science is always making wonderful improvements in things.

JACK [picking up the muffin dish]. Oh, that is nonsense; you are always talking nonsense.

ALGERNON. Jack, you are at the muffins again! I wish you wouldn't. There are only two left. [Takes them.] I told you I was particularly fond of muffins.

JACK. But I hate tea-cake.

ALGERNON. Why on earth then do you allow tea-cake to be served up for your guests? What ideas you have of hospitality!

JACK. Algernon! I have already told you to go. I don't want you here. Why don't you go?

ALGERNON. I haven't quite finished my tea yet, and there is still one muffin left. [JACK groans, and sinks into a chair. ALGERNON still continues eating.]

CURTAIN

ACT III

SCENE.—Morning-room at the Manor House.
GWENDOLEN and CECILY are at the window, looking out into the garden.

GWENDOLEN. The fact that they did not follow us at once into the house, as anyone else would have done, seems to me to show that they have some sense of shame left.

CECILY. They have been eating muffins. That looks like repentance.

GWENDOLEN [after a pause]. They don't seem to notice us at all. Couldn't you cough?

GWENDOLEN. They're looking at us. What effrontery!

CECILY. They're approaching. That's very forward of them.

GWENDOLEN. Let us preserve a dignified silence.

CECILY. Certainly. It's the only thing to do now.

Enter JACK, followed by ALGERNON. They whistle some dreadful popular air from a British opera.

GWENDOLEN. This dignified silence seems to produce an unpleasant effect.

CECILY. A most distasteful one.

GWENDOLEN. But we will not be the first to speak.

CECILY. Certainly not.

GWENDOLEN. Mr. Worthing, I have something very particular to ask you. Much depends on your reply.

CECILY. Gwendolen, your common sense is invaluable. Mr. Moncrieff, kindly answer me the following question. Why did you pretend to be my guardian's brother?

ALGERNON. In order that I might have an opportunity of meeting you.

CECILY [to GWENDOLEN]. That certainly seems a satisfactory explanation, does it not?

GWENDOLEN. Yes, dear, if you can believe him.

CECILY. I don't. But that does not affect the wonderful beauty of his answer.

GWENDOLEN. True. In matters of grave importance, style, not sincerity, is the vital thing. Mr. Worthing, what explanation can you offer to me for pretending to have a brother? Was it in order that you might have an opportunity of coming up to town to see me as often as possible?

JACK. Can you doubt it, Miss Fairfax?

GWENDOLEN. I have the gravest doubts upon the subject. But I intend to crush them. This is not the moment for German scepticism. [Moving to CECILY.] Their explanations appear to be quite satisfactory, especially Mr. Worthing's. That seems to me to have the stamp of truth upon it.

CECILY. I am more than content with what Mr. Moncrieff said. His voice alone inspires one with absolute credulity.

GWENDOLEN. Then you think we should forgive them?

CECILY. Yes. I mean no.

GWENDOLEN. True! I had forgotten. There are principles at stake that one cannot surrender. Which of us should tell them? The task is not a pleasant one.

CECILY. Could we not both speak at the same time?

GWENDOLEN. An excellent idea! I nearly always speak at the same time as other people. Will you take the time from me?

CECILY. Certainly. [GWENDOLEN beats time with uplifted finger.]

GWENDOLEN and CECILY [speaking together]. Your Christian names are still an insuperable barrier. That is all!

JACK AND ALGERNON [speaking together]. Our Christian names! Is that all? But we are going to be christened this afternoon.

GWENDOLEN [to JACK]. For my sake you are prepared to do this terrible thing?

JACK. I am.

CECILY [to ALGERNON]. To please me you are ready to face this fearful ordeal?

ALGERNON. I am!

GWENDOLEN. How absurd to talk of the equality of the sexes! Where questions of self-sacrifice are concerned, men are infinitely beyond us.

JACK. We are. [Clasps hands with ALGERNON.]

CECILY. They have moments of physical courage of which we women know absolutely nothing.

GWENDOLEN [to JACK]. Darling!

ALGERNON [to CECILY]. Darling! [They fall into each other's arms.]

Enter MERRIMAN. When he enters he coughs loudly, seeing the situation.

MERRIMAN. Ahem! Ahem! Lady Bracknell!

JACK. Good heavens!

Enter LADY BRACKNELL. The couples separate in alarm. Exit MERRIMAN.

LADY BRACKNELL. Gwendolen! What does this mean?

GWENDOLEN. Merely that I am engaged to be married to Mr. Worthing, Mamma.

LADY BRACKNELL. Come here. Sit down. Sit down immediately. Hesitation of any kind is a sign of mental decay in the young, of physical weakness in the old. [Turns to JACK.] Apprised, sir, of my daughter's sudden flight by her trusty maid, whose confidence I purchased by means of a small coin, I followed her at once by a luggage train. Her unhappy father is, I am glad to say, under the impression that she is attending a more than usually lengthy lecture by the University Extension Scheme on the Influence of a Permanent Income on Thought. I do not propose to undeceive him. Indeed I have never undeceived him on any question. I would consider it wrong. But of course, you will clearly understand that all communication between yourself and my daughter must cease immediately from this moment. On this point, as indeed on all points, I am firm.

JACK. I am engaged to be married to Gwendolen, Lady Bracknell!

LADY BRACKNELL. You are nothing of the kind, sir. And now, as regards Algernon!

Algernon!

ALGERNON. Yes, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. May I ask if it is in this house that your invalid friend Mr. Bunbury resides?

ALGERNON [stammering]. Oh, no! Bunbury doesn't live here. Bunbury is somewhere else at present. In fact, Bunbury is dead.

LADY BRACKNELL. Dead! When did

Mr. Bunbury die? His death must have been extremely sudden.

ALGERNON [airily]. Oh, I killed Bunbury this afternoon. I mean poor Bunbury died this afternoon.

LADY BRACKNELL. What did he die of?

ALGERNON. Bunbury? Oh, he was quite exploded.

LADY BRACKNELL. Exploded! Was he the victim of a revolutionary outrage? I was not aware that Mr. Bunbury was interested in social legislation. If so, he is well punished for his morbidity.

ALGERNON. My dear Aunt Augusta, I mean he was found out! The doctors found out that Bunbury could not live, that is what I mean—so Bunbury died.

LADY BRACKNELL. He seems to have had great confidence in the opinion of his physicians. I am glad, however, that he made up his mind at the last to some definite course of action, and acted under proper medical advice. And now that we have finally got rid of this Mr. Bunbury, may I ask, Mr. Worthing, who is that young person whose hand my nephew Algernon is now holding in what seems to be a peculiarly unnecessary manner?

JACK. That lady is Miss Cecily Cardew, my ward. [LADY BRACKNELL bows coldly to CECILY.]

ALGERNON. I am engaged to be married to Cecily, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. I beg your pardon?

CECILY. Mr. Moncrieff and I are engaged to be married, Lady Bracknell.

LADY BRACKNELL [with a shiver, crossing to the sofa and sitting down.]. I do not know whether there is anything peculiarly exciting in the air of this particular part of Hertfordshire, but the number of engagements that go on seems to me considerably above the proper average that statistics have laid down for our guidance. I think some preliminary enquiry on my part would not be out of place. Mr. Worthing, is Miss Cardew at all connected with any of the larger railway stations in London? I merely desire information. Until yesterday I had no idea that there were any families or persons whose origin was a Terminus. [JACK looks perfectly furious, but restrains himself.]

JACK [in a clear, cold voice]. Miss Cardew is the grand-daughter of the late Mr. Thomas Cardew of 149, Belgrave Square, S.W.; Gervase Park, Dorking, Surrey; and the Sporrán, Fifeshire, N.B.

LADY BRACKNELL. That sounds not unsatisfactory. Three addresses always inspire confidence, even in tradesmen. But what proof have I of their authenticity?

JACK. I have carefully preserved the Court Guide of the period. They are open to your inspection, Lady Bracknell.

LADY BRACKNELL [grimly]. I have known strange errors in that publication.

JACK. Miss Cardew's family solicitors are Messrs. Markby, Markby, and Markby.

LADY BRACKNELL. Markby, Markby, and Markby? A firm of the very highest position in their profession. Indeed I am told that one of the Mr. Markbys is occasionally to be seen at dinner parties. So far I am satisfied.

JACK [very irritably]. How extremely kind of you, Lady Bracknell! I have also in my possession, you will be pleased to hear, certificates of Miss Cardew's birth, baptism, whooping cough, registration, vaccination, confirmation, and the measles; both the German and the English variety.

LADY BRACKNELL. Ah! A life crowded with incident, I see; though perhaps somewhat too exciting for a young girl. I am not myself in favour of premature experiences. [Rises, looks at her watch.] Gwendolen! the time approaches for our departure. We have not a moment to lose. As a matter of form, Mr. Worthing, I had better ask you if Miss Cardew has any little fortune?

JACK. Oh, about a hundred and thirty thousand pounds in the Funds. That is all. Good-bye, Lady Bracknell. So pleased to have seen you.

LADY BRACKNELL [sitting down again]. A moment, Mr. Worthing. A hundred and thirty thousand pounds! And in the Funds! Miss Cardew seems to me a most attractive young lady, now that I look at her. Few girls of the present day have any really solid qualities, any of the qualities that last, and improve with time. We live, I regret to say, in an age of surfaces. [To CECILY.] Come over here, dear. [CECILY goes across.] Pretty child! your dress is sadly simple, and your hair seems almost as Nature might have left it. But we can soon alter all that. A thoroughly experienced French maid produces a really marvellous result in a very brief space of time. I remember recommending one to young Lady Lancing, and after three months her own husband did not know her.

JACK [aside]. And after six months nobody knew her.

LADY BRACKNELL. [Glares at JACK for a few moments. Then bends, with a practised smile, to CECILY.] Kindly turn round, sweet child. [CECILY turns completely round.] No, the side view is what I want. [CECILY presents her profile.] Yes, quite as I expected. There are distinct social possibilities in your profile. The two weak points in our age are its want of principle and its want of profile. The chin a little higher, dear. Style largely depends on the way the chin is worn. They are worn very high, just at present. Algernon!

ALGERNON. Yes, Aunt Augusta!

LADY BRACKNELL. There are distinct social possibilities in Miss Cardew's profile.

ALGERNON. Cecily is the sweetest, dearest, prettiest girl in the whole world. And I don't care twopence about social possibilities.

LADY BRACKNELL. Never speak disrespectfully of society, Algernon. Only people who can't get into it do that. [To CECILY.] Dear child, of course you know that Algernon has nothing but his debts to depend upon. But I do not approve of mercenary marriages. When I married Lord Bracknell I had no fortune of any kind. But I never dreamed for a moment of allowing that to stand in my way. Well, I suppose I must give my consent.

ALGERNON. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. Cecily, you may kiss me!

CECILY [kisses her]. Thank you, Lady Bracknell.

LADY BRACKNELL. You may also address me as Aunt Augusta for the future.

CECILY. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. The marriage, I think, had better take place quite soon.

ALGERNON. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

CECILY. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL. To speak frankly, I am not in favour of long engagements. They give people the opportunity of finding out each other's character before marriage which I think is never advisable

JACK. I beg your pardon for interrupting you, Lady Bracknell, but this engagement is quite out of the question. I am Miss Cardew's guardian, and she cannot marry without my consent until she comes of age. That consent I absolutely decline to give.

LADY BRACKNELL. Upon what grounds, may I ask? Algernon is an extremely, I may almost say an ostentatiously, eligible young man. He has nothing, but he looks 10 everything. What more can one desire?

JACK. It pains me very much to have to speak frankly to you, Lady Bracknell, about your nephew, but the fact is that I do not approve at all of his moral character. I 15 suspect him of being untruthful. [ALGERNON and CECILY look at him in indignant amazement.]

LADY BRACKNELL. Untruthful! My nephew Algernon? Impossible! He is an Oxonian. 20

JACK. I fear there can be no possible doubt about the matter. This afternoon, during my temporary absence in London on an important question of romance, he obtained admission to my house by means of 25 the false pretence of being my brother. Under an assumed name he drank, I've just been informed by my butler, an entire pint bottle of my Perrier-Jouet, Brut, '89; a wine I was specially reserving for myself. 30 Continuing his disgraceful deception, he succeeded in the course of the afternoon in alienating the affections of my only ward. He subsequently stayed to tea, and devoured every single muffin. And what makes his 35 conduct all the more heartless is, that he was perfectly well aware from the first that I have no brother, that I never had a brother, and that I don't intend to have a brother, not even of any kind. I distinctly told him 40 so myself yesterday afternoon.

LADY BRACKNELL. Ahem! Mr. Worthing, after careful consideration I have decided entirely to overlook my nephew's conduct to you.

JACK. That is very generous of you, Lady Bracknell. My own decision, however, is unalterable. I decline to give my consent.

LADY BRACKNELL [to CECILY]. Come here, sweet child. [CECILY goes over.] How 50 old are you, dear?

CECILY. Well, I am really only eighteen, but I always admit to twenty when I go to evening parties.

LADY BRACKNELL. You are perfectly right in making some slight alteration. Indeed, no woman should ever be quite accurate about her age. It looks so calculating. . . . [In meditative manner.] Eighteen, but admitting to twenty at evening parties. Well, it will not be very long before you are of age and free from the restraints of tutelage. So I don't think your guardian's consent is, after all, a matter of any importance.

JACK. Pray excuse me, Lady Bracknell, for interrupting you again, but it is only fair to tell you that according to the terms of her grandfather's will Miss Cardew does not come legally of age till she is thirty-five.

LADY BRACKNELL. That does not seem to me to be a grave objection. Thirty-five is a very attractive age. London society is full of women of the very highest birth who have, of their own free choice, remained thirty-five for years. Lady Dumbleton is an instance in point. To my own knowledge she has been thirty-five ever since she arrived at the age of forty, which was many years ago now. I see no reason why our dear Cecily should not be even still more attractive at the age you mention than she is at present. There will be a large accumulation of property.

CECILY. Algy, could you wait for me till I was thirty-five?

ALGERNON. Of course I could, Cecily. You know I could.

CECILY. Yes, I felt it instinctively, but I couldn't wait all that time. I hate waiting even five minutes for anybody. It always makes me rather cross. I am not punctual myself, I know, but I do like punctuality in others, and waiting, even to be married, is quite out of the question.

ALGERNON. Then what is to be done, Cecily?

CECILY. I don't know, Mr. Moncrieff.

LADY BRACKNELL. My dear Mr. Worthing, as Miss Cardew states positively that she cannot wait till she is thirty-five—a remark which I am bound to say seems to me to show a somewhat impatient nature—I would beg of you to reconsider your decision.

JACK. But my dear Lady Bracknell, the matter is entirely in your own hands. The moment you consent to my marriage with Gwendolen, I will most gladly allow your nephew to form an alliance with my ward.

LADY BRACKNELL [rising and drawing herself up]. You must be quite aware that what you propose is out of the question.

JACK. Then a passionate celibacy is all that any of us can look forward to.

LADY BRACKNELL. That is not the destiny I propose for Gwendolen. Algernon, of course, can choose for himself. [Pulls out her watch.] Come, dear, [GWENDOLEN rises] we have already missed five, if not six, trains. To miss any more might expose us to comment on the platform.

Enter DR. CHASUBLE.

CHASUBLE. Everything is quite ready for the christenings.

LADY BRACKNELL. The christenings, sir! Is not that somewhat premature?

CHASUBLE [looking rather puzzled, and pointing to JACK and ALGERNON]. Both these gentlemen have expressed a desire for immediate baptism.

LADY BRACKNELL. At their age? The idea is grotesque and irreligious! Algernon, I forbid you to be baptised. I will not hear of such excesses. Lord Bracknell would be highly displeased if he learned that that was the way in which you wasted your time and money.

CHASUBLE. Am I to understand then that there are to be no christenings at all this afternoon?

JACK. I don't think that, as things are now, it would be of much practical value to either of us, Dr. Chasuble.

CHASUBLE. I am grieved to hear such sentiments from you, Mr. Worthing. They savour of the heretical views of the Anabaptists, views that I have completely refuted in four of my unpublished sermons. However, as your present mood seems to be one peculiarly secular, I will return to the church at once. Indeed, I have just been informed by the pew-opener that for the last hour and a half Miss Prism has been waiting for me in the vestry.

LADY BRACKNELL [startling]. Miss Prism! Did I hear you mention a Miss Prism?

CHASUBLE. Yes, Lady Bracknell. I am on my way to join her.

LADY BRACKNELL. Pray allow me to detain you for a moment. This matter may prove to be one of vital importance to Lord Bracknell and myself. Is this Miss Prism a female of repellent aspect, remotely connected with education?

CHASUBLE [somewhat indignantly]. She is the most cultivated of ladies, and the very picture of respectability.

LADY BRACKNELL. It is obviously the same person. May I ask what position she holds in your household?

CHASUBLE [severely]. I am a celibate, madam.

JACK [interposing]. Miss Prism, Lady Bracknell, has been for the last three years Miss Cardew's esteemed governess and valued companion.

LADY BRACKNELL. In spite of what I hear of her, I must see her at once. Let her be sent for.

CHASUBLE [looking off]. She approaches; she is nigh.

Enter MISS PRISM hurriedly.

MISS PRISM. I was told you expected me in the vestry, dear Canon. I have been waiting for you there for an hour and three-quarters. [Catches sight of LADY BRACKNELL who has fixed her with a stony glare. MISS PRISM grows pale and quails. She looks anxiously round as if desirous to escape.]

LADY BRACKNELL [in a severe, judicial voice]. Prism! [MISS PRISM bows her head in shame.] Come here, Prism! [MISS PRISM approaches in a humble manner.] Prism! Where is that baby? [General consternation. The Canon starts back in horror. ALGERNON and JACK pretend to be anxious to shield CECILY and GWENDOLEN from hearing the details of a terrible public scandal.] Twenty-eight years ago, Prism, you left Lord Bracknell's house, Number 104, Upper Grosvenor Street, in charge of a perambulator that contained a baby, of the male sex. You never returned. A few weeks later, through the elaborate investigations of the Metropolitan police, the perambulator was discovered at midnight, standing by itself in a remote corner of Bayswater. It contained the manuscript of a three-volume novel of more than usually revolting sentimentality. [MISS PRISM starts in involuntary indignation.] But the baby was not there! [Everyone looks at MISS PRISM.] Prism, where is that baby? [A pause.]

MISS PRISM. Lady Bracknell, I admit with shame that I do not know. I only wish I did. The plain facts of the case are these. On the morning of the day you mention, a day that is forever branded on my memory, I prepared as usual to take the baby out in its perambulator. I had also with me a somewhat old but capacious hand-bag in which I had intended to place the manuscript of a work of fiction that I had written during my few unoccupied hours. In a moment of mental abstraction, for which I never can forgive myself, I deposited the manuscript in the bassinette, and placed the baby in the hand-bag.

JACK [who has been listening attentively]. But where did you deposit the hand-bag?

MISS PRISM. Do not ask me, Mr. Worthing.

JACK. Miss Prism, this is a matter of no small importance to me. I insist on knowing where you deposited the hand-bag that contained that infant.

MISS PRISM. I left it in the cloak-room of one of the larger railway stations in London.

JACK. What railway station?

MISS PRISM [quite crushed]. Victoria. The Brighton line. [Sinks into a chair.]

JACK. I must retire to my room for a moment. Gwendolen, wait here for me.

GWENDOLEN. If you are not too long, I will wait here for you all my life.

[Exit JACK in great excitement.]

CHASUBLE. What do you think this means, Lady Bracknell?

LADY BRACKNELL. I dare not even suspect, Dr. Chasuble. I need hardly tell you that in families of high position strange coincidences are not supposed to occur. They are hardly considered the thing. [Noises heard overhead as if someone was throwing trunks about. Everybody looks up.]

CECILY. Uncle Jack seems strangely agitated.

CHASUBLE. Your guardian has a very emotional nature.

LADY BRACKNELL. This noise is extremely unpleasant. It sounds as if he was having an argument. I dislike arguments of any kind. They are always vulgar, and often convincing.

CHASUBLE [looking up]. It has stopped now. [The noise is redoubled.]

LADY BRACKNELL. I wish he would arrive at some conclusion.

GWENDOLEN. This suspense is terrible. I hope it will last.

Enter JACK with a hand-bag of black leather in his hand.

JACK [rushing over to Miss Prism]. Is this the hand-bag, Miss Prism? Examine it carefully before you speak. The happiness of more than one life depends on your answer.

MISS PRISM [calmly]. It seems to be mine. Yes, here is the injury it received through the upsetting of a Gower Street omnibus in younger and happier days. Here is the stain on the lining caused by the explosion of a temperance beverage, an incident that occurred at Leamington. And here, on the lock, are my initials. I had forgotten that in an extravagant mood I had had them placed there. The bag is undoubtedly mine. I am delighted to have it so unexpectedly restored to me. It has been a great inconvenience being without it all these years.

JACK [in a pathetic voice]. Miss Prism, more is restored to you than this hand-bag. I was the baby you placed in it.

MISS PRISM [amazed]. You?

JACK [embracing her]. Yes . . . mother!

MISS PRISM [recoiling in indignant astonishment]. Mr. Worthing! I am unmarried!

JACK. Unmarried! I do not deny that is a serious blow. But after all, who has the right to cast a stone against one who has suffered? Cannot repentance wipe out an act of folly? Why should there be one law for men and another for women? Mother, I forgive you. [Tries to embrace her again.]

MISS PRISM [still more indignant]. Mr. Worthing, there is some error. [Pointing to Lady Bracknell.] There is the lady who can tell you who you really are.

JACK [after a pause]. Lady Bracknell, I hate to seem inquisitive, but would you kindly inform me who I am?

LADY BRACKNELL. I am afraid that the news I have to give you will not altogether please you. You are the son of my poor sister, Mrs. Moncrieff, and consequently Algernon's elder brother.

JACK. Algy's elder brother! Then I have a brother after all. I knew I had a brother! I always said I had a brother! Cecily,—how could you have ever doubted that I had a brother? [Seizes hold of ALGERNON.] Dr. Chasuble, my unfortunate brother. Miss Prism, my unfortunate brother. Gwendolen, my unfortunate brother. Algy, you young scoundrel, you will have to treat me with more respect in the future. You have never behaved to me like a brother in all your life.

ALGERNON. Well, not till to-day, old boy, I admit. I did my best, however, though I was out of practice. [Shakes hands.]

GWENDOLEN [to JACK]. My own! But what own are you? What is your Christian name, now that you have become someone else?

JACK. Good heavens! . . . I had quite forgotten that point. Your decision on the subject of my name is irrevocable, I suppose?

GWENDOLEN. I never change, except in my affections.

CECILY. What a noble nature you have, Gwendolen!

JACK. Then the question had better be cleared up at once. Aunt Augusta, a moment. At the time when Miss Prism left me in the hand-bag, had I been christened already?

LADY BRACKNELL. Every luxury that money could buy, including christening, had been lavished on you by your fond and dotting parents.

JACK. Then I was christened! That is settled. Now, what name was I given? Let me know the worst.

LADY BRACKNELL. Being the eldest son you were naturally christened after you father.

JACK [irritably]. Yes, but what was my father's Christian name?

LADY BRACKNELL [meditatively]. I cannot at the present moment recall what the General's Christian name was. But I have no doubt he had one. He was eccentric, I admit. But only in later years. And that was the result of the Indian climate, and marriage, and indigestion, and other things of that kind.

JACK. Algy! Can't you recollect what our father's Christian name was?

ALGERNON. My dear boy, we were never even on speaking terms. He died before I was a year old.

JACK. His name would appear in the Army Lists of the period, I suppose, Aunt Augusta?

LADY BRACKNELL. The General was essentially a man of peace, except in his domestic life. But I have no doubt his name would appear in any military directory.

JACK. The Army Lists of the last forty years are here. These delightful records should have been my constant study. [Rushes to bookcase and tears the books out.] M. Generals . . . Mallam, Maxbohm, Magley, what ghastly names they have—Markby, Migsby, Mobbs, Moncrieff! Lieutenant 1840, Captain, Lieutenant-Colonel, Colonel, General 1869, Christian names, Ernest John. [Puts book very quietly down and speaks quite calmly.] I always told you, Gwendolen, my name was Ernest, didn't I? Well, it is Ernest after all. I mean it naturally is Ernest.

LADY BRACKNELL. Yes, I remember that the General was called Ernest. I knew I had some particular reason for disliking the name.

GWENDOLEN. Ernest! My own Ernest! I felt from the first that you could have no other name!

JACK. Gwendolen, it is a terrible thing for a man to find out suddenly that all his life he has been speaking nothing but the truth. Can you forgive me?

GWENDOLEN. I can. For I feel that you are sure to change.

JACK. My own one!

CHASUBLE [to MISS PRISM]. Lætitia! [Embraces her.]

MISS PRISM [enthusiastically]. Frederick! At last!

ALGERNON. Cecily! [Embraces her.] At last!

JACK. Gwendolen! [Embraces her.] At last!

LADY BRACKNELL. My nephew, you seem to be displaying signs of triwality.

JACK. On the contrary, Aunt Augusta, I've now realized for the first time in my life the vital Importance of Being Earnest.

THE LYRIC

THE LYRIC

THE LYRIC as contrasted with the epic and the drama is the expression in melodious verse of personal emotion. The simple lyric unit, the result of a single emotional impulse, is necessarily brief. Longer lyrics like the ode, the elegy, and the reflective lyric are made up by developing a number of associated emotional impulses. The emotion of lyric verse may be aroused by an impulse from the outside world, or from an idea in the poet's mind. Generally the emotion is represented as being felt by the poet himself, but sometimes the poet creates an imaginary character passing through the emotional experiences. The meditative lyric, which develops at length the emotions induced by some train of thought, succeeds in so far as its intellectual content does not outweigh its emotional appeal.

THE SONG

The simplest form of lyric, the song, achieves perfection when it conveys spontaneous emotion free from the burden of thought, like Shakespeare's

It was a lover and his lass
With a hey and a ho and a hey nonino

and charms us with its melodious phrases and tripping measures. The Elizabethan lyrics and those of Burns and Béranger excel in this respect.

The Psalms.—A serious and elevated type of lyric is found in the Book of Psalms, attributed by tradition to David. The Psalms give expression to the fears, the joys, and the tribulations of the Hebrew race. There are psalms, like the twenty-third, of quiet confidence in the providence of God; imprecatory psalms of distress in the face of disaster, when His presence is far removed; psalms of rejoicing and thanksgiving over His goodness; and psalms of contrition and abasement seeking His forgiveness and favor. For vivid and moving imagery the Psalms are unrivaled in lyric poetry. The solemn, moralistic spirit of the Hebrew may be found recurring in the course of lyric poetry of other races—for example, in Kipling's Recessional calling the English race to humility before the Lord.

The Greek and Roman Lyrists.—Sappho, the woman love-poet of Lesbos, (c. 610 B. C.) has been almost universally acclaimed by fellow poets as the supreme head of lyric poetry. The fragments of her love poems glow with an intensity of passion that defies imitation and the art of the translator. "Judging even from the mutilated fragments," writes Swinburne, "fallen within our reach from the broken altar of her sacrifice of song, I for one have always agreed with all Grecian tradition in thinking Sappho to be beyond all question and comparison the very greatest poet that ever lived."

In contrast to songs of love, of beauty, and of mourning for the passing of beauty, the three notes continually sounding from Sappho's lyre, Anacreon (563?-478 B. C.) celebrates the joys of delight in natural objects, and of the drinking and revelry associated with the worship of Bacchus.

Of Roman lyrists Catullus (87-54 B. C.), the most personal and passionate, is nearest the tradition of Sappho. The Lesbia of his poems was the notorious Clodia, one of the powerful and disreputable women of the Empire. When she jilted him, he, seeking surcease from sorrow over his love and the death of his brother, returned to his villa on the lovely peninsula in Lake Garda, which he celebrates in his famous lyric, Sirmio. Tennyson on visiting Sirmio was moved to write his unsurpassed tribute to Catullus, a poem which fittingly prefaces the translations of his Latin master.

The lyrics of Horace (65-8 B. C.) have not the exaltation and passion of Pindar and Sappho, but their blithe spirit, their gentle Epicurean philosophy have endeared them to numerous readers in every generation. They reflect the moods of the poet and country gentleman, who, after his turbulent career as a soldier in the army of Brutus, was able, through the munificence of his wealthy patron, Maecenas, to retire from strenuous life to the peace of his Sabine Farm.

The Lyrists of the Renaissance.—The songs of Greek and Roman Lyrists became the inspiration of the poet-singers of the Renaissance: in France, Ronsard (1524–1585) and the Pléiade; in England, Marlowe (1564–1593) and Shakespeare (1564–1616). Shakespeare's ecstatic morning song, "Hark! Hark! the lark," though written with the full power of his lyric genius, has hardly a syllable that cannot be matched in the verses of his French predecessors, whose lyrics in turn are replete with conceits and imagery of Grecian origin. The lyrics of Ben Jonson (1573–1637) and Robert Herrick (1591–1633) show even more thorough acquaintance with the classical lyrists.

Modern Lyrists.—After the splendid burst of English lyric song in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, we find no native lyric genius until the coming of Burns in the latter part of the eighteenth century. The lyrics of Burns are expressions of primal emotions; they have little intellectual appeal and depend upon no literary fashion; they are unsurpassed in vividness, simplicity, spontaneity, intensity, and naturalness. The lyrics of Shelley, Tennyson, and Swinburne, on the contrary, are products of highly cultivated genius; they are intellectual as well as emotional, and are frequently full of abstract and complex imagery.

THE SONNET

A sonnet in its orthodox form is a lyric of fourteen lines with a definite rhyme scheme. There are two principal types—the Italian, and the English. To Petrarch (1304–1374) may be traced the Italian sonnet form which became a fashion in France and England during the sixteenth century. His sonnets celebrating Laura in life and in death set the fashion of the French and the English sonnet sequences. The Italian sonnet form begins with an octave of eight lines rhyming a b b a a b b a, and a sestet of six, rhyming c d e c d e. The rhyme scheme of the octave is fixed; variations are found in the rhyme scheme of the sestet. The Astrophel and Stella (1591) of Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586) set the fashion for the numerous Elizabethan sonnet sequences. The English, or Shakespearean, sonnet form is less closely articulated than the Italian. Found in the writings of Surrey and other early Elizabethan sonneteers, it was adopted by Shakespeare for the greatest sequence of sonnets ever written. It is made up of three quatrains rhyming a b a b, c d c d, e f e f, and ending with a couplet g g.

Both the English and the Italian sonnet forms persist among later English sonneteers, but the Italian form prevails. The sonnet of Wordsworth (1770–1850) "Scorn not the sonnet, critic," likens Milton's transformation of the Italian sonnet to the swelling blast of the trumpet. Both Milton (1608–1674) and Wordsworth employ the sonnet for political and moral criticism; Keats (1795–1821), Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1809–1861) and the Rossettis continue the earlier tradition of the sonnet sequence for the celebration of love. The perfection of Longfellow (1807–1882) in sonnet technique has given him a worthy place among his fellow sonneteers.

THE ODE

Pindar (522–448? B. C.) gave to the world the elaborate structural ode which still bears his name. After his apprenticeship as a musician, he began to compose poems for public occasions. He is known to us chiefly by his great songs of Victory, celebrating the champions of the games of Greece held in honor of the Gods. Unlike the free lyric, the Pindaric ode is elaborate and formal, and built upon the strictest rules for metrical forms. The three parts, strophe, antistrophe, and epode, are so constructed that strophe is answered by antistrophe, and epode responds to epode. In content the Pindarics alternate between praise of the Gods and of the heroes, between references to ancient mythology, legend, or history, and celebrations of the present victors and their achievements.

In the tradition of English poetry, where the ode is most frequently employed, may be found a few successful imitations of the formal odes of Pindar, notably those of Ben Jonson (1573–1637) and Thomas Gray (1716–1771). The English genius, however, out of its general distaste for literary rule and discipline, developed, under the leadership of Cowley in the seventeenth century, the free or formless ode. In this type little attention is paid to fixed plan or prescribed measure. The poet varies the length of his lines and his rhythms to suit his mood or thought. Wordsworth (1770-1850) in his Ode on the Intimations of Immortality, Shelley (1792-1822) in his Ode to a Skylark, and Keats (1795-1821) in his Ode to a Nightingale find the irregular ode adapted to their romantic reveries. Tennyson (1809-1892), in his irregular Ode to the Duke of Wellington, attains a majesty of movement that is a welcome substitute for the extravagances of many Pindaric imitations.

THE PASTORAL AND THE ELEGY

Pastoral poetry has been defined as the city man's dream of life in the country. As early as the third century B. C., the Greek lyric poets of the highly cultivated Alexandrian civilization, Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, were composing pastorals in the form of idyls or little pictures of country life. The songs and dialogues of the shepherds, goatherds, fishermen, and nymphs of Theocritus resemble those that the poet himself may have heard on the shores of his Sicilian home, but he has refashioned them in the spirit and atmosphere of conventional art. "To see the beauty of nature afresh through the medium of enriched artistic tradition," writes Mackail, "was the last task achieved by the Alexandrian poets."

Vergil gave to the Roman world his ten pastorals, called Bucolics or Eclogues, in 37 B. C. They are artificial imitations of the more sincere pastorals of his Alexandrian predecessors. Although the nature and the life are Roman, the names of the shepherds are Greek, and the place names remain as Sicily and Arcadia. Moreover, Vergil burdens the pastoral with allegorical allusions to contemporary politics. A single illustration is included in this book to show how closely imitative of the Greek and Roman are the succeeding English pastorals. The name Lycides, mentioned in the seventh pastoral of Vergil, who copied it from the seventh idyl of Theocritus, reappears as the title of the first great English elegy, the Lycidas of Milton.

The elegy is a special form of pastoral poetry derived from the idyls of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus. In imitation of the first idyl of Theocritus, Bion wrote a lament for Adonis. Moschus in turn followed with the first personal elegy in literature, one expressing grief over the death of Bion. The formal elegy falls into three natural divisions: first, the mourning; second, the questioning; and, third, the answer or the reconciliation, which contains the poet's consolation or philosophical conclusion.

The three great elegies in English literature, which imitate the classical pastoral forms, are the Lycidas (1638) of Milton, the Adonais (1821) of Shelley, and the Thyrsis (1866) of Matthew Arnold. Each is a tribute to a friend: Milton's to Edward King, Shelley's to John Keats, Arnold's to Arthur Hugh Clough. Gray's Elegy (1751), though not written in this pastoral tradition, is a restrained lament over the universality of death.

FRENCH LYRIC POETRY

French lyric poetry is represented in this collection by four popular names: François Villon (1431-1462), Pierre de Ronsard (1524-1585), Pierre Jean de Béranger (1780-1857), and Victor Hugo (1802-1885).

Villon, the medieval university scholar, glutton, thief, drunkard, and poet, is believed to have died on the scaffold shortly after 1461. This greatest of poetic vagabonds has made himself immortal with the ballade, a difficult French lyric form of several stanzas with intricate fixed rhyme schemes ending with an envoi addressed to a Prince or Princess.

Ronsard is the leading poet of the Pléiade, that French Renaissance group which absorbed the new learning from Italy, imitated the verses of Petrarch and other Italian poets, and in turn influenced the literary fashions of lyric poetry in the England of Elizabeth.

Béranger, who in contrast to Villon, lived a relatively quiet and retired life, is one of the most popular French poets, doubtless because of his rollicking good fellowship, his wit, and his gaiety.

Hugo, the father of French Romantic poetry, is valued as the painter of landscapes in verse and the master of romantic lyric moods. Nature and humanity are his themes. "No poet," says Saintsbury, "has a rarer and more delicate touch of pathos, none a more imperious command of awe, of the vague, of the supernatural aspects of nature. The great peculiarity of Victor Hugo is that his poetry always transports."

GERMAN LYRIC POETRY

Germany's representative lyric poets are Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832), Friedrich von Schiller (1759-1805), and Heinrich Heine (1799-1856). Of all the many literary forms in which Goethe distinguished himself, his lyric poems are the least subject to criticism. Whether in spontaneous or meditative vein they represent the high water mark of genuine lyric poetry.

Schiller brings to lyric poetry a less passionate and more sentimental and moralistic genius than Goethe's. His main interest is in ideas rather than in songs; he does not reach the lyric heights of his friend. "The best of his minor poems," says Evans, "are those in which the qualities of the historian, the philosopher, and the poet are combined with epic narration." The lyrics introducing his drama, William Tell, breathe the very air of the Swiss mountains and lakes, though Schiller, at the time, had never been in Switzerland and relied upon books for his knowledge of Swiss life.

Heine is one of the most popular of German love poets, though the sincerity of his songs is weakened, sometimes by sentimentality, sometimes by cynicism. This penchant for sudden cynical twists in some of his lyrics has given him the title of "the mocking bird of the singing grove." Dr. Burton, in summing up the genius of Heine, calls him "a poet, who, when true to his highest inspiration, was a romantic bird of the first rank of lyric utterance."

THE BOOK OF PSALMS

PSALM I

"BLESSED IS THE MAN"

BLESSED is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly,

Nor standeth in the way of sinners,

Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

But his delight is in the law of the Lord;

And in his law doth he meditate day and night. 5

And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season;

His leaf also shall not wither;

And whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

The ungodly are not so; 10

But are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment,

Nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous;

But the way of the ungodly shall perish. 15

PSALM VIII

A SONG OF PRAISE

O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

Who hast set thy glory above the heavens.

Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies,

That thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger. 5

When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers,

The moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained,

What is man, that thou art mindful of him?

And the son of man, that thou visitest him?

For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, 10

And hast crowned him with glory and honor.

Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands;

Thou hast put all things under his feet:

All sheep and oxen,

Yea, and the beasts of the field; 15

The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea.

And whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.
O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name
in all the earth!

PSALM XIX

“THE HEAVENS DECLARE THE GLORY OF GOD”

THE heavens declare the glory of God;
And the firmament sheweth his handiwork.
Day unto day uttereth speech,
And night unto night sheweth knowledge,
There is no speech nor language, 5
Where their voice is not heard.
Their line is gone out through all the earth,
And their words to the end of the world.
In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,
Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, 10

And rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.
His going forth is from the end of the heaven,
and his circuit unto the ends of it;
And there is nothing hid from the heat there-
of.

The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; 15

The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.

The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing
the heart;

The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.

The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever;

The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. 20

More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold;

Sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
Moreover by them is thy servant warned;

And in keeping of them there is great reward.
Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults. 25

Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me:

Then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer.

PSALM XXIII

“THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD”

THE Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside the still waters.

He restoreth my soul;
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. 5

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil;
For thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff
they comfort me.

Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;

Thou anointest my head with oil;
My cup runneth over. 10

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me
all the days of my life;

And I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

PSALM XXIV

“THE EARTH IS THE LORD'S”

THE earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;

The world, and they that dwell therein.
For he hath founded it upon the seas,

And established it upon the floods.
Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? 5

Or who shall stand in his holy place?
He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart;

Who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity,
nor sworn deceitfully.

He shall receive the blessing from the Lord,
And righteousness from the God of his salvation. 10

This is the generation of them that seek him,
That seek thy face, O Jacob.

Lift up your heads, O ye gates;
And be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors;

And the King of glory shall come in. 15
Who is this King of glory?

The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle.

Lift up your heads, O ye gates;
Even lift them up, ye everlasting doors;

And the King of glory shall come in. 20
Who is this King of glory?

The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory.

PSALM XXVII

"THE LORD IS MY LIGHT"

THE Lord is my light and my salvation;
whom shall I fear?

The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?

When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.

Though an host should encamp against me,
my heart shall not fear;

Though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident. 5

One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after:

That I may dwell in the house of the Lord
all the days of my life,

To behold the beauty of the Lord,

And to enquire in his temple.

For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion; 10

In the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me; he shall set me up upon a rock.

And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me;

Therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy;

I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord.

Hear, O Lord, when I cry with my voice; 15

Have mercy also upon me, and answer me.

When thou saidst, Seek ye my face;

My heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek.

Hide not thy face far from me;

Put not thy servant away in anger: 20

Thou hast been my help; leave me not,

Neither forsake me, O God of my salvation.

When my father and my mother forsake me,
then the Lord will take me up.

Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies.

Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies; 25

For false witnesses are risen up against me,
and such as breathe out cruelty.

I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart;

Wait, I say, on the Lord.

PSALM XLVI

"GOD IS OUR REFUGE"

GOD is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed,

And though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled,

Though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. 5

There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God,

The holy place of the tabernacle of the most High.

God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved;

God shall help her, and that right early.

The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved; 10

He uttered his voice, the earth melted.

The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.

Come, behold the works of the Lord,

What desolations he hath made in the earth.

He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the
earth; 15

He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear
in sunder;

He burneth the chariot in the fire.

Be still, and know that I am God;

I will be exalted among the heathen,

I will be exalted in the earth. 20

The Lord of hosts is with us;

The God of Jacob is our refuge.

PSALM LI

"HAVE MERCY UPON ME"

HAVE mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness;

According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions.

Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity,

And cleanse me from my sin.

For I acknowledge my transgressions; 5

And my sin is ever before me.

Against thee, thee only, have I sinned,

And done this evil in thy sight;

That thou mightest be justified when thou
speakest,

And be clear when thou judgest. 10
 Behold, I was shapen in iniquity;
 And in sin did my mother conceive me.
 Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts;
 And in the hidden part thou shalt make me
 to know wisdom. 14
 Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean;
 Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.
 Make me to hear joy and gladness;
 That the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice.
 Hide thy face from my sins,
 And blot out all mine iniquities. 20
 Create in me a clean heart, O God;
 And renew a right spirit within me.
 Cast me not away from thy presence;
 And take not thy holy spirit from me.
 Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; 25
 And uphold me with thy free spirit.
 Then will I teach transgressors thy ways;
 And sinners shall be converted unto thee.
 Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God,
 thou God of my salvation;
 And my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness. 30
 O Lord, open thou my lips;
 And my mouth shall show forth thy praise.
 For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it;
 Thou delightest not in burnt offering.
 The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; 35
 A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.
 Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion;
 Build thou the walls of Jerusalem.
 Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, 39
 With burnt offering and whole burnt offering;
 Then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar.

PSALM XC

“LORD, THOU HAST BEEN OUR DWELL-ING PLACE”

LORD, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations.
 Before the mountains were brought forth,
 Or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the
 world,
 Even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God:

Thou turnest man to destruction; 5
 And sayest, Return, ye children of men.
 For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past,
 And as a watch in the night.
 Thou carriest them away as with a flood;
 They are as a sleep; 10
 In the morning they are like grass which groweth up.
 In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth
 up;
 In the evening it is cut down, and withereth.
 For we are consumed by thine anger,
 And by thy wrath are we troubled. 15
 Thou hast set our iniquities before thee,
 Our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.
 For all our days are passed away in thy
 wrath;
 We spend our years as a tale that is told.
 The days of our years are threescore years and ten; 20
 And if by reason of strength they be fourscore years,
 Yet is their strength labor and sorrow;
 For it is soon cut off, and we fly away.
 Who knoweth the power of thine anger?
 Even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath.
 So teach us to number our days, 26
 That we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.
 Return, O Lord, how long?
 And let it repent thee concerning thy servants.
 O satisfy us early with thy mercy; 30
 That we may rejoice and be glad all our days.
 Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us,
 And the years wherein we have seen evil.
 Let thy work appear unto thy servants,
 And thy glory unto their children. 35
 And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us;
 And establish thou the work of our hands
 upon us;
 Yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

PSALM XCI

CONFIDENCE IN GOD

HE THAT dwelleth in the secret place of the most High Shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress;
 My God; in him will I trust.
 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, 5
 And from the noisome pestilence.
 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust;
 His truth shall be thy shield and buckler.
 Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by
 night;
 Nor for the arrow that flieth by day; 10
 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness;
 Nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.
 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand;
 But it shall not come nigh thee.
 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. 15 Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge,
 Even the most High, thy habitation,
 There shall no evil befall thee, Neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.
 For he shall give his angels charge over thee,
 To keep thee in all thy ways. 21
 They shall bear thee up in their hands,
 Lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.
 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder;
 The young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet. 25
 Because he hath set his love upon me,
 Therefore will I deliver him;
 I will set him on high,
 Because he hath known my name.
 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him;
 I will be with him in trouble; 31
 I will deliver him, and honor him.
 With long life will I satisfy him,
 And show him my salvation.

PSALM CXXI

"I WILL LIFT UP MINE EYES"

I WILL lift up mine eyes unto the hills,
 From whence cometh my help.
 My help cometh from the Lord,
 Which made heaven and earth.
 He will not suffer thy foot to be moved; 5
 He that keepeth thee will not slumber.

Behold, he that keepeth Israel
 Shall neither slumber nor sleep
 The Lord is thy keeper; 9
 The Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand.
 The sun shall not smite thee by day,
 Nor the moon by night.
 The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil;
 He shall preserve thy soul.
 The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in 15
 From this time forth, and even for evermore.

PSALM CXXX

"OUT OF THE DEPTHS"

OUT of the depths have I cried unto thee, O
 Lord.
 Lord, hear my voice;
 Let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.
 If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O
 Lord, who shall stand?
 But there is forgiveness with thee, 5
 That thou mayest be feared.
 I wait for the Lord,
 My soul doth wait,
 And in his word do I hope. 9
 My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning;
 I say, more than they that watch for the morning.
 Let Israel hope in the Lord;
 For with the Lord there is mercy,
 And with him is plenteous redemption.
 And he shall redeem Israel from all his in-iquities. 15

PSALM CXLV

"I WILL EXTOL THEE"

I WILL extol thee, my God, O king;
 And I will bless thy name for ever and ever.
 Every day will I bless thee;
 And I will praise thy name for ever and ever.
 Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised;
 And his greatness is unsearchable. 6
 One generation shall praise thy works to
 another,
 And shall declare thy mighty acts.
 I will speak of the glorious honor of thy majesty,
 And of thy wondrous works. 10

And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts;
And I will declare thy greatness.
They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness,
And shall sing of thy righteousness.
The Lord is gracious, and full of compassion,
Slow to anger, and of great mercy. 16
The Lord is good to all,
And his tender mercies are over all his works.
All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord;
And thy saints shall bless thee. 20
They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom,
And talk of thy power;
To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts,
And the glorious majesty of his kingdom.
Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom,
And thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. 26
The Lord upholdeth all that fall,
And raiseth up all those that be bowed down.
The eyes of all wait upon thee;
And thou givest them their meat in due season. 30

Thou openest thine hand,
And satisfiest the desire of every living thing.
The Lord is righteous in all his ways,
And holy in all his works.
The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon
him, 35
To all that call upon him in truth.
He will fulfil the desire of them that fear
him;
He also will hear their cry, and will save
them.
The Lord preserveth all them that love him;
But all the wicked will he destroy. 40
My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord;
And let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever.

SAPPHO (c. 610 B. C.)

FRAGMENTS

HESPERUS, THE BRINGER¹

O HESPERUS, thou bringest all good things—
Home to the weary, to the hungry cheer,
To the young bird the parent's brooding
wings,

¹Translation by Lord Byron.

The welcome stall to the o'erlabored steer;
Whate'er of peace about our hearthstone clings, 5
Whate'er our household gods protect of
dear,
Are gathered round us by thy look of rest;
Thou bring'st the child too to its mother's breast.

ONE GIRL²

LIKE the sweet apple which reddens upon the topmost bough,
A-top on the topmost twig,—which the pluckers forgot, somehow,— Forgot it not, nay, but got it not, for none could get it till now.

Like the wild hyacinth flower which on the hills is found,
Which the passing feet of the shepherds for ever tear and wound, 5
Until the purple blossom is trodden in the
ground.

MOTHER, I CANNOT MIND MY WHEEL³

MOTHER, I cannot mind my wheel;
My fingers ache, my lips are dry;
Oh! if you felt the pain I feel!
But oh, who ever felt as I!

THE silver moon is set;
The Pleiades are gone;
Half the long night is spent, and yet
I lie alone.⁴

THOU liest dead, and there will be no memory left behind
Of thee or thine in all the earth, for never didst thou bind
The roses of Pierian streams upon thy brow;
thy doom
Is writ to flit with unknown ghosts in cold and nameless gloom.⁵

ODE TO APHRODITE¹

SPLENDOUR-THRONED Queen, immortal Aphrodite,

Daughter of Jove, Enchantress, I implore
thee

Vex not my soul with agonies and anguish;
Slay me not, Goddess!

Come in thy pity—come, if I have prayed
thee; 5

Come at the cry of my sorrow; in the old times

Oft thou hast heard, and left thy father's
heaven,

Left the gold houses,
Yoking thy chariot. Swiftly did the doves
fly,

Swiftly they brought thee, waving plumes of wonder— 10

Waving their dark plumes all across the aether,

All down the azure.
Very soon they lighted. Then didst thou,
Divine one,

Laugh a bright laugh from lips and eyes
immortal, 15

Ask me, "What ailed me—wherefore out of
heaven

"Thus I had called thee?
"What it was made me madden in my heart
so?"

Question me smiling—say to me, "My Sappho,

"Who is it wrongs thee? Tell me who refuses 20

"Thee, vainly sighing."
"Be it who it may be, he that flies shall
follow;

"He that rejects gifts, he shall bring thee
many;

"He that hates now shall love thee dearly,
madly—

"Aye, though thou wouldst not." 25

So once again come, Mistress; and, releasing Me from my sadness, give me what I sue for,

Grant me my prayer, and be as heretofore
now

Friend and protectress.

BLEST as the immortal gods is he,
The youth whose eyes may look on thee,
Whose ears thy tongue's sweet melody
May still devour.

¹Translation by Edwin Arnold.

Thou smilest too?—sweet smile, whose
charm 5

Has struck my soul with wild alarm,
And, when I see thee, bids disarm
Each vital power.

Speechless I gaze: the flame within Runs swift o'er all my quivering skin; 10
My eyeballs swim; with dizzy din
My brain reels round;

And cold drops fall; and tremblings frail
Seize every limb; and grassy pale

I grow; and then—together fail 15
Both sight and sound.²

PLANETS, that around the beauteous moon
Attendant wait, cast into shade

Their ineffectual lustre, soon
As she, in full-orbed majesty arrayed,
Her silver radiance pours 5
Upon this world of ours.²

ANACREON

(563 ?–478 ? B. C.)

THE GRASSHOPPER³

HAPPY Insect! what can be
In happiness compared to thee?

Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy Morning's gentle wine!

Nature waits upon thee still, 5
And thy verdant cup does fill;

'Tis filled wherever thou dost tread,
Nature's self's thy Ganymede.

Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing;
Happier than the happiest king! 10

All the fields which thou dost see,
All the plants, belong to thee;

All that summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice.

Man for thee does sow and plow; 15
Farmer he, and landlord thou!

Thou dost innocently joy;
Nor does thy luxury destroy;

The shepherd gladly heareth thee, 20
More harmonious than he.

Thee country hinds with gladness hear,
Prophet of the ripened year!

Thee Phoebus loves, and does inspire;
Phoebus is himself thy sire.

²Translation by J. H. Merivale.

³Translation by Cowley.

To thee, of all things upon Earth, 25
 Life's no longer than thy mirth.
 Happy insect, happy thou!
 Dost neither age nor winter know;
 But, when thou'st drunk, and danced, and sung
 Thy fill, the flowery leaves among, 30 (Voluptuous, and wise withal, Epicurean animal!)
 Sated with thy summer feast,
 Thou retir'st to endless rest.

THE SWALLOW¹

Foolish prater, what dost thou
 So early at my window do,
 With thy tuneless serenade?
 Well 't had been had Tereus made
 Thee as dumb as Philomel; 5
 There his knife had done but well.
 In thy undiscovered nest
 Thou dost all the winter rest,
 And dreamest o'er thy summer joys,
 Free from th' ill thou'st done to me;
 Who disturbs or seeks out thee? 10
 Hadst thou all the charming notes
 Of the wood's poetic throats,
 All thou art could never pay
 What thou hast ta'en from me away 15
 Cruel bird! thou'st ta'en away
 A dream out of my arms to-day;
 A dream that ne'er must equaled be
 By all that waking eyes may see.
 Thou, this damage to repair, 20
 Nothing half so sweet or fair,
 Nothing half so good, canst bring,
 Though men say thou bring'st the Spring.

DRINKING²

I CARE not for the idle state
 Of Persia's king, the rich, the great!
 I envy not the monarch's throne,
 Nor wish the treasured gold my own.
 But oh! be mine the rosy braid, 5
 The fervor of my brows to shade;
 Be mine the odors, richly sighing,
 Amid my hoary tresses flying.
 To-day I'll haste to quaff my wine,
 As if to-morrow ne'er should shine; 10
 But if to-morrow comes, why then—
 I'll haste to quaff my wine again.

¹Translation by Cowley.²Translation by Tom Moore.

And thus while all our days are bright,
 Nor time has dimmed their bloomy light,
 Let us the festal hours beguile 15
 With mantling cup and cordial smile;
 And shed from every bowl of wine
 The richest drop on Bacchus's shrine!
 For Death may come, with brow unpleasant,
 May come when least we wish him present,
 And beckon to the sable shore, 20
 And grimly bid us—drink no more!

A LOVER'S SIGH²

THE Phrygian rock that braves the storm
 Was once a weeping matron's form;
 And Procne, hapless, frantic maid,
 Is now a swallow in the shade.
 Oh that a mirror's form were mine, 5
 To sparkle with that smile divine;
 And like my heart I then should be,
 Reflecting thee, and only thee!
 Or could I be the robe which holds
 That graceful form within its folds; 10
 Or, turned into a fountain, lave
 Thy beauties in my circling wave;
 Or, better still, the zone that lies
 Warm to thy breast, and feels its sighs!
 Or like those envious pearls that show 15
 So faintly round that neck of snow!
 Yes, I would be a happy gem,
 Like them to hand, to fade like them.
 What more would thy Anacreon be?
 Oh, anything that touches thee, 20
 Nay, sandals for those airy feet—
 Thus to be pressed by thee were sweet!

THE CUP³

MAKE me a bowl, a mighty bowl,
 Large as my capacious soul,
 Vast as my thirst is. Let it have Depth enough to be my grave.
 I mean the grave of all my care, 5
 For I intend to bury't there.
 Let it of silver fashioned be,
 Worthy of wine! worthy of me!
 Worthy to adorn the spheres
 As that bright Cup among the stars! 10
 Yet draw no shapes of armor there,
 No casque nor shield nor sword nor spear!
 Nor wars of Thebes nor wars of Troy,
 Nor any other martial toy.

³Translation by John Oldham.

For what do I vain armor prize, 15
 Who mind not such rough exercise?
 But gentle sieges, softer wars,
 Fights that cause no wounds or scars.
 I'll have not battles on my plate,
 Lest sight of them should brawls create, 20
 Lest that provoke to quarrels too,
 Which wine itself enough can do.

CATULLUS (84-54 B. C.)

"FRATER AVE ATQUE VALE"

*Row us out from Desenzano, to your Sirmione row!
 So they row'd, and there we landed—"O venusta Sirmio!"*

There to me thro' all the groves of olive in the summer glow,

There beneath the Roman ruin where the purple flowers grow,

*Came that "Ave atque Vale" of the Poet's hopeless
 woe,*

Tenderest of Roman poets nineteen hundred years ago

*"Frater Ave atque Vale"—as we wander'd to and
 fro*

*Gazing at the Lydian laughter of the Garda Lake
 below*

*Sweet Catullus's all-but-island, olive-silvery Sirmio!
 —Tennyson.*

HOME TO SIRMIO¹

DEAR Sirmio, that art the very eye
 Of islands and peninsulas, that lie
 Deeply embosomed in calm inland lake,
 Or where the waves of the vast ocean break;
 Joy of all joys, to gaze on thee once more! 5
 I scarce believe that I have left the shore
 Of Thynia, and Bithynia's parching plain,
 And gaze on thee in safety once again!

Oh, what more sweet than when, from care
 set free,

The spirit lays its burden down, and we, 10
 With distant travel spent, come home and
 spread

Our limbs to rest along the wished-for bed!
 This, this alone, repays such toils as these!
 Smile, then, fair Sirmio, and thy master
 please,—

And you, ye dancing waters of the lake, 15
 Rejoice; and every smile of home awake!

LOVE IS ALL¹

LET us, Lesbia darling, still Live our life, and love our fill;
 Heeding not a jot, howe'er
 Churlish dotards chide or stare!
 Suns go down, but 'tis to rise 5
 Brighter in the morning skies;
 But when sets our little light,
 We must sleep in endless night.
 A thousand kisses grant me sweet;
 With a hundred these complete; 10
 Lip me a thousand more, and then Another hundred give again.
 A thousand add to these, anon
 A hundred more, then hurry one
 Kiss after kiss without cessation, 15
 Until we lose all calculation;
 So envy shall not mar our blisses
 By numbering up our tale of kisses.

LAST WORD TO LESBIA²

O FURIUS and Aurelius! comrades sweet!
 Who to Ind's farthest shore with me would roam.

Where the far-sounding Orient billows beat
 Their fury into foam;

Or to Hyrcania, balm-breathed Araby, 5
 The Sacian's or the quivered Parthian's
 land,

Or where seven-mantled Nile's swoll'n waters
 dye

The sea with yellow sand;

Or cross the lofty Alpine fells, to view
 Great Caesar's trophied fields, the Gallic
 Rhine, 10

The pain-smear'd Briton race, grim-visaged
 crew,

Placed by earth's limit line;

To all prepared with me to brave the way,
 To dare whate'er the eternal gods decree—
 These few unwelcome words to her convey
 Who once was all to me. 16

Still let her revel with her godless train,
 Still clasp her hundred slaves to passion's thrall,

Still truly love not one, but ever drain
 The life-blood of them all. 20

¹Translation by Theodore Martin.

²Translation by James Cranston.

Nor let her more my once fond passion heed,
 For by her faithlessness 'tis blighted now,
 Like flow'ret on the verge of grassy mead
 Crushed by the passing plow.

TO CORNELIUS NEPOS¹

MY LITTLE volume is complete,
 Fresh pumice-polished and as neat
 As book need wish to be;
 And now, what patron shall I choose
 For these gay sallies of my muse? 5
 Cornelius, whom but thee!

For though they are but trifles, thou
 Some value didst to them allow,
 And that from thee is fame,
 Who dared in thy three volumes' space, 10
 Alone of all Italians, trace
 Our history and name.

Great Jove, what lore, what labor there!
 Then take this little book, whate'er
 Of good or bad it store; 15
 And grant, oh guardian Muse, that it
 May keep the flavor of its wit
 A century or more!

THE DEAD SPARROW²

YE CUPIDS, droop each little head,
 Nor let your wings with joy be spread;
 My Lesbia's favorite bird is dead,
 Whom dearer than her eyes she loved.
 For he was gentle, and so true, 5
 Obedient to her call he flew,
 No fear, no wild alarm he knew,
 But lightly o'er her bosom moved:

And softly fluttering here and there,
 He never sought to clear the air, 10
 But chirruped oft, and, free from care,
 Tuned to her ear his grateful strain.
 Now having passed the gloomy bourne
 From whence he never can return,
 His death and Lesbia's grief I mourn, 15
 Who sighs, alas! but sighs in vain.

Oh! curst be thou, devouring grave!
 Whose jaws eternal victims crave,
 From whom no earthly power can save;
 For thou hast ta'en the bird away: 20

From thee my Lesbia's eyes o'er flow,
 Her swollen cheeks with weeping glow;
 Thou art the cause of all her woe,
 Receptacle of life's decay.

LOVE'S UNREASON

I HATE and love—the why I cannot tell,
 But by my tortures know the fact too well.

ON ARRIUS¹

WHENEVER Arrius wished to name
 'Commodious,' out 'Chommodious' came:
 And when of his intrigues he blabbed,
 With his 'hintrigues' our ears he stabbed,
 And thought, moreover, he displayed 5
 A rare refinement, when he made
 His h's thus at random fall
 With emphasis most guttural.
 So spoke his mother, I'll be bound,
 His uncle so his h's ground, 10
 His grandam so the vowels tried
 And grandsire on the mother's side.

To Syria Arrius was despatched,
 And then our ears a respite snatched.
 'Twas quite a comfort and delight 15
 To hear such words pronounced aright,
 With no alarm lest they should grate
 With the redundant aspirate;
 When suddenly came news one day,
 Which smote the city with dismay, 20
 That the Ionian seas a change
 Had undergone most sad and strange;
 For, since by Arrius crossed, the wild
 'Hionian Hocean' they were styled.

CATULLUS AT HIS BROTHER'S GRAVE

O'ER many a sea, o'er many a stranger land,
 I bring this tribute to thy lonely tomb,
 My brother! and beside the narrow room
 That holds thy ashes weeping stand.
 Vainly I call to thee. Who can command 5
 An answer forth from Orcus' dreary
 gloom?

Oh brother, brother! life lost all its bloom,
 When thou wert snatched from me with pitiless hand!
 Woe, Woe, is me, that we shall meet no
 more!

Meanwhile, these gifts accept, which to the grave 10

¹Translation by Theodore Martin.

²Translation by Lord Byron.

Of those they loved in life our sires of yore
 With pious hand and reverential gave—Gifts that are streaming with a brother's
 tears!
 And now, farewell, and rest thee from all
 fears!

FAREWELL TO BITHYNIA¹

A BALMY warmth comes wafted o'er the seas,
 The savage howl of wintry tempests dear
 In the sweet whispers of the western breeze Has died away; the spring, the spring is
 here! 4

Now quit, Catullus, quit the Phrygian plain,
 Where days of sweltering sunshine soon shall crown
 Nicæa's fields with wealth of golden grain,
 And fly to Asia's cities of renown!

Already through each nerve a flutter runs
 Of eager hope, that longs to be away; 10
 Already 'neath the light of other suns
 My feet, new-winged for travel, yearn to stray.

And you, ye band of comrades tried and
 true,
 Who side by side went forth from home,
 farewell!
 How far apart the paths shall carry you 15
 Back to your nativeshore, ah, who can tell?

NUPTIAL SONG¹

YOUTHS. Lo, Hesper is at hand! Rise, youths! His light
 Expected long now harbingers the night.
 'Tis time to quit the feast. We must away.
 Swell high with me the hymeneal lay.
 Anon the virgin comes in blushes by. 5
 Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, be thou nigh!

MAIDENS. Mark you the youths? Rise up, rise up, each maid!
 Already hath the evening star displayed
 In the dim welkin his Ætæan flame.
 Mark you their nimbleness? Then know their aim! 10
 Anon they'll sing a lay we must outvie.
 Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, be thou nigh!

Y. No easy triumph, comrades, shall we gain.

See how the maids are practising their strain!
 Nor vainly so. With undivided care 15
 Their task is wrought—what marvel, if 'tis
 fair?

Whilst we, who labor with distracted wit,
 Are like to lose the palm, and so 'tis fit,
 Bestowing here our voice and there our ear.
 Well studied work to victory is dear— 20
 Pains undivided, toil that will not tire;
 Then kindle to your task with answering
 fire!

Anon they will begin; we must reply.

Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, be thou nigh!

M. Say, Hesper, say, what fire of all that
 shine 25
 In Heaven's great vault more cruel is than
 thine?

Who from the mother's arms her child can tear—

The child that clasps her mother in despair;
 And to the youth, whose blood is all aflame,
 Consigns the virgin sinking in her shame!
 When towns are sacked, what cruelty more
 drear? 31

Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, Hymen, hear!

Y. Say, Hesper, say, what fire of all that
 shine

In Heaven's great vault more jocund is than
 thine?

Who with thy flame dost ratify the bond 35
 Of wedlock-troth first vowed by lovers fond,
 By parents vowed, but consummated ne'er,
 Until thy star hath risen upon the air?
 What choicer hour sends heaven our life to cheer?

Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, Hymen, hear! 40

M. Woe, my companions, woe, that Hesper thus

Hath reft the fairest of our mates from us!
 Why were we heedless of thy coming—why?
 For most it fits to watch, when thou art
 nigh. 44

To stolen delights by night the lover hies,
 And him wilt thou, oh Hesper, oft surprise,
 When thou in other name dost reappear.
 Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, Hymen, hear!

Y. Heed not the railing of the virgin choir!

They joy to chide thee with fictitious ire. 50

¹Translation by Theodore Martin.

How, if within their secret soul they long
For what they so vituperate in song?
Then to their chiding turn a heedless ear.
Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, draw thou near!

M. As in a garden grows some floweret
fair, 55
Safe from the flocks, safe from the plough-man's share,
Nursed by the sun, by gentle breezes fanned,
Fed by the showers, admired on every hand,
There as it coyly blossoms in the shade, 59
Desired by many a youth, by many a maid;
But pluck that flower, its witchery is o'er,
And neither youth nor maid desires it more.
So is the virgin prized, endeared as much,
Whilst yet unsullied by a lover's touch;
But if she lose her chaste and virgin flower,
Her beauty's bloom is blighted in an hour: 66
To youths no more, no more to maidens dear.
Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, be thou near!

Y. As grows a widowed vine in open fields, 69
It hangs its head, no mellow clusters yields;
So droops the fragile stem, its topmost shoot
With nerveless tendril hangs about its root;
That vine no husbandman nor rustic swain
Hath cared to tend or cultivate or train;
But if by happier chance that self-same vine 75
Around a husband elm its tendrils twine,
Then many a husbandman and rustic swain
Its shoots will tend and cultivate and train.
Even such the virgin, and unprized as much,
That fades, untended by a lover's touch; 80
But when, in fulness of her maiden pride,
Some fitting mate has won her for his bride,
She's loved as never was she loved before,
And parents bless her and are stern no more.

Y. AND M. Then spurn not, oh ye virgins, such a groom! 85
Unmeet it is to spurn the man to whom
Thy father gave thee, and thy mother too;
For unto them is thy obedience due.
Not wholly thine is thy virginity;
Thy parents own some part of it in thee. 90
One third thy father's is by right divine,
One third thy mother's; one alone is thine.
Then war not with these twain, who with thy dower
Have given their son-in-law their rights and
power.

Come! to the bridal-chamber hence-away! 95
Oh Hymen, Hymenæus, bless our rites to-
day!

HORACE (65-8 B. C.)

TO PYRRHA¹

(Odes, I, 5)

WHAT slender youth, bedew'd with liquid
odors,
Courts thee on roses in some pleasant cave,
Pyrrha? For whom bind'st thou
In wreaths thy golden hair,
Plain in thy neatness? O how oft shall he 5
Of faith and changed gods complain, and seas
Rough with black winds, and storms
Unwonted shall admire!
Who now enjoys thee credulous, all gold,
Who, always vacant, always amiable 10
Hopes thee, of flattering gales Unmindful. Hapless they
To whom thou untried seem'st fair. Me, in my vow'd
Picture, the sacred wall declares to have hung
My dank and dropping weeds 15
To the stern god of sea.

THE SHIP OF STATE²

(Odes, I, 14)

OH SHIP! new billows sweep thee out Seaward. What wilt thou? Hold the port, be stout.

See'st not thy mast
How rent by stiff Southwestern blast?

Thy side, of rowers how forlorn? 5
Thine hull, with groaning yards, with rigging torn,

Can ill sustain
The fierce, and ever fiercer main;

Thy gods, no more than sails entire,
From whom yet once thy need might aid require, 10

Oh Pontic Pine,
The first of woodland stocks is thine,

¹Translation by John Milton.

²Translation by William Ewart Gladstone.

Yet race and name are but as dust.
 Not painted sterns give storm-tost seamen
 trust;
 Unless thou dare
 To be the sport of storms, beware.

O fold at best a weary weight,
 A yearning care and constant strain of late,
 O shun the seas
 That gird those glittering Cyclades. 20

TO SALLY¹

(Odes, I, 22)

THE man in righteousness arrayed,
 A pure and blameless liver,
 Needs not the keen Toledo blade,
 Nor venom-freighted quiver.
 What though he wind his toilsome way 5
 O'er regions wild and weary—
 Through Zara's burning desert stray,
 Or Asia's jungles dreary:

What though he plow the billowy deep
 By lunar light, or solar, 10
 Meet the resistless Simoon's sweep,
 Or iceberg circumpolar!
 In bog or quagmire deep and dank
 His foot shall never settle;
 He mounts the summit of Mont Blanc, 15
 Or Popocatpetl.

On Chimborazo's breathless height
 He treads o'er burning lava;
 Or snuffs the Bohan Upas blight,
 The deathful plant of Java. 20
 Through every peril he shall pass,
 By Virtue's shield protected;
 And still by Truth's unerring glass
 His path shall be directed.

Else wherefore was it, Thursday last, 25
 While strolling down the valley,
 Defenseless, musing as I passed
 A canzonet to Sally,
 A wolf, with mouth-protruding snout,
 Forth from the thicket bounded— 30
 I clapped my hands and raised a shout—
 He heard—and fled—confounded.

Tangier nor Tunis never bred
 An animal more crabbed;

Nor Fez, dry-nurse of lions, fed 35
 A monster half so rabid;
 Nor Ararat so fierce a beast
 Has seen since days of Noah;
 Nor stronger, eager for a feast,
 The fell constrictor boa. 40

TO LICINIUS²

(Odes, II, 10)

RECEIVE, dear friend, the truths I teach;
 So shalt thou live beyond the reach
 Of adverse Fortune's power;
 Not always tempt the distant deep,
 Nor always timorously creep 5
 Along the treacherous shore.

He that holds fast the golden mean,
 And lives contentedly between
 The little and the great,
 Feels not the wants that pinch the poor, 10
 Nor plagues that haunt the rich man's door,
 Embittering all his state.

The tallest pines feel most the power
 Of wintry blasts; the loftiest tower
 Comes heaviest to the ground; 15
 The bolts that spare the mountain's side,
 His cloud-capt eminence divide,
 And spread the ruin round.

The well-inform'd philosopher
 Rejoices with a wholesome fear, 20
 And hopes, in spite of pain;
 If winter bellow from the north,
 Soon the sweet spring comes dancing forth,
 And Nature laughs again.

What if thine heaven be overcast? 25
 The dark appearance will not last;
 Expect a brighter sky.
 The god, that strings the silver bow,
 Awakes sometimes the Muses too,
 And lays his arrows by. 30

If hindrances obstruct thy way,
 Thy magnanimity display,
 And let thy strength be seen;
 But oh! if Fortune fill thy sail,
 With more than a propitious gale, 35
 Take half thy canvas in.

¹Translation by John Quincy Adams.

²Translation by William Cowper.

(Odes, I, 38)

Plainer myrtle pleases me 5
Thus outstretched beneath my vine,
Myrtle more becoming thee
Waiting with thy master's wine.

Sounds that shall soothe to sleep and dreams.
Then when the thunderous winter comes
again, 29

Crowd where the hearth-gods' smiles show warm!"

Alfius the usurer, when thus he swore Farmer to be for ever more,
At the mid-month his last transaction ending,
By next new moon is keen for lending. 70

CHRISTOPHER
MARLOWE (1564-1593)

THE PASSIONATE SHEP-HERD TO HIS LOVE

COME live with me and be my Love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That hills and valleys, dales and fields,
Or woods or steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
And see the shepherds feed their flocks
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Embroider'd all with leaves of myrtle.

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair-lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold.

A belt of straw and ivy-buds
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me and be my Love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my Love.

WILLIAM SHAKE-
SPEARE (1564-1616)¹

WHO IS SYLVIA?

FROM Two Gentlemen of Verona

WHO is Sylvia? what is she,
That all our swains commend her?
Holy, fair, and wise is she;
The heaven such grace did lend her,
That she might admired be.

Is she kind as she is fair?
For beauty lives with kindness.

Love doth to her eyes repair
To help him of his blindness,
And, being helped, inhabits there. 10

Then to Sylvia let us sing,
That Sylvia is excelling;
She excels each mortal thing
Upon the dull earth dwelling:
To her let us garlands bring. 15

O MISTRESS MINE

FROM Twelfth Night

O MISTRESS mine, where are you roaming?
O, stay and hear, your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low:
Trip no further, pretty sweeting,
Journeys end in lovers meeting, 5
Every wise man's son doth know.

What is love? 't is not hereafter;
Present mirth hath present laughter;
What's to come is still unsure:
In delay there lies no plenty, 10
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

FANCY

FROM Merchant of Venice

TELL me where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart or in the head?
How begot, how nourish'd?
Reply, reply.

It is engendered in the eyes, 5
With gazing fed; and fancy dies
In the cradle where it lies:
Let us all ring fancy's knell;
I'll begin it,—Ding, dong, bell.
Ding, dong, bell. 10

AUBADE

FROM Cymbeline

HARK! hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;
And winking Mary-buds begin 5
To ope their golden eyes:
With everything that pretty bin,
My lady sweet, arise!
Arise, arise!

¹Other songs by Shakespeare will be found on pages 12, 415, and 432.

WHERE THE BEE SUCKS

FROM The Tempest

WHERE the bee sucks, there suck I:

In a cowslip's bell I lie;

There I couch when owls do cry.

On the bat's back I do fly

After summer merrily: 5

Merrily, merrily, shall I live now,

Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

WHEN ICICLES HANG
BY THE WALLFROM Love's Labor Lost

WHEN icicles hang by the wall,

And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,

And Tom bears logs into the hall,

And milk comes frozen home in pail, 5

When blood is nipped and ways be foul, 5

Then nightly sings the staring owl,

"Tu-whit, tu-who!" a merry note,

While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

When all aloud the wind doth blow,

And coughing drowns the parson's saw, 10

And birds sit brooding in the snow,

And Marian's nose looks red and raw,

When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl,

Then nightly sings the staring owl,

"Tu-whit, tu-who!" a merry note, 15

While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

TAKE, O, TAKE THOSE LIPS AWAYFROM Measure for Measure

TAKE, O, take those lips away,

That so sweetly were forsworn;

And those eyes, the break of day,

Lights that do mislead the morn:

But my kisses bring again, 5

Bring again;

Seals of love, but sealed in vain,

Sealed in vain!

A SEA DIRGE

FROM The Tempest

FULL fathom five thy father lies,

Of his bones are coral made,

Those are pearls that were his eyes:

Nothing of him that doth fade,

But doth suffer a sea-change 5

Into something rich and strange.

Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:

Ding-dong,

Hark! now I hear them, ding-dong, bell.

BEN JONSON

(1573-1637)

SONG TO CELIA

DRINK to me only with thine eyes,

And I will pledge with mine;

Or leave a kiss but in the cup,

And I'll not look for wine.

The thirst that from the soul doth rise 5

Doth ask a drink divine;

But might I of Jove's nectar sup,

I would not change for thine.

I sent thee late a rosy wreath,

Not so much honoring thee 10

As giving it a hope, that there

It could not withered be.

But thou thereon didst only breathe,

And sent'st it back to me;

Since when it grows, and smells, I swear, 15

Not of itself, but thee.

HYMN TO DIANA

QUEEN and Huntress, chaste and fair,

Now the sun is laid to sleep,

Seated in thy silver chair

State in wonted manner keep:

Hesperus entreats thy light, 5

Goddess excellently bright.

Earth, let not thy envious shade

Dare itself to interpose;

Cynthia's shining orb was made

Heaven to clear when day did close: 10

Bless us then with wished sight,

Goddess excellently bright.

Lay thy bow of pearl apart

And thy crystal-shining quiver;

Give unto the flying hart 15

Space to breathe, how short soever:

Thou that mak'st a day of night,

Goddess excellently bright!

ROBERT HERRICK

(1591-1674)

THE NIGHT-PIECE, TO JULIA

HER eyes the glow-worm lend thee,
The shooting stars attend thee;
And the elves also,
Whose little eyes glow
Like the sparks of fire, befriend thee. 5

No Will-o'-th'-Wisp mis-light thee,
Nor snake nor slow-worm bite thee;
But on, on thy way,
Not making a stay,
Since ghost there's none to affright thee. 10

Let not the dark thee cumber;
What though the moon does slumber?
The stars of the night
Will lend thee their light,
Like tapers clear without number. 15

Then, Julia, let me woo thee,
Thus, thus, to come unto me;
And when I shall meet
Thy silvery feet
My soul I'll pour into thee. 20

TO THE VIRGINS, TO MAKE MUCH OF TIME

GATHER ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying:
And this same flower that smiles to-day
To-morrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun, 5
The higher he's a-getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first, 10
When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
And while ye may, go marry:
For having lost but once your prime, 15
You may for ever tarry.

TO DAFFODILS

FAIR daffodils, we weep to see
You haste away so soon;
As yet the early-rising sun
Has not attain'd his noon. 5
Stay, stay
Until the hasting day
Has run
But to the evensong;
And, having pray'd together, we
Will go with you along. 10

We have short time to stay, as you,
We have as short a spring;
As quick a growth to meet decay,
As you, or anything. 15
We die
As your hours do, and dry
Away
Like to the summer's rain;
Or as the pearls of morning's dew,
Ne'er to be found again. 20

ROBERT BURNS

(1759-1796)

SCOTS WHA HAE

SCOTS, wha hae wi' Wallace bled, Scots, wham Bruce has aften led;
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victory! 5
Now's the day, and now's the hour;
See the front o' battle lour;
See approach proud Edward's power—
Chains and slavery!

Wha will be a traitor knave?
Wha can fill a coward's grave? 10
Wha sae base as be a slave?
Let him turn and flee!
Wha for Scotland's king and law
Freedom's sword will strongly draw,
Freeman stand, or Freeman fa', 15
Let him follow me!

By oppression's woes and pains, 20
By your sons in servile chains!
We will drain our dearest veins,
But they shall be free!
Lay the proud usurpers low!
Tyrants fall in every foe!
Liberty's in every blow!—
Let us do or die!

HIGHLAND MARY

YE BANKS, and braes,¹ and streams around
 The castle o' Montgomery,
 Green be your woods and fair your flowers,
 Your waters never drumlie!²
 There summer first unfauld her robes, 5
 And there the langest tarry;
 For there I took the last fareweel,
 O' my sweet Highland Mary.

How sweetly bloom'd the gay green birk,
 How rich the hawthorn's blossom, 10
 As underneath their fragrant shade
 I clasp'd her to my bosom!
 The golden hours, on angel wings,
 Flew o'er me and my dearie;
 For dear to me as light and life, 15
 Was my sweet Highland Mary.

Wi' monie a vow and lock'd embrace
 Our parting was fu' tender;
 And, pledging aft to meet again,
 We tore ourselves asunder; 20
 But O! fell death's untimely frost,
 That nipt my flower sae early!
 Now green's the sod, and cauld's the clay,
 That wraps my Highland Mary!

O, pale, pale now, those rosy lips, 25
 I aft hae kiss'd sae fondly!
 And closed for aye the sparkling glance,
 That dwelt on me sae kindly!
 And mould'ring now in silent dust,
 That heart that lo'ed me dearly! 30
 But still within my bosom's core Shall live my Highland Mary.

A MAN'S A MAN FOR A' THAT

IS THERE, for honest poverty,
 That tings his head, an' a' that?
 The coward slave, we pass him by,
 We dare be poor for a' that!
 For a' that, an' a' that, 5
 Our toils obscure, an' a' that;
 The rank is but the guinea's stamp;
 The man's the gowd³ for a' that.

What tho' on hamely fare we dine,
 Wear hodden-gray, an' a' that; 10
 Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,
 A man's a man for a' that.

For a' that, an' a' that,
 Their tinsel show, an' a' that;
 The honest man, tho' e'er sae poor, 15
 Is king o' men for a' that.

Ye see yon birkie,⁴ ca'd a lord,
 Wha struts, an' stares, an' a' that;
 Tho' hundreds worship at his word,
 He's but a coof⁵ for a' that. 20
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 His riband, star, an' a' that,
 The man o' independent mind,
 He looks and laughs at a' that.

A prince can mak a belted knight, 25
 A marquis, duke, an' a' that;
 But an honest man's aboon his might,
 Guid faith he mauna fa⁶ that!
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 Their dignities, an' a' that, 30
 The pith o' sense, an' pride o' worth,
 Are higher rank than a' that.

Then let us pray that come it may,
 As come it will for a' that,
 That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth 35
 May bear the gree,⁷ an' a' that.
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 It's comin yet, for a' that,
 That man to man, the warld o'er,
 Shall brithers be for a' that. 40

BONIE DOON

YE FLOWERY banks o' bonie Doon,
 How can ye blume sae fair?
 How can ye chant, ye little birds,
 And I sae fu' o' care?

Thou'll break my heart, thou bonie bird, 5
 That sings upon the bough;
 Thou minds me o' the happy days,
 When my fause luvie was true.

Thou'll break my heart, thou bonie bird,
 That sings beside thy mate; 10
 For sae I sat, and sae I sang,
 And wist na o' my fate.

Aft hae I rov'd by bonie Doon
 To see the wood-bine twine,
 And ilka⁸ bird sang o' its luvie, 15
 And sae did I o' mine.

MY HEART'S IN THE HIGHLANDS

FAREWELL to the Highlands, farewell to the North,
 The birth-place of valour, the country of
 worth;
 Wherever I wander, wherever I rove,
 The hills of the Highlands for ever I love.

My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here; 5

My heart's in the Highlands, a-chasing
 the deer;

A-chasing the wild deer, and following the
 roe,

My heart's in the Highlands wherever I go.

Farewell to the mountains, high-covered with snow;

Farewell to the straths and green valleys
 below; 10

Farewell to the forests and wild-hanging woods,

Farewell to the torrents and loud-pouring floods.

My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here;

My heart's in the Highlands, a-chasing
 the deer;

A-chasing the wild deer, and following the
 roe, 15

My heart's in the Highlands wherever
 I go.

JOHN ANDERSON MY JO

JOHN ANDERSON my jo,¹ John,
 When we were first acquent,
 Your locks were like the raven,
 Your bonie brow was brent;²
 But now your brow is beld,³ John, 5
 Your locks are like the snaw;
 But blessings on your frosty pow,⁴
 John Anderson, my jo.

John Anderson my jo, John,
 We clamb the hill thegither; 10

And monie a cantie⁵ day, John,
 We've had wi' ane anither:
 Now we maun totter down, John,
 And hand in hand we'll go,
 And sleep thegither at the foot, 15
 John Anderson my jo.

GREEN GROW THE RASHES

CHORUS

GREEN grow the rashes, O;
 Green grow the rashes, O;
 The sweetest hours that e'er I spend
 Are spent among the lasses, O.

There's nought but care on ev'ry han', 5
 In every hour that passes, O:
 What signifies that life o' man,
 An' 'twere na for the lasses, O?

The war'ly⁶ race may riches chase,
 An' riches still may fly them, O; 10
 An' tho' at last they catch them fast,
 Their hearts can ne'er enjoy them, O.

But gie me a cannie⁷ hour at e'en,
 My arms about my dearie, O;
 An' war'ly cares, an' war'ly men, 15
 May a' gae tapsalteerie, O.

For you sae douce,⁸ ye sneer at this;
 Ye're nought but senseless asses, O:
 The wisest man the war' e'er saw,
 He dearly loved the lasses, O. 20

Auld Nature swears, the lovely dears
 Her noblest work she classes, O:
 Her prentice han' she try'd on man,
 An' then she made the lasses, O.

CHORUS

Green grow the rashes, O; 25
 Green grow the rashes, O;
 The sweetest hours that e'er I spend,
 Are spent among the lasses, O.

FLOW GENTLY, SWEET AFTON

Flow gently, sweet Afton, among thy green
 braes,
 Flow gently, I'll sing thee a song in thy praise;

¹Sweetheart.

²Smooth.

³Bald.

⁴Head.

⁵Merry.

⁶Worldly.

⁷Quiet.

⁸Prudent.

My Mary's asleep by thy murmuring stream,
Flow gently, sweet Afton, disturb not her
dream.

Thou stock-dove, whose echo resounds thro'
the glen, 5

Ye hae whistling blackbirds in yon thorny
den,

Thou green-crested lapwing, thy screaming
forbear,

I charge you disturb not my slumbering
fair.

How lofty, sweet Afton, thy neighbouring hills,

Far marked with the courses of clear winding rills; 10

There daily I wander as noon rises high,
My flocks and my Mary's sweet cot in my
eye.

How pleasant thy banks and green valleys
below,

Where wild in the woodlands the prim-roses
blow;

There oft, as mild Evening weeps over the lea, 15

The sweet-scented birk shades my Mary
and me.

Thy crystal stream, Afton, how lovely it glides,

And winds by the cot where my Mary re-
sides;

How wanton thy waters her snowy feet
lave,

As gathering sweet flowerets she stems thy clear wave. 20

Flow gently, sweet Afton, among thy green
braes,

Flow gently, sweet river, the theme of my lays;

My Mary's asleep by thy murmuring stream,
Flow gently, sweet Afton, disturb not her
dream.

AULD LANG SYNE¹

CHORUS

For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

¹The (good) old times.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot, 5
And never brought to min'?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And auld lang syne?

And surely ye'll be² your pint-stowp,
And surely I'll be mine! 10
And we'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

We twa hae run about the braes,
And pu'd the gowans³ fine;
But we've wandered monie a weary fit 15
Sin' auld lang syne.

We twa hae paidled i' the burn,⁴
From mornin' sun till dine;⁵
But seas between us braid hae roared
Sin' auld lang syne. 20

And there's a hand, my trusty fiere,⁶
And gie's a hand o' thine;
And we'll tak a right guid-willie waught⁷
For auld lang syne.

CHORUS

For auld lang syne, my dear, 25
For auld lang syne.
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

OF A' THE AIRTS THE WIND CAN BLAW

OF A' the airts⁸ the wind can blaw
I dearly like the west,
For there the bonie lassie lives,
The lassie I lo'e best:
There wild woods grow an' rivers row, 5
An' monie a hill between;
But day and night my fancy's flight
Is ever wi' my Jean.

I see her in the dewy flowers,
I see her sweet an' fair: 10
I hear her in the tunefu' birds,
I hear her charm the air:
There's not a bonie flower that springs
By fountain, shaw,⁹ or green;
There's not a bonie bird that sings, 15
But minds me o' my Jean.

O, WERT THOU IN THE CAULD BLAST

O, WERT thou in the cauld blast
 On yonder lea, on yonder lea,
 My plaidie to the angry airt,
 I'd shelter thee, I'd shelter thee.
 Or did misfortune's bitter storms 5
 Around thee blaw, around thee blaw,
 Thy bield¹ should be my bosom,
 To share it a', to share it a'.
 Or were I in the wildest waste,
 Sae black and bare, sae black and bare, 10
 The desert were a paradise,
 If thou wert there, if thou wert there.
 Or were I monarch o' the globe,
 Wi' thee to reign, wi' thee to reign,
 The brightest jewel in my crown 15
 Wad be my queen, wad be my queen.

WALTER SCOTT

PROUD MAISIE

FROM The Heart of Midlothian

PROUD Maisie is in the wood,
 Walking so early;
 Sweet Robin sits on the bush,
 Singing so rarely.
 "Tell me, thou bonny bird. 5
 When shall I marry me?"
 "When six braw gentlemen Kirkward shall carry ye."
 "Who makes the bridal bed, Birdie, say truly?" 10
 "The grey-headed sexton
 That delves the grave duly.
 "The glow-worm o'er grave and stone
 Shall light thee steady.
 The owl from the steeple sing, 15
 'Welcome, proud lady.'"

HERE'S A HEALTH TO KING CHARLES

FROM Woodstock

BRING the bowl which you boast,
 Fill it up to the brim;

¹Shelter.

'Tis to him we love most,
 And to all who love him.
 Brave gallants, stand up, 8
 And avaunt ye, base carles!
 Were there death in the cup,
 Here's a health to King Charles.

Though he wanders through dangers,
 Unaided, unknown, 10
 Dependent on strangers,
 Estranged from his own;
 Though 'tis under our breath,
 Amidst forfeits and perils,
 Here's to honour and faith, 15
 And a health to King Charles!

Let such honours abound
 As the time can afford,
 The knee on the ground, 20
 And the hand on the sword;
 But the time shall come round
 When, 'mid Lords, Dukes, and Earls,
 The loud trumpet shall sound,
 Here's a health to King Charles!

PERCY BYSSHE
 SHELLEY (1792-1822)

TO NIGHT

SWIFTLY walk over the western wave,
 Spirit of Night! 5
 Out of thy misty eastern cave,
 Where all the long and lone daylight,
 Thou wovest dreams of joy and fear, 8
 Which make thee terrible and dear,—
 Swift be thy flight!
 Wrap thy form in a mantle gray,
 Star-inwrought!
 Blind with thine hair the eyes of Day; 10
 Kiss her until she be wearied out,
 Then wander o'er city, and sea, and land
 Touching all with thine opiate wand—
 Come, long sought!

When I arose and saw the dawn, 15
 I sighed for thee;
 When light rode high, and the dew was gone,
 And noon lay heavy on flower and tree,
 And the weary Day turned to his rest,
 Lingering like an unloved guest, 20
 I sighed for thee.

Thy brother Death came, and cried,
 Wouldst thou me?
 Thy sweet child Sleep, the filmy-eyed,
 Murmured like a noontide bee, 25
 Shall I nestle near thy side?
 Wouldst thou me?—And I replied,
 No, not thee!

Death will come when thou art dead
 Soon, too soon— 30
 Sleep will come when thou art fled;
 Of neither would I ask the boon
 I ask of thee, belovèd Night—
 Swift be thine approaching flight,
 Come soon, soon! 35

A LAMENT

O WORLD! O life! O time!
 On whose last steps I climb Trembling at that where I had stood before;
 When will return the glory of your prime?
 No more—Oh, never more! 5

Out of the day and night
 A joy has taken flight;
 Fresh spring, and summer, and winter
 hoar,
 Move my faint heart with grief, but with de-
 light
 No more—Oh, never more! 10

TO——

MUSIC, when soft voices die,
 Vibrates in the memory—
 Odors, when sweet violets sicken,
 Live within the sense they quicken.

Rose leaves, when the rose is dead, 5
 Are heaped for the belovéd's bed;
 And so thy thoughts, when thou art gone,
 Love itself shall slumber on.

TO——

ONE word is too often profaned
 For me to profane it,
 One feeling too falsely disdained
 For thee to disdain it.
 One hope is too like despair 5
 For prudence to smother,
 And pity from thee more dear
 Than that from another.

I can give not what men call love,
 But wilt thou accept not 10
 The worship the heart lifts above
 And the Heavens reject not,
 The desire of the moth for the star,
 Of the night for the morrow,
 The devotion to something afar 15
 From the sphere of our sorrow?

LINES: "WHEN THE LAMP IS SHATTERED"

WHEN the lamp is shattered
 The light in the dust lies dead—
 When the cloud is scattered
 The rainbow's glory is shed.
 When the lute is broken, 5
 Sweet tones are remembered not;
 When the lips have spoken,
 Loved accents are soon forgot.

As music and splendor
 Survive not the lamp and the lute, 10
 The heart's echoes render
 No song when the spirit is mute:—
 No song but sad dirges,
 Like the wind through a ruined cell,
 Or the mournful surges 15
 That ring the dead seaman's knell.

When hearts have once mingled
 Love first leaves the well-built nest,
 The weak one is singled
 To endure what it once possessed. 20
 O Love! who bewailest
 The frailty of all things here,
 Why choose you the frailest
 For your cradle, your home, and your bier?

Its passions will rock thee 25
 As the storms rock the ravens on high:
 Bright reason will mock thee,
 Like the sun from a wintry sky.
 From thy nest every rafter
 Will rot, and thine eagle home 30
 Leave thee naked to laughter,
 When leaves fall and cold winds come.

A DIRGĒ

ROUGH wind, that moanest loud
 Grief too sad for song;
 Wild wind, when sullen cloud
 Knells all the night long;

Sad storm, whose tears are vain,
Bare woods, whose branches strain,
Deep caves and dreary main,
Wail, for the world's wrong!

ALFRED TENNYSON
(1809-1892)

CHORIC SONG

FROM The Lotus-Eaters

I

There is sweet music here that softer falls
Than petals from blown roses on the grass,
Or night-dews on still waters between walls
Of shadowy granite, in a gleaming pass;
Music that gentlier on the spirit lies,
Than tired eyelids upon tired eyes;
Music that brings sweet sleep down from the blissful skies.

Here are cool mosses deep,
And thro' the moss the ivies creep,
And in the stream the long-leaved flowers
weep,
And from the craggy ledge the poppy hangs in sleep.

II

Why are we weigh'd upon with heaviness,
And utterly consumed with sharp distress,
While all things else have rest from weariness?

All things have rest: why should we toil
alone,

We only toil, who are the first of things,
And make perpetual moan,
Still from one sorrow to another thrown;
Nor ever fold our wings,
And cease from wanderings,
Nor steep our brows in slumber's holy balm;
Nor harken what the inner spirit sings,
"There is no joy but calm!"—

Why should we only toil, the roof and crown of things?

III

Lo! in the middle of the wood,
The folded leaf is woo'd from out the bud
With winds upon the branch, and there Grows green and broad, and takes no care,
Sun-steep'd at noon, and in the moon
Nightly dew-fed; and turning yellow Falls, and floats adown the air.

Lo! sweeten'd with the summer light,
The full-juiced apple, waxing over-mellow,
Drops in a silent autumn night.
All its allotted length of days
The flower ripens in its place,
Ripens and fades, and falls, and hath no toil,
Fast-rooted in the fruitful soil.

IV

Hateful is the dark-blue sky,
Vaulted o'er the dark-blue sea.
Death is the end of life; ah, why Should life all labour be?
Let us alone. Time driveth onward fast,
And in a little while our lips are dumb.
Let us alone. What is it that will last?
All things are taken from us, and become Portions and parcels of the dreadful past.
Let us alone. What pleasure can we have To war with evil? Is there any peace
In ever climbing up the climbing wave?
All things have rest, and ripen toward the grave
In silence—ripen, fall, and cease:
Give us long rest or death, dark death, or dreamful ease.

V

How sweet it were, hearing the downward
stream,
With half-shut eyes ever to seem
Falling asleep in a half-dream!
To dream and dream, like yonder amber
light,
Which will not leave the myrrh-bush on the
height;
To hear each other's whisper'd speech;
Eating the Lotos day by day,
To watch the crisping ripples on the beach,
And tender curving lines of creamy spray:
To lend our hearts and spirits wholly
To the influence of mild-minded melancholy;
To muse and brood and live again in memory,
With those old faces of our infancy
Heap'd over with a mound of grass,
Two handfuls of white dust, shut in an urn
of brass!

VI

Dear is the memory of our wedded lives,
And dear the last embraces of our wives
And their warm tears; but all hath suffer'd
change;

For surely now our household hearths are cold,

Our sons inherit us, our looks are strange;
And we should come like ghosts to trouble
joy.

Or else the island princes over-bold 75

Have eat our substance, and the minstrel
sings

Before them of the ten years' war in Troy,
And our great deeds, as half-forgotten things.
Is there confusion in the little isle?

Let what is broken so remain. 80

The Gods are hard to reconcile;

'Tis hard to settle order once again.

There is confusion worse than death,

Trouble on trouble, pain on pain,

Long labour unto aged breath, 85

Sore task to hearts worn out by many wars

And eyes grown dim with gazing on the pilot-stars.

VII

But, propped on beds of amaranth and moly,
How sweet—when warm airs lull us, blowing lowly—

With half-dropped eyelid still, 90

Beneath a heaven dark and holy,

To watch the long bright river drawing slowly

His waters from the purple hill—

To hear the dewy echoes calling

From cave to cave thro' the thick-twined
vine— 95

To watch the emerald-colour'd water falling

Thro' many a woven acanthus-wreath divine!

Only to hear and see the far-off sparkling
brine,

Only to hear were sweet, stretch'd out beneath the pine.

TEARS, IDLE TEARS

FROM The Princess

TEARS, idle tears, I know not what they mean,

Tears from the depth of some divine despair

Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,

In looking on the happy autumn-fields,

And thinking of the days that are no more. 5

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the under-
world,

Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge;
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more. 10

Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns

The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds

To dying ears, when unto dying eyes

The casement slowly grows a glimmering square; 14

So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

Dear as remember'd kisses after death,

And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feign'd

On lips that are for others; deep as love,

Deep as first love, and wild with all regret; 19

O Death in Life, the days that are no more!

SWEET AND LOW

FROM The Princess

SWEET and low, sweet and low,

Wind of the western sea,

Low, low, breathe and blow,

Wind of the western sea!

Over the rolling waters go, 5

Come from the dying moon, and blow,

Blow him again to me:

While my little one, while my pretty one,
sleeps.

Sleep and rest, sleep and rest,

Father will come to thee soon; 10

Rest, rest, on mother's breast,

Father will come to thee soon;

Father will come to his babe in the nest,

Silver sails all out of the west

Under the silver moon; 15

Sleep, my little one, sleep, my pretty one,
sleep.

BUGLE SONG

FROM The Princess

THE splendor falls on castle walls

And snowy summits old in story;

The long light shakes across the lakes,

And the wild cataract leaps in glory. 4

Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying

Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying
dying.

O, hark, O, hear! how thin and clear,

And thinner, clearer, farther going:

O, sweet and far from cliff and scar
 The horns of Elfland faintly blowing! 10
 Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying,
 Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying,
 dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
 They faint on hill or field or river;
 Our echoes roll from soul to soul, 15
 And grow for ever and for ever.
 Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
 And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying,
 dying.

CHORUSES

FROM Atalanta in Calydon

WHEN the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,
 The mother of months in meadow or plain
 Fills the shadows and windy places
 With lisp of leaves and ripple of rain;
 And the brown bright nightingale amorous 5
 Is half assuaged for Itylus,
 For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
 The tongueless vigil, and all the pain.

Come with bows bent and with emptying of quivers,
 Maiden most perfect, lady of light, 10
 With a noise of winds and many rivers,
 With a clamor of waters, and with might;
 Bind on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,
 Over the splendor and speed of thy feet;
 For the faint east quickens, the wan west
 shivers, 15
 Round the feet of the day and the feet of the night.

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to
 her,
 Fold our hands round her knees, and cling?
 O that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her,
 Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring! 20
 For the stars and the winds are unto her
 As raiment, as songs of the harp-player;

For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
 And the southwest-wind, and the westwind sing.

For winter's rains and ruins are over, 25
 And all the season of snows and sins;
 The days dividing lover and lover,
 The light that loses, the night that wins;
 And time remembered is grief forgotten,
 And frosts are slain and flowers begotten, 30
 And in green underwood and cover
 Blossom by blossom the spring begins.

The full streams feed on flower of rushes,
 Ripe grasses trammel a traveling foot,
 The faint fresh flame of the young year
 flushes 35
 From leaf to flower and flower to fruit;
 And fruit and leaf are as gold and fire,
 And the oat is heard above the lyre,
 And the hoofed heel of a satyr crushes
 The chestnut-husk at the chestnut-root. 40

And Pan by noon and Bacchus by night,
 Fleeter of foot than the fleet-foot kid,
 Follows with dancing and fills with delight
 The Mænad and the Bassarid;
 And soft as lips that laugh and hide 45
 The laughing leaves of the trees divide,
 And screen from seeing and leave in sight
 The god pursuing, the maiden hid.

The ivy falls with the Bacchanal's hair
 Over her eyebrows hiding her eyes; 50
 The wild vine slipping down leaves bare
 Her bright breast shortening into sighs;
 The wild vine slips with the weight of its
 leaves,
 But the berried ivy catches and cleaves 54
 To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare
 The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies.

BEFORE the beginning of years
 There came to the making of man
 Time, with a gift of tears;
 Grief, with a glass that ran;
 Pleasure, with pain for leaven; 5
 Summer, with flowers that fell;
 Remembrance fallen from heaven,
 And madness risen from hell;
 Strength without hands to smite;
 Love that endures for a breath; 10
 Night, the shadow of light,
 And life, the shadow of death.

And the high gods took in hand
 Fire, and the falling of tears,
 And a measure of sliding sand 15
 From under the feet of the years
 And froth and drift of the sea;
 And dust of the laboring earth;
 And bodies of things to be
 In the houses of death and of birth; 20
 And wrought with weeping and laughter,
 And fashioned with loathing and love,
 With life before and after
 And death beneath and above,
 For a day and a night and a morrow, 25
 That his strength might endure for a span
 With travail and heavy sorrow,
 The holy spirit of man.

From the winds of the north and the south
 They gathered as unto strife; 30
 They breathed upon his mouth,
 They filled his body with life;
 Eyesight and speech they wrought
 For the veils of the soul therein,
 A time for labor and thought, 35
 A time to serve and to sin;
 They gave him light in his ways,
 And love, and a space for delight,
 And beauty and length of days,
 And night, and sleep in the night. 40
 His speech is a burning fire;
 With his lips he travaileth;
 In his heart is a blind desire,
 In his eyes foreknowledge of death;
 He weaves, and is clothed with derision; 45
 Sows, and he shall not reap;
 His life is a watch or a vision
 Between a sleep and a sleep.

WE HAVE seen thee, O Love, thou art fair;
 thou art goodly, O Love;
 Thy wings make light in the air as the wings of a dove.
 Thy feet are as winds that divide the stream of the sea;
 Earth is thy covering to hide thee, the garment of thee.
 Thou art swift and subtle and blind as a flame of fire; 5
 Before thee the laughter, behind thee the tears of desire;

And twain go forth beside thee, a man with a
 maid;
 Her eyes are the eyes of a bride whom delight makes afraid;
 As the breath in the buds that stir is her bridal breath:
 But Fate is the name of her; and his name is
 Death. 10

RECESSIONAL

God of our fathers, known of old—
 Lord of our far-flung battle line—
 Beneath whose awful hand we hold Dominion over palm and pine—
 Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, 2
 Lest we forget—lest we forget!

The tumult and the shouting dies—
 The Captains and the Kings depart—
 Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
 An humble and a contrite heart. 10
 Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
 Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Far-called, our navies melt away—
 On dune and headland sinks the fire—
 Lo, all our pomp of yesterday 15
 Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
 Judge of the Nations, spare us yet,
 Lest we forget—lest we forget!

If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
 Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe—
 Such boasting as the Gentiles use,
 Or lesser breeds without the Law—
 Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
 Lest we forget—lest we forget!

For heathen heart that puts her trust 25
 In reeking tube and iron shard—
 All valiant dust that builds on dust,
 And guarding calls not Thee to guard,—
 For frantic boast and foolish word, 29
 Thy Mercy on Thy People, Lord! Amen.

THE SONNET

PETRARCH

(1304-1374)

SONNETS TO LAURA

LOOSE to the breeze her golden tresses
flowed,

Wildly in thousand mazy ringlets blown,
And from her eyes unconquered glances
shone,

Those glances now so sparingly bestowed.
And true or false, meseemed some signs she showed

As o'er her cheek soft pity's hue was thrown;

I, whose whole breast with love's soft food
was sown,

What wonder if at once my bosom blowed?
Graceful she moved, with more than mortal
mien,

In form an angel; and her accents won Upon the ear with more than human sound.

A spirit heavenly pure, a living sun,
Was what I saw; and if no more 'twere seen, T' unbend the bow will never heal the wound.¹

SAY from what part of heaven 'twas Nature
drew,

From what idea, that so perfect mold
To form such features, bidding us behold,

In charms below, what she above could do?
What fountain nymph, what dryad maid e'er threw

Upon the wind such tresses of pure gold?
What heart such numerous virtues can unfold?

Although the chiefest all my fond hopes slew.
He for celestial charms may look in vain

Who has not seen my fair one's radiant
eyes,

And felt their glances pleasingly beguile.

How Love can heal his wounds, then wound
again,

He only knows who knows how sweet her sighs,

How sweet her converse, and how sweet her smile.²

WHEN welcome slumber locks my torpid
frame,

I see thy spirit in the midnight dream;
Thine eyes that still in living lustre beam:

In all but frail mortality the same.

Ah! then, from earth and all its sorrows free,

Methinks I meet thee in each former scene,

Once the sweet shelter of a heart serene;

Now vocal only while I weep for thee.

For thee!—ah, no! From human ills secure,

Thy hallowed soul exults in endless day, 'Tis I who linger on the toilsome way.

No balm relieves the anguish I endure,

Save the fond feeble hope that thou art near

To soothe my sufferings with an angel's tear.³

LOVE'S TRIUMPH OVER
DEATH⁴

WHEN she who was the source of all my sighs, Fled from the world, herself, my straining
sight,

Nature who gave us that unique delight,
Was sunk in shame, and we had weeping
eyes.

Yet shall not vauntful Death enjoy this prize,

This sun of suns which then he veiled in
night;

For love hath triumphed, lifting up her
light

On earth and mid the saints in Paradise.

What thought remorseless and impiteous
doom

Deemed that the music of her deeds would
die,

And that her splendour would be sunk in
gloom,

The poet's page exalts her to the sky

With life more living in the lifeless tomb,

And death translates her soul to reign on high.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

(1554-1586)

ASTROPHEL AND STELLA

I

LOVING in truth, and fain in verse my love
 to show,
 That she, dear she, might take some pleasure of my pain,—
 Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know,
 Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain,—
 I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe, 5
 Studying inventions fine, her wits to entertain,
 Oft turning others' leaves, to see if thence would flow
 Some fresh 'and fruitful showers upon my sunburnt brain.
 But words came halting forth, wanting Invention's stay;
 Invention, Nature's child, fled step-dame
 Study's blows; 10
 And others' feet still seemed but strangers'
 in my way.
 Thus, great with child to speak, and helpless
 in my throes,
 Biting my truant pen, beating myself for
 spite;
 "Fool," said my Muse to me, "look in thy heart, and write."

XV

YOU that do search for every purling spring
 Which from the ribs of old Parnassus flows,
 And every flower, not sweet perhaps, which grows
 Near thereabouts, into your poesy wring;
 You that do dictionary's method bring 5
 Into your rhymes, running in rattling rows;
 You that poor Petrarch's long deceased woes
 With new-born sighs and denizen'd wit do
 sing;
 You take wrong ways; those far-fet helps be such
 As do bewray a want of inward touch, 10
 And sure, at length stolen goods do come to
 light:
 But if, both for your love and skill, your name

You seek to nurse at fullest breasts of Fame,
 Stella behold, and then begin to endite.

XXXI

WITH how sad steps, O Moon, thou climb'st
 the skies!
 How silently, and with how wan a face!
 What, may it be that even in heavenly
 place
 That busy archer his sharp arrows tries! 4
 Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
 Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case,
 I read it in thy looks; thy languished grace,
 To me, that feel the like, thy state describes,
 Then, even of fellowship, O Moon, tell me,
 Is constant love deemed there but want of wit? 10
 Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
 Do they above love to be loved, and yet
 Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
 Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?

XXXIX

COME, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of
 peace,
 The baiting-place of wit, the balm of woe,
 The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
 Th' indifferent judge between the high and
 low;
 With shield of proof shield me from out the press 5
 Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw:
 O make in me those civil wars to cease;
 I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
 Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest
 bed,
 A chamber deaf of noise and blind of light, 10
 A rosy garland and a weary head:
 And if these things, as being thine by right,
 Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me,
 Livelier than elsewhere, Stella's image see.

XLI

HAVING this day my horse, my hand, my lance
 Guided so well that I obtained the prize,
 Both by the judgment of the English eyes
 And of some sent from that sweet enemy,
 France; 4

Horsemen my skill in horsemanship advance,
 Town folks my strength; a daintier judge applies
 His praise to sleight which from good use doth rise;
 Some lucky wits impute it but to chance;
 Others, because of both sides I do take 9
 My blood from them who did excel in this,
 Think Nature me a man-at-arms did make.
 How far they shot awry! the true cause is,
 Stella looked on, and from her heavenly face Sent forth the beams which made so fair my race.

LXIV

NO MORE! My Dear, no more these counsels try!
 O give my passions leave to run their race!
 Let Fortune lay on me her worst disgrace!
 Let folk o'ercharged with brain, against me
 cry!
 Let clouds bedim my face, break in mine
 eye! 5
 Let me no steps but of lost labor trace!
 Let all the earth in scorn recount my case;
 But do not will me from my love to fly!
 I do not envy Aristotle's wit;
 Nor do aspire to Cæsar's bleeding fame; 10
 Nor ought do care, though some above me
 sit;
 Nor hope, nor wish another course to frame:
 But that which once may win thy cruel heart.
 Thou art my wit, and thou my virtue art.

XCV

LEAVE me, O Love, which reachest but to
 dust,
 And thou, my mind, aspire to higher things!
 Grow rich in that which never taketh rust:
 Whatever fades, but fading pleasure brings.
 Draw in thy beams, and humble all thy
 might 5
 To that sweet yoke where lasting freedoms be;
 Which breaks the clouds and opens forth the
 light
 That doth both shine and give us sight to see.
 O take fast hold! let that light be thy guide
 In this small course which birth draws out to death, 10
 And think how evil becometh him to slide
 Who seeketh Heaven, and comes of heavenly breath.
 Then farewell, world! thy uttermost I see:
 Eternal Love, maintain thy life in me!

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1564-1616)

SONNETS

XXX

WHEN to the Sessions of sweet silent thought
 I summon up remembrance of things past,
 I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
 And with old woes new wail my dear time's
 waste:
 Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow, 5
 For precious friends hid in death's dateless
 night,
 And weep afresh love's long-since-cancell'd
 woe,
 And moan th' expense of many a vanish'd
 sight:
 Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
 And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er 10
 The sad account of fore-bemoan'd moan,
 Which I new pay as if not paid before.
 But if the while I think on thee, dear
 friend,
 All losses are restored and sorrows end.

XXXIII

FULL many a glorious morning have I seen Flatter the mountain-tops with sovereign
 eye,
 Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
 Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
 Anon permit the basest clouds to ride 5
 With ugly rack on his celestial face,
 And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
 Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
 Even so my sun one early morn did shine
 With all-triumphant splendour on my brow;
 But out, alack! he was but one hour mine; 11
 The region cloud hath masked him from me
 now.
 Yet him for this my love no whit dis-
 daineth;
 Suns of the world may stain, when heaven's sun staineth.

LX

LIKE as the waves make towards the peb-bled shore,
 So do our minutes hasten to their end;
 Each changing place with that which goes before,
 In sequent toil all forwards do contend.

Nativity, once in the main of light, 5
 Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crowned,
 Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
 And Time that gave doth now his gift confound.

Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth
 And delves the parallels in beauty's brow, 10
 Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
 And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow:

And yet to times in hope my verse shall
 stand,

Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

LXXI

No LONGER mourn for me when I am dead
 Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
 Give warning to the world that I am fled From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell.

Nay, if you read this line, remember not 5
 The hand that writ it; for I love you so That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot

If thinking on me then should make you woe.
 O, if, I say, you look upon this verse 9
 When I perhaps compounded am with clay,
 Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
 But let your love even with my life decay,

Lest the wise world should look into your
 moan

And mock you with me after I am gone.

LXXIII

THAT time of year thou mayst in me behold
 When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,

Bare ruined choirs where late the sweet birds sang.

In me thou see'st the twilight of such day 5
 As after sunset fadeth in the west,
 Which by and by black night doth take away,
 Death's second self, that seals up all in rest.
 In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire
 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie, 10
 As the death-bed whereon it must expire,
 Consumed with that which it was nourished
 by.

This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,

To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

CXVI

LET me not to the marriage of true minds
 Admit impediments. Love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover to remove.
 O, no! it is an ever-fixed mark 5
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wand'ring bark,
 Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.

Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks

Within his bending sickle's compass come; 10
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,

But bears it out even to the edge of doom.

If this be error and upon me proved,
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

CXXIX

THE expense of spirit in a waste of shame
 Is lust in action; and till action, lust
 Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
 Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust,
 Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight, 5
 Past reason hunted, and no sooner had Past reason hated, as a swallowed bait
 On purpose laid to make the taker mad;
 Mad in pursuit and in possession so; 9
 Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
 A bliss in proof, and proved, a very woe;
 Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.

All this the world well knows; yet none knows well

To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

JOHN MILTON

(1608-1674)

ON HIS BLINDNESS

WHEN I consider how my light is spent Ere half my days in this dark world and
 wide,
 And that one talent which is death to hide Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent

To serve therewith my Maker, and present 5
 My true account, lest He returning chide,
 "Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"

I fondly ask. But Patience to prevent That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need

Either man's work or his own gifts. Who
best 10

Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best.
His state

Is kindly: thousands at his bidding speed
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT

AVENGE, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones

Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold; Even them who kept thy truth so pure of
old,

When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones, 4

Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold

Slain by the bloody Piemontese, that rolled Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans

The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow 10

O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth
sway

The triple Tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who, having learnt thy
way,

Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

WILLIAM WORDS- WORTH (1770-1850)

LONDON, 1802

MILTON! thou shouldst be living at this
hour:

England hath need of thee; she is a fen
Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen, Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,

Have forfeited their ancient English dower 5
Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.

Thy soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart:
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the
sea: 10

Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

SCORN NOT THE SONNET

Composed almost extempore, in a short walk on the western side of Rydal Lake. (Wordsworth.)

SCORN not the Sonnet; Critic, you have frowned,

Mindless of its just honors; with this key
Shakespeare unlocked his heart; the melody
Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's
wound; 4

A thousand times this pipe did Tasso sound;
With it Camöens soothed an exile's grief;
The Sonnet glittered a gay myrtle leaf
Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned
His visionary brow: a glow-worm lamp,
It cheered mild Spenser, called from Faery-
land 10

To struggle through dark ways; and, when a damp

Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The Thing became a trumpet; whence he blew

Soul-animating strains—alas, too few!

TO B. R. HAYDON

B. R. Haydon, the painter, wrote: "I have benefited and have been supported in the troubles of life by your poetry. . . I will bear want, pain, misery, and blindness; but I will never yield one step I have gained on the road I am determined to travel over." Wordsworth's answer to this letter was the following sonnet.

HIGH is our calling, Friend!—Creative Art
(Whether the instrument of words she use,
Or pencil pregnant with ethereal hues,)

Demands the service of a mind and heart,
Though sensitive, yet, in their weakest part,
Heroically fashioned—to infuse 6

Faith in the whispers of the lonely Muse, While the whole world seems adverse to desert.

And, oh! when Nature sinks, as oft she may,
Through long-lived pressure of obscure distress, 10

Still to be strenuous for the bright reward,
And in the soul admit of no decay,
Brook no continuance of weak-mindedness—
Great is the glory, for the strife is hard!

THE WORLD IS TOO MUCH WITH US

THE world is too much with us; late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our
powers:

Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!

The Sea that bares her bosom to the moon; 5
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up-gathered now like sleeping
flowers;

For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather
be

A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn; 10
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less for-
lorn;

Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathéd horn.

JOHN KEATS (1795–1821)

WHEN I HAVE FEARS THAT I MAY CEASE TO BE

WHEN I have fears that I may cease to be
Before my pen has glean'd my teeming brain,
Before high piléd books, in charact'ry,
Hold like rich garners the full-ripen'd grain;

When I behold, upon the night's starr'd
face, 5

Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
And think that I may never live to trace Their shadows, with the magic hand of
chance;

And when I feel, fair creature of an hour!
That I shall never look upon thee more, 10
Never have relish in the faery power
Of unreflecting love!—then on the shore
Of the wide world I stand alone, and think Till Love and Fame to nothingness do sink.

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER

MUCH have I travell'd in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold.
Oft of one wide expanse had I been told 5
That deep-browed Homer ruled as his de-mesne;

Yet did I never breathe its pure serene Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and
bold:

Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken; 10
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He star'd at the Pacific—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING (1809–1861)

HOW DO I LOVE THEE?

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and
height

My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.

I love thee to the level of everyday's 5
Most quiet need, by sun and candle-light.

I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.

I love thee with the passion put to use
In my old griefs, and with my childhood's 10 faith.

I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
With my lost saints,—I love thee with the breath,

Smiles, tears, of all my life!—and, if God
choose,

I shall but love thee better after death.

MATTHEW ARNOLD (1822–1888)

SHAKESPEARE

OTHERS abide our question. Thou art free.
We ask and ask—Thou smilest and art still,
Out-topping knowledge. For the loftiest
hill,

Who to the stars uncrowns his majesty, 4
 Planting his steadfast footsteps in the sea, Making the heaven of heavens his dwelling-
 place,
 Spares but the cloudy border of his base
 To the foil'd searching of mortality;
 And thou, who didst the stars and sunbeams know,
 Self-school'd, self-scann'd, self-honor'd, self-secure, 10
 Didst tread on earth unguess'd at.—Better
 so!
 All pains the immortal spirit must endure,
 All weakness which impairs, all griefs which
 bow,
 Find their sole speech in that victorious
 brow.

QUIET WORK

ONE lesson, Nature, let me learn of thee,
 One lesson which in every wind is blown,
 One lesson of two duties kept at one Though the loud world proclaim their enmity—
 Of toil unsever'd from tranquillity! 5
 Of labor, that in lasting fruit outgrows
 Far noisier schemes, accomplish'd in repose,
 Too great for haste, too high for rivalry!
 Yes, while on earth a thousand discords ring,
 Man's fitful uproar mingling with his toil, 10
 Still do thy sleepless ministers move on,
 Their glorious tasks in silence perfecting;
 Still working, blaming still our vain turmoil, Laborers that shall not fail, when man is gone.

LOVESIGHT

WHEN do I see thee most, beloved one?
 When in the light the spirits of mine eyes
 Before thy face, their altar, solemnize
 The worship of that Love through thee made known?
 Or when in the dusk hours, (we two alone,) 5
 Close-kissed and eloquent of still replies
 Thy twilight-hidden glimmering visage lies,
 And my soul only sees thy soul its own?
 O love, my love! if I no more should see
 Thyself, nor on the earth the shadow of thee,

Nor image of thine eyes in any spring,— 11
 How then should sound upon Life's darkening slope
 The ground-whirl of the perished leaves of Hope,
 The wind of Death's imperishable wing?

REMEMBER

REMEMBER me when I am gone away,
 Gone far away into the silent land;
 When you can no more hold me by the
 hand,
 Nor I half turn to go, yet turning stay.
 Remember me when no more, day by day, 5
 You tell me of our future that you planned:
 Only remember me; you understand
 It will be late to counsel then or pray.
 Yet if you should forget me for a while 9
 And afterwards remember, do not grieve:
 For if the darkness and corruption leave
 A vestige of the thoughts that once I had,
 Better by far you should forget and smile
 Than that you should remember and be sad.

NATURE¹

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
 Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
 Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
 And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
 Still gazing at them through the open door, 5
 Nor wholly reassured and comforted
 By promises of others in their stead,
 Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
 So Nature deals with us, and takes away 9
 Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
 Leads us to rest so gently, that we go
 Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
 Being too full of sleep to understand How far the unknown transcends the what we know.

OFT HAVE I SEEN AT SOME CATHEDRAL DOOR¹

OFT have I seen at some cathedral door
A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat,
Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er; 5
Far off the noises of the world retreat;

The loud vociferations of the street
Become an undistinguishable roar.

So, as I enter here from day to day,
And leave my burden at this minster gate, 10
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait.

THE ODE

PINDAR
(522-448? B. C.)

OLYMPIAN I

TO HIERO THE SYRACUSIAN, VICTOR IN THE HORSE-RACE

STROPHE I

WATER the first of elements we hold;
And, as the flaming fire at night
Glow with its own conspicuous light, Above proud treasure shines transcend-ant gold:

But if, my soul, 'tis thy desire 5
For the Great Games to strike thy lyre,
Look not within the range of day

A star more genial to descry
Than yon warm sun, whose glittering ray

Dims all the spheres that gild the sky; 10

Nor loftier theme to raise thy strain
Than famed Olympia's crowded plain:

From whence, by gifted minstrels richly wove,
Th' illustrious hymn, at glory's call,
Goes forth to Hiero's affluent hall, 15
To hail his prosperous throne and sing
Saturnian Jove.

ANTISTROPHE I

Hiero the just, that rules the fertile field,
Where fair Sicilia's pastures feed
Unnumber'd flocks, and for his meed Culls the sweet flowers that all the virtues
yield; 20

Nor less renown'd his hand essays
To wake the Muse's choicest lays,

Such as the social feast around
Full oft our tuneful band inspire—
But wherefore sleeps the thrilling sound?
Pluck from the peg thy Dorian lyre, 26
If Pisa's palms have charms for thee,
If Pherenicus' victory

Hath roused thee to the rapturous cares of
song;
Tell us how swift the ungoaded steed 30
By Alpheus urged his furious speed,
And bore the distant prize from all the panting throng.

EPODE I

Proud of his stud, the Syracusian king Partook the courser's triumph. Through the plain

By Lydian Pelops won his praises ring— 35 Pelops of Neptune loved (whose watery
reign

Bounds the wide earth, that trembles at his might),

Pelops, whose form the plastic Fate replaced,

And from the caldron bright

Drew forth with ivory shoulder graced.
Life teems with wonders: yet, in Reason's
spite, 41

O'er the fond fascinating fiction, warm
From Fancy's pencil, hangs a charm
That more than Nature's self her painted dreams delight.

STROPHE II

For Taste, whose softening hand hath power to give

Sweetness and grace to rudest things,
And trifles to distinction brings, 47

Makes us full oft the enchanting tale receive

In Truth's disguise as Truth. The day
Yet comes, Time's test, that tears away
The veil each flattering falsehood wears.

Beseems us then (for less the blame)
Of those that heed us from the spheres
Becoming marvels to proclaim.

Great son of Tantalus, thy fate 55
Not as the fablers I relate.

Thee with the Gods thy Sire's Siplyian guest,
When they in turn beneath his bower
Purest repast partook, the Power
That wields the Trident, seized, and ravished from the feast. 60

ANTISTROPHE II

Desire his breast had conquered. Up he drove

His trembling prize of mortal mold
In radiant car with steeds of gold
To th' highest mansion of all-honored
Jove;

With whom the Boy, from wondering
Ide 65

Rapt long before, like place supplied.
Her Pelops lost, her vanished son

Soon roused the frantic mother's care;
No tidings came; the search begun

In mystery ended in despair. 70

Forthwith some envious foe was found
Whispering th' unseemly slander round,

How all into the bubbling caldron cast Thy mangled limbs were seethed, and shred

In fragments on the table spread, 75
While circling Gods looked on and shared
th' abhorred repast.

EPODE II

Far be from me and mine the thought profane,

That in foul feast celestials could de-
light!

Blasphemous tale! Detraction finds its bane

E'en in the wrong it works—If mortal
wight 80

Heaven e'er hath honored, 'twas this Tantalus;

But soon from ill-digested greatness
sprung

Presumption and abuse:

Thence from his towering fortunes
flung

(Frightful reverse!) he fell. A ponderous
rock 85

High o'er his head hung threatening (angry Jovè

So judged him for his crimes above):

Where day and night he waits, dreading th' expected shock.

STROPHE III

Thus doomed is he life's hopeless load to
bear,

Torment unceasing! Three beside, 90
Delinquents there, like pains abide.

He from th' Immortals their ambrosial
fare,

The nectarous flood that crowned their bowl,

To feast his earth-born comrades, stole;
Food, that, by their celestial grace, 95

Eternal youth to him had given.

Vain hope, that guilt by time or place Can 'scape the searching glance of
heaven!

For this the blameless Son once more Back to man's short-lived race they

bore; 100

There, when fresh youth its blooming flower had blown,

And round his chin th' umbrageous beard
Mature its manlier growth had reared,

From Pisa's Prince he sought, his nuptial couch to crown,

ANTISTROPHE III

The famed Hippodamé; whose charms to gain, 105

The fond and furious father's pride,
At night's dark hour alone he hied

To the rough shore of the loud-bellowing
main,

And called the Trident-sceptred God,
Whose form forthwith beside him stood:

'Oh! if th' endearing gifts,' said he, 111

The Cyprian sea-born Queen bestows, Have still, great Neptune, grace with
thee,

Propitiate now thy suppliant's vows.

Arrest Œnomaüs' brazen spear, 115
To Elis guide my prompt career,

And bear me on thy swiftest chariot's wheel
Victorious to the goal; for he,

Slayer of suitors ten and three,

Still from his daughter's hope withholds the bridal seal. 120

EPODE III

'Majestic Danger calls but for the brave, Trusts not the dastard's arm: then why should man,
 By life's hard lot predestined to the grave,
 Waste in the dark th' unprofitable span,
 And crouch in Age's corner unrenowned, Heav'n's noblest gifts untasted? Power
 divine! 126
 Grant thou th' event be crowned,
 This peril shall at least be mine.'
 Thus he, with zeal not unregarded, speeds
 His ardent prayer. The God his prayer embraced, 130
 Gave him his car with gold enchaced,
 And roused th' unwaried plumes that winged the immortal steeds.

STROPHE IV

CEnomaüs' power th' exulting youth o'er-throws:
 The virgin spouse his arms entwine;
 From whose soft intercourse, a line 135
 By all the virtues nursed, six warriors rose.
 Now in rich pomp and solemn state
 His dust heroic honors wait.
 Where Alpheus laves the hallowed glade,
 His tomb its ample range displays, 140
 And gifts by many a stranger laid
 High on his crowded altar blaze;
 But most from proud Olympia's drome,
 On distant realms, on times to come,
 Shines Pelops' fame. There Speed demands his crown, 145
 Toil-mastering Strength the muscle strains,
 And conquerors pass life's proud remains On Virtue's tranquil couch, the slumber of renown.

ANTISTROPHE IV

Such is the Champion's meed: the constant good,
 That lives beyond the transient hour, 150
 Of all that Heaven on man can shower,
 Most fires his hope, most wakes his gratitude:
 But now 'tis mine, the strain to raise,
 And swell th' Equestrian Hero's praise,
 To crown with loud Æolian song 155
 A Prince, whose peer the spacious
 earth
 Holds not its noblest chiefs among,
 Boasts not in wisdom, power and
 worth,

A host more gifted, to display,
 Through all the mazes of the lay. 160
 Hiero, some guardian god thy fame sustains
 And makes thee his peculiar care;
 If long thy deeds his smiles shall share,
 A loftier flight I'll soar, and warble sweeter strains.

EPODE IV

Then high on Cronium's peak my post
 shall be; 165
 There, as a poet's glance informs my
 soul,
 First in the burning race thy steeds to see,
 Thy bounding chariot whirl thee to the goal.
 Then shall the Muse her strongest javelin fling;
 'Bove all the ranks of greatness at the top 170
 Shines the consummate king—
 Beyond that height lift not thy hope.
 Be thine in that bright station long to bear
 Thy upright course; mine, with the conquering band,
 To take my honorable stand, 175
 And 'mong the bards of Greece the palm of genius wear.

PYTHIAN V

TO ARCESILAS THE CYRENÆAN, VICTOR
 IN THE CHARIOT-RACE

STROPHE I

WEALTH is wide-extended power, Whene'er with genuine worth combined
 Man leads it forth in Fortune's favouring hour
 And friendships throng behind.
 Thee, heav'n-enhanced Arcesilas, 5
 These gifts through all thy glorious
 days
 From life's first step, by Castor's grace,
 Have bless'd; who now with Pythian bays
 Given from his golden car thy brows hath
 crown'd:
 'Twas he the threatening storm allay'd 10
 That shook thy prosperous house and
 spread
 The cheering calm, that brightens round.

ANTISTROPHE I

Wisdom still with temperate hand
 Improves the boon by Heaven bestow'd;
 And thee, that walk'st with Justice through the land, 15
 A thousand blessings crowd.
 First as thou art the sceptred lord
 Of mighty realms, and bear'st combined
 By Nature for that proud reward,
 The ruler's eye, the sage's mind: 20
 Next as thy coursers from the Pythian plain
 Have borne the glorious prize away,
 While Phœbus gives thee to display
 Th' exulting pomp and choral strain.

EPODE I

O cease not, while the song, that swells thy
 fame, 25
 Sounds through Cyrenè's echoing towers,
 Where Venus spreads her sweetest bowers,
 God the great cause of all things to proclaim.
 First of thy peers be great Carrhotus styled;
 He brought not to th' applauding plain, 30
 Where Battus' just descendants reign,
 Excuse, repentant Epimethes' child;
 But foremost in the chariot-course
 By pleased Castalia's sacred source
 Th' accepted stranger pass'd, and round 35
 Thy kingly locks his wreath of glory bound.

STROPHE II

Twelve times round the measured bourn
 With heel unmatch'd, uninjured rein, Flew the swift steeds, nor tire nor trapping
 torn—
 Lo! where by Delphi's fane 40
 Hangs the fair chariot (sound and bright
 As from the sculptor's hand it wheel'd
 Beneath the steep Crisæan height
 To th' hollow plain and sacred field), Slung from the cypress beam, the God be-
 side; 45
 Where by the Cretan archers' hands
 Hewn from one trunk his statue stands,
 The rich Parnassian temple's pride.

ANTISTROPHE II

Him with grateful heart we praise,
 Whose deeds exalt his country's king: 50
 On thee, Alexibiades, their rays
 The bright-hair'd Graces fling;

Blest in the minstrel's mindful strain,
 Thy rare exploit's reward, to live: 54
 Twice twenty chariots strew'd the plain,
 Thy wheels ungrazed, thy steeds survive:

Skill hath no place but in the brave man's
 breast;
 Now from the glorious games once more
 His Libyan plains, his native shore, 59
 The youth's triumphant steps have press'd.

EPODE II

Thus labour still, man's painful part, remains.
 Yet mark! the same propitious Power
 (The stranger's light, the nation's tower)
 That beam'd on ancient Battus, still sustains
 The throne he stablish'd, and with gifts profuse 65
 Blesses his people. Him, 'tis said,
 The stately lions roaring fled:
 His alien speech their awe-struck ire subdues.
 Phœbus himself, that led the way,
 Gave their fierce natures to dismay; 70
 That no rude chance might stay Cyrenè's
 lord
 In his great course, or thwart th' unerring
 word.

STROPHE III

Phœbus dire disease's cure
 To seers and sapient matrons shows:
 He gave the lyre, and on his favourites
 pure 75
 Th' inspiring Muse bestows
 (The Muse, that wins from ruthless war
 The soften'd soul to love and peace):
 He rules the shrine oracular;
 Where warn'd by him th' Herculean
 race 80
 Sought with th' Ægimians on Laconian
 ground,
 In Pyle and Argos their abode.
 The praise, from Sparta's deeds that flow'd,
 Be mine in partial strain to sound.

ANTISTROPHE III

Spartan's born by favour'd sires 85
 From Ægeus sprung to Thera came:
 Fate led them to the land whose sacred
 fires
 With many a victim flame.

Thence, Phœbus, thy Carneian rites
 To proud Cyrenæ's mount we bore, 90
 Still hallowing as the feast invites,
 Her fair-built fanes and echoing shore.
 Thither Antenor's sons, Troy's grave remains,
 By hostile flames in ruin laid,
 With Helen's Grecian wanderers fled, 95
 And left their sons th' adopted plains.

EPODE III

There dwelt that race of warlike charioteers,
 To whose heroic shades the band,
 That led by Battus rules the land,
 Still slays the sacrifice, the altar rears; 100 Battus, whose winged galleys through the
 brine
 Oped their deep passage. For the gods
 High groves he raised, their dark abodes:
 He the Scyrotan to Apollo's shrine, 104
 Where the full pomp with prancing steed
 Imploring blessings might proceed,
 His spacious causeway plann'd. The Forum
 nigh
 Aloof the vulgar tombs his reliques lie.

STROPHE IV

Blest his mortal part he bore;
 In death a hero's rites he knows: 110
 Their sacred kings far off, the walls before,
 In humbler rest repose.
 Still in the shades beyond the grave
 Our liquid lays their spirits hear, Shedding soft dews and streams that
 lave 115
 The living flower their virtues bear;
 Lays, that with them Arcesilas record
 Their glorious son; whose choral train
 Now sing for him in sounding strain.
 Phœbus who waves the flaming sword, 120

ANTISTROPHE IV

Him, who sends from Pytho's hills
 The graceful song, that far o'erbuys
 The cost of conquest, to the prince that fills
 The praises of the wise.
 'Tis but the general tale: in wit, 125
 In words, with age his youth may vie;
 Bold as the Sovereign bird, whose might
 With wings expanded awes the sky.
 His strength in contest, like the tower in war:
 A child the Muses' haunts he knew, 130
 Still on their pinion soars; and who Shall guide with him the glowing car?

EPODE IV

All the domestic paths that lead to fame,
 His enterprising steps have tried;
 And well th' approving gods supplied 135
 His purposes with power. Through life the same
 Grant him, in act resolved, in counsel sage,
 Blest sons of Saturn, long to know;
 Nor let th' autumnal tempest blow
 To blast the ripe abundance of his age: 140
 Jove, whose high will exalts and moves
 The destiny of those he loves,
 Vouchsafe the sons of Battus to obtain Like wreaths of glory from th' Olympian
 plain.

BEN JONSON

(1573-1637)

A PINDARIC ODE

TO THE IMMORTAL MEMORY AND FRIEND-SHIP OF THAT NOBLE PAIR, SIR
 LUCIUS CARY AND SIR H. MORISON

I

STROPHE

BRAVE infant of Saguntum, clear
 Thy coming forth in that great year,
 When the prodigious Hannibal did crown
 His rage with razing your immortal town.
 Thou looking then about, 5
 Ere thou wert half got out,
 Wise child, didst hastily return,
 And mad'st thy mother's womb thine urn.
 How summed a circle didst thou leave mankind
 Of deepest lore, could we the center find! 10

ANTISTROPHE

Did wiser nature draw thee back,
 From out the horror of that sack;
 Where shame, faith, honor, and regard of
 right,
 Lay trampled on? the deeds of death and
 night
 Urged, hurried forth, and hurled 15
 Upon the affrighted world;
 Fire, famine, and fell fury met,
 And all on utmost ruin set:
 As, could they but life's miseries foresee, 19
 No doubt all infants would return like thee.

EPODE

For what is life, if measured by the space,
 Not by the act?
 Or masked man, if valued by his face,
 Above his fact?
 Here's one outlived his peers 25
 And told forth fourscore years:
 He vexed time, and busied the whole state:
 Troubled both foes and friends;
 But ever to no ends:
 What did this stirrer but die late? 30
 How well at twenty had he fallen or stood!
 For three of his four score he did no good.

II

STROPHE

He entered well by virtuous parts,
 Got up, and thrived with honest arts,
 He purchased friends, and fame, and honors
 then, 35
 And had his noble name advanced with men;
 But weary of that flight,
 He stooped in all men's sight
 To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
 And sunk in that dead sea of life, 40
 So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,
 But that the cork of title buoyed him up.

ANTISTROPHE

Alas! but Morison fell young!
 He never fell,—thou fall'st, my tongue.
 He stood a soldier to the last right end, 45
 A perfect patriot and a noble friend;
 But most, a virtuous son.
 All offices were done
 By him, so ample, full, and round,
 In weight, in measure, number, sound, 50
 As, though his age imperfect might appear,
 His life was of humanity the sphere.

EPODE

Go now, and tell our days summed up with fears,
 And make them years;
 Produce thy mass of miseries on the stage, 55
 To swell thine age;
 Repeat of things a throng,
 To show thou hast been long,
 Not lived; for life doth her great actions
 spell
 By what was done and wrought 60
 In season, and so brought
 To light: her measures are, how well

Each syllable answered, and was formed how
 fair;
 These make the lines of life, and that's her
 air!

III

STROPHE

It is not growing like a tree 65
 In bulk, doth make men better be;
 Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
 To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sear:
 A lily of a day,
 Is fairer far, in May, 70
 Although it fall and die that night;
 It was the plant and flower of light.
 In small proportions we just beauties see;
 And in short measures life may perfect be.

ANTISTROPHE

Call, noble Lucius, then, for wine, 75
 And let thy looks with gladness shine;
 Accept this garland, plant it on thy head,
 And think, nay know, thy Morison's not
 dead.
 He leaped the present age,
 Possess with holy rage, 80
 To see that bright eternal day;
 Of which we priests and poets say
 Such truths as we expect for happy men;
 And there he lives with memory and Ben

EPODE

Jonson, who sung this of him, ere he went, 85
 Himself, to rest,
 Or taste a part of that full joy he meant
 To have exprest,
 In this bright asterism;
 Where it were friendship's schism, 90
 Were not his Lucius long with us to tarry,
 To separate these twi-
 Lights, the Dioscuri;
 And keep the one half from his Harry.
 But fate doth so alternate the design, 95
 Whilst that in heaven, this light on earth must shine.

IV

STROPHE

And shine as you exalted are;
 Two names of friendship, but one star:
 Of hearts the union, and those not by chance
 Made, or indenture, or leased out t' advance

The profits for a time, 101
 No pleasures vain did chime,
 Of rhymes, or riots, at your feasts,
 Orgies of drink, or feigned protests;
 But simple love of greatness and of good,
 That knits brave minds and manners more than blood. 106

ANTISTROPHE

This made you first to know the why
 You liked, then after, to apply
 That liking; and approach so one the t'
 other,
 Till either grew a portion of the other; 110
 Each styléd by his end,
 The copy of his friend.
 You lived to be the great sir-names
 And titles by which all made claims
 Unto the Virtue: nothing perfect done, 115
 But as a Cary or a Morison.

EPODE

And such a force the fair example had,
 As they that saw
 The good and durst not practise it, were glad
 That such a law 120
 Was left yet to mankind;
 Where they might read and find Friendship, indeed, was written not in
 words;
 And with the heart, not pen,
 Of two so early men, 125
 Whose lines her rolls were, and records;
 Who, ere the first down bloomed on the chin,
 Had sowed these fruits, and got the harvest in.

JOHN DRYDEN

(1631-1700)

ALEXANDER'S FEAST

OR, THE POWER OF MUSIC; AN ODE IN HONOR OF ST. CECILIA'S DAY
 (1697)

I

T WAS at the royal feast, for Persia won
 By Philip's warlike son:
 Aloft in awful state
 The godlike hero sate
 On his imperial throne: 5
 His valiant peers were placed around;

Their brows with roses and with myrtles
 bound
 (So should desert in arms be crowned).
 The lovely Thais, by his side,
 Sate like a blooming Eastern bride 10
 In flow'r of youth and beauty's pride.
 Happy, happy, happy pair!
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair. 15

CHORUS

Happy, happy, happy pair!
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair.

II

Timotheus, placed on high 20
 Amid the tuneful choir,
 With flying fingers touched the lyre:
 The trembling notes ascend the sky,
 And heav'nly joys inspire.
 The song began from Jove, 25
 Who left his blissful seats above
 (Such is the power of mighty love).
 A dragon's fiery form belied the god:
 Sublime on radiant spires he rode,
 When he to fair Olympia pressed; 30
 And while he sought her snowy breast:
 Then, round her slender waist he curled,
 And stamped an image of himself, a sov'- reign of the world.
 The list'ning crowd admire the lofty sound;
 "A present deity," they shout around; 35
 "A present deity," the vaulted roofs re-
 bound:
 With ravished ears
 The monarch hears,
 Assumes the god,
 Affects to nod, 40
 And seems to shake the spheres.

CHORUS

With ravished ears
 The monarch hears,
 Assumes the god,
 Affects to nod, 45
 And seems to shake the spheres.

III

The praise of Bacchus then the sweet musician sung,
 Of Bacchus ever fair and ever young:

The jolly god in triumph comes;
 Sound the trumpets; beat the drums; 50
 Flushed with a purple grace
 He shows his honest face:
 Now give the hautboys breath; he comes, he comes.
 Bacchus, ever fair and young,
 Drinking joys did first ordain; 55
 Bacchus' blessings are a treasure.
 Drinking is the soldier's pleasure:
 Rich the treasure,
 Sweet the pleasure,
 Sweet is pleasure after pain. 60

CHORUS

Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
 Drinking is the soldier's pleasure:
 Rich the treasure,
 Sweet the pleasure,
 Sweet is pleasure after pain. 65

IV

Soothed with the sound, the king grew vain;
 Fought all his battles o'er again;
 And thrice he routed all his foes; and thrice
 he slew the slain.
 The master saw the madness rise;
 His glowing cheeks, his ardent eyes; 70
 And, while he heav'n and earth defied,
 Changed his hand, and checked his pride.
 He chose a mournful Muse,
 Soft pity to infuse:
 He sung Darius great and good, 75
 By too severe a fate,
 Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,
 Fallen from his high estate,
 And welt'ring in his blood;
 Deserted, at his utmost need, 80
 By those his former bounty fed;
 On the bare earth exposed he lies,
 With not a friend to close his eyes.

With downcast looks the joyless victor sate,
 Revolving in his altered soul 85
 The various turns of chance below;
 And, now and then, a sigh he stole;
 And tears began to flow.

CHORUS

Revolving in his altered soul
 The various turns of chance below; 90
 And, now and then, a sigh he stole;
 And tears began to flow.

V

The mighty master smiled, to see
 That love was in the next degree:
 'T was but a kindred sound to move, 95
 For pity melts the mind to love.
 Softly sweet, in Lydian measures,
 Soon he soothed his soul to pleasures.
 "War," he sung, "is toil and trouble;
 Honor, but an empty bubble; 100
 Never ending, still beginning,
 Fighting still, and still destroying:
 If the world be worth thy winning,
 Think, O think it worth enjoying;
 Lovely Thais sits beside thee, 105
 Take the good the gods provide thee."

The many rend the skies with loud applause;
 So Love was crowned, but Music won the
 cause.

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
 Gazed on the fair 110
 Who caused his care,
 And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
 Sighed and looked, and sighed again:
 At length, with love and wine at once oppressed, 114
 The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast.

CHORUS

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
 Gazed on the fair
 Who caused his care,
 And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
 Sighed and looked, and sighed again: 120
 At length, with love and wine at once oppressed,
 The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast.

VI

Now strike the golden lyre again:
 A louder yet, and yet a louder strain.
 Break his bands of sleep asunder, 125
 And rouse him, like a rattling peal of thunder.

Hark, hark, the horrid sound
 Has raised up his head:
 As awaked from the dead,
 And amazed, he stares around. 130
 "Revenge, revenge!" Timotheus cries,
 "See the Furies arise!
 See the snakes that they rear,
 How they hiss in their hair,

And the sparkles that flash from their
eyes! 135

Behold a ghastly band,
Each a torch in his hand!

Those are Grecian ghosts, that in battle were slain,

And unburied remain
Inglorious on the plain: 140

Give the vengeance due
To the valiant crew.

Behold how they toss their torches on high,

How they point to the Persian abodes,
And glitt'ring temples of their hostile gods!"

The princes applaud, with a furious joy; 146

And the king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;

Thais led the way,

To light him to his prey,

And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.

CHORUS

And the king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy; 151

Thais led the way,

To light him to his prey,

And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.

VII

Thus, long ago, 155

Ere heaving bellows learned to blow,

While organs yet were mute;

Timotheus, to his breathing flute,

And sounding lyre,

Could swell the soul to rage, or kindle soft
desire. 160

At last, divine Cecilia came,

Inventress of the vocal frame;

The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,
Enlarged the former narrow bounds,

And added length to solemn sounds, 165

With nature's mother wit, and arts unknown
before.

Let old Timotheus yield the prize,

Or both divide the crown;

He raised a mortal to the skies;

She drew an angel down. 170

GRAND CHORUS

At last, divine Cecilia came,

Inventress of the vocal frame;

The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,

Enlarged the former narrow bounds,

And added length to solemn sounds, 175

With nature's mother wit, and arts unknown

THOMAS GRAY

(1716-1771)

THE PROGRESS OF POESY¹

STROPHE

AWAKE, Æolian lyre,² awake,

And give to rapture all thy trembling strings.

From Helicon's harmonious springs

A thousand rills their mazy progress take:

The laughing flowers, that round them blow,

Drink life and fragrance as they flow. 6

Now the rich stream of music winds along

Deep, majestic, smooth, and strong,

Through verdant vales, and Ceres' golden reign.³

Now rolling down the steep amain, 10

Headlong, impetuous, see it pour:

The rocks, and nodding groves rebel to the roar.

ANTISTROPHE

Oh! Sovereign of the willing soul,

Parent of sweet and solemn-breathing airs,

Enchanting shell!⁴ the sullen Cares, 15

And frantic Passions hear thy soft control.

On Thracia's hills the Lord of War,⁵

Has curbed the fury of his car,

And dropped his thirsty lance at thy command.

Perching on the sceptered hand 20

Of Jove, thy magic lulls the feathered king⁶

With ruffled plumes, and flagging wing:

Quenched in dark clouds of slumber lie

The terror of his beak, and lightnings of his eye.

Thee the voice, the dance, obey, 25
 Tempered to thy warbled lay.
 O'er Idalia's¹ velvet-green
 The rosy-crown'd Loves are seen
 On Cytherea's day. 29

With antic Sports, and blue-eyed Pleasures,
 Frisking light in frolic measures;
 Now pursuing, now retreating,
 Now in circling troops they meet:
 To brisk notes in cadence beating
 Glance their many-twinkling feet. 35
 Slow melting strains their Queen's approach declare:

Where'er she turns the Graces homage
 pay.
 With arms sublime, that float upon the air,
 In gliding state she wins her easy way:
 O'er her warm cheek, and rising bosom,
 move 40
 The bloom of young Desire, and purple light of Love.

STROPHE

Man's feeble race what Ills await,
 Labor and Penury, the racks of Pain,
 Disease, and Sorrow's weeping train,
 And Death, sad refuge from the storms of
 Fate! 45
 The fond complaint, my Song, disprove,
 And justify the laws of Jove.
 Say, has he giv'n in vain the heav'nly Muse?
 Night, and all her sickly dews,
 Her Specters wan, and Birds of boding cry, 50
 He gives to range the dreary sky:
 Till down the eastern cliffs afar Hyperion's march² they spy, and glitt'ring shafts of war.

ANTISTROPHE

In climes beyond the solar road,
 Where shaggy forms o'er ice-built mountains roam, 55
 The Muse has broke the twilight-gloom
 To cheer the shiv'ring Native's dull abode.
 And oft, beneath the od'rous shade
 Of Chili's boundless forests laid,
 She deigns to hear the savage Youth repeat
 In loose numbers wildly sweet 61

 Isles, that crown th' Ægean deep,
 Fields, that cool Ilissus³ laves,
 Or where Mæander's⁴ amber waves
 In lingering Lab'rinth creep, 70
 How do your tuneful Echoes languish,
 Mute, but to the voice of Anguish?
 Where each old poetic Mountain
 Inspiration breathed around:
 Ev'ry shade and hallowed Fountain 75
 Murmured deep a solemn sound:
 Till the sad Nine in Greece's evil hour
 Left their Parnassus for the Latian plains.
 Alike they scorn the pomp of tyrant-Power,
 And coward Vice, that revels in her chains. 80
 When Latium had her lofty spirit lost,
 They sought, O Albion! next thy sea-en-

Far from the sun and summer-gale,
 In thy green lap was Nature's Darling⁶
 laid,
 What time, where lucid Avon strayed, 85
 To Him the mighty Mother did unveil
 Her awful face: The Dauntless Child
 Stretched forth his little arms, and smiled.
 This pencil take (she said) whose colors clear
 Richly paint the vernal year: 90
 Thine too these golden keys, immortal Boy!
 This can unlock the gates of Joy;
 Of Horror that, and thrilling Fears,
 Or ope the sacred source of sympathetic
 Tears.

⁵Gray's note on this epode is as follows: Progress of poetry from Greece to Italy, and from Italy to England.
 Chaucer was not unacquainted with the writings of Dante or of Petrarch. The Earl of Surrey and Sir Tho. Wyatt had traveled in Italy [Gray is wrong about Surrey, who was never in Italy, though he spent some time in France], and formed their taste there; Spenser imitated the Italian writers; Milton improved on them: but this school expired soon after the Restoration, and a new one arose on the French model, which has subsisted ever since.

ANTISTROPHE

Nor second He,¹ that rode sublime 95
 Upon the seraph-wings of Ecstasy,
 The secrets of th' Abyss to spy.
 He passed the flaming bounds of Place and
 Time:
 The living Throne, the sapphire-blaze,
 Where Angels tremble, while they gaze, 100
 He saw; but blasted with excess of light,
 Closed his eyes in endless night.
 Behold, where Dryden's less presumptuous
 car,
 Wide o'er the fields of Glory bear
 Two Coursers of ethereal race, 105
 With necks in thunder clothed, and long-resounding pace.

Hark, his hands the lyre explore!
 Bright-eyed Fancy hovering o'er Scatters from her pictured urn 109
 Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn.
 But ah! 'tis heard no more—
 Oh! Lyre divine, what daring Spirit
 Wakes thee now? though he inherit
 Nor the pride, nor ample pinion,
 That the Theban Eagle bear² 115
 Sailing with supreme dominion
 Through the azure deep of air:
 Yet oft before his infant eyes would run
 Such forms, as glitter in the Muse's ray 119
 With orient hues, unborrowed of the Sun:
 Yet shall he mount, and keep his distant way
 Beyond the limits of a vulgar fate,
 Beneath the Good how far—but far above the Great.

THE BARD³

A PINDARIC ODE

ADVERTISEMENT

THE following Ode is founded on a Tradition current in Wales, that Edward the First, when he completed the conquest of that country, ordered all the Bards that fell into his hands to be put to death.⁴

¹Milton.

²Pindar compares himself to that bird, and his enemies to ravens that croak and clamor in vain below, while it pursues its flight, regardless of their noise (Gray's note).

³Begun in 1754 and finished in 1757, when it was first published.

⁴This tradition has no foundation in fact. Edward I reigned from 1272 to 1307.

STROPHE

"RUIN seize thee, ruthless King!
 Confusion on thy banners wait,
 Though fanned by Conquest's crimson wing
 They mock the air with idle state.
 Helm, nor Hauberk's twisted mail, 5
 Nor even thy virtues, Tyrant, shall avail
 To save thy secret soul from nightly fears,
 From Cambria's⁵ curse, from Cambria's
 tears!"
 Such were the sounds, that o'er the crested pride 9
 Of the first Edward scattered wild dismay,
 As down the steep of Snowdon's⁶ shaggy side
 He wound with toilsome march his long array.
 Stout Glo'ster⁷ stood aghast in speechless
 trance;
 To arms! cried Mortimer,⁸ and couched his quiv'ring lance.

ANTISTROPHE

On a rock, whose haughty brow 15
 Frowns o'er old Conway's foaming flood,
 Robed in the sable garb of woe,
 With haggard eyes the Poet stood;
 (Loose his beard, and hoary hair 19
 Streamed, like a meteor, to the troubled air)
 And with a Master's hand, and Prophet's fire, Struck the deep sorrows of his lyre.
 "Hark, how each giant-oak, and desert cave,
 Sighs to the torrent's awful voice beneath!
 O'er thee, O King! their hundred arms they
 wave, 25
 Revenge on thee in hoarser murmurs breathe.
 Vocal no more, since Cambria's fatal day,
 To high-born Hoel's harp, or soft Llewel-lyn's lay.

⁶A name given by the Saxons to that mountainous tract which the Welsh themselves call Craigian-eryri: it included all the highlands of Carnarvonshire and Merionethshire, as far east as the river Conway (Gray's note).

⁷Gilbert de Clare, surnamed the Red, Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, son-in-law to King Edward (Gray's note).

⁸Edmond de Mortimer, Lord of Wigmore. They were both Lords-Marchers, whose lands lay on the borders of Wales, and probably accompanied the king in this expedition (Gray's note).

Brave Urien sleeps upon his craggy bed:
Mountains, ye mourn in vain
Modred, whose magic song
Made huge Plinlimmon¹ bow his cloud-topped head.

On dreary Arvon's shore they lie,² 35
Smeared with gore, and ghastly pale:
Far, far aloof th' affrighted ravens sail;
The famished Eagle screams, and passes by.
Dear lost companions of my tuneful art, 39
Dear, as the light that visits these sad eyes,
Dear, as the ruddy drops that warm my
heart,

Ye died amidst your dying country's cries—
No more I weep. They do not sleep.
On yonder cliffs, a grisly band,
I see them sit, they linger yet, 45
Avengers of their native land:
With me in dreadful harmony they join,
And weave with bloody hands the tissue of thy line.

STROPHE

“Weave the warp, and weave the woof,
The winding-sheet of Edward's race. 50
Give ample room, and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace.
Mark the year, and mark the night,
When Severn shall re-echo with affright
The shrieks of death, through Berkeley's roofs that ring, 55
Shrieks of an agonizing King!³
She-Wolf⁴ of France, with unrelenting fangs,
That tear't the bowels of thy mangled Mate,
From thee be born, who o'er thy country
hangs⁵
The scourge of Heav'n. What Terrors round him wait! 60
Amazement in his van, with Flight combined,
And sorrow's faded form, and solitude behind.

Fair laughs⁷ the Morn, and soft the Zephyr
blows,

While proudly riding o'er the azure realm
In gallant trim the gilded Vessel goes; Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm;

Regardless of the sweeping Whirlwind's
sway, 75
That, hushed in grim repose, expects his evening prey.

“Fill high the sparkling bowl,
The rich repast prepare,
Reft of a crown, he yet may share the feast:
Close by the regal chair 80
Fell Thirst and Famine scowl
A baleful smile upon their baffled Guest.
Heard ye the din of battle bray,
Lance to lance, and horse to horse?
Long Years of havoc⁸ urge their destined
course, 85
And through the kindred squadrons mow their
way.
Ye Towers of Julius,⁹ London's lasting
shame,
With many a foul and midnight murder fed,
Revere his Consort's¹⁰ faith, his Father's¹¹
fame,
And spare the meek Usurper's¹² holy head. 90
Above, below, the rose¹³ of snow,
Twined with her blushing foe, we spread:

Wallows beneath the thorny shade.

¹⁴The silver boar was the device of Richard III (Gray). The “infant gore” is that of the murdered princes.

Now, Brothers, bending o'er th' accursèd loom 95
Stamp we our vengeance deep, and ratify his doom.

STROPHE

"Edward, lo! to sudden fate
(Weave we the woof. The thread is spun)
Half of thy heart we consecrate.
(The web is wove. The work is done.)' 100
Stay, O stay! nor thus forlorn Leave me unblessed, unpitied, here to mourn:
In yon bright track, that fires the western
skies,
They melt, they vanish from my eyes.
But oh! what solemn scenes on Snowdon's
height 105
Descending slow their glitt'ring skirts unroll?
Visions of glory, spare my aching sight,
Ye unborn Ages, crowd not on my soul!
No more our long-lost Arthur we bewail.
All-hail, ye genuine Kings,¹ Britonnia's Issue, hail! 110

ANTISTROPHE

"Girt with many a Baron bold,
Sublime their starry fronts they rear;
And gorgeous Dames, and Statesmen old
In bearded majesty, appear.
In the midst a Form divine!² 115
Her eye proclaims her of the Briton-Line;
Her lion-port, her awe-commanding face,
Attended sweet to virgin grace.
What strings symphonious tremble in the
air,
What strains of vocal transport round her play! 120
Hear from the grave, great Taliessin, hear;
They breathe a soul to animate thy clay.
Bright Rapture calls, and soaring, as she
sings,
Waves in the eye of Heav'n her many-colored wings.

EPODE

"The verse adorn again 125
Fierce War, and faithful Love,

²Queen Elizabeth.

And Truth severe, by fairy Fiction dressed.³
In buskined measures move
Pale Grief, and pleasing Pain,
With Horror, Tyrant of the throbbing breast.⁴ 130
A Voice, as of the Cherub-Choir,
Gales from blooming Eden bear;⁵
And distant warblings lessen on my ear,
That lost in long futurity expire.⁶
Fond impious Man, think'st thou, yon sanguine cloud, 135
Raised by thy breath, has quenched the Orb of day?
To-morrow he repairs the golden flood,
And warms the nations with redoubled ray.
Enough for me: With joy I see
The different doom our Fates assign. 140
Be thine Despair, and sceptered Care,
To triumph, and to die, are mine."
He spoke, and headlong from the mountain's
height
Deep in the roaring tide he plunged to endless night.

ODE

INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY FROM RECOLLECTIONS OF EARLY CHILDHOOD

I

THERE was a time when meadow, grove,
and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
To me did seem
Apparelled in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream. 5
It is not now as it hath been of yore;—
Turn whereso'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

II

The Rainbow comes and goes, 10
And lovely is the Rose,
The Moon doth with delight

³The reference is to Spenser's Faerie Queene.

⁴Shakespeare.

⁵Milton.

⁶The succession of poets after Milton's time (Gray).

Look round her when the heavens are bare;
 Waters on a starry night
 Are beautiful and fair; 15
 The sunshine is a glorious birth;
 But yet I know, where'er I go,
 That there hath past away a glory from
 —the earth.

III

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous
 song,
 And while the young lambs bound 20
 As to the tabor's sound,
 To me alone there came a thought of grief;
 A timely utterance gave that thought relief,
 And I again am strong:
 The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep; 25
 No more shall grief of mine the season
 wrong;
 I hear the Echoes through the mountains
 throng,
 The Winds come to me from the fields of
 sleep,
 And all the earth is gay;
 Land and sea 30
 Give themselves up to jollity,
 And with the heart of May Doth every Beast keep holiday;—
 Thou Child of Joy,
 Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou happy Shepherd-boy! 35

IV

Ye blessèd Creatures, I have heard the
 call
 Ye to each other make; I see
 The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;
 My heart is at your festival,
 My head hath its coronal, 40
 The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it
 all.
 Oh evil day! if I were sullen
 While Earth herself is adorning,
 This sweet May-morning,
 And the Children are culling 45
 On every side,
 In a thousand valleys far and wide,
 Fresh flowers; while the sun shines warm,
 And the Babe leaps up on his Mother's
 arm:—
 I hear, I hear, with joy I hear! 50
 —But there's a Tree, of many, one,

A single Field which I have looked upon,
 Both of them speak of something that is
 gone:
 The Pansy at my feet
 Doth the same tale repeat: 55
 Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
 Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

V

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
 The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
 Hath had elsewhere its setting, 60
 And cometh from afar:
 Not in entire forgetfulness,
 And not in utter nakedness,
 But trailing clouds of glory do we come
 From God, who is our home: 65
 Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
 Shades of the prison-house begin to close
 Upon the growing Boy,
 But he beholds the light, and whence it
 flows,
 He sees it in his joy; 70
 The Youth, who daily farther from the east
 Must travel, still is Nature's Priest,
 And by the vision splendid
 Is on his way attended;
 At length the Man perceives it die away, 75
 And fade into the light of common day.

VI

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her
 own;
 Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
 And, even with something of a Mother's
 mind,
 And no unworthy aim, 80
 The homely Nurse doth all she can
 To make her Foster-child, her Inmate Man,
 Forget the glories he hath known,
 And that imperial palace whence he came.

VII

Behold the Child among his new-born blisses,
 A six years' Darling of a pigmy size!
 See, where 'mid work of his own hand he lies,
 Fretted by sallies of his mother's kisses,
 With light upon him from his father's eyes!
 See, at his feet, some little plan or chart, 90
 Some fragment from his dream of human life,
 Shaped by himself with newly-learned art;
 A wedding or a festival,
 A mourning or a funeral;
 And this hath now his heart, 95

And unto this he frames his song:
 Then will he fit his tongue
 To dialogues of business, love, or strife;
 But it will not be long Ere this be thrown aside, 100
 And with new joy and pride
 The little Actor cons another part;
 Filling from time to time his "humorous stage"
 With all the Persons, down to palsied Age,
 That Life brings with her in her equipage;
 As if his whole vocation
 Were endless imitation.

VIII

Thou, whose exterior semblance doth belie
 Thy Soul's immensity;
 Thou best Philosopher, who yet dost keep
 Thy heritage, thou Eye among the blind,
 That, deaf and silent, read'st the eternal
 deep,
 Haunted for ever by the eternal mind,—
 Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!
 On whom those truths do rest, 115
 Which we are toiling all our lives to find,
 In darkness lost, the darkness of the brave;
 Thou, over whom thy Immortality
 Broods like the Day, a Master o'er a Slave,
 A Presence which is not to be put by; 120
 Thou little Child, 'yet glorious in the might
 Of heaven-born freedom on thy being's
 height,
 Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
 The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
 Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
 Full soon thy Soul shall have her earthly freight,
 And custom lie upon thee with a weight,
 Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life!

IX

O joy! that in our embers
 Is something that doth live, 130
 That nature yet remembers
 What was so fugitive!
 The thought of our past years in me doth
 breed
 Perpetual benediction: not indeed
 For that which is most worthy to be blest—
 Delight and liberty, the simple creed
 Of Childhood, whether busy or at rest,
 With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast:—

Not for these I raise
 The song of thanks and praise; 140
 But for those obstinate questionings
 Of sense and outward things,
 Fallings from us, vanishings;
 Blank misgivings of a Creature
 Moving about in worlds not realized, 145
 High instincts before which our mortal
 Nature
 Did tremble like a guilty Thing surprised:
 But for those first affections,
 Those shadowy recollections,
 Which, be they what they may, 150
 Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
 Are yet a master light of all our seeing;
 Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make
 Our noisy years seem moments in the being
 Of the eternal Silence: truths that wake, 155
 To perish never;
 Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavor,
 Nor Man nor Boy,
 Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
 Can utterly abolish or destroy! 160
 Hence in a season of calm weather
 Though inland far we be,
 Our Souls have sight of that immortal sea
 Which brought us hither,
 Can in a moment travel thither, 165
 And see the Children sport upon the shore,
 And hear the mighty waters rolling ever-
 more.

x

Then sing, ye Birds, sing, sing a joyous
 song!
 And let the young Lambs bound
 As to the tabor's sound! 170
 We in thought will join your throng,
 Ye that pipe and ye that play,
 Ye that through your hearts to-day
 Feel the gladness of the May!
 What thou the radiance which was once so
 bright 175
 Be now forever taken from my sight,
 Though nothing can bring back the hour
 Of Splendor in the grass, of glory in the flower;
 We will grieve not, rather find
 Strength in what remains behind; 180
 In the primal sympathy
 Which having been must ever be;
 In the soothing thoughts that spring
 Out of human suffering;

In the faith that looks through death, 185
In years that bring the philosophic mind.

XI

And O ye Fountains, Meadows, Hills, and Groves,

Forebode not any severing of our loves!
Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your might;
I only have relinquished one delight 190
To live beneath your more habitual sway.
I love the Brooks which down their channels
fret,

Even more than when I tripped lightly as
they;

The innocent brightness of a new-born Day
Is lovely yet; 195

The Clouds that gather round the setting
sun

Do take a sober coloring from an eye
That hath kept watch o'er man's mortality;
Another race hath been, and other palms are won.

Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears,
To me the meanest flower that blows can give

Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

PERCY BYSSHE
SHELLEY (1792-1822)

TO A SKYLARK

HAIL to thee, blithe spirit!

Bird thou never wert,

That from heaven, or near it,

Pourest thy full heart

In profuse strains of unpremeditated art. 5

Higher still and higher

From the earth thou springest

Like a cloud of fire;

The blue deep thou wingest,

And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest. 10

In the golden lightning

Of the sunken sun,

O'er which clouds are brightning,

Thou dost float and run;

Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun. 15

The pale purple even Melts around thy flight;

Like a star of heaven,

In the broad daylight

Thou art unseen, but yet I hear thy shrill delight, 20

Keen as are the arrows

Of that silver sphere,

Whose intense lamp narrows

In the white dawn clear,

Until we hardly see, we feel that it is there. 25

All the earth and air

With thy voice is loud,

As, when night is bare,

From one lonely cloud

The moon rains out her beams, and heaven is overflowed. 30

What thou art we know not;

What is most like thee?

From rainbow clouds there flow not

Drops so bright to see,

As from thy presence showers a rain of melody. 35

Like a poet hidden

In the light of thought,

Singing hymns unbidden,

Till the world is wrought

To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded
not: 40

Like a high-born maiden

In a palace-tower,

Soothing her love-laden

Soul in secret hour

With music sweet as love, which overflows her bower: 45

Like a glow-worm golden

In a dell of dew,

Scattering unbeholden

Its ærial hue

Among the flowers and grass, which screen it from the view: 50

Like a rose embowered

In its own green leaves,

By warm winds deflowered,

Till the scent it gives Makes faint with too much sweet these heavy-winged thieves: 55

Sound of vernal showers
 On the twinkling grass,
 Rain-awakened flowers,
 All that ever was Joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy music doth surpass: 60

Teach us, sprite or bird,
 What sweet thoughts are thine:
 I have never heard
 Praise of love or wine
 That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine. 65

Chorus Hymeneal,
 Or triumphal chant,
 Matched with thine would be all
 But an empty vaunt,
 A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want. 70

What objects are the fountains
 Of thy happy strain?
 What fields, or waves, or mountains?
 What shapes of sky or plain?
 What love of thine own kind? what ignorance of pain? 75

With thy clear keen joyance
 Languor cannot be:
 Shadow of annoyance
 Never came near thee:
 Thou lovest; but ne'er knew love's sad
 satiety. 80

Waking or asleep,
 Thou of death must deem Things more true and deep
 Than we mortals dream,
 Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream? 85

We look before and after,
 And pine for what is not:
 Our sincerest laughter
 With some pain is fraught;
 Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought. 90

Yet if we could scorn
 Hate, and pride, and fear;
 If we were things born
 Not to shed a tear,
 I know not how thy joy we ever should come near. 95

Better than all measures
 Of delightful sound,
 Better than all treasures
 That in books are found,
 Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the
 ground! 100

Teach me half the gladness
 That thy brain must know,
 Such harmonious madness
 From my lips would flow,
 The world should listen then, as I am listening now. 105

JOHN KEATS

(1795-1821)

ODE ON A GRECIAN URN

THOU still unravished bride of quietness, Thou foster-child of silence and slow
 time,
 Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
 A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
 What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape 5
 Of deities or mortals, or of both,
 In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
 What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
 What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
 What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy? 10

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
 Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
 Not to the sensual ear, but, more endeared,
 Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
 Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave 15
 Thy song, nor ever can those trees be
 bare;
 Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss
 Though winning near the goal—yet, do not
 grieve;
 She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss, 19
 For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring
adieu;

And, happy melodist, unwearied,
For ever piping songs for ever new; 24
More happy love! more happy, happy love!
For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
For ever panting, and for ever young;
All breathing human passion far above,
That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead, and a parching
tongue. 30

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands
dressed?

What little town by river or sea shore, 35
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be; and not a soul to tell 39
Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede
Of marble men and maidens over wrought,
With forest branches and the trodden weed;
Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of
thought

As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral! 45
When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all 50
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to
know.

ODE TO A NIGHTINGALE

MY HEART aches, and a drowsy numbness
pains

My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,

Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:

'T is not through envy of thy happy lot, 5
But being too happy in thine happiness.—

That thou, light wingèd Dryad of the trees,

In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease. 10

O for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delved
earth,

Tasting of Flora and the country green,
Dance, and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth!

O for a breaker full of the warm South, 15
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene, With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,

And purple-stainèd mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world
unseen,

And with thee fade away into the forest dim: 20

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget What thou among the leaves hast never
known,

The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other
groan;

Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs, 25

Where youth grows pale, and specter-thin, and dies;

Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despairs,

Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous
eyes,

Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow. 30

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:

Already with thee! tender is the night, 35
And haply the Queen-Moon is on her
throne,

Clustered around by all her starry Fays;
But here there is no light,

Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown

Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways. 40

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet, Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
 But, in embalmèd darkness, guess each sweet
 Wherewith the seasonable month endows
 The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree
 wild; 45
 White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglan-tine;
 Fast fading violets covered up in leaves;
 And mid-May's eldest child,
 The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves. 50

Darkling I listen; and, for many a time
 I have been half in love with easeful
 Death,
 Called him soft names in many a musèd
 rime,
 To take into the air my quiet breath;
 Now more than ever seems it rich to die, 55
 To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
 While thou art pouring forth thy soul
 abroad
 In such an ecstasy!
